Ver. 19. So he went back with him, and did eat bread and water in his house.] He thought it possible that God might, in pity to him, revoke his prohibition; because he was hungry and weary. But he ought to have believed the revelation he had himself, of which he was certain; and not trusted to what another pretended was revealed to him; which he could not be sure was true. And it is said emphatically, ver. 22. The Lord did say to thee, Eat no bread, &c. If God had, in compassion to him, thought fit to recal that word, he would have done it to himself; and as plainly allowed him to refresh himself, as before he had forbidden it. So Abarbinel well observes, "Nothing that a prophet receives from God is to be altered, unless that prophet hath another word from God revoking the former." As Abraham had;

to whom God saith, (Gen. xxii. 2.) "Take thy son, &c. and offer him for a burnt-offering," &c. But when he was going to do it, he heard that command repealed, (ver. 12.) "Lay not thy hand upon the lad," &c. He would not receive a contrary command from the mouth of any prophet, but from the mouth of God alone; from whom he received the first command.

Ver. 20. And it came to pass, that as they sat at the table, the word of the Lord came to the prophet that brought him back.] God would not vouchsafe to speak to him, who had disobeyed his voice; but rather to the other, though in his name he had feigned an untruth.

Ver. 21. And he cried unto the man of God that came from Judah, saying.] He seems to be in a great agony; from the consideration of what he had done, and of what the prophet from Judah was to suffer.

Thus saith the Lord, Forasmuch as thou hast disobeyed the mouth of the Lord, and hast not kept the commandment which the Lord thy God commanded thee.] To disobey God's mouth, was to disobey the word spoken by his mouth.

Ver. 22. But camest back, and hast eaten bread and drunk water in this place of which the Lord did say to thee, Eat no bread, and drink no water; thy carcass shall not come into the sepulchre of thy fathers.] This was all his punishment; that he should shortly die, and not be buried among the Jews.

Ver. 23. And it came to pass, after he had eaten bread, and after he had drunk, that he saddled for him the ass, for the prophet whom he had brought back.] It is remarkable, that no punishment is here threatened to the old prophet for telling him a lie. Because, as Abarbinel thinks, he meant no harm to the other prophet; but fancied that his saying, he might not eat or drink with them, was only to excuse himself from going with Jeroboam to his house. And besides, it might have turned to the great advantage of the prophet who came from Judah, if he had steadfastly persisted in his resolution, and not given credit to what the old prophet said against it.

Ver. 24. And when he was gone, a lion met him by the way, and slew him.] Not far from Beth-el there was a wood; out of which the two she-bears came, that tare two-and-forty children in pieces, (2 Kings ii. 24.) Out of which wood, it is probable, this lion came, and slew this prophet.

And his carcass was cast in the way, and the ass stood by it, the lion also stood by the carcass.] This was to admonish all the prophets to observe God's commands strictly; and to shew Jeroboam what he might expect, since God spared not a lesser offender. But, as God shewed his severity, in taking away this prophet's life, which was his punishment; so he remarkably shewed his approbation of the prophet; in that the lion stood quietly by his carcass, and did not devour it; nor do any hurt to the ass on which he rode. As if he was merely sent by a Divine appointment, to execute what God had threatened; but could not move one step beyond that commission. For when the prophet had suffered what God intended, he takes even his dead body into his protection; and would not let it be violated, as is observed below, ver. 28.

Ver. 25. And, behold, men passed by, and saw the carcass cast in the way, and the lion standing by the carcass: and they came and told it in the city where the old prophet dwelt.] As a wonderful thing; that the lion should neither fall upon his prey, nor hurt them who passed by; but suffered them to go on quietly.

Ver. 26. And when the prophet that brought him back from the way heard thereof, he said, It is the man of God, that was disobedient to the word of the Lord.] Disobedience in great cases hath been thus punished by men in authority. For the Athenians put their ambassadors to death, whom they had sent into Arcadia, though they had performed their business very well, to their content, ἐπεὶ ἑτέραν ὁδὸν ἦλθον, καὶ οὐ τὴν προστεταγμένην, because they came another way, and not that which they were prescribed. Which is the very case before us, (Ælian. lib. vi. Var. Hist. cap. 5.)

Therefore the Lord hath delivered him unto the lion, who hath torn him, and slain him, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake unto him.] The lion did not rend his body in pieces, but only gave him one wound, which killed him. In the Hebrew the word is, he broke him, that is, his bones, and so slew him speedily.

Ver. 27. And he spake to his sons, saying, Saddle me the ass. And they saddled him.] Hearing the lion stood as quiet as a lamb, and neither meddled with the carcass, nor hurt any that passed by, he did not fear to take up the body of the prophet that came from Judah; believing the lion had order to do no other mischief, but kill him.

Ver. 28. And he went, and found his carcass cast in the way, and the ass and the lion standing by the carcass: the lion had not eaten the carcass, nor torn the ass.] Here is a cluster of miracles; that the lion, contrary to his nature, did not eat the carcass, nor kill the ass, nor meddle with the travellers that passed by, nor with the old prophet and his ass: and that the ass stood so quietly, and was not frighted at the sight of a lion, and betake itself to flight; and more than this, the lion stood by the carcass a long time, until this strange news was carried into the city; as a faithful keeper of the prophet's body, that no other wild beasts should meddle with it. Which made the miracle more illustrious; and plainly shewed all this did not happen by chance.

Ver. 29. And the prophet took up the carcass of the man of God, and laid it upon the ass, and brought it back: and the old prophet came into the city to mourn, and to bury him.] To make a solemn funeral for him.

Ver. 30. And he laid his carcass in his own grave.] Which was the greatest honour he could do him.

And they mourned over him, saying, Alas, my brother!] He and his sons made the usual lamentation over him; of which this was the form, we find, in aftertimes, (Jer. xxii. 18.)

Ver. 31. And it came to pass, after he had buried him, that he spake unto his sons, saying, When I am dead, then bury me in the sepulchre wherein the man of God is buried; lay my bones beside his bones.] This he ordered, not merely out of affection to the prophet, but to secure himself from the judgment that he had threatened, ver. 2.

Ver. 32. For the saying which he cried by the word of the Lord against the altar in Beth-el, and against all the houses of the high places that are in the cities of Samaria, shall surely come to pass.] This Abarbinel looks upon as an argument that this man was a prophet of the Lord; that he foretold the same thing that the man of God, who came from Judah, did. And, as he thinks, something more; viz. the destruction of all the high places by Josiah, which is not before mentioned.

Ver. 33. After this thing Jeroboam returned not from his evil way.] By all these wonderful works (for the singular number is put for the plural) Jeroboam was not at all changed; but continued in his idolatry.

But made again of the lowest of the people priests of the high places.] He did not reform in any one thing; but still went on in making any body priests. (See xii. 31.)

Whosoever would, he consecrated him, and he became one of the priests of the high places.] Without any respect to his tribe, or family; or, indeed, to his condition.

Ver. 34. And this thing became sin to the house of Jeroboam, even to cut it off, and destroy it from the face of the earth.] Brought dreadful punishments upon his family (for so sin sometimes signifies the punishment of sin), and these not vulgar punishments, but utter extirpation.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. AT that time.] Some time after those woes were denounced against him; but the phrase doth not denote any precise time.

Abijah the son of Jeroboam was sick.] Being stricken by the hand of God with some disease.

Ver. 2. And Jeroboam said to his wife, Arise, I pray thee, and disguise thyself.] Put on such apparel as the common people wear.

That thou be not known to be the wife of Jeroboam.] He would have her go on this errand, because he was sure she would report things truly to him: but yet would not have her known to be his wife, because he would have the prophet speak more freely and indifferently: or, perhaps, he was afraid he should threaten too heavily, if he knew who she was.

And get thee to Shiloh; behold, there is the prophet Ahijah, which told me I should be king over this people.] This looks like great stupidity, that he should think to deceive a prophet, who could tell him future events: and therefore much more discover things present.

Ver. 3. And take with thee ten loaves, and cracknels, and a cruse of honey, and go to him: he shall tell thee what shall become of the child.] They that went to inquire of a prophet used to make him some present, as a token of their respect to him. (See 1 Sam. ix. 7.) And by such oblations the prophets supported themselves. This present which she made him was of such things as might make him think her to be a countrywoman, rather than a courtier.

Ver. 4. And Jeroboam's wife did so, and arose, and went to Shiloh, and came to the house of Ahijah: but Ahijah could not see; for his eyes were set by reason of his age.] In the Hebrew, his eyes stood for his hoariness. He seems to have had a film, or a cataract, grown over his eyes.

Ver. 5. And the Lord said unto Ahijah, Behold, the wife of Jeroboam cometh to ask a thing of thee for her son; for he is sick: thus and thus shalt thou say unto her; for it shall be, when she cometh to thee, that she shall feign herself to be another woman.] He was as fully instructed how to treat her, as if he had seen and known her.

Ver. 6. And it came to pass, when Ahijah heard the sound of her feet, as she came in at the door, that he said, Come in, thou wife of Jeroboam, why feignest thou thyself to be another? for I am sent to thee with heavy tidings.] He discovered her before she appeared, that she might give the greater credit to his words.

Ver. 7. Go, tell Jeroboam, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel; Forasmuch as I exalted thee from among the people, and made thee prince over my people Israel.] Raised him from a private person to be the king of the ten tribes.

Ver. 8. And rent the kingdom away from the house of David, and gave it thee; and yet thou hast not been as my servant David, who kept my commandments, and who followed me with all his heart, to do that only which was right in mine eyes.] Though David committed some great sins, yet he was upright in his religion, and never started aside in the least unto other gods. In which piety, God expected Jeroboam should have continued, as he admonished him, when he first sent Ahijah to him, (xi. 38.)

Ver. 9. But hast done evil above all that were before thee.] King Saul was not so bad; nor Solomon: who, though he was drawn aside himself, yet did not study to make his people idolaters.

For thou hast gone and made thee other gods, and molten images.] Or, even molten images; that is, the golden calves. Which he did not think to be gods, but only representations of God: and yet God looked upon this worship which was paid to him before these images, as the worship of other gods: which are called devils in 2 Chron. xi. 1 .

To provoke me to anger.] That was the effect of this idolatrous worship.

And hast cast me behind thy back.] Neglected me and my service. For those things we cast behind our backs which are nothing worth; and for which we have no regard or concern what becomes of them.

Ver. 10. Therefore, behold, I will bring evil upon the house of Jeroboam.] Severely punish it.

And will cut off from Jeroboam him that pisseth against the wall.] That is, not leave a man of his family alive, as Ralbag interprets it. (See 1 Sam. xxv. 22.)

And him that is shut up and left in Israel.] That is, married or unmarried, as De Dieu expounds these words upon Deut. xxxii. 36. all sorts of men, of whatsoever state or condition they be. Others refer this to treasures shut up in secret places, and to flocks left in the field; or, to men taken captive, or that have escaped. As much as to say, There shall be an universal destruction. And thus Bochartus glosses (comprehending all these), "I will cut off every male, whether he be a captive, or a free man; whether he live in the city, or in the country; be married or single." (See his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 66.)

And I will take away the remnant of the house of Jeroboam.] All his posterity.

As a man taketh away dung, till it be all gone.] Which servants remove so carefully, that they suffer not the least speck to remain.

Ver. 11. Him that dieth of Jeroboam in the city shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat.] That is, none of them shall be buried.

For the Lord hath spoken it.] This is God's irrevocable decree.

Ver. 12. Arise thou therefore, get thee unto thy own house; and when thy feet enter the city, the child shall die.] This was a sign that all the rest of his threatenings should be fulfilled.

Ver. 13. And all Israel shall mourn for him, and bury him; for he only of Jeroboam shall come to the grave.] All the rest were to be buried in the bowels of dogs, and of fowls of the air, (ver. 11.)

Because in him is found some good thing towards the Lord God of Israel in the house of Jeroboam.] He was the only person of that family that disliked the worship of the calves, and perhaps intended to remove them when he had power; and suffer the people to go up to Jerusalem to worship, trusting God would preserve him in his kingdom. Some of the Jews say, that he broke down a hedge which his father had made, to keep people from going to Jerusalem, at the three great feasts.

Ver. 14. Moreover, the Lord shall raise him up a king over Israel, who shall cut off the house of Jeroboam.] This king was Baasha, (xv. 27, 28.)

That day.] As soon as he was made king, (ver. 29.)

But what? even now.] What did I say (that day)? even just now. It is as sure as if it were now done. The Chaldee takes it otherwise; He shall destroy the house of Jeroboam; both that which liveth now at this day, and that which shall be born in time to come. But Kimchi puts no stop at this word vemah (and what), but continues it with what follows, in this manner, What is this which shall now happen, to that which shall come hereafter? that is, the present calamities shall be nothing to the future. Which agrees well enough with what follows, concerning the continual troubles that should be in Israel; and at last their captivity.

Ver. 15. And the Lord shall smite Israel.] For their consenting to that idolatrous worship which Jeroboam set up.

As a reed is shaken in the water.] That is, they shall be in perpetual commotions by civil wars: having no quiet, but frequently changing their kings. Thus Bochartus excellently expounds it, in an epistle to our bishop Morley, p. 106, &c. The reason of this expression was, that several of their kings were afterward killed, and new families started up; and between so many kings of so many families and tribes, their minds fluctuated and wavered; and they knew not where to fix themselves, and rest in quiet: therefore their condition is thus described in 2 Chron. xv. 5. "There was no peace to him that went in, or to him that came out," &c.

And he shall root up Israel out of this good land, which he gave to their fathers.] Which he began to do first by Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, (2 Kings xv. 29.) and then finished it by Shalmaneser, (2 Kings xvii. 5, 6, &c.)

And shall scatter them beyond the river.] That is, Euphrates: they being carried (as the forenamed places tell us) into the country of the Medes.

Because they have made their groves.] In which they placed the images of their gods. For they were not contented with the calves, but fell to grosser idolatry; which was commonly practised in groves. (See Judg. iii. 7.)

Provoking the Lord to anger.] For nothing was so detestable to him as this sin.

Ver. 16. And he shall give Israel up.] Into the hands of the heathen.

Because of the sins of Jeroboam, who did sin, and who made Israel to sin.] Perverted the whole nation: who by his authority and example were led into idolatry.

Ver. 17. And Jeroboam's wife arose, and departed, and came to Tirzah.] A city in the tribe of Manasseh: which had been famous in ancient times, (Josh. xii. 24.) and became the royal seat, and continued so for some time, (xv. 33.) being found more convenient, I suppose, than Shechem, where Jeroboam first settled.

And when she came to the threshold of the door, the child died.] It seems the king's house was near the gate of the city: for it is said, ver. 12. that as soon as she entered into the city, the child should die. And so it did, when she came to the threshold of the door of the palace.

Ver. 18. And they buried him; and all Israel mourned for him, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake by the hand of his servant Ahijah the prophet.] Whereby he confirmed all the rest of his threatenings against the house of Jeroboam and the people of Israel.

Ver. 19. And the rest of the acts of Jeroboam, how he warred, and how he reigned.] How he behaved himself in war, and in peace.

Behold, they are written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel.] Not in that book in the Bible called Chronicles; but in such a book as that wherein the acts of Solomon were recorded, day by day, xi. 41. (See there.)

Ver. 20. And the days that Jeroboam reigned were two-and-twenty years: and he slept with his fathers; and Nadab his son reigned in his stead.] His sleeping with his fathers seems to be a phrase signifying only that he died, as all before him did: not that he was buried with them, (as it is said of Rehoboam, ver. 31.) for they were private men, and he a king; who, no doubt, was magnificently interred by his son.

Ver. 21. And Rehoboam the son of Solomon reigned in Judah. Rehoboam was forty and one years old when he began to reign.] And therefore was born a year before Solomon came to the crown: for he reigned but forty years, xi. 42.

And he reigned seventeen years in Jerusalem, the city which the Lord had chosen out of all the tribes of Israel, to put his name there.] A great honour to him, of which he was not worthy; and therefore God shortened his days, and did not let him reign so long as Jeroboam.

And his mother's name was Naamah an Ammonitess.] It is much that David should suffer Solomon to marry one of this country; unless she was proselyted, as the daughter of Pharaoh is supposed to have been. He himself, indeed, had married the daughter of Talmai king of Geshur; but the son he had by her proved so wicked, that it might have been a caution to him not to marry his son, especially him he intended for the heir of his crown, to a stranger. Who, if she was proselyted, yet many think she did not so change her religion, but that she instilled ill principles into her son, and corrupted him. Nay, was one of those women that enticed Solomon to idolatry; for women of Ammon are reckoned among his strange wives.

Ver. 22. And Judah did evil in the sight of the Lord, and they provoked him to jealousy with their sins which they had committed.] By joining other gods together with him. Which is an amazing thing, that, at the beginning of his reign, Rehoboam should do well for three years, (2 Chron. xi. 17.) and then forsook the law of God, (2 Chron. xii. 1.)

and fell off from his worship, into such gross idolatry, as exceeded that of Jeroboam's.

Above all that their fathers had done.] Above all that had been practised in the time of the judges.

Ver. 23. For they also built them high places, and images, and groves, on every high hill, and under every green tree.] They multiplied altars on every high hill; and set up images; and built temples for them: which I take to be meant by groves. For they could not be under every green tree; nor could they be said to be built, but to be planted; therefore it is reasonable to interpret them temples, or places of Divine worship. As among the heathens, Strabo testifies (Geograph. lib. ix.) that the poets called their temples by the name of groves (ἄλση καλοῦσιν τὰ ἱερὰ πάντα), though they had no trees about them; because the custom was to have trees planted about their sacred places. In which the Israelites set up altars; directly contrary to the law: which intended to preserve unity in religion, by allowing one altar only.

Ver. 24. And there were also Sodomites in the land.] This kind of wickedness often attended idolatry, (xv. 12. 2 Kings xxiii. 7. Rom. i. 21. 28.) For among the heathens the most filthy things were practised in these shady dark places (their groves) by the worshippers of Venus, Bacchus, and Priapus. And such there were, it appears by the place now quoted, (2 Kings xxiii. 7.) among the Israelites: who, out of devotion to some false god or other, prostituted their bodies, contrary to nature, to be abused in honour of those gods, directly against the law, (Deut. xxiii. 17.) For when Josiah purged the temple, he is said to cast out the Sodomites: where by Kedeschim our Selden understands the priests of Astarte. (Syntag. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 2.)

Ver. 25. And it came to pass, that, in the fifth year of king Rehoboam, Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem.] Ῥοβοάμος δ' αὐτῷ παρέδωκε ἀμαχητὶ τὴν πόλιν. And Rehoboam (as Josephus writes) delivered up the city to him, without striking a stroke. For he had a vast army (as we read, 2 Chron. xii. 2.) wherewith he conquered Asia, as Herodotus tells us, who calls him Sesostris. For Josephus acknowledgeth he relates the same expedition that the Scripture doth, but under a different name. It may seem something strange, that Shishak being so nearly allied to Rehoboam should come up against him, and take his royal city: but as kingdoms are never married, so Jeroboam, it is likely, who had lived long in Egypt, stirred him up to invade him, and thereby established himself in his new kingdom: for we read not a word of any cities in Israel that he took, but only the fenced cities of Judah; (2 Chron. xii. 4.) Jeroboam and his country remaining undisturbed. Besides, it must be remembered he was not the son of Pharaoh's daughter, but of an Ammonitess: and therefore there was no kindred between Rehoboam and Shishak.

Ver. 26. And he took away the treasures of the house of the Lord, and the treasures of the king's house; he even took away all.] These riches which David and Solomon had treasured up, tempted Shishak, it is probable, to this expedition against Jerusalem: for he did not intend to keep this city, but only to spoil it.

And he took away the shields of gold which Solomon had made.] Which were in the house of the forest of Lebanon, (see x. 16, 17.) which it seems he also plundered. This was a speedy vengeance for their sins; that so soon after Solomon's death, the splendour wherein he left Jerusalem should be extinguished. For Rehoboam served God three years; was corrupted in the fourth; and in the fifth was punished.

Ver. 27. And king Rehoboam made in their stead brazen shields, and committed them into the hands of the chief of the guard.] In the Hebrew the word for guard is runner: so called because they went before the king and behind him.

Which kept the door of the king's house.] These shields were not of much value; and so were committed to men in a mean office: whereas the golden ones were kept, as I said, in the house of the forest of Lebanon.

Ver. 28. And it was so, when the king went into the house of the Lord, that the guard bare them, and brought them back into the guard-chamber.] He did not quite forsake God, but still continued to worship in the temple: and, perhaps, he now left the high places (after he had been thus chastised by the king of Egypt), and frequented the house of God better. Shields were carried before him thither for pomp's sake, that he might not be contemned by his people; and that there might be no occasion for sedition, if they were disposed to it, when they saw him so well guarded.

Ver. 29. Now the rest of the acts of Rehoboam, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] He refers those that desired a larger account of him to the public Annals, as he had done when he concludes the history of Jeroboam, ver. 19. (See there.)

Ver. 30. And there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam all their days.] This doth not seem to agree with what we read xii. 22. where God commanded Rehoboam and his people not to go to fight with Israel: and they obeyed his voice. But this is easily satisfied, by observing that the Jews were commanded not to make war upon the Israelites; but they are not commanded not to defend themselves, if the Israelites made war upon them. And this was their case; the Israelites vexed them with continual incursions and depredations; though the house of David did not assault them, but only repelled their violence; or, perhaps, upon the borders, they were continually endeavouring to get ground one of another; though they never came to a set battle.

Ver. 31. And Rehoboam slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David: and his mother's name was Naamah, an Ammonitess.] The repetition of this about his mother hath something remarkable in it, (see ver. 21.) though it is hard to know what it is. Abarbinel thinks, it is as much as to say, He did not repent at last; but as he lived, so he died, in the idolatry of his mother.

And Abijam his son reigned in his stead.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. NOW, in the eighteenth year of king Jeroboam the son of Nebat reigned Abijam over Judah.] Which seems to disagree with what is said below (ver. 9.) concerning Asa, that he began to reign the twentieth year of Jeroboam, and Abijam reigned three years. But it is usual, both in Scripture and in other authors, to reckon part of a year for a whole year. So Abijam began to reign in some part of Jeroboam's eighteenth year, and continued his reign the whole nineteenth, and died in the twentieth: and so was reckoned to have reigned three years, as it here follows.

Ver. 2. Three years reigned he in Jerusalem.] This was a very short time, as Abarbinel observes; but it was because he walked in the way of his father; which provoked God to cut him off.

And his mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom.] The same author fancies she was the daughter of Absalom, (as he is called 2 Chron. xi. 21.) who rebelled against his father David; and so was a bad daughter of a bad father. She is called by another name, 2 Chron. xiii. 2. viz. Michaiah the daughter of Uriel. But he thinks that is the name of the family, and this her proper name. Others think this is a mere fancy, and with great reason; for Abishalom is a different name from Absalom, as David's son is always called. And they think he had two names, as his daughter also had. But Pellicanus seems to me to have given the plainest account of this, that Maachah was his grandmother, and Micaiah his mother.

Ver. 3. And he walked in all the sins of his father, which he had done before him.] See xiv. 22—24.

And his heart was not perfect with the Lord his God, as the heart of David his father.] They ought all to have remembered David, and trod in his steps; who was the founder of the royal family; and never turned aside to the worship of other gods, as this man did; though together with them he worshipped the Lord God of Israel, who is therefore called the Lord his God.

Ver. 4. Nevertheless, for David's sake, the Lord his God gave him a lamp in Jerusalem, to set up his son after him.] He continued the kingdom in the posterity of David: which is the meaning of giving him a lamp. (See xi. 36.)

And to establish Jerusalem.] Whereby Jerusalem was established as the place of God's worship.

Ver. 5. Because David did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, and turned not aside from any thing that he commanded him all the days of his life, save only in the matter of Uriah the Hittite.] He was not without other sins; but none so enormous as this: and therefore not remembered, as this about Uriah is very often, to his dishonour.

Ver. 6. And there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam all the days of his life.] This was said before, (xiv. 30.) and therefore may seem to come in here impertinently: because he is not speaking of Rehoboam, but of his son Abijam: who was a valiant young man in the days of his father, and always fought his battles with Jeroboam. Which being related before in the history of Rehoboam, is here repeated, as Abarbinel thinks, to shew that Abijam was the cause of these wars. And these words, all his days, he thinks, relate to Abijam, who continued the war between his father and Jeroboam with great success: as we read 2 Chron. xiii. 17. Bochartus thinks a plainer account may be given of this, by supposing that Rehoboam signifies this son of his; children and fathers being one and the same in a moral account. Thus Abraham is said to have purchased the sepulchre of the sons of Emor; which was indeed purchased by Jacob: and the Israelites say to Rehoboam, (xii. 16.) "What portion have we in David?" That is, in Rehoboam the grandchild of David? In like manner, he thinks, it may be said, there was war between Rehoboam and Jeroboam; that is, between Abijam the son of Rehoboam and Jeroboam: whom Abijam grievously afflicted. (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 43.) But this doth not seem to be the true account; because the war between Abijam and Jeroboam is distinctly mentioned in the next verse. Therefore the meaning of these words is, that though God was pleased, for David's sake, who walked uprightly before him, to continue a lamp, that is, a successor to him in Jerusalem; yet these successors were vexed with continual wars (as appeared both in the reign of Rehoboam and of Abijam), and did not enjoy their kingdom peaceably.

Ver. 7. Now the rest of the acts of Abijam, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] See xi. 41. Ezra saith they were recorded in the book of the prophet Iddo, 2 Chron. xiii. 22. from whence he took what he thought fit.

And there was war between Abijam and Jeroboam.] He continued the war, which had been between his father and Jeroboam, and managed it very gloriously, as Ezra shews in the book of the Chronicles.

Ver. 8. And Abijam slept with his fathers; and they buried him in the city of David: and Asa his son reigned in his stead.

Ver. 9. In the twentieth year of Jeroboam king of Israel reigned Asa over Judah.] In some part of that year. (See ver. 2.)

Ver. 10. And one-and-forty years reigned he in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Maachah, the daughter of Abishalom.] This was the name of his grandmother, who is called his mother, as Reuel is called the father of Jethro's daughters, Exod. ii. 18. when he was their grandfather. Which example Kimchi here alleges to explain this. And thus Abarbinel: The sense is not, that Maachah brought forth Asa (for she was his father's mother), but she brought him up and gave him his education: which made his piety the more remarkable, that he was not tainted with her principles of religion as his father was. But why his mother should not be mentioned, but his grandmother, which was not at all needful (because it was evident, by what was said before, that Maachah was the mother of Abijam his father), is unaccountable. And therefore others think that this was the name of his mother; which was the same, as her father's also was, with that of Abijam's.

Ver. 11. And Asa did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, as did David his father.] He made him his pattern: worshipping the Lord alone, and taking away all idols, as it here follows.

Ver. 12. And he took away the Sodomites out of the land, and removed all the idols that his father had made.] Of which see xiv. 23, 24. But still some secretly remained; and therefore when it is said he removed all idols, the meaning is, all that he could discover, for some lurked privately, (xxii. 46.)

Ver. 13. And also Maachah his mother, even her he removed from being queen.] He took away her guards, all the ensigns of royal dignity, and reduced her to the condition of a private person. But the word being is not in the Hebrew; which others translate, he removed her from the queen: that is, from his wife; that she might not be infected with her idolatry. He put her therefore out of the court, where she gave a bad example.

Because she had made an idol in a grove.] The word we translate idol, is Miphlezeth, which imports something of terror and horror; either because it was of a frightful aspect, or brought dreadful judgments upon its worshippers. St. Jerome understands by it Priapus, or Baal-Peor, to whom the women were much devoted. Theodoret takes it for Astarte, or Venus: and, indeed, in the northern countries, Priapus and Venus were painted together; as Johan. Gensius observes in his book De Victimis Humanis, par. i. cap. 9. Whatsoever it was, it was placed in a grove; in which shady places all the works of darkness, even sodomy itself, were practised.

Asa destroyed her idol, and burnt it by the brook Kidron.] He cut it down, and having burnt it, stamped it to a powder, and then threw it into the brook Kidron; as Moses did with the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 20. (See 2 Chron. xv. 16.)

Ver. 14. But the high places were not removed: nevertheless Asa's heart was perfect with the Lord all his days.] He did take away all the high places wherein they sacrificed to strange gods, (2 Chron. xiv. 3.) but not those wherein God alone was worshipped: for his authority was not great enough to do this; the people having so universally and so long taken this licence, that none durst attempt to abolish this inveterate custom till the days of Hezekiah: who, seeing the calamities that were coming upon his country, endeavoured to prevent them by a thorough reformation. But though Asa did not venture to do this, yet his heart was sincerely affected to the right worship of God; and he suffered sacrifices to be offered to none else.

Ver. 15. And he brought in the things which his father had dedicated, and the things which himself had dedicated, into the house of the Lord, silver, and gold, and vessels.] According to the piety of ancient times, his father had vowed some part of the spoils he took in the war with Jeroboam unto the Lord; but had not time to make good his vow, or upon some account or other neglected it. Asa's son therefore made his vow good; and also himself brought in what he had devoted unto holy uses, (for so the words are in the Hebrew, he brought in the holy things of his father, &c.) having gotten great spoil in his war with the Ethiopians, (2 Chron. xiv. 13, 14.)

Ver. 16. And there was war between Asa and Baasha king of Israel all their days.] There having been no mention hitherto made of Baasha, this may seem not to stand in its proper place. But Abarbinel thinks it is here inserted, that as this Divine writer had shewn what his virtues were, so he might now mention his faults. The chief of which was occasioned by this war: which moved him to send to Ben-hadad for help, when he should have relied upon God; as it is related largely, 2 Chron. xvi. 7, &c.

Ver. 17. And Baasha king of Israel went up against Judah.] After Asa's great victory over the Ethiopians, a great many of the Israelites fell off to him from Baasha: who thereupon resolved to make war upon Judah, and thereby prevent a further defection of his subjects.

And built Ramah.] A city in the tribe of Benjamin: which either belonged to the kingdom of Israel, or he had taken from Judah and fortified it; for that is meant by building it, as appears by what follows.

That he might not suffer any to go out or come in to Asa king of Judah.] That he might hinder all communication between his people and the people of Judah. For this place lay in the confines of both kingdoms; and in such a strait, that, a fortification being made there, none could pass to and fro without a licence from Baasha.

Ver. 18. Then Asa took all the silver and gold that was left in the treasures of the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king's house, and delivered them into the hands of his servants; and king Asa sent them to Ben-hadad, the son of Tabrimon, the son of Hezion, king of Syria, that dwelt at Damascus, saying.] This was held lawful, in case of extreme danger, to employ sacred things for the defence of one's country. But here was no such necessity in this case; for God had appeared so wonderfully for Asa, against a more powerful enemy than Baasha, that he ought to have confided in him for help; as the prophet Hanani told him, 2 Chron. xvi. 7, &c.

Ver. 19. There is a league between me and thee, and between my father and thy father.] In the latter end of Solomon's reign the Syrians were enemies to him, (xi. 24, 25.) But when he was dead, and the kingdom was divided, both Judah and Israel made peace with the Syrians: having enough to do, to settle themselves in their own dominions.

Behold, I have sent unto thee a present of silver and gold; come and break thy league with Baasha king of Israel, that he may depart from me.] This was a wicked piece of policy, to tempt him with money to break his word, which perhaps he had sworn to observe.

Ver. 20. So Ben-hadad hearkened unto king Asa, and sent the captains of the hosts which he had.] Always in a readiness, for some expedition, or for the defence of his country.

Against the cities of Israel, and smote Ijon, and Dan, and Abel-beth-maachah, and all Cinneroth, with all the land of Naphtali.] By this it appears, that he fell upon the northern part of the kingdom of Israel, which was nearest to Damascus; whilst Baasha was busy at Ramah, which was in the more southern part of his dominion.

Ver. 21. And it came to pass, that when Baasha heard thereof, that he left off building of Ramah.] By this means Asa compassed his ends; it not being safe for Baasha to continue the work he was about, for fear Ben-hadad should make larger conquests than he had already done.

And dwelt in Tirzah.] Which was become the royal city, (see xiv. 17.) where Baasha settled himself; though he intended, I suppose, when he had finished Ramah, to have dwelt there some part of the year; that by his presence the passages might have been the better secured.

Ver. 22. Then king Asa made a proclamation throughout all Judah (none was exempted).] He summoned all the people of the country; who were not disabled by age, or sickness, or some other way.

And they took away the stones, and the timber thereof, wherewith Baasha had builded, and king Asa built with them Geba of Benjamin, and Mizpah.] They were inhabited before, but he enlarged, and perhaps fortified them. Which he judged better than to perfect the fortification of Ramah; which would have been a perpetual bone of contention (as we speak) between Judah and Israel.

Ver. 23. And the rest of the acts of Asa, and all his might, and all that he did, and the cities which he built, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] See xi. 41.

Nevertheless in the time of his old age he was diseased in his feet.] He had the gout, as the Gemara of the Sanhedrin explains it, (cap. 6. n. 7.) which made him less active than he had been before this disease seized him.

Ver. 24. And Asa slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers, in the city of David his father: and Jehoshaphat his son reigned in his stead.

Ver. 25. And Nadab the son of Jeroboam began to reign over Israel in the second year of Asa king of Judah, and reigned over Israel two years.] Part of two years, as appears from ver. 28. 33.

Ver. 26. And he did evil in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the way of his father, and in his sin wherewith he made Israel to sin.] By the worship of the golden calves.

Ver. 27. And Baasha the son of Ahijah, of the house of Issachar.] That is, of a family in the tribe of Issachar.

Conspired against him: and Baasha smote him at Gibbethon, which belonged to the Philistines (for Nadab and all Israel laid siege to Gibbethon).] It was a city in the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xix. 44.) and given to the Levites, (xxi. 23.) who quitted it, as they did the rest of their cities, when Jeroboam would not suffer them to execute their office, (2 Chron. xi. 14.) and the Philistines it is likely seized upon it, being adjoining to their country. But Nadab now endeavoured to recover it out of their hands, as of right belonging to him.

Ver. 28. Even in the third year of Asa king of Judah did Baasha slay him, and reigned in his stead.] What was the pretence for this conspiracy we are not told; but it is likely he had many joined with him in it; otherwise it had not been easy to slay him, when he was in the midst of his army before Gibbethon.

Ver. 29. And it came to pass, when he reigned, that he smote all the house of Jeroboam; he left not to Jeroboam any that breathed, until he had destroyed him, according to the saying of the Lord, which he spake by Ahijah the Shilonite.] His intention was not to fulfil this prophecy, (mentioned xiv. 10.) but to secure himself in his usurped throne, by cutting off all that had any title to it. But by this means God fulfilled his own intentions; and that as speedily as Ahijah the prophet had foretold, (xiv. 14.)

Ver. 30. Because of the sins of Jeroboam which he sinned, and which he made Israel to sin, by his provocation wherewith he provoked the Lord God of Israel to anger.] Which caused great miseries in Israel; especially in the beginning of that kingdom, when they reigned by force, not by succession. Whereas in Judah the son succeeded the father, by right of blood, according to the promise made to David.

Ver. 31. Now the rest of the acts of Nadab, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?] His acts could not be many; yet more were recorded in the public Annals than are here mentioned, (xi. 41.)

Ver. 32. And there was war between Asa and Baasha king of Israel all their days.] We read the very same words before (ver. 16.) in the history of Asa; which are now repeated in the history of Baasha, to shew the reason why Asa was his enemy, which he would not have been (but his friend) had he feared God after his cutting off the whole house of Jeroboam. But he would make no covenant with him, notwithstanding he had fulfilled the word of God, because he walked in the sins of Jeroboam. Thus Abarbinel.

Ver. 33. And in the third year of Asa king of Judah began Baasha the son of Ahijah to reign over all Israel in Tirzah, twenty and four years.

Ver. 34. And he did evil in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the way of Jeroboam, and in his sin wherewith he made Israel to sin.] Which makes it evident, that he did not cut off Jeroboam's family because they were idolaters, but because he aspired to the throne; which, when he possessed, he endeavoured to establish himself in it by the same wicked policy which Jeroboam used. For he reformed nothing in religion; but continued to worship the calves which Jeroboam had set up, to keep the people from going to worship at Jerusalem.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. THEN the word of the Lord came to Jehu the son of Hanani against Baasha, saying.] This is a prophet that lived till the end of Jehoshaphat's reign. (See 2 Chron. xix. 1. xx. 34.) And his father Hanani was a prophet before him, (2 Chron. xvi. 7.) Nor was there wanting a succession of prophets during the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, as Abarbinel hath observed through every reign, their names being set down in Holy Scripture: he hath shewn in a catalogue he hath made of the kings, and the prophets in their time; too long to be here transcribed.

Ver. 2. Forasmuch as I have exalted thee out of the dust.] It seems he was of a mean family in the tribe of Issachar. Perhaps, but a common soldier, or some small officer in the army which laid siege to Gibbethon; but being bold and daring, formed a conspiracy against Nadab.

And made thee prince of my people Israel.] God's providence interposed, that nothing should hinder the success of his design against Nadab; because he intended to make use of him to punish the house of Jeroboam.

And thou hast walked in the way of Jeroboam, and hast made my people Israel to sin, to provoke me to anger by their sins.] Continued them in their idolatry, against which he ought to have shewn the greatest zeal, because it provoked God's anger against the family of Jeroboam.

Ver. 3. Behold, I will take away the posterity of Baasha, and the posterity of his house; and will make thy house like the house of Jeroboam the son of Nebat.] So that neither any of his own children, nor the children of any of his relations should remain; but his name be quite put out.

Ver. 4. Him that dieth of Baasha in the city shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat.] The very same threatening that was pronounced against Jeroboam and his posterity by Ahijah, (xiv. 11.)

Ver. 5. Now the rest of the acts of Baasha, and what he did, and his might, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?

Ver. 6. So Baasha slept with his fathers, and was buried in Tirzah: and Elah his son reigned in his stead.] He was not slain, as Nadab was; but died, as Jeroboam did; and his son suffered like his, (ver. 9, 10.)

Ver. 7. And also by the hand of the prophet Jehu the son of Hanani came the word of the Lord against Baasha, and against his house.] This command of God being given to Jehu, (ver. 1.) he executed it, and delivered this message to Baasha some time before he died. Which is said to be done by the hand of Jehu, because he was the minister of God in this business.

Even for all the evil that he did in the sight of the Lord, in provoking him to anger with the work of his hands, in being like to Jeroboam; and because he killed him.] That is, killed Nadab, who was Jeroboam's son: or rather (as Abarbinel judiciously observes) this relates to the whole house of Jeroboam beforementioned; which Baasha destroyed, not because they were idolaters, and that he might fulfil the word of the Lord (as perhaps he pretended), but to satisfy his own ambition, being guilty of the very same crime that Jeroboam was: and therefore was no better than a murderer in the slaughter he made of his family; and accordingly is threatened to be punished for that very act, which was committed, not in obedience to God, but to serve himself.

Ver. 8. And in the twenty and sixth year of Asa king of Judah began Elah the son of Baasha to reign over Israel.] This seems to contradict what Ezra saith in 2 Chron. xvi. 1. that Baasha built Ramah in the thirty-sixth year of Asa. Of which I shall give an account in my notes on that place. For the present it may suffice to say, that Ezra doth not speak of the thirty-sixth year of Asa's reign, but of the thirty-sixth year after the division of the kingdom. For it could be, at the most, but the twenty-sixth year of Asa's reign when Baasha died.

In Tirzah, two years.] Not complete; but one entire year, and part of another: as appears from ver. 10. 15.

Ver. 9. And his servant Zimri (captain of half of his chariots).] A considerable commander in his army, who had a great interest in the soldiery.

Conspired against him as he was in Tirzah, drinking himself drunk in the house of Arza, steward of his house in Tirzah.] He seems to have been a debauched young man, who stayed at home following his pleasures, whilst his army was besieging Gibbethon, (ver. 15.) Which gave Zimri, who it is likely was captain of his guard, the better opportunity to kill him.

Ver. 10. And Zimri went in and smote him, and killed him, in the twenty-seventh year of Asa king of Judah, and reigned in his stead.] Here was a speedy execution of the vengeance threatened against him by Jehu, that God would make his house like the house of Jeroboam, (ver. 3.) For as Nadab the son of Jeroboam reigned but two years, (xv. 25.) so Elah the son of Baasha reigned no more: and then, as Nadab was killed with the sword, so was Elah. Thus, as Abarbinel notes, there was a wonderful likeness between Jeroboam and Baasha, in their lives, and in their deaths; in their sons, and in their family.

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, when he began to reign, as soon as he sat on his throne, that he slew all the house of Baasha: he left not one that pisseth against the wall.] That is, not a man. (See xiv. 10.)

Neither of his kinsfolk, nor of his friends.] He not only destroyed all that were descended from Baasha, as Baasha had done the family of Jeroboam; but he extended the destruction, and increased it, as Abarbinel speaks; for he killed all that were of kin to Baasha, with all his friends, which Baasha did not: this seems to be contained in the threatening of Jehu, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 12. Thus Zimri destroyed all the house of Baasha, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake against Baasha by Jehu the prophet.] See ver. 1, 2. 7.

Ver. 13. For all the sins of Baasha, and the sins of Elah his son.] This shews that Elah walked in his father's ways; though it be not before mentioned.

By which they sinned, and by which they made Israel to sin, in provoking the Lord God of Israel to anger with their vanities.] So the golden calves are called, being (as Forsterus well translates the word) "Commentitia numina," gods of their own devising. (See 1 Sam. xii. 21.)

Ver. 14. Now the rest of the acts of Elah, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?] Here is no mention of his might; (as there is of his father's, ver. 5.) for he was, as I said, a man of pleasure.

Ver. 15. In the twenty-seventh year of Asa king of Judah did Zimri reign seven days in Tirzah: and the people were encamped against Gibbethon, which belonged to the Philistines.] Which had been besieged many years ago, when Baasha slew Nadad, (xv. 27.) But was then relieved, or afterward retaken by the Philistines, while the Israelites were in a distracted condition; but now again invested.

Ver. 16. And the people that were encamped heard say, Zimri hath conspired, and hath also slain the king.] Had success in his conspiracy, and made himself king.

Wherefore all Israel made Omri, the captain of the host, king over Israel that day in the camp.] Just as the Roman army, in aftertimes, made their chief commander emperor.

Ver. 17. And Omri went up from Gibbethon, and all Israel with him.] All the army that were at the siege.

And besieged Tirzah.] Where Zimri, a more dangerous enemy, was.

Ver. 18. And it came to pass, when Zimri saw that the city was taken.] Which he was not able to defend against a powerful army; from whom he suspected no opposition; but hoped they would have let him reign as quietly as they did Baasha.

That he went into the palace of the king's house.] Into the strongest part of the house.

And burnt the king's house over him with fire, and died.] He was afraid, I suppose, of suffering some shameful punishment, if he had been taken alive; and therefore chose to die desperately in this manner. So Sardanapulus ended his life.

Ver. 19. For his sins which he sinned in doing evil in the sight of the Lord, in walking in the way of Jeroboam, and in his sin which he did, to make Israel to sin.] Though he lived but a very short time after he usurped the crown, yet he gave sufficient demonstration of his resolution to continue the idolatry of Jeroboam; and therefore was abandoned by God.

Ver. 20. Now the rest of the acts of Zimri, and the treason which he wrought, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?] It is likely, other acts that he did before he conspired against Elah were recorded in that book; together with the manner how he wrought his treason.

Ver. 21. Then were the people of Israel divided into two parts.] For when it is said, (ver. 16.) all Israel made Omri king in the camp; the meaning is, only the whole army, and they that attended them.

Half of the people followed Tibni the son of Ginath, to make him king.] For they did not like to have a king imposed upon them by the soldiery; and Tibni had as good a title as the other, being also a valiant man; who succeeded Zimri, perhaps, in his command, as captain of half his chariots.

And half followed Omri.] As already advanced to the royal dignity; and a greater man than Tibni; being captain of the whole host.

Ver. 22. And the people that followed Omri prevailed against the people that followed Tibni the son of Ginath.] For Omri had the advantage of having the army on his side.

So Tibni died.] In this civil war (into which they fell by God's just judgment upon them) many of the people, in all likelihood, died together with him.

And Omri reigned.] Without competitor. The Jews in Seder Olam Rabba, whom Rasi and others follow, say it contributed much to his advancement, that Asa king of Judah married his son Jehoshaphat to Omri's daughter. For which they have no other ground, but that it is said, 2 Chron. xviii. 1. he joined in affinity with Ahab.

Ver. 23. In the thirty and first year of Asa king of Judah began Omri to reign over Israel, twelve years.] These twelve years of his reign are to be computed not from the thirty-first of Asa's reign; for it is evident he began to reign in the twenty-seventh year of Asa, (ver. 15.) and his son began to reign in the thirty-eighth year of Asa, (ver. 29.) Therefore the twelve years are to be computed from the beginning of Omri's reign: which was, as I said, the twenty-seventh of Asa's. From which time (as Abarbinel observes) the contest continued between Omri and Tibni, unto the thirty-first year of king Asa. In the end of which Tibni died; and then Omri reigned over all Israel, whereas he reigned but over half the people before. And Tibni being extinct, all the foregoing years are accounted to Omri; viz. from the beginning of Asa's seven-and-twentieth year, when Zimri died, to the end of this eight-and-thirtieth year, which make twelve years.

Six years reigned he in Tirzah.] Half of his time he made this his royal seat; which was, as some think, all the time his contention with Tibni lasted, and some time after.

Ver. 24. And he bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver, and built upon the hill, and called the name of the city which he built, after the name of Shemer, owner of the hill Samaria.] The king's house in Tirzah being burnt, as we read ver. 18. he built a royal palace in this city, which he also built upon this hill; and called it after the name of him who was the owner of it before he bought it, viz. Shemer, from whom it had the Hebrew name of Shomeron. Which was ever after made the royal seat of the kings of Israel.

Ver. 25. But Omri wrought evil in the eyes of the Lord, and did worse than all that were before him.] For he not only walked in the way of Jeroboam, but, it is likely, began to introduce other idolatries, which his son Ahab established among them. Or, he compelled the people to worship the calves; and by severe laws restrained the people from going up to Jerusalem: which, as some think, are meant by the statutes of Omri, (Micah vi. 16.)

Ver. 26. For he walked in all the way of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and in his sin wherewith he made Israel to sin, to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger with their vanities.] Though he had seen Elah, and all the whole house of Baasha destroyed by his predecessor for their idolatry, and Zimri himself perished in the same sin, (ver. 13. 19.) yet he persisted in their iniquity, and brought down the wrath of God upon him, and upon his family, as the foregoing kings had done.

Ver. 27. Now the rest of the acts of Omri which he did, and his might which he shewed, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?] It seems he was a valiant man, which Elah was not; concerning whose might there is no mention, as I noted upon ver. 14.

Ver. 28. So Omri slept with his fathers, and was buried in Samaria.] Which now began, as I said, to be the royal city of the kingdom of Israel, as Jerusalem was of Judah.

And Ahab his son reigned in his stead.] Who was so eminent upon several accounts, that we have a long account of him in the following part of this book.

Ver. 29. And in the thirty-eighth year of Asa king of Judah began Ahab the son of Omri to reign over Israel: and Ahab reigned over Israel in Samaria twenty and two years.] In this space of time Asa saw six kings of Israel buried; whilst Judah flourished under one and the same king: which no doubt was a great advantage to them.

Ver. 30. And Ahab the son of Omri did evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him.] Was more idolatrous than his father Omri: for he brought in the worship of Baal (as it follows in the next verse), that is, of the sun, and of all the host of heaven.

Ver. 31. And it came to pass, as if it had been a light thing to him to walk in the way of Jeroboam the son of Nebat.] He was not satisfied with the worship which Jeroboam had invented, though highly displeasing to God. For so the words are in the Hebrew, was it a light thing? As much as to say, It was a most heinous crime; and yet Ahab resolved to be more wicked. For Jeroboam did not quite forsake the Lord God of Israel, but worshipped him by a representation of his own invention: and this more out of policy than any love to this kind of worship. But Ahab, out of pure love to strange gods, forsook the Lord, without any such reason for it as Jeroboam had; the people being now sufficiently estranged from Jerusalem.

That he took to wife Jezebel the daughter of Eth-baal.] Called in profane writers Ithobalus.

King of the Zidonians.] Who had been old idolaters.

And served Baal, and worshipped him.] That god, whom the Chaldeans and Babylonians called Bel, the Phœnicians (of whom the Zidonians were a part) called Baal: which in Hebrew signifies lord. Which anciently was the name of the true God, as Mr. Selden observes; but when the world grew wicked, was given to the sun by the Phœnicians: who, as Philo-Byblius tells us, reputed the sun to be μόνον οὐρανοῦ θεόν, the only god of heaven. And at last this name was given to other stars, and to their dead kings, whose memory was dear to them. And various rites, ceremonies, and sacrifices were devised in their honour, as that great man observes, (Syntag. de Diis Syris, ii. cap. 1.) who understands these words of the Phœnician Belus or Baal, who was the very same with the European Jupiter: and Zidon being situated on the sea, their Baal was called by the Greeks the Sea Jupiter. So Hesychius, Θαλάσσιος Ζεὺς ἐν Σιδόνι τιμᾶται, the Sea Jupiter is worshipped at Sidon. But our Mr. Mede is very confident, that the Baal whose worship Jezebel brought with her from Zidon was a deified king of the Phœnicians: as Baal was the first king of Babel who was deified after his death. Whence all the souls of men who were canonized after death were called Baalim. (See book i. discourse xlii. and his Apostacy of the later Times, par. i. chap. 3.) Whence it came, that there were not more Jupiters among the Europeans, than there were Baals among the Syrians. And hence so many mountains, and springs, and woods, and cities, were called by the name of Baal, when Joshua conquered Canaan; as Baal-Meon, Bamoth-Baal, Baal-Gad, Baal-Thamar, Baal-Zephon, and many more. In which places, no doubt, Baalim were worshipped, and from thence they had their names.

Ver. 32. And he reared up an altar for Baal in the house of Baal, which he had built in Samaria.] He built a temple for this god in the royal city, and set up an altar, where he sacrificed to him. Which was more directly to worship other gods than Jeroboam did: who pretended the worship he performed to the calves was to the true God, whom he honoured in them.

Ver. 33. And Ahab made a grove.] Which was another piece of idolatry; which God commanded to be abolished, (Deut. vii. 5.)

And Ahab did more to provoke the Lord God of Israel to anger than all the kings of Israel that were before him.] In this grove, it is likely, all manner of impurities were practised: for Jezebel was a filthy woman.

Ver. 34. In his days did Hiel the Beth-elite.] A man that lived in the very seat of idolatry; and, it is likely, was deeply infected with it.

Build Jericho.] A place which, being under a cherem, was never to be rebuilt; because it was devoted to God, as the first-fruits of the conquests of Canaan. Which this man either did not know (because ignorant of the law, which now was little read), or was so impious as not to regard the words of Joshua, believing no other god but Baal.

He laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his first-born, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake by Joshua the son of Nun.] But he found to his cost, that the sentence which Joshua pronounced against the rebuilder of this city proved true; for his eldest son died when he laid the first stone of it: and so all the rest of his children, one after another, as the building advanced; till at last his youngest son died when it was finished. A most remarkable instance of the certainty of Divine threatenings; and that God never forgets what he hath said, but continues always the same. This sentence being pronounced more than four hundred and forty years ago, and now fulfilled exactly in all its circumstances: which might have been a warning to the whole nation, not to despise the long-suffering and patience of God, who, though he had not yet carried them out of their good land, according to the word of Ahijah, (xiv. 15.) would certainly do it, if they continued in their impenitence.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. AND Elijah the Tishbite.] The care of God over this people (as I noted before) was so great, that in every king's reign, from the first to the last, there was one or more prophets to instruct, admonish, and correct them. And now in the reign of Ahab (when there was the greatest need of it), God raised up an extraordinary prophet far exceeding all others, whom Abarbinel calls the prince of the prophets, next unto Moses. Whose original being not known (for here is no mention of his father or mother), some of the Jews have fancied him to have been an angel sent from heaven to reduce them to the true religion. So Abarbinel relates, upon the book of Judges, as Joh. Frischmuthus observes, in a dissertation about Elijah. Whose name, which in the Hebrew is Elijahu, carries something Divine in it; being compounded, as Ægid. Camartus imagines, of three of the names of God, viz. Eli, and Jah, and Hu. There is no doubt the two first are the names of God, but there is reason to question the last, though a great man of our own, Edm. Castellus, in his Polyglot Lexicon, doth put Hu among the Divine names; and so do the cabalists. He was indeed a very eminent messenger of God, sent to call the Israelites to repentance; from whence our learned Dr. Lightfoot thinks he had the name of Tishbite: from the Hebrew word shub, which signifies to return; for he was sent to be the converter of the nation. (See him upon St. Luke, i. 17.) Other conjectures there are about this name, which Frischmuth hath collected; and Dionysius Petavius hath delivered his opinion about it upon Epiphanius, (Hæres. lv. n. 3.) who saith Elijah was ἐξ ἱερέων of the priests, and grandson to Zadok. But Kimchi seems to have given the plainest account of this name of Thishbite from Thesbe, a town or region where he was born: just as Ahijah is called Shilonite, from Shilo, where he was born, or dwelt.

Who was of the inhabitants of Gilead.] It is not certain that he was a native of this country; but only that he came and settled among the Gileadites, being born, as some think, in the tribe of Benjamin, though most are rather of opinion in the tribe of Gad.

Said unto Ahab, As the Lord liveth, before whom I stand, there shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word.] To make his words the more regarded, he swore solemnly by the eternal God, whose minister he was (for that is meant by standing before him), and to whom he had prayed, that there should be no moisture from the clouds for three years and a half ensuing, unless it was by his prayers. Thus St. James teaches us to expound these words, these years, (James v. 17.) And Abarbinel makes out the connexion of this chapter with the foregoing in this manner:—Elijah admonished Ahab to lay to heart the punishment of Hiel the Beth-elite, saying, Fear the Lord lest he be angry with thee, as he was with Hiel, for breaking his command. But Ahab despised his admonition, and said, That was a chance; for you say we are all idolaters, and yet the threatening in the law of Moses (Deut. xi. 16, 17.) is not come upon us. Whereupon Elijah, in a great anger, said, As the Lord liveth there shall be no dew, &c. Which story is told with more circumstances in the Talmud.

Ver. 2. And the word of the Lord came to him, saying.] The king being incensed at this threatening, God took care to secure Elijah from his fury, by the following direction.

Ver. 3. Get thee hence.] For he saw that Ahab intended to lay hold of him.

And turn thee eastward, and hide thyself by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan.] This brook Bochartus takes to be the same with Kana, mentioned by Joshua, xvi. 5. xvii. 9. So called from the plenty of reeds (for Kana signifies a reed), in which the prophet lay hid while he stayed in this place.

Ver. 4. And it shall be, that thou shalt drink of the brook: and I will command the ravens to feed thee there.] This seems so strange, that some will have the word orebim not to signify ravens, but merchants: because they find the word orebe in Ezek. xxvii. 17. signifying merchants that traded in the market of Tyre. But, as Bochartus hath observed, they are never called simply orebim. Nor is their opinion better, who think Arabians to be here meant: for there were none thereabout; and Elias's lurking-place would soon have been discovered to Ahab, if merchants, or any other people that travelled that way, had been acquainted with it. We must therefore acknowledge a miraculous care which God took of Elijah, as all the ancients do, none excepted. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 13.) Nor did such things seem incredible to the heathen, who tell us as strange stories. For example, that Jupiter was fed in his cradle by bees: and Janus, the son of Apollo and Evadne, with honey by dragons: and Midas, when an infant, had corn put into his mouth, as he lay asleep, by ants: Æsculapius nourished by a goat; and a great many more mentioned by that excellent person Huetius, in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 17.

Ver. 5. So he went, and did according to the word of the Lord: for he went and dwelt by the brook Cherith, that is before Jordan.

Ver. 6. And the ravens brought him bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening; and he drank of the brook.] God amply provided for his servant; sending him not only bread, but flesh also, that he might make a good meal: and this twice a day, at dinner and supper. This provision some of the Jews fancy (in Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 11. n. 76.) the ravens brought from Ahab's house; others fancy, from Jehoshaphat's; as if he was fed with royal dainties. But Bochartus thinks it is better to say, that they had this provision from some of the seven thousand persons who had never bowed to Baal. But it is best of all to confess we cannot tell whence they had it; God, perhaps, making meat ready prepared on purpose for him. They who object that these were unclean creatures, who polluted the meat which they touched, should consider, that all this was done by an extraordinary dispensation. And St. Chrysostom fancies, there was this moral instruction in it; that Elijah should learn to be more mild and gentle towards the deluded Israelites, by these birds, who were cruel to their young, but kind to him. And indeed it is very wonderful, as Victorinus Strigelius here glosses, that the ravens, who do not feed their own young ones, should constantly feed the prophet. For such is the ἀστοργία of these creatures, as naturalists report, that they forsake their young before they be fledged: whom God feeds by worms, which are produced by the dung, and out of the carcasses that have been brought into their nests, until they be able to fly, and provide for themselves. I think he hath this out of St. Ambrose, lib. x. epist. 82. The Psalmist is thought to allude to it, Psal. cxlvii. 9. And God himself in Job xxxviii. 41.

Ver. 7. And it came to pass, after a while, that the brook dried up, because there had been no rain.] In the Hebrew it is, at the end of days, that is, of a year; as that phrase, I have shewn, is often used.

Ver. 8. And the word of the Lord came to him, saying,

Ver. 9. Arise, get thee to Zarephath, which belongeth to Zidon, and dwell there.] It was a place between Tyre and Zidon, but belonged to the territory of the latter; and so was not in the land of Israel, but inhabited by gentiles.

Behold, I have commanded a widow woman there to sustain thee.] He had appointed and disposed her, just as he did the ravens, ver. 4. For she had no command from God for it; (it appears from ver. 12.) and this was an extraordinary providence, that a poor widow and a gentile should support him; though, in all likelihood, she was not a stranger to the true religion, but a pious woman of another nation.

Ver. 10. So he arose, and went to Zarephath: and when he came to the gate of the city, behold, the widow woman was there gathering sticks.] Which shews she was but in a poor condition.

And he called to her, and said, Fetch me, I pray thee, a little water in a vessel, that I may drink.] For he knew, by a Divine inspiration, this was the woman that was to sustain him.

Ver. 11. And as she was going to fetch it.] This shews she was a good woman; being ready to succour a stranger.

He called unto her and said, Bring me, I pray thee, a morsel of bread in thy hand.] Which was very natural to desire, having asked for water: but he said it to move her to acquaint him with what follows.

Ver. 12. And she said, As the Lord thy God liveth.] By this it appears she knew the Lord God of Israel; and that Elijah was a prophet; or, at least, one of his worshippers.

I have not a cake, but a handful of meal in a barrel, and a little oil in a cruse: and I am gathering two sticks.] By two sticks is meant a few: as two frequently signifies, (Isa. xvii. 6. Jer. iii. 14.)

That I may go and dress it for me and my son, that we may eat it, and die.] The famine, it seems, was sore in that country, as well as in Israel. For they of Zidon had their provision from the Israelites; and besides, it is likely, had no rain: but were punished as their neighbours were; being all alike idolaters.

Ver. 13. And Elijah said unto her, Fear not.] Be not afraid of being famished.

Go and do as thou hast said: but make me a little cake thereof first, and bring it unto me, and after that make for thee and for thy son.] A very hard command: whereby he tried her faith and obedience.

Ver. 14. For thus saith the Lord God of Israel, The barrel of meal shall not waste, neither shall the cruse of oil fail, until the day that the Lord sendeth rain on the earth.] This was a miracle, which they that were not Christians did not think incredible: as Huetius shews in the same book, and the chapter abovementioned, ver. 4.

Ver. 15. And she went, and did according to the saying of Elijah.] By which it is evident that she trusted in the Lord God of Israel.

And she, and he, and her house did eat many days.] Some by many days understand a full year: as it is in the margin. But it rather signifies two years: for one year was past before he came from the brook Cherith, (see ver. 7.) And therefore they lived upon this meal and oil two years more, till the end of the famine.

Ver. 16. And the barrel of meal wasted not, neither did the cruse of oil fail, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake by Elijah.] But what they took out for their daily use, was immediately supplied by the power of God.

Ver. 17. And it came to pass, after these things.] After this demonstration of the power and goodness of God.

That the son of the woman, the mistress of the house, fell sick; and his sickness was so sore, that there was no breath left in him.] He expired and died.

Ver. 18. And she said unto Elijah, What have I to do with thee, O thou man of God?] Some take the meaning to be, wherein have I offended thee? but the following words seem to imply, that in a great agony of spirit she asked him, wherefore he came to her house, if this were his intention?

Art thou come to call my sin to remembrance, and to slay my son?] This she thought was hard, to requite his entertainment at her house with such a punishment for her sins. For then sins are said to be called to remembrance before God, when he punishes them.

Ver. 19. And he said unto her, Give me thy son.] He reached out his hands, and bade her put him into his arms.

And he took him out of her bosom.] It seems he was but a little child: who the Jews think afterward proved a prophet; viz. Jonah.

And carried him up into a loft where he abode.] The LXX. translate it ὑπερῷον, an upper room: which he had to himself for his study, meditation, and prayer; as Elisha afterward had in another place, (2 Kings iv. 10.)

And laid him upon his own bed.] By this it appears it was a private room, where he lodged.

Ver. 20. And he cried unto the Lord.] Prayed most earnestly.

And said, O my God, hast thou brought evil upon the widow with whom I sojourn, by slaying her son?] He humbly expostulated with God; representing what an addition it was to his other afflictions, that this widow should suffer, who had been so kind to him; and suffer in her son, the great comfort of her life; and that while he was in her house.

Ver. 21. And he stretched himself upon the child three times, and cried unto the Lord, and said, O Lord my God, I pray thee, let this child's soul come again into him.] He lay prostrate in prayer before God, and stretched out himself upon the child, as if he would inspire him with a new life. And this he did three times; believing God would be moved by his importunity, to do what he desired.

Ver. 22. And the Lord heard the voice of Elijah; and the soul of the child came into him again, and he revived.] Hereby it appeared not only that this was done by God, to whom Elijah prayed; but that he did it for Elijah's sake.

Ver. 23. And Elijah took the child, and brought him down out of the chamber into the house, and delivered him unto his mother: and Elijah said, See, thy son liveth.] There was no need, one would think, to bid her observe and lay to heart the great power and mercy of God, in restoring her son to life. But the best of us must be awakened to our duty.

Ver. 24. And the woman said to Elijah, Now by this I know thou art a man of God.] She believed it before; (ver. 18.) but when she saw he did not cure her child when he lay sick, but suffered him to die, she began to doubt of it. But her faith revived, together with her son, and was mightily confirmed.

And that the word of the Lord in thy mouth is truth.] She believed all that he delivered as the mind of God; and gave up herself entirely to his instructions. The benefit of which she enjoyed, till God sent Elijah to meet Ahab; resolving to send rain upon the earth, as it follows in the next chapter.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, after many days.] See upon ver. 15. of the foregoing chapter. Grotius expounds it, after six months, upon St. Luke iv. 25.

That the word of the Lord came to Elijah in the third year, saying.] Our Saviour saith, and so doth St. James, that the drought continued three years and six months, (Luke iv. 25. James v. 17.) which doth not disagree with these words, which are thus to be explained. At the beginning of the drought, it is likely, Ahab imputed the want of rain to natural causes, and so did not seek to slay Elijah: but after six months neither the former nor the latter rain falling in their season, he began to be enraged at him as the cause of the drought: which forced Elijah, at God's command, to save his life by flight. And from that time the three years here mentioned are to be computed; before the word of the Lord came to him: he being one year at the brook Cherith, and two years at Sarepta; in the end of which year God took pity upon the country, having fulfilled the words of Elijah, (xvii. 1.) I see no ground for Abarbinel's observation, that the famine continued three years, to shew that it was a punishment inflicted for the sins of three families: Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and his son Nadab; Baasha, and his son Elah; Omri, and his son Ahab. The observation of Grotius is far better upon St. Luke iv. 25. (See there.)

Go, and shew thyself unto Ahab; and I will send rain upon the earth.] He would not destroy the earth because it was inhabited by wicked men (as Abarbinel speaks), and yet would have them know that Elijah's prayers procured mercy for them.

Ver. 2. And Elijah went to shew himself unto Ahab: and there was a sore famine in Samaria.] Which made it the more dangerous for him to appear in Ahab's presence; lest being so sorely afflicted, he should, in his rage, cause him to be killed before he could deliver his message to him.

Ver. 3. And Ahab called Obadiah, which was the governor of his house.] Some, both Jews and Christians, think this was Obadiah the prophet; for which I can find no ground but what is said in 2 Chron. xvii. 7. that Obadiah was one of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to instruct the people. And Ezra, from the next words, infers he was not a prophet.

(Now Obadiah feared the Lord greatly.] Was a truly religious man, and worshipped the Lord alone with great affection to his service; which one would have expected should have made Ahab discard him, if not persecute him.

But, I suppose, he was so very useful a servant to him, in the management of the affairs of his family (which he ordered with singular prudence and fidelity), that he connived at his not worshipping Baal, nor the calves; especially since he did not (we may well think) go up to Jerusalem to worship; with which defect God was pleased to dispense, as Ahab did with his religion.

Ver. 4. For it was so, when Jezebel cut off the prophets of the Lord.] There were schools of the prophets, it is likely, still remaining in Israel unto her time; but she endeavoured to destroy them, and those who were bred up in them; that there might be none to instruct the people in the true religion. For such, I suppose, are here meant; not those that were endued with the extraordinary gift of prophecy: for Elijah saith, ver. 22. that he only was left a prophet of the Lord; though that may signify no more, but that he knew of nobody beside.

That Obadiah took a hundred prophets, and hid them by fifty in a cave.] Which was an act of great piety and zeal, whereby he hazarded his own life.

And fed them with bread and water).] Sent them meat and drink privately every day.

Ver. 5. And Ahab said unto Obadiah, Go into all the land, unto all fountains of water, and unto all brooks; peradventure we may find grass to save the horses and mules alive, that we lose not all the beasts.] Many were dead for want of grass, which he hoped they might find growing in such moist places, enough to preserve the rest.

Ver. 6. And they divided the land between them, to pass through it: Ahab went one way by himself, and Obadiah went another way by himself.] Ahab would make this search himself, lest it should not be done faithfully by others, who might be persuaded by prayers and entreaties, or the presents of those who had any grass, not to discover it. Only he trusted Obadiah.

Ver. 7. And as Obadiah went in the way, behold, Elijah met him: and he knew him, and fell on his face, and said, Art thou my lord Elijah?] He shewed by the profound reverence he made to him, how much he honoured him.

Ver. 8. And he answered, I am: go, tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here.] The prophet also approved the honour Obadiah did his master, whom he owned for his lord, though he was a very wicked man. (See ver. 10.) For kings, by their office, are sacred persons: and therefore are to be had in great veneration (though bad men) even by the high-priest, and by the prophets, who did not approach them, as the Jews observe, without due reverence. And it is a famous saying of R. Jedaiah, "Do not dwell in a city, where no reverence or fear is paid to the king."

Ver. 9. And he said, What have I sinned, that thou wouldest deliver thy servant into the hand of Ahab, to slay me?] For that he concluded would be the effect of such a message delivered by him to Ahab, as he shews in the following discourse.

Ver. 10. As the Lord thy God liveth, there is no nation or kingdom whither my lord hath not sent to seek thee.] That is, to all the countries thereabout, with whom he was in league. For it is a very foolish conceit of some of the Jews (which the best of them disown), that Ahab was as great an emperor as Nebuchadnezzar, or Ahasuerus, who ruled over all nations.

And when they said, He is not there, he took an oath of the kingdom and nation, that they found thee not.] These words incline me to think, that he sought him only throughout all his own dominions; through every tribe, which is called a nation; and every government, which is called a kingdom. For how could he take an oath of any but his own subjects? It may be said, indeed, that there might be such compacts between him and the Moabites, Edomites, Ammonites, and other neighbouring nations, that they should harbour none of his rebellious subjects: and that if he required it, they should swear they knew of none in their country. But such a treaty is so unusual, that I see no reason to suppose it.

Ver. 12. And it shall come to pass, as soon as I am gone from thee, that the Spirit of the Lord shall carry thee whither I know not.] Snatch thee away from hence, as sometimes the prophets were suddenly transported by an invisible power to places far distant from that where they were at present, (2 Kings ii. 16. Ezek. iii. 12. 14. Acts viii. 39, 40.) And, in all likelihood, there had been instances of it before this time; which made Obadiah fear it might fall out so in this case.

And so when I come and tell Ahab, and he cannot find thee, he shall slay me.] Because he did not seize and secure Elijah when he was in his power; but let him escape.

But I thy servant fear the Lord from my youth.] Therefore he hoped the prophet would take care to preserve him, because he was not like the rest of the court.

Ver. 13. Was it not told my lord what I did, when Jezebel slew the prophets of the Lord, how I hid a hundred men of the Lord's prophets by fifty in a cave, and fed them with bread and water?] Sometimes a virtuous man may speak the truth of himself; though it be in his own praise.

Ver. 14. And now thou sayest, Go, tell thy lord, Behold, Elijah is here: and he shall slay me.] When it would expose him to manifest danger of losing his life.

Ver. 15. And Elijah said, As the Lord of hosts liveth.] He who commands all creatures in heaven and earth.

Before whom I stand.] Whom I serve, as one of his ministers.

I will surely shew myself unto him to-day.] He feared not to shew himself to Ahab; for a greater king than he, the Lord of all things, he knew would preserve him.

Ver. 16. So Obadiah went to meet Ahab, and told him: and Ahab went to meet Elijah.] The solemn oath of Elijah made Obadiah readily obey him; and assured him Ahab should not be disappointed, but certainly find him.

Ver. 17. And it came to pass, when Ahab saw Elijah, that Ahab said unto him, Art thou he that troubleth Israel?] He troubles a country, who confounds all things in it, and puts them out of order. In such a condition Israel now was, by a grievous famine; which made them not know which way to turn themselves. And this he ascribed to Elijah.

Ver. 18. And he answered, I have not troubled Israel; but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken the commandments of the Lord.] They trouble a nation who break the laws of God; not they that defend them.

And thou hast followed Baalim.] There were more Baals than one worshipped by the heathen, as I observed before: and it is very probable, that Ahab worshipped all the host of heaven, as well as the sun. (See xvi. 30, 31.)

Ver. 19. Now therefore send, and gather all Israel unto Mount Carmel.] That he might prove, in the face of all the people, that it was not he who troubled them.

And the prophets of Baal four hundred and fifty, and the prophets of the groves four hundred.] By the prophets of the groves (as we translate it), Mr. Selden understands the prophets of Astarte, the great goddess of the Zidonians; which he proves by comparing many places of Scripture together, (L. de Diis Syris, Syntag. ii. cap. 3.) Maimonides hath a peculiar notion, that the prophets of Baal, and of the groves, were such as had drunk in the opinion of the ancient Zabii; who made images to receive the influences of the stars; golden ones for the sun, and silver ones for the moon, &c. which gave to men the gift of prophecy, and shewed what was good for them. The same they said of trees; which were some under the influence of one star, some under the influence of another; and were planted in their names, and worshipped after several manners, and infused special virtues into the trees, and made men prophets. This he avers he found expressly in their books. (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 29.)

Who eat at Jezebel's table.] So high an esteem they had of these prophets, that she kept a table on purpose for them, to do them honour with the people.

Ver. 20. So Ahab sent unto all the children of Israel, and gathered the prophets together unto Mount Carmel.] I suppose the Israelites sent the great men of their several tribes to represent them; and the prophets readily assembled at the king's command; who did not distrust their power, and was promised rain, I suppose, by Elijah, if he did as he desired.

Ver. 21. And Elijah came to all the people, and said, How long halt ye between two opinions?] Like lame men, who tread not firmly, but dubiously; not knowing which to choose, the Lord or Baal; and therefore joining both together.

If the Lord be God, follow him: if Baal be God, follow him.] As much as to say, There cannot be more gods than one. That is the first article of your faith; "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," (Deut. vi. 4.) If the Lord be he, then stick to him: if Baal, then reject the other. This is most rational: for both of them cannot be God.

And the people answered him not a word.] Either not knowing what to resolve, or being ashamed.

Ver. 22. Then said Elijah unto the people, I, even I only, remain a prophet of the Lord; but the prophets of Baal are four hundred and fifty men.] He was the only prophet that appeared in behalf of the Lord, and yet feared not to contest with a great multitude who came to defend Baal.

Ver. 23. Let them therefore give us two bullocks; and let them choose one bullock for themselves, and cut it in pieces, and lay it on wood, and put no fire under; and I will dress the other bullock, and lay it on wood, and put no fire under.] He propounded a plain way to decide this controversy, and settle the people's minds in their belief. To whom he first propounded it, that they might approve of it, if they thought it a sure way to discover the truth.

Ver. 24. And call ye on the name of your gods, and I will call on the name of the Lord; and the God that answereth by fire, let him be God.] That is, he that sendeth fire to consume the sacrifice, which is presented to him.

And the people answered and said, It is well spoken.] They looked upon this as a reasonable proposition; because they knew that sacrifices had been approved by God, in this manner; and they were very desirous to make the experiment, and be satisfied, by this means, who was the true God. Thus Moses's sacrifice was approved, (Lev. ix. 24.) and Gideon's, (Judg. vi. 21.) and David's, (1 Chron. xxi. 20.) and Solomon's, when he consecrated the temples, (2 Chron. vii. 1. 3.) By this means, in all these cases, God had shewn that he accepted the sacrifices, and that the persons who offered them were his servants.

Ver. 25. And Elijah said unto the prophets of Baal.] Having the people's approbation, he turned to Baal's prophets, and desired them to agree to this trial.

Choose you one bullock for yourselves, and dress it first.] No doubt they produced both the bullocks, as he propounded at the first; (ver. 22.) and if there was any advantage in choosing one, and dressing it before the other, he desired they might have it.

For ye are many.] And he being a single person, was willing to give them the precedence.

And call on the name of your gods, but put no fire under.] It may be translated, call on the name of your god, viz. Baal. Or else, it may relate to their Baalim, which were many, as they themselves were: and desire them all to try their power, by putting no fire under the sacrifice; but expecting it to come down from heaven.

Ver. 26. And they took the bullock which was given them.] The choice of which was left to them.

And dressed it.] Flayed it, and cut it in pieces, and laid it upon the wood. Which they durst not refuse to do, because the people thought it a reasonable motion which Elijah made; and they had utterly lost their credit with the people, if they had not accepted it. And perhaps they did not distrust the power of Baal; which Ralbag thinks was Mars, a fiery planet; but rather the sun, which far exceeds all the other heavenly bodies in heat. Which they thought might possibly exert its power, upon this great occasion, and burn up their sacrifice. At least they might hope that Elijah might not be able to bring fire down from heaven, because he sacrificed in a high place, not at the temple: which was contrary to the law of God, who therefore would not hear him; and then they should stand upon equal ground with him, though they obtained no fire to consume their sacrifice.

And called upon the name of Baal from morning even until noon.] When the sun was in its greatest strength.

Saying, O Baal, hear us! But there was no voice, nor any that answered.] Not the least flash of fire.

And they leaped upon the altar which was made.] Or, they danced about it, after the manner of the ancient Salii. Or, as Bochartus interprets it, "Quasi furore prophetico extra se rapti, incompositis motibus huc illuc ferebantur;" They ran about hither and thither, as men in an ecstacy with a prophetical fury, which put them into uncouth and disorderly motions. For it appears they acted like prophets from ver. 29. who sometimes acted as men beside themselves. (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50.) Abarbinel thinks this leaping or dancing was a rite used in the worship of the sun: which puts all things in motion.

Ver. 27. And it came to pass at noon.] When the morning sacrifice was ended.

That Elijah mocked them.] He did not think it unlawful, or unseemly to jeer them, and their god; that he might awaken them out of their stupidity, and expose them to all the by-standers as corrupters of religion, and deceivers of the people.

And said, Cry aloud; for he is a god.] He bade them raise their voices; for they believed he was a god, but might be something deaf, or a great way off from them, and so could not hear what they said, unless they cried louder.

Either he is talking.] Busy about dispatches: either in sending ambassadors, or giving audience.

Or he is pursuing.] Some notion (as the Hebrews understand it); being in a deep study, or deliberating about some weighty business. It is commonly understood, He is hunting, or pursuing enemies.

Or he is in a journey.] Not at home; but travelling to some other place; whither they must send after him.

Or peradventure he sleepeth.] As they used to do in those hot countries after dinner.

And must be awaked.] With loud noises.

Ver. 28. And they cried aloud, and cut themselves, after their manner, with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them.] They did more than Elijah bade them: hoping to move him with their own blood, in which, perhaps, they thought he more delighted, than in the blood of beasts, or in their cries. For many nations offered human sacrifices to their gods: and their priests, when they were possessed with a sacred fury, were wont to slash themselves till their blood gushed out. Thus among the Romans the priests did in the worship of Bellona: in which "Sacerdotes non alieno, sed suo cruore sacrificant," &c. The priests sacrificed not with another's blood, but with their own. (See Lactantius, in his Divin. Institut. lib. i. cap. 21.) For cutting their shoulders, and running their drawn swords through both hands, they run about like mad men. And so Apuleius saith, they that carried about the Syrian goddess, after many other things, took out their knives or swords and cut themselves. (See lib. viii. Metamorph. p. 172, 173. and Pricæus and Rigaltius upon that place.) But our Mr. Mede hath a peculiar notion, which is, that Baalim being the deified souls of dead men, therefore the prophets of Baal cut themselves in his worship; because this was a funeral rite or ceremony, (Lev. xix. 28. xxi. 5. Deut. xiv. 1.) and therefore retained in the service of such gods, in token that they were but deified men. (See upon xvi. 31.)

Ver. 29. And it came to pass, when mid-day was past, and they prophesied to the time of the offering the evening sacrifice.] When all was done, they fell into a fury, and raved, as if they were possessed with an invisible power; singing hymns and praises to Baal. For that is sometimes meant by prophesying; (1 Chron. xxv. 2, 3.) or, it may be simply meant, they still continued praying to Baal; (ver. 26.) for that was part of a prophet's office.

That there was neither voice, nor any to answer, nor any that regarded.] No more tokens of regard to their praises than to their prayers; nor any, the least intimation, that Baal was a god, that minded what they said or did.

Ver. 30. And Elijah said unto all the people, Come near unto me. And they came near unto him.] They had stood hitherto by the prophets of Baal, to attend them in their sacrifice. Now Elijah calls them to him, that they might be witnesses of what he could do.

And he repaired the altar of the Lord that was broken down.] I suppose Carmel had been one of the most eminent high places in the whole kingdom: where the people, as they had been long accustomed, offered sacrifices to God in ancient times. But the worshippers of Baal had broken down the altar, and set up one of their own. For there were two sorts of high places, I have before noted, some for the worship of the true God, which continued in Judah, even under religious princes: others for the worship of idols; which good kings took away when they let the other remain. On the contrary, Ahab broke down the altars of God in the high places, and allowed none but those for Baal.

Ver. 31. And Elijah took twelve stones, according to the number of the tribes of the sons of Jacob.] That he might shew he worshipped the God of the patriarchs, and no other: and that all the people, though divided in civil government, ought to be united in the same religion, and have but one altar for them; being the sons of one man, who was very dear to God, as it here follows.

Unto whom the word of the Lord came, saying, Israel shall be thy name.] He purged his family from all idolatry; and then God appeared to him, and talked with him, and called him by a new name; importing the power he had with God, (Gen. xxxv. 2—4. 10. 13. 15.)

Ver. 32. And with the stones he built an altar in the name of the Lord.] Which he might do, being a prophet; for such persons were free from the lesser laws, that they might preserve the greater.

And he made a trench about the altar, as great as would contain two measures of seed.] That is, a large trench; for two measures are thought to be the third part of an ephah.

Ver. 33. And he put the wood in order, and cut the bullock in pieces, and laid him on the wood.] To be a whole burnt-offering.

And said, Fill four barrels with water.] Which they might have out of the brook at the foot of the mount, (ver. 40.) or out of the sea, which was not far off.

And pour it on the burnt-sacrifice, and on the wood.] From hence some gather the altar was hollow, into which this water run.

Ver. 34. And he said, Do it the second time: and they did it the second time. And he said, Do it the third time: and they did it the third time.] That is, they did it till all was full of water, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 35. And the water ran round about the altar; and he filled the trench also with water.] This seems to prove the altar was hollow, and that there was a trench also round about it: both which were as full of water as they could hold, to make the miracle more conspicuous and convincing. For what more contrary than fire and water?

Ver. 36. And it came to pass, at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice.] When the people of God were offering their solemn prayers to God at the temple in Jerusalem. This is a noted time for great things that were then done. (See upon Lev. ix. 24.)

That Elijah the prophet came near.] To the altar.

And said, Lord God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, let it be known this day that thou art God in Israel, and that I am thy servant, and that I have done all these things at thy word.] He desires him to demonstrate at once by this miracle, that he was the only true God, and that Elijah was his prophet, and that he had done nothing (in bringing, for instance, a long famine upon them) but by his command. Such miracles were proper, either where a new religion was to be set up, or the old one restored, after a general depravation.

Ver. 37. Hear me, O Lord, hear me.] He was the more earnest and fervent in his prayer, as Abarbinel thinks, because he had undertaken to make this experiment of God's power, without any particular command from God of his own accord; nothing doubting but he would appear to vindicate his own honour; though he offered sacrifice in a high place, which was against the law.

That this people may know that thou art the Lord God, and that thou hast turned their hearts back again] God turns men's hearts, though they be not turned; because he not only doth that which evidently tends to convert them, and is sufficient to do it; but for the present also so affects them that they are converted: though they will not take care to continue in that pious bent, but start back again from him.

Ver. 38. And the fire of the Lord fell, and consumed the burnt-sacrifice, and the wood, and the stones, and the dust, and licked up the water that was in the trench.] It is called the fire of the Lord, because it was sent from him out of heaven to testify that he was the only God (as the people could not but acknowledge), and it was of such unusual force, that it consumed not only the flesh of the bullock, and the wood, but the very stones, and the dust, and all the water that had been poured out there in great quantity.

Ver. 39. And when all the people saw it, they fell on their faces.] Worshipping the Lord of heaven and earth.

And said, The Lord is God; the Lord he is God.] This repeated acknowledgment shews how deeply they were affected at present, with the demonstration God had given, that he only was to be worshipped. Which extorted this public confession from them: but they soon forgat their own convictions, and continued in their idolatry.

Ver. 40. And Elijah said unto them, Take the prophets of Baal; let none of them escape.] The prophets of the groves, I suppose, were not there: Jezebel, on whom they attended, (ver. 19.) not suffering them to appear. It is likely they were Zidonians, which she brought along with her from her own country, when Ahab married her, and were peculiarly under her command.

And they took them; and Elijah brought them down to the brook Kishon, and slew them there.] As perverters of the law, and teachers of idolatry; upon whom the people, in that fit of zeal wherein they now were, readily executed the sentence Elijah pronounced against them. And Ahab could make no opposition; being himself also, it is likely, astonished at the stupendous miracle.

Ver. 41. And Elijah said unto Ahab, Get thee up, eat and drink.] They had fasted and prayed all the day till the even sacrifice was over, that they might have rain; or, that God would decide the controversy in question.

For there is a sound of abundance of rain.] He bade him be solicitous no longer; for plenty of rain was coming.

Ver. 42. And Ahab went up to eat and drink.] From the river that was at the bottom of the mount, he went up to a place on the side of it, where a tent was pitched for him, that he might refresh himself, now that the sacrifice was finished; and by Elijah's prayer he obtained rain, which he assured him he heard coming. By these two verses it is apparent, that Ahab himself was present to see how this contest between his prophets and Elijah, that is, between Baal and God, would end. And in all probability was as much convinced as the people, that the Lord was the only God.

And Elijah went up to the top of Carmel.] The prophet went a great deal higher, where he could see the Mediterranean Sea; and would neither eat nor drink, till he actually saw the rain gathering.

And he cast himself down upon the earth, and put his face between his knees.] He fell upon his knees, and bowed his head to the very ground; so that it touched his knees: in token of great humility, and most earnest desire, that God would remember his people, and send them rain.

Ver. 43. And he said to his servant.] Who, some of the Jews say, was the widow of Sarepta's son. But he was too young to wait upon him.

Go up now, and look towards the sea. And he went up, and looked, and said, There is nothing. And he said, Go again seven times.] It is not easy to give an account of these phrases, so often here used, he went up. First Ahab went up, and then Elijah, and now he sends his servant, and at last he bade his servant (ver. 44.) go up to Ahab. It is most likely there were several risings in this mountain, some higher than other. Elijah went to the top of them; but there was another higher, to which he bade his servant go up. Or Elijah, perhaps, was near the top; and he sent his servant to the very top of all: and then bade him go down from thence, and go up to that part of the mount, where Ahab was eating and drinking.

Ver. 44. And it came to pass, that, at the seventh time, there arose a little cloud out of the sea, like a man's hand. And he said, Go up, and say to Ahab, Prepare thy chariot, and get thee down, that the rain stop thee not.] For he saw such abundance of rain coming, as would cause floods, and render the way, for the present, unpassable, if he did not make haste home.

Ver. 45. And it came to pass, in the meanwhile, that the heavens were thick with clouds and wind, and there was a great rain.] While the servant went to Ahab, and his chariot was making ready, that little cloud spread itself, and in a great thickness covered the face of the sky.

And Ahab rode, and went to Jezreel.] He did not go to Samaria; for Jezreel, I suppose, was nearer: and there he had a palace, (xxi. 1.)

Ver. 46. And the hand of the Lord was upon Elijah; and he girded up his loins, and ran before Ahab.] They wore loose and long garments in this country; and therefore girded them up when they had occasion to run, that they might not hinder them. And God now gave Elijah more than human strength, so that (though he was an old man, xix. 4.) he was made able to run as fast as Ahab's chariot drove, like one of his footmen. In which he shewed his readiness to do the king all the honour imaginable, and that he was far from being his enemy, but only desired he would become a worshipper of the true God, which was, he could not but see, the Lord God of Israel.

Unto the entrance of Jezreel.] He thought it not prudent, it is likely, to venture into the city, lest Jezebel should seize him, but stopped at the gate of the city, or of the palace, and retired to some private place.

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND Ahab told Jezebel all that Elijah had done.] How he had called for fire from heaven, and had made rain to fall upon the earth.

And withal, that he had slain all the prophets with the sword.] That is, all the prophets of Baal, for they only are mentioned, xviii. 22. 25. and the prophets of the groves (who are said to be four hundred, xviii. 19.) were still in being, as appears from xxii. 6.

Ver. 2. Then Jezebel sent a messenger unto Elijah, saying, So let God do to me, and more also, if I make not thy life as the life of one of them by to-morrow about this time.] This shews the great folly of rage; which gave him notice of his danger, and admonished him to avoid it: or, perhaps she thought him as courageous as she was furious; and that he would not flee; and then she knew her power would be greater than his.

Ver. 3. And when he saw that, he arose, and went for his life, and came to Beer-sheba, which belonged to Judah.] Whither her power did not reach; being in another kingdom.

And he left his servant there.] Because he intended to go into the wilderness, where he resolved to spend the rest of his days, and die; and he would not have the youth put to the same straits, in which he was like to be. We read of no command from God to fly; nor doth he forbid it; but left him to his own prudence. Which made him think it in vain to hope for Ahab's protection; who he saw would continue an idolater, and by his example make the people revolt to the worship of Baal. Though some are of opinion it was a fault in Elijah to run away, and not to depend upon God to preserve him, in his pious endeavours to keep the people in the true religion; who had so solemnly acknowledged the Lord to be God.

Ver. 4. And he himself went a day's journey into the wilderness.] This wilderness was that wherein the Israelites wandered forty years; and he now travelled as many days.

And came and sat down under a juniper-tree.] Which some look upon as a sign he did not value life; because the shade of this tree (under which he not only sat, but lay down and slept) is thought to be very noxious, as Virgil observes.

And he requested for himself that he might die; and said, It is enough: now, O Lord, take away my life.] He thought he could do God no further service; and therefore desired to be discharged from his office by death; for all that he could say or do proved ineffectual.

For I am not better than my fathers.] Unto whose age, it is likely, he had lived.

Ver. 5. And as he lay and slept under a juniper-tree, behold, an angel touched him, and said unto him, Arise and eat.] Perhaps he was faint with his day's journey, for want of food at the end of it.

Ver. 6. And he looked, and, behold, there was a cake baken on the coals.] It should be translated, upon hot stones, as Bochartus shews in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 33.

And a cruse of water at his head: and he did eat and drink, and laid him down again.] Being weary, and wanting rest.

Ver. 7. And the angel of the Lord came again the second time, and touched him, saying, Arise and eat; because the journey is too great for thee.] Without extraordinary strength; he being an old man, and much tired with one day's journey.

Ver. 8. And he arose, and did eat and drink, and went in the strength of that meat forty days and forty nights, unto Horeb the mount of God.] It was a journey of not above four or five days, if so much; but he went about by private ways, that he might not be discovered; and, perhaps, rested sometimes, and lay hid, if there was any danger of his being seen. The Jews have made a comparison between him and Moses, in twenty-four particulars. But Abarbinel shews they were very different, and Moses had the superiority, especially in this thing here mentioned. For he is of opinion that Elijah ate and drank every day, when he could meet with food, as he might in several places of the wilderness. But ordinary food would not have enabled him to travel so long as he did: but it was by the power of that celestial food which the angel brought him, that he held out, it giving him vigour beyond all that he could receive from any other nourishment. But in this Moses went beyond him, that he had no food at all; being supported by a miraculous power, forty days and forty nights, without any sustenance of meat and drink.

Ver. 9. And he came thither into a cave, and lodged there: and, behold, the word of the Lord came to him, and said to him, What doest thou here, Elijah?] As much as to say, I have no business for thee here. This is not a place wherein to do me service. Which was a secret reproof for flying so far away: Judea, Samaria, or Damascus, being fitter places for him to be employed in.

Ver. 10. And he said, I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts.] He professed that he had not wanted zeal for the Lord's service; but been moved with great indignation against idolatry.

For the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, and thrown down thine altars.] He calls the altars that had been erected in high places by the ancient patriarchs, or other pious people in following times, God's altars: because they sacrificed upon them to him alone, and not to idols.

And slain thy prophets with the sword.] So Jezebel had done, xviii. 4.

And I, even I only, am left.] There were many prophets besides him: but none of them appeared publicly in defence of religion, but he alone.

And they seek my life, to take it away.] These words answer the question, What doest thou here? He fled thither to save his life.

Ver. 11. And he said, Go forth, and stand upon the mount before the Lord.] Where the Schechinah, I suppose, appeared unto him, after some preparations for it.

And, behold, the Lord passed by, and a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks.] He heard a sign of the Divine presence coming, before he went out of the cave. For his angelical ministers, which attended his majesty, passed by the mouth of the cave in a mighty terrible wind; which had those dreadful effects here mentioned.

Before the Lord.] These words shew, that, in exact speaking, it was not the Lord that passed by when this wind blew, but his ushers, as I may call them, who went before the Lord: so it here follows.

But the Lord was not in the wind.] The Schechinah did not yet appear.

And after the wind an earthquake; but the Lord was not in the earthquake.] The Divine Presence still did not manifest itself.

Ver. 12. And after the earthquake a fire.] Lightning and thunder, just as there was at the giving of the law, which Elijah endeavoured to restore.

But the Lord was not in the fire.] Still he heard nothing from God; who by these things prepared him to receive his majesty with the greatest humility and composure of spirit.

And after the fire a small still voice.] At the last the Lord himself came, as he perceived by the whispering of a voice; which bade him listen and attend to what the Lord should say unto him. There are many pious meditations, which this appearance of the Divine Majesty hath suggested to interpreters. Particularly Strigelius looks upon it as representing the Divine Nature to be inclined not to terrify and destroy, but placidly to invite and preserve. God easily lays aside his anger (as Nazianzen speaks in his oration upon his father), and delights to exercise mercy. For he is compelled to anger by us, πρὸς δὲ τοῦτο τὴν ὁρμὴν ἔχει, but to mercy he is very prone, as we may speak, and by his own nature bent unto it, &c. To the same purpose Ralbag discourses among the Jews. Others look upon all this as a figure of the gospel dispensation, which came not in such a terrible manner as the law did, with storms, thunders, lightnings, and earthquakes, (Exod. xix. 16. Heb. xii. 18, &c.) but with great lenity and sweetness, God speaking to us by his Son, in the most mild and gentle manner. And herein also some think he intended to shew Elijah that he had all the elements ready armed at his command, if he pleased to make use of them, to destroy idolaters: but by that still voice he declared the Divine patience and tenderness, which he would have him to imitate, by bridling his anger, to which he was by nature very prone.

Ver. 13. And it was so, when Elijah heard it, that he wrapped his face in his mantle, and went out, and stood in the entrance of the cave.] He first covered his face, in token of great reverence to God, not being able to look upon the Divine Glory which now appeared; and then went out of the cave, (as God had commanded him, ver. 11.) and stood in the entrance of it, to listen to what God would say to him.

And, behold, there came a voice to him.] From the Schechinah, or Divine Glory.

And said, What doest thou here, Elijah?] The same words are repeated which he had heard before, ver. 9. Only there they were spoken by the angel, but here by the Lord himself.

Ver. 14. And he said, I have been very jealous for the Lord of hosts: because the children of Israel have forsaken thy covenant, thrown down thine altars, and slain thy prophets with the sword; and I, even I only, am left; and they seek my life, to take it away.] He makes the same answer that he had done before, ver. 10. He was so full of anger (as Ralbag thinks) that he did not apply his mind as he ought to understand the vision, and therefore only repeats his former words. But God informs him in the following verse, that he would take care to chastise the Israelites in due time for their apostacy from him; and for that end bade him go and anoint Hazael, &c.

Ver. 15. And the Lord said unto him, Go, return thy way to the wilderness of Damascus.] He bids him return the way he came to Horeb; till he came to the way that led to the wilderness of Damascus, and go thither.

And when thou comest, anoint Hazael to be king of Syria.] As much as to say (as the forenamed author expounds it), Since thou art so angry with the Israelites for their impiety, go and anoint one to be king of Syria, who shall be a scourge to them. But this was not done presently, nor did he himself anoint Jehu; but ordered that it should be done by his successor Elisha; though it may be doubted whether any of them were anointed, except Jehu. For the word anoint may be no more than appoint him king, as kings were constituted in Israel by unction. Hence, by a metaphor, it is accommodated to the preferment of men to all dignities: as in Psal. cv. 15. "Touch not mine anointed;" and Cyrus is called the Lord's anointed, Isa. xlv. 1.

Ver. 16. And Jehu the son of Nimshi.] He was grandson of Nimshi, (as appears from 2 Kings ix. 2.) who are frequently called sons in the holy books.

Anoint to be king over Israel; and Elisha the son of Shaphat, of Abel-meholah, shalt thou anoint to be prophet in thy room.] This last was the chiefest command (to anoint, that is appoint, Elisha to be his successor), for the other two were to be performed by him, not by Elijah; who ordered Elisha to do it in convenient time; and first he appointed Jehu king, and afterward Hazael.

Ver. 17. And it shall come to pass, that him that escapeth the sword of Hazael shall Jehu slay; and him that escapeth from the sword of Jehu, shall Elisha slay.] This is not to be understood, as if the sword of Hazael should do execution before the sword of Jehu, and the sword of Jehu before that of Elisha: but it only signifies, as Abarbinel observes, that God in his providence had appointed three persons to punish the Israelites, according to their deserts. Thus he intended Hazael should destroy them in battle; which he mentions first, because it is a general calamity. But Jezebel, and the children of Ahab, and the priests of Baal, not going out to fight, and consequently not falling in battle, God ordered Jehu should cut them off in that manner as he did, with all the worshippers of Baal. But he did not inflict evil upon all the people of Israel, because he was to be their king. And though he slew idolaters, he did not meddle with little children, whose disposition he did not know: but they were reserved to be punished by Elisha, who foresaw they would prove idolaters. Thus he, with too much subtilty: but in general he saith well, that the Scripture doth not mention these things according to the time wherein they fell out; but according to the decree of God, who appointed every one to execute that which was proper for him to do.

Ver. 18. Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel.] This seems to be a correction of Elijah's mistake, who imagined that he alone was the only true worshipper of God that remained in Israel. Though Abarbinel will have it relate to what goes immediately before, that all the Israelites should not be destroyed: for he had a great number (seven thousand being put indefinitely for many thousand) of pious people in Israel, who had never worshipped Baal; and should not therefore be hurt either by Hazael, or otherways.

All the knees that have not bowed to Baal, and every mouth that hath not kissed him.] Every one knows that bowing the knee was an act of worship; and so was kissing the idol: which was done two ways: either by applying their mouth immediately to the image (as Cicero against Verres relates of the image of Hercules), or kissing their hand before the image, and then stretching it out, and, as it were, throwing the kiss to it. Concerning which rite of adoration Salmasius hath given a large account in his annotations upon Flav. Vopiscus, in the life of the emperor Probus; where he observes such kisses were called labrata oscula; and from hence the phrases oscula jacere, and basia jactare, and manu venerari, and manu salutare: which he shews out of many authors are used for this way of adoration: the same he notes in his Plin. Exercit. p. 936. where Pliny saith, " in adorando dextram ad osculum referimus, totum corpus circumagimus;" when we worship, we kiss our hand, and turn about our whole body.

Ver. 19. So he departed thence.] From Mount Horeb.

And found Elisha the son of Shaphat.] In his journey towards Damascus.

Who was ploughing with twelve yoke of oxen before him, and he with the twelfth.] His servants managed the rest, and he himself drove the last. This shews him to have been a great man; who, according to the manner of those ancient times, looked after his business himself; and was taken from the plough to be a prophet, as the Romans took some from thence to be dictators and consuls. For nothing was in greater esteem than agriculture among the ancient Greeks and Romans, as well as among the Hebrews. In Homer, we see kings and princes living upon the fruits of their lands and their flocks, and labouring with their own hands. Hesiod hath made a poem on purpose to recommend the country life and labour to his brother. It would be too tedious to shew how the Carthaginians and Persians, and indeed all other ancient nations, did not think that to do nothing was to live nobly; but they studied how to cultivate their lands, and employed themselves, as well as their servants, in that business. Whence such persons, who were of the best quality, were called αὐτουργοὶ, men that did their work themselves, and did not commit the care of it to others, but ploughed with their own hands. So Quinctius Cincinnatus is said by Dionys. Halicarn. lib. x. to have returned from his consulship, to lead, τὸν αὐτουργὸν βίον, a rustic life, as he did before it. As the learned Jac. Perizonius observes upon Ælian's Var. Histor. lib. i. cap. 31. As for the rest, the Greeks ascribe this invention of yoking oxen together to plough withal either to Ceres, and Triptolemus, or Bacchus (or some other great person); though Moses, who was before them all, was well acquainted with it; (Deut. xv. 9.) and Job before him, (Job i. 3. xlii. 12.).

Abarbinel thinks these twelve yoke of oxen with which Elisha was ploughing, denoted that he should be leader of the twelve tribes of Israel.

And Elijah passed by him, and cast his mantle upon him.] He put upon him the prophetical habit; which was his inauguration. Or, as some understood it, this was a token that he must become his servant, and attend upon him; and consequently succeed in his office. For servants were wont to carry their masters' shoes after them, and their garments. And accordingly he waited upon him, as appears from two phrases, in the last verse: first, he went after him; and secondly, he ministered unto him.

Ver. 20. And he left the oxen, and ran after Elijah.] To desire him to stay a little.

And said, Let me kiss my father and my mother.] Take his leave of them.

And then I will follow thee.] For he understood that to be the meaning of his throwing his mantle upon him.

And he said unto him, Go back again.] Return to thy oxen; and do as thou desirest.

For what have I done unto thee?] He asks him whether he thought he had done any thing to hinder him? And so this was said to try whether he understood his meaning, and was inclinable to attend him. But Abarbinel thinks these words signify, that he had conferred a great dignity upon him; which required him to dispatch his business immediately; and taking leave of his father and mother, to come after him without any delay; since he had done such a great thing to him. Which illustrates the words of our Saviour, Matt. xix. 21.

Ver. 21. And he returned back from him.] Went home, and then came to those that were ploughing.

And took a yoke of oxen, and slew them, and boiled their flesh with the instruments of the oxen, and gave unto the people, and they did eat.] He made a feast for his servants, neighbours, and friends, before he parted with them; in token of the joy he conceived at his new calling. Which shews he was not a poor peasant, such as our ploughmen are; but a man of condition, who was able to make a great expense upon occasion.

And he arose, and went after Elijah, and ministered unto him.] Glad to leave his estate, his friends, and all that he had; glad to serve God in a lower station first, before he executed the office of a prophet.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. AND Ben-hadad king of Syria.] Ben-hadad is as much as the son of Hadad. Which Hadad was of the seed-royal in Edom, and escaped into Egypt when David slew all the males in Edom; (xi. 16, 17.) but infested Solomon in his latter days, and endeavoured to recover his kingdom; in which he not succeeding, it is probable he established himself in Syria.

Gathered all his host together.] The father of this king had taken several cities from the Israelites, (ver. 34. xv. 20.) and perhaps had made them tributaries to the Syrians; which tribute Ahab refusing to pay, he made war upon him.

And there were thirty and two kings with him.] Such petty princes as those in the land of Canaan before the conquest of it by Joshua; who were under the protection of the king of Syria, and bound to serve him in his wars. But he had better have been without them, and employed his own natural subjects only, who had done his business more successfully, (ver. 24.) because it was their own.

And horses and chariots.] It is not said what number; which is an argument it was not very great.

And he went up and besieged Samaria, and warred against it.] He did not actually besiege it; for his army was routed before he could do it. Therefore the sense is, he went up to besiege Samaria, and assault it. Which is like that speech, Gen. xxviii. 10. Jacob went out from Beer-sheba and went to Haran. Which Rasi interprets, He went out to go to Haran. For it presently follows, that God appeared to him in the way.

Ver. 2. And sent messengers to Ahab king of Israel into the city, and said unto him, Thus saith Ben-hadad.] He speaks in a haughty style; just like the messengers of the Assyrian monarch to Hezekiah, Thus saith the great king, the king of Syria.

Ver. 3. Thy silver and thy gold are mine; thy wives and thy children, even the goodliest, are mine.] This message is explained by the king of Israel's answer.

Ver. 4. And the king of Israel answered and said, My lord, O king, according to thy saying, I am thine, and all that I have.] He was content to be his vassal, and to hold all that he enjoyed of him; for so he understood his demands. But Ben-hadad intended more: or, from his submissive answer, took occasion to enlarge his demands; requiring the property of all he had, which he resolved (as appears from his second message, in the next verses) to take into his own possession.

Ver. 5. And the messengers came again, and said, Thus speaketh Ben-hadad, saying, Although I have sent unto thee, saying, Thou shalt deliver unto me thy silver, and thy gold, thy wives, and thy children;

Ver. 6. Yet I will send my servants unto thee to-morrow about this time, and they shall search thy house, and the houses of thy servants; and it shall be, that whatsoever is pleasant in thine eyes, they shall put it in their hand, and take it away.] He tells him the meaning of his first demand, that he should deliver all he had into his hands. Unto which, if he now consented, it should not suffice; but he would send some of his officers to take all, and to ransack every corner of his palace, and carry away from him and from his courtiers (who are meant, I suppose, by his servants) whatsoever was valuable: or, perhaps, by servants he means all his subjects.

Ver. 7. Then the king of Israel called all the elders of the land, and said.] Summoned a general council of all the great men to advise what to do.

Mark, I pray, and see how this man seeketh mischief: for he sent unto me for my wives, and for my children, for my silver and my gold, and I denied them not.] But now nothing will content him but my utter ruin, and enslaving of our country. In this Ahab shewed some sparks of virtue remaining in him; in that while Ben-hadad desired only what he had in his own disposal, that is, all his private goods, he agreed to it: but when all the people, and the public good were concerned, he would do nothing without their consent.

Ver. 8. And all the elders, and all the people, said unto him, Hearken not unto him, nor consent.] They promising unanimously, I suppose, to stand by him, and defend him against so insolent an enemy.

Ver. 9. Wherefore he said unto the messengers of Ben-hadad, Tell my lord the king.] Of whom he speaks in as humble a manner as he did at first, (ver. 4.)

All that thou didst send for to thy servant at the first I will do: but this thing I may not do.] For his people would not yield to it.

And the messengers departed, and brought him word again.] Delivered this answer to Ben-hadad, that Ahab stuck to his first concession, according as he understood his demands, but would not consent to more.

Ver. 10. And Ben-hadad sent unto him, and said, The gods do so to me, and more also, if the dust of Samaria shall suffice for handfuls for all the people that follow me.] He wishes he may perish, if he did not bring such an army against the king of Israel, that if every soldier in it should take a handful of his country, nothing of it would be left remaining. Others explain it thus; I will not leave a bit of Samaria standing. But the other is most natural; and this is included in it.

Ver. 11. And the king of Israel answered and said, Tell him, Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off.] A speech like that, "Do not sing a triumph before the victory."

Ver. 12. And it came to pass, when Ben-hadad heard this message (as he was drinking, he and the kings in the pavilions), that he said unto his servants, Set yourselves in array: and they set themselves in array against the city.] Whilst the treaty lasted between him and Ahab he was remiss: but now he commands his army to be put in order, and that they should invest Samaria, and plant their batteries against it.

Ver. 13. And, behold, there came a prophet to Ahab king of Israel, saying.] One of those that had been hid; but was now commanded by God to appear and carry a message to Ahab. Which the prophet thought he might do safely, when he brought him such good news, as that which follows.

Thus saith the Lord, Hast thou seen all this great multitude? behold, I will deliver it into thine hand this day.] Hereby God shewed, that, as he hated idolatry, of which Ahab was notoriously guilty, so he hated also insolent proud boasters, who imagine they have no superior; and that they can carry all things as they please, by their own power.

And thou shalt know that I am the Lord.] Have a new demonstration that he was the Lord of all things. For Ahab had no such message brought by any of Baal's prophets; which was sufficient to convince him, that the Lord, who could foretell and do such wonderful things, was the only God.

Ver. 14. And Ahab said, By whom?] He gave some credit to his word; and only asks by whom this deliverance should be wrought: for he knew he had not forces enough to encounter and overthrow such powerful enemies.

And he said, Thus saith the Lord, Even by the young men of the princes of the provinces.] The princes of the provinces were the governors of the several provinces, into which the kingdom was divided. And their young men seem to signify their servants, or their pages (as we speak), that waited on them. As much as to say, Not by old experienced soldiers, but by youths; who, perhaps, had never seen a fight, but had always lived at court.

And he said, Who shall order the battle?] Or, who shall begin the fight (as some understand these words), they or we? Shall we make a sally, or expect till they assault us?

And he answered, Thou.] He bids the king begin, and lead them on. Which was commanded, to encourage the young men, and to try whether Ahab would thus far trust God or not.

Ver. 15. Then he numbered the young men of the princes of the provinces, and they were two hundred and thirty-two; and after them he numbered all the people, even all the children of Israel, being seven thousand.] All that he could get together: for these surely were not all the men of war in Israel.

Ver. 16. And they went out.] Of Samaria.

At noon.] When they knew the Syrians were at dinner, taking a repast; if not debauching themselves, as their king was.

And Ben-hadad was drinking himself drunk in the pavilions, he and the kings, the thirty-two kings that helped him.] Being perfectly secure that the Israelites durst not appear to disturb him.

Ver. 17. And the young men of the princes of the provinces went out first.] And Ahab, no doubt, at the head of them.

And Ben-hadad sent out, and they told him, There are men come out of Samaria.] The meaning is, that upon their first coming out, Ben-hadad hearing a bustle, sent to know what was the matter: and they told him a small party was come out of Samaria.

Ver. 18. And he said, Whether they be come out for peace, take them alive; or whether they be come out for war, take them alive.] It was against the law of nations to apprehend those that came to treat of peace: but he, in his insolent pride, bade his people not trouble themselves to examine what they came for, but to take them alive; which he thought they might easily do, being so few.

Ver. 19. So these young men of the princes of the provinces came out of the city, and the army which followed them.] The young men only appeared at first; but the rest of the army came out a little after.

Ver. 20. And they slew every one his man.] Who came to apprehend them.

And the Syrians fled, and Israel pursued them.] At which the Syrians were so amazed, by the suddenness of the attempt, that they fled: imagining them to be stronger and better prepared for war than they were.

And Ben-hadad the king of Syria escaped on a horse with the horsemen.] He was possessed with the same fear; and did not endeavour to make his men rally again, but fled away together with them.

Ver. 21. And the king of Israel went out, and smote the horses and chariots, and slew the Syrians with a great slaughter.] He went out, by the prophet's order, at the head of the young men, when they first issued out of the city. But now he went out further than he had done at the beginning, and overtook the chariots and horsemen; among whom he made a great slaughter.

Ver. 22. And the prophet came to the king of Israel, and said, Go, strengthen thyself, and mark, and see what thou doest.] He bade him make what preparations he was able, and take care that nothing was wanting to oppose the designs of the Syrians against him; who would certainly return, and renew the fight the next year.

For at the return of the year the king of Syria will come up against thee.] At the time when kings used to go out to war. Of which see 2 Sam. xi. 1.

Ver. 23. And the servants of the king of Syria said unto him, Their gods are gods of the hills, therefore they were stronger than we.] They did not know the God of the universe, but only worshipped particular gods; who they thought ruled over particular countries, and distributed several parts of those countries among them; (some being gods of the woods, others of the rivers, &c.) and they imagined the God of the Hebrews to be ὀρειβάτης, as Pan was called by the heathen. For they had heard, perhaps, that their law was given from heaven upon a mountain, and there God appeared to them: and the country of Israel also was very hilly: where, upon one eminent hill, God's temple was built, and he was worshipped. And it was known, that the Israelites delighted to sacrifice in high places: insomuch, that when they could not come at them, they sacrificed on the house-tops, (Jer. xx. 13.)

But let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they.] For, besides that the Syrian gods, they thought, had more power in a flat plain country, wherein they delighted; there also they should have more service of their horses and chariots, which could not fight so well upon mountains.

Ver. 24. And do this thing; Take the kings away, every man out of his place, and put captains in their rooms.] He had made the thirty-two kings, who were his tributaries, chief commanders in his former army: which his counsellors represented to him as a great error; and therefore advised him to displace them, and put his own captains in their stead, who would fight better. For they fought for their country, which the other did not: and besides, the kings, it is likely, were too delicate to be warriors; and were not so obedient to discipline as his captains would be.

Ver. 25. And number thee an army like the army thou hast lost, horse for horse, chariot for chariot; and we will fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they.] For his army they knew would be superior; and they should have the advantage of the ground.

Ver. 26. And it came to pass, that, at the return of the year, Ben-hadad numbered the Syrians, and went up to Aphek, to fight against Israel.] This was a city in the tribe of Asher: which, it is probable, was one of those that Ben-hadad's father had taken from the king of Israel, (ver. 34.) Not far from which was the plain of Galilee, where he intended to fight.

Ver. 27. And the children of Israel were numbered, and were all present, and went against them.] That is, as many as could be got together were numbered, and put in order to give them battle.

And the children of Israel pitched before them like two little flocks of kids; but the Syrians filled the country.] The Hebrew word chasiph is no where found but in this place; which Kimchi and others translate a little flock. But there is no need to add the word little: for the flocks of goats are always small; never so great as those of sheep. For they love to ramble, and are scattered up and down, as Bochartus observes, who translates these words, two flocks of young kids; denoting their contemptible number, and that they were weak, feeble, and timorous, like those fugacious creatures, as he speaks, Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 51.

Ver. 28. And there came a man of God, and spake unto the king of Israel, and said, Thus saith the Lord, Because the Syrians have said, The Lord is God of the hills, but he is not God of the valleys: therefore will I deliver all this great multitude into thine hand, and ye shall know that I am the Lord.] This man of God, the Jews say, was the prophet Micaiah.

Ver. 29. And they pitched one over against the other seven days; and so it was, that on the seventh day the battle was joined.] It may seem strange that they should look upon one another so long, and watch for advantages, without coming to any action: for the Syrians had so much advantage in their numbers, that one would think they should have immediately encompassed the Israelites, and destroyed them all. But, perhaps, the Israelites were pitched upon a rising ground, and the Syrians durst not attack them till they came down into the plain.

And the children of Israel slew of the Syrians a hundred thousand footmen in one day.] In all probability they surprised them, by a sudden unexpected assault: and God dismayed them, and struck such a terror into them, that they could make no resistance.

Ver. 30. And the rest fled to Aphek, into the city; and there a wall fell upon twenty and seven thousand of the men that were left.] The wall of the city, under which they lay, to be ready to defend it, fell down; either by the Israelites' batteries, or by an earthquake; and killed or maimed a great number of them that fled thither for safety.

And Ben-hadad fled into the city, into an inner chamber.] In the Hebrew the words are, into a chamber within a chamber; that is, into a very secret place, where he thought he should not be easily found.

Ver. 31. And his servants said unto him, Behold now, we have heard that the kings of Israel are merciful kings.] Better natured than other kings unto those who were in distress; they retaining still something of the temper of that good king David; who was full of humanity and tenderness, unto which true religion disposes men above all other things.

Let us, I pray thee.] One of his principal courtiers spake this in the name of the rest.

Put sackcloth on our loins, and ropes upon our heads; and go out to the king of Israel: peradventure he will save thy life.] This it seems was the posture in those times, wherein supplicants presented themselves, when they petitioned for mercy; as among the Greeks and Romans they came in a mournful manner, with a branch of olive in their hands. The sackcloth upon their loins was a token of great sorrow for what they had done; and halters about their necks, a token of their subjection to what punishment he pleased to inflict.

Ver. 32. So they girded sackcloth on their loins, and put ropes upon their heads, and came unto the king of Israel, and said, Thy servant Ben-hadad saith, I pray thee, let me live.] He now as humbly petitions Ahab, as Ahab a little while ago had petitioned him, (ver. 4.) and he begs of him life. Such are the strange turns of human affairs, which the ancient historians among the heathens have observed, as admonishments to men not to bear themselves high in a prosperous condition, nor trust to their present fortune (as they called it), not knowing, "quid serus vesper vehat," what might fall out before the day was done.

And he said, Is he yet alive? he is my brother.] He rejoiced to hear that he did not perish in the battle; and not only pardoned him at the first word, and gave him his life; but expressed as great affection to him, as if he had been his brother. This was folly, not mercifulness or good-nature. It had been enough not to have tormented him; but to let him not only live, but own him for a brother, was stupid inconsideration. For a man that lately treated him so disdainfully could never make a true friend.

Ver. 33. Now the men did diligently observe whether any thing would come from him, and did hastily catch it: and they said, Thy brother Ben-hadad.] They were wise persons whom he employed in this embassy; who watched attentively whether any kind word would drop from his mouth, on which they might lay hold, and make their advantage of it, before he could retract it. And they catched at the word brother, and said, Thy brother Ben-hadad lives, and implores this favour, that he may live.

And he said, Go ye, bring him.] This was strange rashness, to make such haste, as not to advise with his privy-council what to do in such a case.

Then Ben-hadad came forth to him; and he caused him to come up into the chariot.] It seems that Ahab was still in the field.

Ver. 34. And Ben-hadad said unto him, The cities which my father took from thy father I will restore.] The word Ben-hadad not being in the Hebrew, Osiander and some others think that Ahab, who was so kind as to take him up into his chariot, made this speech to him when he came there, that he would not only give him his life, but his kingdom also, which he had now power to take from him; and be so far from diminishing his power, that he would restore all that had been taken from him by his father. Which senseless kindness was the thing that provoked God to pronounce that heavy doom upon him, ver. 42. But the next words do not well agree with this: therefore I take these to be Ben-hadad's words to Ahab, whereby he endeavoured to smooth him up and sweeten him, by offering to become his subject (as the next words signify), and making restitution of all that had been taken from his predecessor.

And thou shalt make streets for thee in Damascus, as my father made in Samaria.] Some think by streets he means market-places, where commodities were sold, the toll of which should belong to Ahab. Others think he means courts of judgment, where he should maintain a jurisdiction over Ben-hadad's subjects: others, that we now call a piazza, of which Ahab should receive the rents. But commonly interpreters think he means fortifications, whereby he might bridle the chief city of the kingdom of Syria; that they might not make new irruptions into the land of Israel: citadels, as we now speak, to keep them in awe, and to be a check to them, if they attempted any thing destructive to the Israelites. Yet, after all, Gotf. Vallandus hath said a great deal to prove that the Hebrew word signifies palaces, which he being allowed to build, was a great token of subjection. We do not read of any such things that were built by the Syrian kings in Samaria: nor of any cities they took from the Israelites; unless those taken from Baasha, (xv. 20.) who was not Ahab's father.

Then said Ahab, I will send thee away with this covenant. So he made a covenant with him, and sent him away.] Wherein he discovered his great weakness: for his covenant was soon broken, as we read in the last chapter of this book.

Ver. 35. And a certain man of the sons of the prophets.] This the Jews will still have to be Micaiah: which is not likely, for he is called a prophet of the Lord, not one of the sons of the prophets.

Said unto his neighbour in the word of the Lord, Smite me, I pray thee.] He bade him give him such a blow as might wound him, (ver. 37.)

And the man refused to smite him.] Because it looked like inhumanity to strike an innocent person, who had done him no wrong.

Ver. 36. Then said he unto him, Because thou hast not obeyed the voice of the Lord, behold, as soon as thou art departed from me, a lion shall slay thee.] This may seem too severe a punishment, till these two things be considered. First, that the prophet commanded him to smite him, and that by the word of the Lord. Not of his own will, and from his proper private motion; but God required it. As if he had said (so Theodoret glosses on it), οὐκ ἐγώ σοι, &c. It is not I that require this of thee, but the Spirit that is within me. And accordingly the punishment was inflicted, because he obeyed not the voice of the Lord. And secondly, the prophet commanded this in God's name, not to an ordinary man, but El Reehu: which should not be translated, to his neighbour, but, as St. Jerome, to his companion. And so the Targum, and other ancient interpreters, to his fellow; that is, a prophet bred in the same school with himself: who well understood the weight of these words, I command thee in the name of the Lord.

And as soon as he was departed from him, a lion found him, and slew him.] The Jews say in the title Sanhedrin, and other places, that some prophets were put to death by the hand of man, and others by the hand of God. They that prophesied what they were not told by God, or they that prophesied in the name of idols, were to be put to death by the judges: but they who concealed their prophecy, or rejected a prophecy, their death was by the hand of God.

Ver. 37. Then he found another man, and said, Smite me, I pray thee. And the man smote him, so that in smiting he wounded him.] The intention of this was, that he might find the freer access to Ahab, as a soldier well deserving; and that he might the better feign his story: for in such a matter the king was not to be dealt withal in downright words.

Ver. 38. And the prophet departed, and waited for the king by the way, and disguised himself with ashes upon his face.] As a man in a very mournful condition. The Hebrews understand it, that he covered his face with a veil, or a handkerchief, or bound it about with a fillet (for one cannot tell how ashes should cover it), in token that he was wounded. So that the king could not know who he was. (See Bochart's Canaan, lib. ii. cap. 8.)

Ver. 39. And as the king passed by, he cried to the king; and said, Thy servant went out into the midst of the battle.] He pretended that he had adventured his life in the late fight; being engaged in the hottest service.

And, behold, a man turned aside, and brought a man unto me, and said, Keep this man: if by any means he be missing, then thy life shall be for his life, or else thou shalt pay a talent of silver.] He pretended, I suppose, that his captain having a prisoner of great quality, charged him with him; telling him that he should be answerable for him with his life, if he let him escape; or redeem his life with a greater sum of money than he was able to pay.

Ver. 40. And as thy servant was busy here and there.] Endeavouring, in the fight, to do the best service he was able every where.

He was gone.] In the Hebrew, he could not be found.

And the king of Israel said unto him, So shall thy judgment be; thyself hast decided it.] Thou hast pronounced thy own sentence; according to your agreement, so shalt thou suffer. He had forgot how he had dismissed a greater person willingly, else he could not have been so hard-hearted as to condemn one that had offended unwillingly. But he soon made him think of it.

Ver. 41. And he hasted, and took away the ashes from his face.] Threw away his disguise immediately; by pulling off the cloth wherein his face was wrapped.

And the king of Israel discovered him that he was of the prophets.] Some of the by-standers perhaps knew him, when they saw his bare face: or, by the very motion of his eyes before he spake (which he did immediately), he sufficiently discovered what he was.

Ver. 42. And he said unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Because thou hast let a man go out of thy hand whom I appointed to utter destruction.] For the battle was the Lord's; and the victory being obtained purely by the Divine power, and the singular favour of God, Ahab ought not to have resolved how to dispose of Ben-hadad without God's leave; but have consulted him (who had put him into his hands) what he would have done with him: for he was God's prisoner; who was to have his part of the spoil, which he would please to choose.

Therefore thy life shall go for his life, and thy people for his people.] The former part of this decree of God was fulfilled three years after, when Ahab was killed in a battle against the Syrians, (xxii. 1—4, &c.) But the latter part was deferred until the reign of Hazael, who fulfilled it by the wars he had with the Israelites, (2 Kings x. 32, 33.)

Ver. 43. And the king of Israel went to his house heavy and displeased, and came to Samaria.] This heavy sentence turned all their joy for the late victory into mourning: Ahab being much troubled for what he had done, and for what he was like to suffer.

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, after these things, that Naboth the Jezreelite had a vineyard, which was in Jezreel.] After all those wonderful things which God had done, in giving such victories to Ahab, he coveted the vineyard of a neighbour of his. Which is peculiarly noted, as Abarbinel thinks, to have followed the foregoing history, to set forth the extreme great wickedness of Ahab: who spared Ben-hadad, as Saul did Agag king of the Amalekites, and killed Naboth, that he might get his vineyards. This was a high aggravation of his crime, that he basely murdered a just Israelite, and let an impious enemy escape.

Hard by the palace of Ahab king of Samaria.] Not far from it, if not adjoining to it: being planted on the same rising ground, whereon the palace stood; for vines throve best in mountainous places.

Ver. 2. And Ahab spake unto Naboth, saying, Give me thy vineyard, that I may have it for a garden of herbs.] For a flower-garden, as some understand it.

Because it is near my house, and I will give thee for it a better vineyard than it; or, if it seem good to thee, I will give the worth of it in money.] This was a fair proposal; but the law was against it.

Ver. 3. And Naboth said to Ahab, The Lord forbid it me, that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee.]

As it is natural to all men to value and love the ancient possessions that have been in their family; so the law of Moses prohibited the alienation of lands from one tribe to another, unless a man was reduced to poverty; in which case he might sell it till the jubilee; but then it was to return to him. (See Lev. xxv. 15. 25. 28.) Now, as Naboth was in no need, so he considered that if he should, out of respect to the king, and merely to do him a pleasure, part with his vineyard, he should never get it out of his hands at the jubilee; being made part of the ground belonging to the royal palace. This makes it probable that Naboth was one of the seven thousand, who observed the law strictly.

Ver. 4. And Ahab came to his house heavy and displeased.] Just as he had done, after the prophet had pronounced the severe sentence against him, (xx. 43.)

Because of the word which Naboth the Jezreelite had spoken unto him; for he had said, I will not give thee the inheritance of my fathers.] Made him a peremptory denial; which he could not bear.

And he laid him down upon his bed, and turned away his face, and would eat no bread.] He was so vexed to be denied by a subject, that he fell into such a passion, as made him sick, and took away his stomach, and made company unacceptable to him. In short, he was very melancholy.

Ver. 5. And Jezebel his wife came to him, and said, Why is thy spirit so sad, that thou eatest no bread?] She soon found his mind was more out of order than his body; and therefore desired to know what had disturbed him.

Ver. 6. And he said, Because I spake unto Naboth the Jezreelite, and said unto him, Give me thy vineyard for money; or else, if it please thee, I will give thee another vineyard for it: and he answered, I will not give thee my vineyard.] He doth not acquaint her with his reason, but reports his answer, as if he gave him a surly refusal. Which was far otherwise; Naboth representing it as a religious duty, (ver. 3.) founded upon the law of God, not to part with the inheritance of his fathers, which was allotted to them by Joshua, never to be alienated. For in truth they that possessed them were only usufructuaries (i. e. enjoyed the profits of them), God himself being the true proprietor, (Lev. xxv. 23.) who charged their land with no other payments but tenths and first-fruits to his ministers: after which he gave them an entire possession of it, to remain in their several families for ever, without any alteration, which none could make but himself.

Ver. 7. And Jezebel his wife said unto him, Dost thou now govern the kingdom of Israel?] Is this like a king, to torment thyself in this manner? as Ralbag glosses. Or, Doth it become a king to beg and pray, and not rather command? Thou knowest not thine own power, but actest like a minor, who hath no authority. Or, as Abarbinel understands it, Canst thou expect things should go well in thy kingdom, if thou hast neither will nor power to do any thing in such a small matter as this?

Arise, and eat bread, and let thy heart be merry: and I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite.] She would not have him trouble himself, but leave her to accomplish his desires.

Ver. 8. So she wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with his seal.] These seals were wont to be worn upon one of the fingers of their hand, (Jer. xxii. 24.) and never to be taken off night nor day, but when they used them. Which shews she was an audacious woman, that durst steal this from Ahab's finger (for it doth not appear he knew of these letters), and write what she pleased in his name; that is, use his kingly authority to what purposes she thought good.

And sent the letters unto the elders and to the nobles that were in his city dwelling with Naboth.] The Israelites, it seems, after their separation from Judah, kept up the civil polity which was ordained by Moses (though they forsook his religion), having elders and judges in their several cities, as they had here at Jezreel: where they had not only elders, but also nobles; that is, captains of thousands, and hundreds, as Bon. Bertram observes, cap. 12. de Repub. Judaica.

Ver. 9. And she wrote in the letters, saying, Proclaim a fast.] As if there had been some grievous crime committed, or some great calamity had befallen them; which all the people were to bewail, and purge themselves from that sin, lest they also should become guilty. And, consequently, they were to see the crime punished very severely: for such days of fasting were spent in punishing offences, and doing justice, and praying to God for pardon. Some ask, where it was kept? And Vitringa thinks it might possibly be in the very streets of the city: where Ezra kept his fast, (Nehem. viii. 1—3.)

And set Naboth up on high among the people.] In this religious assembly of the people. For he being a person of an illustrious house (as Josephus reports), was ordered to be set in an honourable place: that so it might not be thought they condemned him out of hatred, but with grief and respect to his person, being constrained merely by the evidence given against him. Yet, others will have it, that the reason he was set in an eminent place, was only because all people accused and arraigned were wont so to appear before the judges; that all the people might see them, and hear what was alleged against them, and the proofs of it, and their defence.

Ver. 10. And set two men of Belial.] Men of no conscience, that would swear any thing for money.

Before him, to bear witness against him, saying.] Such was the Roman custom also (which was most rational), that the accused should have the accusers face to face: as Festus saith, Acts xxv. 16. But some think that she need not have put herself to this trouble of proceeding in such a formal manner against Naboth in a court of justice; for by the jus regium mentioned 1 Sam. viii. 14. she might have taken his vineyard from him by Ahab's absolute power. But that is a great mistake; for Samuel only meant that their kings would take the fruits of their vineyards upon occasion for their use, but not the possession of the vineyards themselves; for so all the land might have become the king's: and that jus regium Josephus calls a mere tyranny.

Thou didst blaspheme God and the king.] The Hebrews so much abhorred this crime of blasphemy, that they would not express it by its proper name, but said bless, instead of curse; as here and in the book of Job. Now it was death by the law of Moses to blaspheme God, (Lev. xxiv. 16.) and by custom it was death to blaspheme the king, which is forbidden in those words, Exod. xx. 28. And perhaps they might stretch that law hither, which forbade any man, upon pain of death, to curse his father or his mother; (Exod. xxi. 17.) for the prince is the father of his country. But, to make all sure, they accused Naboth of both, of treason against God and against the king; that so the people might be the better satisfied to see him stoned. But there is this difference to be observed between these two: that if a man had only blasphemed God, he was to be tried by the great court at Jerusalem (as the Hebrew doctors tell us), and his goods came to his heirs: but when any man was executed for treason against the king, his estate went to the exchequer, being forfeited to him against whom the offence was committed. And therefore it was that they accused Naboth of this crime, on purpose that his estate might be confiscated, and Ahab enjoy his vineyard. And they accused him of blasphemy against God for other reasons: that justice might be done the sooner upon him; or, as the Talmudists speak, to increase their indignation. (See Selden, de Successionibus, cap. 25. fol. 87, 88.)

And then carry him out.] Not merely out of the assembly, but out of the city, (ver. 13.) For in the wilderness, and before the conquest of Canaan, they executed punishments without the camp, (Lev. xxiv. 23. Josh. vii. 24.) and afterward without the gate of the city: whereby they intended to testify, that they would take the evil out of the midst of them, and not suffer wickedness to remain among them. So it is explained, ver. 13. (See Grotius, Matt. xxvii. 32.)

And stone him, that he may die.] For this was the punishment of blasphemy: as we see by their attempt to stone our Saviour, and their killing St. Stephen in this manner.

Concerning this punishment, see Sanhedrin, cap. 6.

Ver. 11. And the men of the city, even the elders and the nobles who were the inhabitants of his city.] The principal inhabitants.

Did as Jezebel had sent unto them, and as she had written in the letters which she had sent unto them.] Perhaps she sent private messengers to tell them by word of mouth what she expected from them, and how she would reward them; as well as public letters to authorise what they did. And princes never want instruments to execute their pleasure. But it is much there should be none among the judges, and great men, that abhorred such villany: which argues the great corruption of their manners by idolatry.

Ver. 12. They proclaimed a fast, and set Naboth on high among the people.

Ver. 13 And there came in two men, children of Belial, and sat before him.] As the witnesses used to do in courts of judgment; testifying to his face the truth of the accusation brought against him.

And the men of Belial witnessed against him, even against Naboth, in the presence of the people, saying, Naboth did blaspheme God and the king.] This signifies no more but that they had the impudence publicly to testify a falsity. Though Bertram, in the book beforementioned, (cap. 12.) from these words, in the presence of the people, argues, "Potestatem populi;" the power of the people in this kingdom: because these suborned witnesses gave their testimony before them. So that it was a mixed government, like ours, consisting of the power of the king, of the nobles, and of the people. If this be true, it argues all the people of that place to be very wicked; in that none of them excepted against the testimony of such persons, which ought not (as Maimonides observes) to have been admitted.

Then they carried him forth out of the city, and stoned him with stones, that he died.] And his sons with him, as many gather from 2 Kings ix. 26. they being condemned as accessories to his crime.

Ver. 14. Then they sent to Jezebel, saying, Naboth is stoned, and is dead.] They knew that the order came from her; and therefore let her know they had obeyed it.

Ver. 15. And it came to pass, when Jezebel heard that Naboth was stoned, and was dead, that Jezebel said to Ahab, Arise, take possession of the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, which he refused to give thee for money: for Naboth is not alive, but dead.] But by what title did he take possession? The Hebrews, I observed before, think it was by the right of confiscation; which was practised in all such crimes against the king. (See upon 2 Sam. ix. 7. and Grotius, upon Josh. i. 18. and upon this place.) Though others think he took possession for want of heirs; his children being condemned with him.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, when Ahab heard that Naboth was dead, that Ahab rose up to go down to the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, to take possession of it.] He could not but know how Naboth died; and therefore, by this, consented to that wickedness, which was committed also by his authority, (ver. 8.)

Ver. 17. And the word of the Lord came to Elijah the Tishbite, saying.] Some lesser prophets were employed in the late messages sent unto him, (xx. 13. 28. 35.) But upon this great occasion God sends Elijah, whom he dreaded, not merely to reprove him, but to condemn him to a punishment suitable to the crime he had committed.

Ver. 18. Arise, go down to meet Ahab king of Israel, which is in Samaria.] That is, who reigns in Samaria, (ver. 1.)

Behold, he is in the vineyard of Naboth, whither he is gone down to possess it.] That he might be sure not to lose his labour, he tells him where he might find him.

Ver. 19. And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the Lord, Hast thou killed, and also taken possession?] He expresses in brief the barbarity of this fact: as if he had said, Was it not enough that thou hast taken away his life, but thou must seize on his estate, and go thyself in person to take possession of it?

And thou shalt speak unto him, saying, Thus saith the Lord, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine.] He declares the cause of this judgment upon him, but doth not assign the place; for the dogs licked Ahab's blood in Samaria, (xxii. 38.) Therefore these words should be translated, as the dogs licked, or, in like manner as they licked Naboth's blood, so shall they lick thine: mark what I say, even thine.

Ver. 20. And Ahab said to Elijah, Hast thou found me, O my enemy?] As much as to say, Wilt thou never suffer me to be quiet? How darest thou to appear in my presence again, with such terrible threatenings?

And he answered, I have found thee. Because thou hast sold thyself to work evil in the sight of the Lord.] They that sell themselves are wholly under the power of their masters: so was Ahab under the power of sin; a perfect slave to his sinful lusts and passions, which hurried him into the foulest crimes.

Ver. 21. Behold, I will bring evil upon thee, and will take away thy posterity, and will cut off from Ahab him that piss- eth against the wall, and him that is shut up and left in Israel.] See upon xiv. 10.

Ver. 22. And I will make thy house like the house of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and like the house of Baasha the son of Ahijah, for the provocation wherewith thou hast provoked me to anger, and made Israel to sin.] These two families were utterly extirpated, (see xv. 29. xvi. 11, 12, &c.) as he prophesied Ahab's should be.

Ver. 23. And of Jezebel also spake the Lord, saying, The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel.] In the territory where Naboth was judged, and unjustly condemned.

Ver. 24. Him that dieth of Ahab in the city the dogs shall eat: and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat.] See xiv. 11.

Ver. 25. But there was none like unto Ahab, which did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord.] Made himself a perfect bond-slave to all manner of wickedness.

Whom Jezebel his wife stirred up.] Which did not excuse him, yet something mitigated his punishment: for she died more miserably than he.

Ver. 26. And he did very abominably in following idols, according to all things as did the Amorites.] There was no abomination which the people of Canaan committed (who are here called the Amorites, according to the ancient language, Gen. xv. 16.) which he did not imitate.

Whom the Lord cast out before the children of Israel.] As he intended to cast out the whole family of Ahab: who, by God's judgments upon the Amorites, might have taken warning not to tread in their steps.

Ver. 27. And it came to pass, when Ahab heard these words, that he rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth upon his flesh, and fasted, and lay in sackcloth, and went softly.] All these were expressions of very great sorrow and heaviness; which were usual in mourning. And the last words the Chaldee paraphrast translates, he went barefoot. But it is rejected by the greatest part of interpreters, who take it as we do, for such a slow pace as signified he was reduced to great weakness and feebleness of body, by fasting and grief; or that he had no heart to go about any business. The Jews tell us in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 43. that he sent to Jehoshaphat king of Judah, who came and gave him a certain number of stripes every day; and that three times in a day. But without this fabulous addition, here is enough to signify that he was extremely cast down, and very much troubled; I cannot say for his sin, but for the heavy punishment God had laid upon him. It is likely, indeed, for the present he might have some sense of his sins; but it did not last to bring him to true repentance; that is, to make him forsake them. For we read not so much as of any restitution of the vineyard; much less of his forsaking idols.

Ver. 28. And the word of the Lord came to Elijah the Tishbite, saying,

Ver. 29. Seest thou how Ahab humbleth himself before me? Because he humbleth himself before me.] Which neither Jeroboam nor Baasha had done, but obstinately went on, without the least token of sorrow, when the same doom was passed on them.

I will not bring the evil in his days; but in his son's days will I bring the evil upon his house.] Such a power there is in hearty repentance and reformation of life to obtain a pardon, that God remitted part of Ahab's punishment, at least deferred it, upon this imperfect repentance. Which argued some degree of belief of what the prophet said: and accordingly it was his son's blood, not his, which was licked up by the dogs in that portion of ground where Naboth's was, (2 Kings ix. 25, 26.)

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. AND they continued three years.] Not complete, but part of three years. (See 2 Chron. xviii. 2.)

Without war between Syria and Israel.] Though God was very angry with Israel, and intended to plague them by the Syrians; yet his anger being deferred for some time upon Ahab's humiliation, Elijah did not cause Hazael to be anointed king of Syria, who was to be the executioner of God's wrath, because it was prolonged for the reason now named. Thus Abarbinel.

Ver. 2. And it came to pass that, in the third year, Jehoshaphat king of Judah came down to the king of Israel.] For there was an affinity made between him and Ahab, (2 Chron. xviii. 1.) Jehoshaphat's son having married Ahab's daughter, (2 Kings viii. 18.)

Ver. 3. (And the king of Israel said unto his servants, Know ye that Ramoth-Gilead is ours, and we be still, and take it not out of the hand of the king of Syria)?] Some think Ben-hadad had not made good his covenant to restore all the cities the Syrians had taken from Israel, (xx. 34.) whereof this, it is likely, was one.

Ver. 4. And he said unto Jehoshaphat, Wilt thou go with me to battle to Ramoth-Gilead?] He acted now like a prudent man; who, before he resolved upon a war, desired to know whether he might depend upon Jehoshaphat for his assistance in it: for his forces, in comparison with the Syrians, were very small, (xx. 27.)

And Jehoshaphat said to the king of Israel, I am as thou art, my people as thy people, my horses as thy horses.] He professes himself entirely at his service; as if they were but one person and people.

Ver. 5. And Jehoshaphat said unto the king of Israel, Inquire, I pray thee, at the word of the Lord to-day.] But he desired first, that the prophets who were in Israel might be forthwith consulted, whether God approved of their design, and would give them success in it. So good men were wont to do, (Judg. i. 1. 1 Sam. xxiii. 2.)

Ver. 6. Then the king of Israel gathered the prophets together, about four hundred men.] Some think these were the prophets of the groves, who were not slain with the prophets of Baal, because they are just the same number, (xviii. 19.) But perhaps there were schools of the prophets kept up still in Israel, in imitation of those in Judah, wherein men were bred up, who pretended to have this gift. But it is plain they were false prophets; for Micaiah calls them Ahab's prophets. (See ver. 23.)

And said unto them, Shall I go up against Ramoth-Gilead to battle, or shall I forbear? And they said, Go up; for the Lord shall deliver it into the hand of the king.] They speak, as if they were inspired by the Lord, and in his name promise good success; for they knew Jehoshaphat regarded not Baal, nor Astarte, but only the Lord.

Ver. 7. And Jehoshaphat said, Is there not here a prophet of the Lord besides, that we might inquire of him?] He doth not reject these as no prophets of the Lord, though he suspected them; and therefore desired to know, if there was any other that was accounted a prophet of the Lord, from whom he might receive further satisfaction. And indeed it is not likely that Ahab would adventure to send for such prophets as were professed servants of Baal, from whom Jehoshaphat, he knew, would receive no advice: but they professed themselves to be servants of the Lord; for whom Elijah's late miracle had wrought in Ahab some respect. And Dr. Jackson seems to me to have produced a good argument for this, from Jehoshaphat's continuing his resolution of accompanying Ahab to battle, notwithstanding all that Micaiah had said against it. Which he would never have done, had he believed that Micaiah alone belonged unto the Lord, and his adversaries unto Baal, (book ii. upon the Creed, chap. 18. parag. 2.)

Ver. 8. And the king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat, There is yet one man (Micaiah the son of Imlah) by whom we may inquire of the Lord; but I hate him: for he doth not prophesy good concerning me, but evil. And Jehoshaphat said, Let not the king say so.] We ought to love those who speak the truth, not those who speak what pleaseth us.

Ver. 9. And the king of Israel called an officer, and said, Hasten hither Micaiah the son of Imlah.] He would not deny Jehoshaphat's desire of hearing him, as well as others; lest he should fly off from his kind offer, (ver. 4.)

Ver. 10. And the king of Israel, and the king of Judah sat each on his throne, having on their robes.] Their royal apparel, and all the ensigns of majesty.

In a void place in the entrance of the gate of Samaria.] Where the people used to meet, and causes were heard by the courts of justice. (See upon 2 Sam. xix. 8.)

And all the prophets prophesied before them.] Continued to encourage them in their design.

Ver. 11. And Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah made him horns of iron; and he said, Thus saith the Lord, With these shalt thou push the Syrians, until thou have consumed them.] Such was the manner, it seems, of prophets in ancient times, by external signs to represent future events: as Isaiah and Jeremiah continued to do in future ages, (Isa. xx. 2. Jer. xxvii. 2.)

Ver. 12. And all the prophets prophesied so, saying, Go up to Ramoth-Gilead, and prosper: for the Lord shall deliver it into the king's hand.] Every one of them accorded in the same sense; that he should certainly be victorious.

Ver. 13. And the messenger that was gone to call Micaiah, spake unto him, saying, Behold now, the words of the prophets declare good unto the king with one mouth: let thy word, I pray thee, be like the word of one of them, and speak that which is good.] So mightily did the opinion of universality sway with the superstitious people, that the messenger thought he could persuade Micaiah not to dissent from the rest, lest he should fall under the censure of singularity, peevishness, and privacy of spirit. And thus it is in the church at this day, as the same excellent doctor there observes.

Ver. 14. And Micaiah said, As the Lord liveth, what the Lord saith unto me, that will I speak.] He seems as yet to have no revelation about the matter; but when the question was put to him, God taught him what to answer.

Ver. 15. So he came to the king. And the king said unto him, Micaiah, shall we go against Ramoth-Gilead to battle, or shall we forbear?] The very same question that had been asked the rest of the prophets, (ver. 6.)

And he answered him, Go, and prosper: for the Lord shall deliver it into the hand of the king.] And he gave the very same answer in the same word that the other prophets had done; (ver. 12.) but spake them in such a manner, that Ahab plainly discerned he derided and mocked. It being as if he had said, To what purpose shall I contradict your prophets? For you have a mind to go, and do so; try the truth of their prediction.

Ver. 16. And the king said unto him, How many times shall I adjure thee that thou tell me nothing but that which is true in the name of the Lord?] He had not adjured him at all, but now he doth; and would do it again, and again, if he did not speak seriously, and tell him what God said to him; which Micaiah had not yet done. For he doth not use the common preface of prophets to the foregoing answer, Thus saith the Lord: because he did not speak in God's name, but in his own.

Ver. 17. And he said, I saw all Israel scattered upon the hills.] Routed, and flying from their enemies to the hills for safety.

As sheep that have not a shepherd.] In a most miserable condition, as sheep are without a shepherd to look after them: they being neither strong, nor cunning, nor nimble and swift of feet; but exposed to the injuries of all creatures, when they are left to themselves without a shepherd; which is very often repeated in the Scriptures, as if it were a proverbial speech among the Hebrews. (Numb. xxvii. 17. 2 Chron. xviii. 16. Zech. x. 2. xiii. 7. Matt. ix. 36.)

And the Lord said, These have no master.] They have lost their king and governor: who was represented by the shepherd beforementioned.

Let them return every man to his house in peace.] All go home, and think no more of war; having lost their ruler. This was an exact representation of what followed.

Ver. 18. And the king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat, Did I not tell thee that he would prophesy no good concerning me, but evil?] He had always been wont to bring threatening messages from God to him: and therefore was not (as the Jews imagine) the prophet who brought him that gracious message, when Ben-hadad treated him so insolently, (xx. 13.)

Ver. 19. And he said, Hear thou therefore the word of the Lord.] If thou dost not delight only in lies, hear what have further to say from the Lord.

I saw the Lord sitting on his throne, and all the host o heaven standing by him on his right hand and on his left.] This is a parabolical speech, as Abarbinel calls it, signifying that there was a greater King than Ahab, who would judge him according to his works. And in a vision he saw him sitting on a throne, for that purpose, and attended by the heavenly host, as Ahab was by his prophets: some on his right hand, by which many think he means the good angels; and some on his left hand, by which are meant the bad, who are the executioners of his judgments when he pleases.

Ver. 20. And the Lord said, Who shall persuade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-Gilead?] It is not to be thought there was any such consultation before the Divine Majesty, who should be employed to persuade him to undo himself: but these representations are contrived to bring down invisible things to the meanest capacities of men. Who were to know that the Lord resolved to let Ahab be deceived and perish at Ramoth-Gilead, rather than any other place: that he who let Ben-hadad escape, might be punished by Ben-hadad.

And one said on this manner, and another on that manner.] This is said, only to signify that God hath many ways of bringing men to ruin, when he declares it.

Ver. 21. And there came forth a spirit, and stood before the Lord, and said, I will persuade him.] This is not to be understood literally; but that there are evil spirits who are very forward to entice men to their own destruction, and have power so to do, if the Lord do not hinder them.

Ver. 22. And the Lord said unto him, Wherewith?] God was not ignorant of what he could and would do: but this is said, to represent more familiarly to vulgar understandings, by what means Ahad was led into destruction.

And he said, I will go forth, and will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets.] Suggest to them that which will deceive him.

And he said, Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also: go forth, and do so.] God permitted this lying spirit to follow his own inclinations, which he knew would have success, and prevail with Ahab to believe he should prosper in this war; wherein God intended he should be destroyed. For the prophets had observed how prosperous Ahab had been in former wars with the king of Syria: which made them forward to promise the same success in this also. And Ahab was as forward to believe it, as they were to assure it.

Ver. 23. Now therefore, behold, the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets.] They were properly Ahab's prophets, not the Lord's; who only employed them to mislead him.

And the Lord hath spoken evil concerning thee.] The Lord had decreed he should perish in this war; and in order to it, stirred up the spirit of the prophets (as Abarbinel speaks) to prophesy according to their own inclination; and him to believe them, and rush into his own ruin.

Ver. 24. And Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah went near.] He seems to be the chief of Ahab's prophets: the head, perhaps, of the whole college.

And smote Micaiah on the cheek.] By way of reproach and scorn, Jer. xx. 2. Mark xiv. 45. and other places.

And said, Which way went the Spirit of the Lord from me to speak unto thee?] He was confident he had the Spirit, and could not imagine how it should depart from him, and enter into Micaiah, bidding him contradict all that he and his brethren had prophesied.

Ver. 25. And Micaiah said, Behold, thou shalt see in that day, when thou shalt go into an inner chamber.] Into a secret place, (xx. 30.)

To hide thyself.] For fear he should be seized and punished as a false prophet, and the cause of Ahab's death.

Ver. 26. And the king of Israel said, Take Micaiah, and carry him back to Amon the governor of the city, and to Joash the king's son.] It seems he was in custody, when he was sent for by the messenger to come to Ahab.

Ver. 27. And say, Thus saith the king, Put this fellow in prison.] He ordered him, I suppose, to be kept a closer prisoner than before.

And feed him with the bread of affliction, and the water of affliction, till I come again in peace.] He would not have him starved, but fed with coarse bread and bad water; till he came home and brought victory along with him. And then perhaps he intended to put him to death.

Ver. 28. And Micaiah said, If thou return at all in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me. And he said, Hearken, O people, every one of you.] He desires all the people to mark, and be witnesses of what he said; and take this for a sign whether he was a true prophet or not.

Ver. 29. So the king of Israel, and Jehoshaphat king of Judah, went up to Ramoth-Gilead.] Nothwithstanding the long declaration Micaiah had made of God's decree (which was altogether concerning Ahab), Jehoshaphat gave some credit to the other prophets, who spake in the name of the Lord, as well as he. (See upon ver. 7.)

Ver. 30. And the king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat, I will disguise myself, and enter into the battle.] Like a private man.

But put thou on thy robes.] Appear like a king.

And the king of Israel disguised himself, and went into the battle.] He knew they would aim most at him, as the author of this war; and therefore he would not be known; but gives Jehoshaphat the honour (as he pretended) of leading the army, and appearing as the chief commander of it. But this seems a very odd compliment, to pray him to expose himself to the danger which he shunned. Therefore others render it Put on these robes (which he then offered him); after my example, lay thy cloak, the garment of a chief commander, aside: and put on these robes. For he brought a double change of raiment into the field; that neither of them might be known by their clothes.

Ver. 31. And the king of Syria commanded his thirty-two captains, who had rule over his chariots.] Which were divided, it is likely, into so many distinct bodies.

Saying, Fight neither with small nor great.] With common soldier, or officer, belonging to Jehoshaphat.

Save only with the king of Israel.] Whom he looked upon (as I said) as the sole author of the war, into which he had drawn Jehoshaphat.

Ver. 32. And it came to pass, when the captains of the chariots saw Jehoshaphat, they said, Surely it is the king of Israel.] Which shews, that whatsoever his robes were, he looked like more than a common man.

And they turned aside to fight with him: and Jehoshaphat cried out.] Unto the Lord for help, who delivered him, and moved them to depart from him, as we read in 2 Chron. xviii. 31.

Ver. 33. And it came to pass, when the captains of the chariots perceived that it was not the king of Israel.] By calling upon the Lord for help; or, perhaps, some of them knew him.

That they turned back from pursuing him.] Which was to be ascribed to the secret providence of God, as Ezra tells us in the place abovenamed; who resolved as wonderfully to preserve Jehoshaphat, as to destroy Ahab.

Ver. 34. And a certain man drew a bow at a venture, and smote the king of Israel between the joints of the harness.] The Lord, no doubt, directing the arrow to that part, where it should penetrate into his vital parts. The LXX. into his breast, through his lungs; for it entered between his upper and lower armour.

Wherefore he said to the driver of his chariot, Turn thy hand, and carry me out of the host; for I am wounded.] He bade him drive to some place where he might look after his wound, which was very painful to him.

Ver. 35. And the battle increased that day; and the king was stayed up in his chariot against the Syrians, and died at even.] There was a sharp fight after this: insomuch that the king, for fear his soldiers should run away, would return into the field, notwithstanding his wounds, and be supported in his chariot, to encourage his army, till the even parted them, and then he died.

And the blood ran out of the wound into the midst of the chariot.] It could not be staunched by any means they could use, but ran out of his body into his chariot.

Ver. 36. And there went a proclamation throughout the host, about the going down of the sun, saying, Every man to his city, and every man to his own country.] I suppose Jehoshaphat ordered a retreat to be sounded; and the Syrians, it is likely, were content to be gone, having slain their capital enemy. By this proclamation, the prediction of Micaiah was exactly fulfilled, according to his vision, (ver. 17.)

Ver. 37. So the king died, and was brought to Samaria; and they buried the king in Samaria.

Ver. 38. And one washed the chariot in the pool of Samaria; and the dogs licked up the blood (and they washed his armour), according to the word of the Lord which he spake.] The dogs licked up the blood, which was mixed with the water, wherewith his chariot and armour were washed: the LXX. add the word ὗες, as if swine as well as dogs had licked it up. But as there is no such word in the Hebrew, so neither is it in the Chaldee, Arabic, or Syriac; no, nor in the Latin translation. And it is very absurd; swine being not commonly kept in this country.

Ver. 39. Now the rest of the acts of Ahab, and all that he did, and the ivory house that he made, and all the cities that he built, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?] It appears by this short history, that he had several noble qualities in him, and would have been a great man, if he had not been incurably addicted to idolatry. But it is not to be imagined that the house here mentioned was built of ivory; but only inlaid with it.

Ver. 40. So Ahab slept with his fathers; and Ahaziah his son reigned in his stead.] See ver. 51.

Ver. 41. And Jehoshaphat the son of Asa began to reign over Judah in the fourth year of Ahab king of Israel.

Ver. 42. Jehoshaphat was thirty-five years old when he began to reign; and he reigned twenty-five years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi.] The intention of the Divine writer of this book was, as Abarbinel observes, principally, and in the first place, to give us the history of the kings of the house of David, with which he begins, and then joins to it the history of the kings of Israel. Thus, having finished the history of Asa king of Judah, he recounts the affairs of Israel under Ahab; who being dead, he returns to the history of the kings of Judah, who were the chief objects of his history.

Ver. 43. He walked in all the ways of his father Asa; he turned not aside from it, doing that which was right in the eyes of the Lord: nevertheless the high places were not taken away; the people offered and burnt incense yet in the high places.] This error was so deeply rooted, that the best of their kings, till Hezekiah's time (as I noted before), connived at it: and a great man of ours thinks the prophets accidentally gave countenance to it. Who had this power, that if they dispensed with any positive precept of the law, that precept was to cease for a time. Nor can any other reason be given of the toleration of high places, before the temple was built, and after that of Elijah's sacrificing upon Mount Carmel, and the forbearance of circumcision in the wilderness. (See Mr. Thorndike's Review of the Rites of the Church, p. 107.)

Ver. 44. And Jehoshaphat made peace with the king of Israel.] He did not take advantage which Ahab's death gave him, to seize upon the kingdom of Israel, and take it from his son.

Ver. 45. Now the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat, and his might that he shewed, and how he warred, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] See xi. 41.

Ver. 46. And the remnant of the Sodomites, which remained in the days of Asa his father, took he out of the land.] He made a narrower search after them than his father had done, who is said to have removed them; but some remained without his knowledge, (xv. 12.)

Ver. 47. There was then no king in Edom: a deputy was king.] The king of Judah deputed one to govern the Edomites; who was the viceroy (as we now speak) of the king of Judah. This continued from the days of David, who began this dominion over them, (2 Sam. viii. 14.) unto those of Jehoshaphat; whose son lost this authority, (2 Kings viii. 21.)

Ver. 48. And Jehoshaphat made ships of Tharshish to go to Ophir for gold.] These ships were not to go to Tharshish, but to Ophir. But they are called ships of Tharshish, from their form: for they were made after the mould of those ships which traded to that place. And all such ships, wheresoever they were built, were called ships of Tharshish. Thus Abarbinel. Which seems not to agree with 2 Chron. xx. 36, 37. (See there.)

But the ships were broken at Ezion-geber.] Before they sailed.

Ver. 49. Then said Ahaziah the son of Ahab unto Jehoshaphat, Let my servants go with thy servants in the ships: but Jehoshaphat would not.] He had contracted an amity with this king, and engaged himself so far, as to let him join with him in this navy; (2 Chron. xx. 35, &c.) but being better instructed by his ill success, and by the reproof of a prophet, he would not continue this league with him.

Ver. 50. And Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David his father: and Jehoram his son reigned in his stead.

Ver. 51. And Ahaziah the son of Ahab began to reign over Israel in Samaria the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah.] This seems not to agree with the account we have before that Jehoshaphat began his reign in the fourth year of Ahab, and Ahab reigned two-and-twenty years. Now if we take four from twenty and two, there remain eighteen; and so Ahaziah began to reign in that year, not the seventeenth of Jehoshaphat. But this is easily and truly solved: for the years which the kings of Israel reigned, are taken from the years of the kings of the house of David: so that if any one reigned in the latter end of the reign of a king of the house of David, and the beginning of the following year, he is said to have reigned two years. An instance of which is in the very next words of this verse.

And reigned two years over Israel.] Not complete, as appears from 2 Kings iii. 1. but part of two years: for Ahaziah died before his second year was ended.

Ver. 52. And he did evil in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the way of his father, and in the way of his mother.] Who was still alive, to keep him in his idolatry.

And in the way of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.] He was in nothing amended, by all that had befallen his father, and the family of Jeroboam.

Ver. 53. For he served Baal, and worshipped him.] Which worship had been introduced by his mother Jezebel: beyond the impiety of Jeroboam.

And provoked to anger the Lord God of Israel, according to all that his father had done.] Taking no warning by the hand of God against his father, which was very remarkable; nor believing the dreadful threatenings of Elijah against his mother, and their whole family.

THE SECOND BOOK OF THE KINGS.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. THEN Moab rebelled against Israel after the death of Ahab.] They paid them no more tribute, but utterly disclaimed their authority over them; which they had owned ever since the days of David, (2 Sam. xiii. 2.) Whereas Edom (which, it seems, in the division of the kingdom, fell to Judah, as Moab did to Israel) continued still under the dominion of the king of Judah, (1 Kings xxii. 47.)

Ver. 2. And Ahaziah fell down through a lattice in his upper chamber that was in Samaria.] By this lattice, the Jews understand some net-work that was in the dining-room; which being decayed, and he leaning upon it, it fell down, and he together with it.

And was sick.] Was bruised, and, perhaps, fell into a fever.

And he sent messengers, and said unto them, Go, inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron whether I shall recover of this disease.] Many think this god was called Baal-Semin, the Lord of heaven; whom the Jews, by way of contempt, called Baal-zebub; i. e. the lord of a fly, as a god that was nothing worth; or rather, because his temple was full of flies: whereas the temple at Jerusalem, though so many sacrifices were offered there daily, never had a fly in it; as the Jews relate in Pirke Avoth. But it is not likely, the king of Israel would have called this god, for whom he had a great reverence, by a contemptible name; which signifies, therefore, no more than Μυιώδης μυίαγρος, ἀπόγυιος, among the Greeks; which were the titles of Jupiter and Hercules; because they were thought to free their countries from flies, with which the Ekronites were pestered, lying in a moist and hot soil, near to the ocean. Theodoret, Procopius, and others, think they worshipped this god in the image of a fly: but the latter of them doubts whether it was the name of a demon, or of an old woman canonized for a goddess. And after all, Mr. Selden thinks the reason of this name cannot be found. But the most probable conjecture is, that he was so called from the cure of a contagious disease. For Pliny tells us, that there being a great pestilence in Africa, which was brought among them by a multitude of flies, it was extinguished by the killing of them all after they had sacrificed to the god Achore. He should have said, the god worshipped at Ekron; from whence that word Achore plainly came, (lib. x. Nat. Hist. cap. 27.) And if this was the original of the name, it is no wonder that Ahaziah sent to inquire of him about his sickness, since he was thought so powerful as to cure the pestilence.

Ver. 3. But the angel of the Lord said to Elijah the Tishbite, Arise, go up to meet the messengers of the king of Samaria, and say unto them, Is it not because there is not a god in Israel, that ye go to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron?] There are two negatives in the Hebrew text which increase the sense, Is it not because there is no God, none in Israel? That is, Do you not plainly declare, that you think there is no God, none at all, in Israel? that he knows nothing, nor can do any thing? Which makes you send to Ekron, as if there was a more knowing and mighty, if not the only, God there.

Ver. 4. And now therefore thus saith the Lord, Thou shalt not come down from the bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die. And Elijah departed.] Unto Mount Carmel, it is very probable: for he was presently after this sitting on the top of a hill, (ver. 9.)

Ver. 5. And when the messengers turned back unto him, he said, Why are ye now come back?] He knew by their speedy return, that they had not executed his command, and asked the reason.

Ver. 6. And they said unto him, There came up a man to meet us, and said unto us, Go, turn back unto the king that sent you, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Is it not because there is not a god in Israel, that thou sendest to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron? therefore thou shalt not come down from the bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die.] Elijah was a man of such a venerable presence, and spake to them with such authority, in the name of the Lord, that they were overawed thereby to obey him, rather than the king.

Ver. 7. And he said unto them, What manner of man was he that came to meet you, and told you these words?] He was not so angry at them for not obeying him, as desirous to know who he was that was so presumptuous as to stop their journey.

Ver. 8. And they answered him, He was a hairy man, and girt with a girdle of leather about his loins. And he said,

It is Elijah the Tishbite.] Some think he is said to be a hairy man, because he had long hair on his head and his beard, like the Greek philosophers: but it is more probable, it was because he was clad with a hairy garment, which the prophets were wont to use, (Isa. xx. 2. Zech. xiii. 4. Matt. iii. 4.) And, indeed, the leathern girdle shews what kind of garment he wore. (See Dr. Hammond, upon the place last mentioned, annot. d.) This was the simplest and most ancient garment; and therefore the old heroes are said to have been clothed in the skins of lions, or tigers, or bears, &c. And, perhaps, by this rude habit the prophets expressed their great grief for the sad condition the Israelites were in, when they came to call them to repentance.

Ver. 9. Then the king sent unto him a captain of fifty with his fifty: and he went up unto him.] Not to the place where he was, but so near that he might hear him deliver his message.

(And, behold, he sat upon the top of a hill), and he spake unto him, Thou man of God, the king hath said, Come down.] Sent him with an order, to command him to come down to him. But the prophet thought he did but mock him, when he called him a man of God, as appears by the punishment he inflicted on him. For it is as if he had said, Thou that callest thyself a man of God, come down, or I will fetch thee. He would not be at the pains to go to the top of the hill; but thought it sufficient to require him, in the king's name, to come down, and surrender himself into his hands.

Ver. 10. And Elijah answered and said unto the captain of fifty, If I be a man of God, then let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty. And there came down fire from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty.] If I be a man of God, as thou sayest, but dost not think, then I am not bound to obey the king, but God (as Abarbinel glosses upon these words), nor am I subject to his power, but unto God's; who will make thee know that he judges in the earth. And immediately he and his men were consumed with lightning, according to Elijah's word. Who chose to destroy them by fire from heaven (as he goes on), because he had at Mount Carmel called for fire to consume the sacrifice. Which miracle they slighting, and coming now in a proud manner to carry him by force to Samaria (where he knew Jezebel would put him to death), he called for fire to consume them.

Ver. 11. Again also he sent unto him another captain of fifty with his fifty: and he answered and said unto him, O man of God, thus hath the king said, Come down quickly.] This man was more insolent than the former, charging the prophet to obey without delay, and not make him stay; or think to dally with him. And, by the following words, it appears, this was the voice of the whole company.

Ver. 12. And Elijah answered and said unto them, If I be a man of God, let fire come down from heaven, and consume thee and thy fifty. And the fire of God came down from heaven, and consumed him and his fifty.] He knew that evil was determined against him by Ahaziah, and therefore defended himself, in this manner, from his cruelty; that he might be afraid to meddle with him, when he saw the Divine vengeance so terrible against those that came to apprehend him.

Ver. 13. And he sent again a captain of the third fifty with his fifty. And the third captain went up, and came and fell on his knees before Elijah, and besought him, and said unto him, O man of God, I pray thee, let my life, and the life of these fifty thy servants, be precious in thy sight.] He humbly entreated him, on his bended knees, to spare his life, and the lives of those that accompanied him, who did not come willingly, much less of their own accord: but were commanded by their lord and master to make known his pleasure to him.

Ver. 14. And, behold, there came fire from heaven, and burnt up the two captains of the former fifties with their fifties: therefore let my life now be precious in thy sight.] He was sensible of the hand of God against those that came with such a command before, and acknowledges he was at Elijah's mercy; but hoped he would take compassion upon him, since he owned him really to be a man of God, and believed his power; as appeared by his falling down most reverently before him, and beseeching his pity, and calling those with him his servants.

Ver. 15. And the angel of the Lord said unto Elijah, Go down with him; and be not afraid of him. And he arose, and went down with him unto the king.] This is a great instance of the prophet's faith and obedience to God; who he trusted would protect him from the wrath of the king, and the malice of Jezebel. Of whom he had great reason to be afraid, having ordered the prophets of Baal to be slain, and now sent the king an unwelcome message, and done terrible execution upon two of his captains and their companies. The first of which made him fly the country, (1 Kings xix. 3.) Jezebel threatening his destruction; and had constrained him to conceal himself for a long time, and not come to Samaria: which was the reason, as Abarbinel observes, that we hear nothing of him in the war of Benhadad against Israel, (1 Kings xx.) nor in the war of Ahab against Ben-hadad, (chap. xxii.) But now, having a command from God for it, as he had in the case of Naboth, he boldly goes to the king, and confirms with his own mouth that ungrateful truth, which he had already told him by his messengers.

Ver. 16. And he said unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Forasmuch as thou hast sent messengers to inquire of Baal-zebub the god of Ekron, (is it not because there is no God in Israel to inquire of his word?) therefore thou shalt not come down from off that bed on which thou art gone up, but shalt surely die.] There was more discourse passed between them, no doubt, than this: but this was the conclusion of all, that the sentence which God had pronounced against him was irreversible; and therefore he should not think of living much longer, but make use of the time remaining to repent of his sins.

Ver. 17. So he died, according to the word of the Lord, which Elijah had spoken.] It is likely he told him the very day when he should die.

And Jehoram reigned in his stead, in the second year of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah; because he had no son.] Therefore this brother of his succeeded him. Who began to govern in this second year of Jehoshaphat's son; but was king before, (iii. 1.) only very young, and, as some of the Jews think, under the care of Jehoshaphat. But Kimchi seems to have better reconciled this seeming difference, That Jehoshaphat declared his son Jehoram king while he lived, and he reigned with him seven years. The occasion of which is intimated in 2 Chron. xx. 3. "He gave the kingdom to Jehoram, because he was the first-born," and gave gifts to the rest of his sons. Who being many, began to strive about the succession to the kingdom: which belonging to the first-born, Jehoshaphat, to quiet them all, declared Jehoram king together with himself, and he reigned with him seven years. When it is said therefore that Ahab's Jehoram reigned in the second year of Jehoshaphat's son Jehoram, the meaning is, the second year that he reigned with his father Jehoshaphat who was then living.

Ver. 18. Now the rest of the acts of Ahaziah which he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] They were but few, because he reigned a very short time; but yet, according to custom, they were recorded in a public register. Of which, see on 1 Kings xi. 41.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when the Lord would take up Elijah into heaven by a whirlwind.] By a mighty sound of wind which the angels raised, who came to fetch him: of which translation he himself had some notice, by the spirit of prophecy.

That Elijah went with Elisha from Gilgal.] Unto this place he retired before his assumption to heaven, it having been (as Abarbinel discourses) a place of great holiness; where the Israelites made their first encampment, after they entered the land of Canaan; and where Joshua had set up twelve stones, taken out of Jordan, in memory of their miraculous passage over that river. Here also Joshua circumcised the Israelites, and kept the first passover, and set up the tabernacle, and the ark of the covenant, which remained here a long time.

Ver. 2. And Elijah said unto Elisha, Tarry here, I pray thee; for the Lord hath sent me to Beth-el.] Another place in ancient time very holy, God appearing here to Jacob more than once, (Gen. xxviii. 19. xxxv. 6. 9.) This Elijah said to try Elisha; for he did not intend to conceal his assumption into heaven, and to have no witnesses of it. His humility indeed was great, but it was not fit to obscure the glory of God, which herein miraculously appeared.

And Elisha said unto him, As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee. So they two went down to Beth-el.] They were not wont anciently to swear by the name of God (out of the reverence they bare to him), but by some lesser thing which depended on it; as Joseph did by the life of Pharaoh; that is, as true as that Pharaoh lives. And Elisha puts both here together, as sure as God liveth, and thou livest, I will not leave thee. (See Grotius, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 13. n. 2.)

Ver. 3. And the sons of the prophets that were at Beth-el came forth to Elisha.] In these very corrupt times, and in that place where the golden calves were worshipped, God did not wholly forsake the Israelites; but continued the schools of the prophets among them. For by the sons of the prophets are meant the scholars of the prophets, whom they educated, and trained up in religion and piety; and God, by degrees, bestowed on some of them the spirit of prophecy. This was a great testimony of God's love to an apostate people; among whom he left prophets to recover them from their idolatry. For even in the chief place of impiety (which was Beth-el) they were not wanting. And it is still more remarkable, that prophets of greater excellency for their miracles were continued in Israel than were in Judah; because they needed them more, to turn their hard hearts from the worship of idols; and to support the pious persons that remained among them, and preserve them from deserting their religion. For it seems to me very probable, that these sons of the prophets were such ministers to the prophets, as the evangelists were to the apostles: whom the prophets sent to publish their prophecies and instructions to the people, where they could not go themselves. And perhaps they taught them the law of God, and explained it to them; of which there was great need in those idolatrous times.

And said unto him, Knowest thou that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head to-day?] It was revealed to some of them by God, and they told it to the rest of the company of the prophets. Who allude to their manner of sitting in their school, when they say God would take away Elijah from his head: that is, deprive him of his instructions. For, it is well known, that the scholars sat below at their master's feet, and the master above over their head, when they taught them.

And he said, Yea, I know it; hold you your peace.] Say no more of it: I would not be disturbed with the thoughts of it. Or, let not my master know that I understand it.

Ver. 4. And Elijah said unto Elisha, Tarry here, I pray thee.] He doth not lay his commands upon him, (as he did unto a former servant, 1 Kings xix. 3.) but only entreats him, and in a more tender manner than he did before, to accompany him no further.

For the Lord hath sent me to Jericho.] Another remarkable place, as Abarbinel observes, to which he went: that, as Moses, when he turned his face towards this place, (Deut. xxxiv. 1.) departed this life; so this should be the last place wherein Elijah would remain, before he left the world. A place also famous for many miracles done there.

And he said, As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee. So they came to Jericho.] He hoped for some great blessing from him, when he was carried up to heaven; and therefore continued firm in his resolution, to attend that wonderful change.

Ver. 5. And the sons of the prophets that were at Jericho, came to Elisha, and said unto him, Knowest thou that the Lord will take away thy master from thy head to-day? And he said, Yea, I know it; hold you your peace.] Here was another school, where the same holy Spirit revealed the mind of God to them; as it had done at Beth-el. And it is a probable opinion of Kimchi, who affirms there were the like schools in other cities of Israel.

Ver. 6. And Elijah said unto him, Tarry here, I pray thee; for the Lord hath sent me unto Jordan.] Another place, where God had wrought great wonders. Not far from which, as Kimchi notes, the great prophet Moses died; and therefore God intended to translate Elijah near to this place.

And he said, As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee. And they two went on.] From Jericho to the river Jordan.

Ver. 7. And fifty men of the sons of the prophets went, and stood to view afar off.] They were confident the time of his assumption drew near, and were very desirous, if it were possible, to see the manner of it: but were not admitted to accompany him to the place, where he was taken up to heaven, as Elisha did; for they took this view at Jericho, (ver. 15.)

And they two stood by Jordan.] The rest being forbidden, I suppose, to go thither with him.

Ver. 8. And Elijah took his mantle, and wrapped it together.] This mantle of his is mentioned five times in these books; thrice in this chapter, and twice in 1 Kings xix. 13. 19. In all which places it is called adareth: which is a word signifying a royal robe, as well as a prophetical, (Jonah iii. 6.) The LXX. in all the five places now mentioned, translate it μηλωτὴ, which properly signifies the prophetical mantle to be made of lamb-skin: being an upper garment thrown over the shoulders, and some think coming down to the heels.

And smote the waters, and they were divided hither and thither, so that they two went over on dry ground.] God made a dry path in the middle of the river, whose waters stood on each side of it.

Ver. 9. And it came to pass, when they were gone over, that Elijah said unto Elisha, Ask what I shall do for thee, before I be taken from thee. And Elisha said, Let, I pray thee, a double portion of thy spirit be upon me.] They are much mistaken, who imagine he begged as much more of the Spirit as Elijah had; for that had been very arrogant. He only desired to have such a portion of it, as the first-born in a family had of his father's estate. That is, as much more of his spirit, as any of the rest of the sons of the prophets: for the portion of the first-born was double to that of the rest of the children. In short, he did not desire to excel his master, but his school-fellows. (See P. Fagius upon Deut. xxi. 17.)

Ver. 10. And he said, Thou hast asked a hard thing.] Such gifts were rarely bestowed.

Nevertheless, if thou see me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee; but if not, it shall not be so.] Mark, this is a sign whether thou shalt have what thou desirest or not.

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, as they still went on, and talked.] Of the happy state, it is likely, to which Elijah was going.

That, behold, there appeared a chariot of fire, and horses of fire, and parted them both asunder; and Elijah went up by a whirlwind into heaven.] Angels appeared before them, in the form of a bright chariot and horses, running towards them upon the ground; which coming between them, separated them one from the other. For Elijah mounted the chariot, and in a great gust of wind governed by angels, was transported into heaven. That is, saith Abarbinel, into the air: for he being a stranger to Christianity, could not conceive how an earthly body could live among the celestial inhabitants; and therefore, according to the gross imaginations of the Jews, imagines he is still upon the earth, in the garden of Eden. But these are ignorant conceits. The plain sense is, that his body being transformed in his passage towards heaven, he was carried up to live among the angels.

The heathens themselves did not disbelieve such things: as appears by the story of Æganympha, who was made immortal by Jupiter; and of Driope by the Hamadryades: and Bacchus assured Cadmus, that by the help of Mars he should live for ever in the isles of the blessed, whither they said Alcumene was snatched up by Mercury, at the command of Jupiter, &c. (See Dan. Huetius in his Alnetanæ Quæstiones, lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 30.)

Ver. 12. And Elisha saw it, and he cried, My father, my father!] So they called their masters and instructors.

The chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof.] And he alludes to what he beheld; and very fitly compared Elijah to chariot and horsemen, which the Israelites wanted in their armies; but he was instead of them by his counsels and prayers; whereby they might have obtained great victories, if they would have been obedient to his word.

And he saw him no more: and he took hold of his own clothes, and rent them in two pieces.] To express his sorrow for so great a loss.

Ver. 13. And he took up also the mantle of Elijah that fell from him.] This dropped from him as he went up to heaven: in token of the spirit that should be given to Elisha, according to his promise.

And went back, and stood by the bank of Jordan.] Whose waters were come together again, after he and Elijah got over.

Ver. 14. And he took the mantle of Elijah that fell from him, and said, Where is the Lord God of Elijah?] That is, let him shew his presence with me, and his power, as he did with Elijah. But we do not translate these last words exactly, two words being left out; viz. aph-hu, which the LXX. put into one, ἀφφώ, of which I know not the sense. And the Chaldee translates it, receive my petition; without any reason; those words carrying in them nothing of that signification. The best account of them is that which I meet with in a short dissertation by Joh. Frischmuthus, de Orig. et Prosapia Eliæ. where he observes, that Elisha having asked this question, Where is the Lord God of Elijah? answers himself in these words, "Aph-hu, etiam ille adhuc superest;" yea, he is yet in being. Thus Abarbinel expresses the sense: Though Elijah be not here, yet his God is. The servant is wanting, but not the Lord. The blessed God is still present, and will supply his place.

And when he also had smote the waters, they parted hither and thither; and Elisha went over.] Just as Elijah had done a little before, (ver. 8.)

Ver. 15. And when the sons of the prophets, which were to view at Jericho, saw him, they said, The spirit of Elijah doth rest on Elisha. And they came to meet him, and bowed themselves down to the ground before him.] In token of their reverence to him, as the father of the prophets.

Ver. 16. And they said unto him, Behold now, there are with us fifty strong men.] Fit to undertake such an expedition as they propose.

Let them go, we pray thee, and seek thy master; lest peradventure the Spirit of the Lord hath taken him up, and cast him upon some mountain, or into some valley.] They had but an imperfect notice of what God intended, when they asked Elisha if he knew the Lord would take his master from him. For they imagined he might not be quite taken away; but only for a time: or, that if his spirit were taken into heaven, his body might possibly be thrown upon some of the neighbouring mountains or valleys.

And he said, Ye shall not send.] For he knew it would be to no purpose.

Ver. 17. And when they urged him until he was ashamed, he said, Send.] He was afraid they should think he wanted love to his master; or, was so ambitious to enjoy his place and authority, that he was loath he should be found alive.

And they sought him three days, but found him not.] In that time they searched every place, where they thought it likely he might be cast.

Ver. 18. And when they came again to him (for he tarried at Jericho), he said unto them, Did not I say unto you, Go not?] By this he settled his authority, in that he foretold them their labour would be lost.

Ver. 19. And the men of the city said unto Elisha, Behold, the situation of this city is pleasant, as my lord seeth; but the water is naught, and the ground barren.] Things did not thrive in that soil; but the people and the cattle miscarried, and the fruit fell off from the trees, as the margin translates it. Which curse, Abarbinel thinks, had been upon this place ever since the time of Joshua.

Ver. 20. And he said, Bring me a new cruse, and put salt therein: and they brought it to him.] He would have a new cruse, that had never been used; and brought by them, together with the salt, that there might be no suspicion of fraud (as Abarbinel observes), nor the virtue ascribed to any thing that was in the cruse before, but merely to the power of God. The Jews also in Michilta say, that his putting salt into it, made this a miracle in a miracle: for it makes water less potable, and ground more barren.

Ver. 21. And he went forth unto the spring of the waters, and cast the salt in there, and said, Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters; there shall not be from thence any more death or barren land.] He wrought the miracle at Jordan, as the forenamed author observes, for his own sake; that he might make an experiment, whether the Divine influence which was upon Elijah was derived unto him. But this at Jericho he wrought for the sake of the sons of the prophets who dwelt there; that they might know the hand of the Lord was with him.

Ver. 22. So the waters were healed unto this day, according to the saying of Elisha, which he spake.] By this the people of the city (who besought this favour from him, ver. 19.) saw that he was a man of God, to whom they owed obedience.

Ver. 23. And he went up from thence to Beth-el.] That he might visit the sons of the prophets who were in that city, and comfort them for the loss of Elijah; by letting them see the Spirit of God was upon him. It is very properly said he went up thither, because it stood upon a hill, and there was an ascent from Jericho thither; (Josh. viii. 3. 17.) though Elijah and he, going another way, are said to go down to Beth-el, (ver. 2.)

And as he was going up by the way, there came forth little children out of the city.] The word naarim signifies grown youth, as well as little children. For Isaac, when he was twenty-eight years old, is called naar, (Gen. xxii. 5. 12.) and Joseph, when he was thirty, (xli. 12.) and Reboboam when he was forty, (2 Chron. xiii. 7.) And this is to be understood here of adult persons, who had a hatred to the prophet.

And mocked him.] By the instigation of their parents, or of Baal's priests (as they will have it, who take them for mere children), who stirred them up, and taught them to jeer at his bald pate, and so laughed at the ascension of Elijah.

And said unto him, Go up thou bald head, go up thou bald head.] Their repetition of these words expresses their earnestness and vehemence in their contempt of him. For, as hair was always accounted a singular ornament, so baldness was disgraceful. Insomuch that Cæsar, as Bochartus hath observed, could not bear with those who jeered him upon this account; and thought it the highest honour the senate did him, in decreeing he should always appear with a wreath of laurel upon his head.

When they call upon Elisha to go up, they flouted, as Abarbinel thinks, at the ascension of Elijah to heaven; the news of which had been brought thither, and reported by the prophets of that place. Which the idolaters laughed at, and bade Elisha go up to heaven also, that they might not be troubled with him. Thus I find also the author of the questions and answers, ad Orthodoxos, understands these words: which were spoken, πρὸς διασυρμὸν τῆς τοῦ Ἠλίου ἀναλήψεως, to reproach the assumption of Elijah: as if they had said, λαμβανέτω καί σε πνεῦμα, Let the Spirit take thee also, and cast thee upon some inaccessible mountain; that we may be rid of thee, as we are of him. (Respons. 80.)

Ver. 24. And he turned back, and looked upon them, and cursed them in the name of the Lord.] This contempt of him, not as a man merely, but as a prophet, provoked the anger of God; who moved Elisha to lay a curse upon them, and punish them, as Moses did Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; and St. Peter did Ananias and Sapphira.

And there came two she-bears out of the wood.] Who it is likely had been robbed of their whelps: which made them the more fierce and outrageous.

And tare forty and two children of them.] This was done by an extraordinary direction of God; who moved the bears at that moment to come out of the wood, when Elisha pronounced the curse; and to make such a great havoc among them, when two or three would have satisfied their hunger.

Ver. 25. And he went from thence to Mount Carmel.] Where it is probable he had many disciples: among whom he intended to be awhile retired.

And from thence he returned to Samaria.] To testify against their idolatry. And it is highly probable there was a college of prophets even in Samaria, as there was in Beth-el and Jericho, whom he went to encourage.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. NOW Jehoram the son of Ahab began to reign over Israel in Samaria, the eighteenth year of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, and reigned twelve years.] Ahaziah his brother reigned two years, and began his reign in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat: (1 Kings xxii. 51.) that is, part of the seventeenth year, and part of the eighteenth, which was accounted for two years. In the latter end of which Jehoram his brother began to reign: when Jehoram, the son of Jehoshaphat, had two years reigned with his father. (See i. 17.)

Ver. 2. And he wrought evil in the sight of the Lord, but not like his father, and like his mother; for he put away the image of Baal which his father had made.] He did not break it in pieces, as he would have done if he had heartily hated it, but only put it away out of the temple; being afraid, lest the judgments of God should fall upon him, as they had done upon his father. And the king of Moab being now in rebellion against him, Jehoshaphat perhaps refused to help him, whilst he was a worshipper of Baal. It is much that his mother, who had brought this worship with her from the Zidonians, should suffer him to remove this image; but she was a little daunted, perhaps, at the many disasters which had befallen their family, and was contented with worshipping Baal in private.

Ver. 3. Nevertheless, he cleaved unto the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin; he departed not therefrom.] It was easier to remove the image of Baal than to put away the calves; for that was new, but the other had been of long standing; and the most likely course they could think of to maintain the division of the two kingdoms.

Ver. 4. And Mesha king of Moab was a sheep-master.] The riches not only of private men, but also of kings, in ancient time consisted much in sheep and cattle: which, I have observed before, they looked after themselves: and their sons kept their sheep, as Bochartus shews in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44. And thus the greatest part of the world lived, during the space of near four thousand years. Which did not hinder them from being, at the same time, a brave and warlike people, as appears by the ancient Romans, who were thus bred; and subdued all Italy, and at last made themselves masters of the world. For this sort of life was the cause of their great strength, making their bodies robust, and hardened to labour, and accustomed to a severe discipline. There cannot be a greater instance of this than we have in Cato the Censor, who passed through all the great offices of the republic of Rome, had governed provinces, commanded armies, was a great orator, lawyer, and politician; who did not disdain to write a treatise concerning all the ways that are necessary for the improving lands, and how stables and houses were to be built for several sorts of cattle, and how presses were to be made for wine and oil, &c. Insomuch, that any one may see he was perfectly acquainted with country business, and that he did not write for ostentation, but for the use and service of mankind.

And rendered to the king of Israel a hundred thousand lambs, and a hundred thousand rams, with the wool.] This was a prodigious number, and being rendered unshorn, made them more valuable. But we are to consider that these countries abounded with sheep; insomuch, that Solomon offered a hundred and twenty thousand at the dedication of the temple, (2 Chron. vii. 5.) and the Reubenites drove from the Hagarites a hundred and fifty thousand, (1 Chron. v. 21.) For they frequently brought forth two at a time, and sometimes twice a year, as that great man Bochartus shews in the same book, cap. 46. and produces a famous place in Pliny, which shews that this was the most ancient tribute. For he saith in the Censorian Tables, all the rents of the people are called pastures, "quia diu hoc solum vectigal fuerat," (lib. xviii. Nat. Hist. cap. 3.) But Ludolphus hath observed two things for the illustrating this history of the king of Moab, which seem to be very considerable. First, that this was not annual tribute, but satisfaction for damages which the Israelites had sustained in the war with them, or by their revolt from them, as the LXX. understand it. And then the word ajil should not be translated a ram, but a wether; for one ram will serve a great many sheep, (lib. i. Comment. in Histor. Æthiop. cap. 3. n. 30.)

Ver. 5. And it came to pass when Ahab was dead, that the king of Moab rebelled against the king of Israel.] As was said before, chap. i. 1. and here again repeated, only to introduce the following history.

Ver. 6. And king Jehoram went out of Samaria the same time, and numbered all Israel.] As soon as he was settled in his kingdom, his first business was to raise an army to reduce Moab to obedience.

Ver. 7. And he went.] After his army was raised, he went out of Samaria.

And sent to Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, saying, The king of Moab hath rebelled against me: wilt thou go with me against Moab to battle? And he said, I will go up: I am as thou art, my people as thy people, and my horses as thy horses.] He returned the very same answer to him which he had given to Ahab his father, when he desired his assistance against Syria, (1 Kings xxii. 4.) wherein he had been so unsuccessful, that it should have made him more cautious how he joined with his son; especially since he seemed to have been afraid to have to do with his brother Ahaziah, (1 Kings xxii. 49.) But Jehoram having reformed some things, (ver. 2.) it made him, perhaps, have a better opinion of him: and by shewing kindness to him, he might hope to persuade him to proceed further. And besides, the Moabites had lately invaded his country, (2 Chron. xx. 1. 10.) which might move him to embrace an opportunity to chastise them for it.

Ver. 8. And he said, Which way shall we go up?] Jehoshaphat having agreed to join with him, it is likely the king of Israel asked this question, and Jehoshaphat made the following answer.

And he answered, The way through the wilderness of Edom.] Which he chose, because he would have the assistance of the Edomites, who were his tributaries. And it is probable Moab was but weakly fortified on that side.

Ver. 9. So the king of Israel went, and the king of Judah, and the king of Edom.] There was no king at this time in Edom, as we read in the last chapter of the foregoing book, (ver. 47.) but a viceroy appointed by the king of Judah. Yet such are called kings, 1 Kings xx. 1. (See Grotius.) And Jehoshaphat, I suppose, now required him with his people to help him in this war.

And they fetched a compass of seven days' journey.] That they might come upon the backs of the Moabites, where they did not expect them.

And there was no water for the host, and for the cattle that followed them.] That drew their carriages. For either there was a great drought in those parts, or they had mistaken their way.

Ver. 10. And the king of Israel said, Alas! that the Lord hath called these three kings together, to deliver them into the hand of Moab.] He doth not cry to God for help, but only bewail the straits into which they were fallen; which his own guilt made him imagine God had contrived for their destruction.

Ver. 11. And Jehoshaphat said, Is not there a prophet of the Lord, that we may inquire by him.] This was spoken like a pious man; but it was a fault that he did not inquire before for direction in this war; as he did in that with the Syrians, (1 Kings xxii. 5.)

And one of the king of Israel's servants answered and said, Here is Elisha the son of Shaphat, which poured water on the hands of Elijah.] That is, was his servant, and ministered unto him.

Ver. 12. And Jehoshaphat said, The word of the Lord is with him.] For no doubt he had been informed how Elijah had chosen him to be his successor; and how he attended him till he was taken up to heaven; and what wonders he had already done.

So the king of Israel, and Jehoshaphat, and the king of Edom, went down to him.] It is uncertain whither they went; but it is very observable, first, how much they honoured the prophet, for whom they did not send to come to them, but went to him. And secondly, how desirous the prophet was to do good, in that he followed the camp into this wilderness. For it is not likely they went back to Samaria to wait on him (where the story last left him, in the last verse of the foregoing chapter), which would have been a seven days' journey; and the army might in the mean time have been lost. Besides, ver. 16. shews he was not far from th em; and the servant in the foregoing verse speaks of him as present; saying, Here is Elisha.

Ver. 13. And Elisha said unto the king of Israel, What have I to do with thee? get thee to the prophets of thy father, and to the prophets of thy mother.] He refuses with great disdain to entertain any discourse with him; and bids him confer with those who he knew could do him no service.

And the king of Israel said, Nay.] That is, I will not consult them; but do thou give us counsel how we may be brought out of this great distress.

For the Lord hath called these three kings together, to deliver them into the hand of Moab.] Though he refused to do any thing for his sake, yet he beseeches him to have respect to the other two kings, who must perish as well as he, if he did not help them.

Ver. 14. And Elisha said, As the Lord of hosts liveth, before whom I stand.] It is observable, that the sons of the prophets are said to sit before their masters the prophets when they instructed them; (iv. 3. 8. and see the foregoing chapter, ver. 3.) but the prophets themselves stood before the Lord, their master, when he sent them upon any message. (See Corn. Bertram. de Rep. Jud. cap. 16.)

Surely, were it not that I regard the presence of Jehoshaphat the king of Judah, I would not look towards thee, nor see thee.] He saith nothing of the king of Edom, who was a dependant upon Jehoshaphat; whose piety he esteemed, and had some respect to all that belonged to him.

Ver. 15. But now bring me a minstrel.] One that could play well upon an instrument of music.

And it came to pass, when the minstrel played, that the hand of the Lord came upon him.] Every one knows that some sort of music wonderfully quiets and composes the spirits, when they are disordered, and raises them when they are flat and heavy. And therefore holy men did not neglect such helps to make them so sedate and cheerful, that they might be fit to receive Divine inspirations. But it is likely he that played now to Elisha, sung withal some hymn in the praises of God, and of his wonderful works, whereby the spirit of the prophet was sweetly composed, which had been disturbed, perhaps more than was fit, by his indignation at the king of Israel. And from hence we may conclude there were excellent musicians in Israel, as well as in Judah, where David had settled Divine music in great perfection. And it is very probable, what the heathen boast of their muses, was from hence derived.

Then the hand of the Lord came upon him.] That is, God wrought in him; and he felt himself moved by a Divine inspiration.

Ver. 16. And he said, Thus saith the Lord, Make this valley full of ditches.] This shews they were in a place where the army was encamped in a valley, in which he ordered them to be set at work, to dig large ditches to hold water enough for them all.

Ver. 17. For thus saith the Lord, Ye shall not see wind, neither shall ye see rain; yet that valley shall be filled with water, that ye may drink, both ye, and your cattle, and your beasts.] The words belonging to one of our senses are frequently applied to another: as, to see wind is to feel it, or hear it. And the meaning is, there should no wind stir to blow up clouds (as the south wind commonly did), nor should they see any rain fall; and yet they should have plenty of water in that valley, for themselves and all belonging to them. I suppose it fell upon the mountains at a distance from them, and came pouring down into the lower ground.

Ver. 18. And this is but a light thing in the sight of the Lord: he will deliver the Moabites into your hand.] Of which, I suppose, they had no hope, being much dispirited for want of water.

Ver. 19. And ye shall smite every fenced city, and every choice city, and shall fell every good tree, and stop up all the wells of water, and mar every good piece of land with stones.] Prophets were to be obeyed, when they commanded things contrary to a positive precept, as some part of this was, (see Deut. xx. 19.) Which they had power to dispense withal for a time, though not always, so as to annul the precept, as Maimonides expounds this matter in his preface to Seder-Zeraim. But some think this usage so severe, that they take the prophet's meaning to be no more than this: that God would give them such an entire victory, that they might be able to do all this if they pleased; and the Moabites were so ill neighbours, that it is very likely they did this execution upon them, (ver. 25.)

Ver. 20. And it came to pass in the morning, when the meat-offering was offered.] When the people of God were praying at Jerusalem, at the time of the morning sacrifice, Elisha joined his prayers with them for this blessing.

That, behold, there came water by the way of Edom, and the country was filled with water.] Whether it came from a sudden collection of a vast number of clouds, which poured down rain in abundance in the land of Edom, or from some rocks which God caused to gush out water; it came by a miraculous power, when there was no natural cause to produce it.

Ver. 21. And when all the Moabites heard that the kings were come up to fight against them, they gathered all that were able to put on armour, and upward, and stood in the border.] Intending to defend themselves; but not to march out of their country to give the enemy battle.

Ver. 22. And they rose up early in the morning.] The next morning, I suppose, after the water filled the valley.

And the sun shone upon the water, and the Moabites saw the water on the other side as red as blood.] On the east side of their country.

Ver. 23. And they said, This is blood: the kings are surely slain, and they have smitten one another: now therefore, Moab, to the spoil.] They knew there was no water there a few days before, and that there had been no rain; and therefore (the sun shining directly in their eyes, which made it look red) they concluded it could be nothing else but blood. And what blood could it be, but that of the three kings' army, who had fallen out, by reason, perhaps, of their different religion; or vexed at the straits they had brought one another into? And the Moabites easily believing what they wished, imagined they had nothing to do but to go and gather spoil, and not to fight at all.

Ver. 24. And when they came to the camp of Israel, the Israelites rose up and smote the Moabites, so that they fled before them.] They entirely routed and dispersed them.

But they went forward smiting the Moabites, even in their country.] But they did not content themselves with this victory, but pursued them so close, that they got into their country with them, and there made a greater havoc of them.

Ver. 25. And they beat down the cities, and on every good piece of land cast every man his stone, and filled it: and they stopped all the wells of water, and felled all the good trees.] According to the permission given them by the prophet, ver. 19. intending, I suppose, to depopulate the whole country.

Only in Kir-haraseth left they the stones thereof.] They left no walls standing, but only these of the royal city, which was exceeding strong. (See Isa. xvi. 7. 11.)

Howbeit the slingers went about it, and smote it.] They raised such batteries against it, that they drove them who defended it from the wall, and made great breaches in it.

Ver. 26. And when the king of Moab saw the battle was too sore for him.] That he was not able to defend the place any longer.

He took with him seven hundred men that drew swords, to break through even unto the king of Edom: but they could not.] He made a sally with seven hundred stout men upon the quarters of the king of Edom (which it seems were the weakest), hoping to break through them and escape. But they were repulsed, and forced to retreat.

Ver. 27. Then he took his eldest son, that should have reigned in his stead, and offered him for a burnt-offering upon the wall.] Hereupon the king of Moab took his eldest son and made him a sacrifice before them all, as the last desperate remedy, hoping thereby to obtain powerful help from his god, through so precious a sacrifice of the dearest thing he had unto him. For it is well known, not only by the Holy Scriptures, but heathen writers, that in great distress they were wont to offer their own children upon their altars. Eusebius, lib. v. Præpar. Evangel. and Lactantius, lib. i. Div. Instit. cap. 21. mention several nations who used these sacrifices: and Cæsar, lib. vi. de Bello Gallico, saith of the Gauls, that when they were afflicted with grievous diseases, or in time of war, or great danger, they either offered men for sacrifices, or vowed they would offer them. For they imagined God would not be appeased, "Nisi pro vita hominis reddatur vita hominis," unless the life of a man was rendered for the life of a man.

Abarbinel, indeed, thinks that he offered the eldest son of the king of Edom, whom he took prisoner in the late sally. But it could not be said of him, that this son was to reign in his stead; for the king of Judah made whom he pleased his deputy over Edom. And this would not have made the three kings withdraw the siege, but prosecute it with greater fury. And Abarbinel acknowledges, that their wise men in Pesikta and the Sanhedrin understand it as I do: and that some of them think he offered him, in imitation of Abraham, to the God of Israel, hoping to move him to be favourable to him. Which no less man than Grotius follows. And indeed it is highly probable, that this custom of offering human sacrifices sprung from the offering of Isaac, from whence the Moabites, who were neighbours to Canaan, learnt it.

And there was great indignation against Israel.] Or, as it may be translated, great repentance upon (or in, or among) Israel. That is, they were extreme sorry and troubled at this barbarous sacrifice, and wished they had not pushed on the war so far; which ended in such a horrid action, which brought an odium upon them.

And they departed from him, and returned to their own land.] Hereupon they raised the siege, by common consent, and returned home, for fear any such thing should be done again.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. NOW there cried a certain woman of the wives of the sons of the prophets unto Elisha, saying.] It is observed by St. Jerome, that Elijah and Elisha had no wives: "Et virgines multi filii prophetarum;" and many of the sons of the prophets were virgins: but it is plain by this place that they were not all so; but had liberty to marry if they pleased.

My husband is dead; and thou knowest that thy servant did fear the Lord.] Was a worshipper of the true God, and not of Baal, nor the calves: which was the reason, it is likely, of his poverty; such men being discountenanced among the idolatrous Israelites.

And the creditor is come to take unto him my two sons to be his bondmen.] Because she was not able to pay his debts: in which case the Hebrews had such a power over their children, that they might sell them (being looked upon as their goods) to pay what they owed; and the creditor might force them to it. And Huetius thinks that from the Jews this custom was propagated to the Athenians; and from them to the Romans. The Hebrew doctors have a fancy, that this prophet was Obadiah, (mentioned 1 Kings xviii. 3.) and that the creditor was Jehoram the son of Ahab. Which is utterly ungrounded.

Ver. 2. And Elisha said unto her, What shall I do for thee? tell me: what hast thou in the house?] Towards the discharge of thy husband's debt.

And she said, Thine handmaid hath not any thing in the house, save a pot of oil.] Which was a thing of great use; both for the service of God and of men.

Ver. 3. And he said, Go, borrow thee vessels abroad of all thy neighbours, even empty vessels; borrow not a few.] As many as she could get, and not small vessels.

Ver. 4. And when thou art come in, thou shalt shut the door upon thee, and upon thy sons.] That none might come in to disturb her in what she was about.

And shalt pour out.] Of the pot of oil which she had.

Into all those vessels, and thou shalt set aside that which is full.] And call for another that was empty.

Ver. 5. So she went from him, and shut the door upon her sons, who brought the vessels to her; and she poured out.] Believing she should by this means be relieved.

Ver. 6. And it came to pass, when the vessels were full, that she said unto her son.] Who brought her the empty vessels; for the other son was employed in setting aside those that were full.

Bring me yet a vessel.] For she was confident the pot of oil would still afford more.

And he said unto her, There is not a vessel more. And the oil stayed.] When there was no vessel to receive it.

Ver. 7. Then she came and told the man of God: and he said, Go, sell the oil, and pay thy debt, and live thou and thy children upon the rest.] We must first do justice; and then expect God's blessing upon the provision we make for ourselves and our family.

Ver. 8. And it fell out on a day, that Elisha passed to Shunem.] A city in the tribe of Issachar, (Josh. xix. 18.)

Where was a great woman.] Who had a great estate, and it is likely kept a great house.

And she constrained him to eat bread.] Was very importunate with him to take a repast at her house, and prevailed with him to accept of her kindness.

And so it was, that, as oft as he passed by, he turned in thither to eat bread.] She made him so welcome, that he made no scruple, when he had occasion to go that way, to step in there and refresh himself: which it is likely she invited him to do.

Ver. 9. And she said unto her husband, Behold now, I perceive.] By her frequent conversation with him.

That this is a holy man of God.] Not only a prophet; but a person of great sanctity.

Which passeth by us continually.] For Shunem was in his way as he went from Carmel (which was not far from hence) to Beth-el and Jericho, and other places of the sons of the prophets.

Ver. 10. Let us make a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall.] A private room remote from the house, where he might retire; and without noise or disturbance give himself to prayer and meditation, and follow his sacred studies.

And let us set up for him there a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick.] Furnish it with all things necessary for a single person.

And it shall be, that when he cometh, he shall turn in thither.] Take up his lodging there, if he think good.

Ver. 11. And it fell out on a day that he came thither, and he turned into the chamber, and lay there.] And it appears by the story, that he became their constant guest.

Ver. 12. And he said to Gehazi his servant, Call this Shunammite. And when he called her, she stood before him.] Waiting to know what he wanted. But he having been so kindly entertained by her for some time, sent for her to give her thanks, and to desire to know what he should do for her.

Ver. 13. And he said unto him, Say now unto her.] He seems to me to have whispered to Gehazi, to ask her the following question. Whereupon she withdrew, thinking he had some business with him before he could speak with her.

Behold, thou hast been careful for us with all this care.] Been exceeding kind to us, in taking care we should want nothing.

What is to be done for thee?] That is, wherein can I serve thee? For he was very desirous, as all good men are, to be grateful.

Wouldest thou be spoken for to the king, or to the captain of the host?] It seems the prophet had a great power at court since the late victory over the Moabites. And therefore, if she had any suit to make to the king, he doubted not to effect it; or had any grievance to complain of, which she suffered by the soldiers, he offered to get it remedied.

And she answered, I dwell among my own people.] Whatsoever vexation any might suffer by the soldiers upon the borders, she tells him she lived safely and quietly among her friends and good neighbours; being so free from want that she needed not petition the king for any thing.

Ver. 14. And he said, What is then to be done for her?] This answer being returned to his master by Gehazi, Elisha asked him, what he thought might be most welcome to her. Which he might easily know, going about the house and observing all things there, which Elisha did not, who lived retired.

And Gehazi said, Verily she hath no child, and her husband is old.] He knew women were desirous above all things to have children: which she neither had, nor was like to have, by reason of her husband's age.

Ver. 15. And he said, Call her.] This shews she withdrew presently, when he first sent for her, (ver. 12, 13.)

And when he had called her, she stood in the door.] Either out of modesty or reverence; or being afraid to disturb him.

Ver. 16. And he said, About this season, according to the time of life.] The next year, after thou hast gone the usual time.

Thou shalt embrace a son.] From the word Habeketh, which we translate thou shalt embrace, some of the Hebrew doctors conjecture that this son proved afterward the prophet Habakkuk: which is a mere fancy, rejected by Abarbinel and others; who make account Habakkuk prophesied in the time of Manasseh or Josiah.

And she said, Nay, my lord, thou man of God, do not lie unto thy handmaid.] Do not jest with me.

Ver. 17. And the woman conceived, and bare a son at that time that Elisha said unto her, according to the time of life.] It is likely he named the very day when he should be born; and it fell out exactly as he had said.

Ver. 18. And when the child was grown, it fell out on a day, that he went out to his father to the reapers.] Either for pleasure, or to inquire of his health. This shews still the truth of that which I have often observed, that great men in ancient times (for the quality of his wife shews this was no mean person, ver. 8.) followed their country business themselves; looking after their corn and their cattle, and labouring with their own hands for their health, and the increase of their estates, by their industry in their improvement.

Ver. 19. And he said unto his father, My head, my head!] Either walking so far, or staying long in the sun (which shone hot in harvest-time), put him into a fever, which grievously affected his head.

And he said to a lad, Carry him home to his mother.]

That she might look after him, and do what was proper for his ease.

Ver. 20. And when he had taken him, and brought him to his mother, he sat on her knees until noon, and then died.] It seems he went out in the morning to his father, and was seized with such a sudden violent pain, as in a few hours killed him.

Ver. 21. And she went up, and laid him upon the bed of the man of God.] Hoping for help by him, whose master she had heard (no doubt) had restored a child to life.

And shut the door, and went out.] Kept it as private as she could, that her husband might not know the child was dead; which would have been a great grief to him.

Ver. 22. And she called to her husband, and said.] By a messenger which she sent to him.

Send me now, I pray thee, one of the young men, and one of the asses, that I may run to the man of God, and come again quickly.] So as not to hinder his business.

Ver. 23. And he said, Wherefore wilt thou go to him to-day? it is neither new moon, nor sabbath.] It appears by this, that the prophets were the public instructors of the people; and their houses were a kind of school or synagogue, unto which they resorted upon the days here mentioned, to be taught their duty, out of the law of God, and to be resolved in their doubts. And the prophets accordingly were constantly in some certain place upon these days, to give the people their instruction.

And she said, It shall be well.] In the Hebrew, it is peace. That is, she prays him to believe that she went for no hurt; but for his and her benefit.

Ver. 24. Then she saddled an ass, and said to her servant, Drive, and go forward; slack not thy riding for me, except I bid thee.] She ordered him to make all the haste he could, as fast as the ass would go; without any respect to her, unless she called to him to drive more softly.

Ver. 25. So she went and came to the man of God to Mount Carmel.] This is a place which he, and Elijah also, much frequented: which makes it credible there was a school of the prophets here; it being a mountain full of trees, which made it fit for sacred exercises. As soon as Elijah was taken from him, Elisha fetched a circuit by Jericho and Beth-el to come hither; and from thence went to Samaria. For which no good reason can be given, but that it was to visit the places which his master had frequented, and instruct those who studied there, as Elijah had been wont to do.

And it came to pass, when the man of God saw her afar off, he said to Gehazi his servant, Behold, yonder is that Shunammite.] He was surprised to see her coming at an unusual time.

Ver. 26. Run now, I pray thee, to meet her.] To shew his respect to her.

And say unto her, Is it well with thee? is it well with thine husband? is it well with the child?] He bids him make particular inquiry after all that were most dear to her.

And she answered, It is well.] Some translate it, It shall be well. But there is no need of that. For they were well in part; that is, she and her husband. And she did not think fit to tell Gehazi all the truth, but to deliver it to the prophet himself.

Ver. 27. And when she came to the man of God to the hill, she caught him by the feet.] After the manner of a most humble supplicant; resolving not to let him stir till he granted her request.

And Gehazi came near to thrust her away.] Believing his master did not expect such abasement, especially from her, who had been so kind and friendly to them.

And the man of God said, Let her alone; her soul is vexed in her.] Do not disturb her, for she is too full of grief already.

And the Lord hath hid it from me.] God had not shewn him the cause of it, that he might have prevented it.

And hath not told me.] The prophets did not know all things, but only what God was pleased to impart unto them. (See 2 Sam. vii. 3.) For the Spirit was not in them after the manner of a supernatural faculty, or infused habit (as we speak), whereby they might act what and when they pleased; Moses himself, the great prophet, not being able to determine some things till he had consulted the Divine Majesty, (Numb. xv. 13, 14.)

Ver. 28. Then she said, Did I desire a son of my lord? did I not say, Do not deceive me?] As much as to say, she was well satisfied without a son: and did neither desire one, nor was forward to believe she should have one when freely promised: but to lose him after he was bestowed upon her, was an unspeakable affliction to her.

Ver. 29. And he said to Gehazi, Gird up thy loins.] That he might travel with greater expedition.

And take my staff in thy hand, and go thy way: if thou meet any man, salute him not; and if any man salute thee, answer him not again.] Lest they should enter into discourse, and stop his speed.

And lay my staff upon the face of the child.] He thought it might work a miracle, as Moses's rod and Elijah's mantle did: and if the woman had had a faith strong enough, it might have been sufficient. But she distrusted it, and would have Elisha go himself. Abarbinel thinks he had no thoughts of reviving the child by this means, but only ordered his staff to be laid upon it, to preserve him from putrefaction: which is a low conceit.

Ver. 30. And the mother of the child said, As the Lord liveth, and as thy soul liveth, I will not leave thee.] This seems to me to signify, that she did not confide in what he ordered Gehazi to do; but thought his presence necessary to touch the child, and pray to God to restore him.

And he arose, and followed her.] Being overcome by her importunity, and his own kindness to so great a friend.

Ver. 31. And Gehazi passed on before them, and laid the staff upon the face of the child; but there was neither voice nor hearing.] No sign of life appeared, as Gehazi, I suppose, expected.

Wherefore he went again to meet him, and told him, saying, The child is not awaked.] He speaks of death as a sleep: in which he continued, notwithstanding he had done as Elisha commanded. And it is likely that power was withheld which might have accompanied the staff, because the prophet changed the method of his proceeding in working this miracle; when the woman would have him go himself, and did not pray to God, that upon the laying on of the staff he might revive.

Ver. 32. And when Elisha came into the house, behold, the child was dead, and laid upon his bed.] Where his mother had left him when she went to Elisha, (ver. 21.)

Ver. 33. He went in therefore, and shut the door upon them twain, and prayed unto the Lord.] He shut the door, that he might not be disturbed by any body in his prayer to God.

Ver. 34. And he went up.] Upon the bed.

And lay upon the child, and put his mouth upon his mouth, and his eyes upon his eyes, and his hands upon his hands; and he stretched himself upon the child.] This could not be done all together, because his face and body were much larger than the child's, but successively: he laid his mouth upon the child's mouth, and his eyes and hands upon the child's eyes and hands, as Elijah had done in the like case, in token that God inspired his soul again into him, at his earnest prayer.

And the flesh of the child waxed warm.] Not from the external heat of Elisha's body, but from an inward principle of life, which was restored, and began to move in him.

Ver. 35. And he returned.] From the bed.

And walked in the house to and fro.] Took a turn or two in the house to refresh himself, after the pains he had taken in prayer, and otherways, for the child's recovery.

And went up, and stretched himself upon him.] As he had done before. For this miracle was not wrought in an instant, but gradually: by continued vehement prayer to God.

And the child sneezed seven times.] A sign of health, whereby his head was purged, in which his pain lay, (ver. 19.)

And the child opened his eyes.] After his sneezing he looked upon Elisha, and it is likely spake to him.

Ver. 36. And he called Gehazi, and said, Call this Shunammite. So he called her: and when she was come in unto him, he said, Take up thy son.] She came only to the door of the room, till he bade her take up her son, and then she came in, as it follows.

Ver. 37. Then she went in, and fell at his feet, and bowed herself down to the ground.] Giving thanks to God, and to him, with a most profound reverence.

And took up her son, and went out.] Publishing, no doubt, this wonderful work of God to all her family; who made it known abroad.

Ver. 38. And Elisha went again to Gilgal.] Where he was with Elijah, a little before he was taken up into heaven, (ii. 1.) For those places, wherein he had been with his master, he loved to visit; that he might work wonders there, and confirm them in a belief that he was a prophet.

And there was a dearth in the land.] A great scarcity of provisions.

And the sons of the prophets were sitting before him.] Which was the posture of disciples when their masters taught them, who sat above, and their scholars below, as I observed, ii. 3. and see Acts xxii. 3. whence Bertram observes, their schools and academies were called ishiboth, that is, sessions.

And he said unto his servant, Set on the great pot, and seethe pottage for the sons of the prophets.] This shews that they lived together in society, and after their lectures were wont to eat together with their master: who ordered his servants to prepare some food for them; which was very plain and common, such as the gardens or fields would afford; without much labour, and of small price.

Ver. 39. And one went into the field to gather herbs.] They went into the fields, I suppose, to gather what green things they could find; because there were no pot-herbs in their garden at home, by reason of the drought.

And found a wild vine, and he gathered thereof wild gourds his lap-full.] This is thought to have been coloquintida, which hath a leaf something like that of a vine, and purges vehemently.

And came and shred them into the pot of pottage: for they knew them not.] Neither he that gathered them, nor they that shred them, knew what they were; but took them to be the leaves of a wild vine.

Ver. 40. So they poured out for the men to eat: and it came to pass, as they were eating of the pottage, that they cried out, and said, O thou man of God, there is death in the pot: and they could not eat thereof.] It was so bitter and distasteful, that they concluded there was some venomous herb in the pot. Perhaps they might know it by the taste to be what it was: an herb that purges extremely, and is poison, if not qualified and taken in a moderate quantity.

Ver. 41. But he said, Then bring meal: and he cast it into the pot; and he said, Pour out for the people, that they may eat: and there was no harm in the pot.] Which alteration was not from any virtue in the meal, but from the power of God. Therefore, the Jews justly reckon this as the eighth miracle which Elisha wrought, after he was made a prophet.

Ver. 42. And there came a man from Baal-shalisha, and brought the man of God bread of the first-fruits.] This was a seasonable present, it being a time of dearth, when bread was very scarce. And it being called biccurim (which was the name for the first-fruits belonging to the priests), it is likely this was not such a present as men were wont to make when they came to ask a prophet any question, and to be resolved of their doubts, (like that, 1 Kings xiv. 3.) but a free-will-offering for the better subsistence of the prophet. Unto whom it is probable, pious people gave that portion, which was assigned by God for the priests, to whom they could not now carry their first-fruits, they being in the land of Judah. And I suppose the schools of the prophets might be partly maintained by this means.

Twenty loaves of barley.] Which were not very large; for then it would not have been a miracle, that they sufficed for a hundred men.

And full ears of corn in the husk thereof.] Which being parched, they were wont to eat. (See Ruth ii. 15.) But Dr. Hammond approves rather of our marginal translation, and thinks these words should be rendered, He brought ears of corn in a satchel, or scrip. (See Matt. x. annot. e.)

And he said, Give unto the people, that they may eat.] That is, to the sons of the prophets, with whom he then was, when this present was brought to him.

Ver. 43. And his servitor said, What! shall I set this before a hundred men?] Just as the apostles said unto our blessed Saviour, when he intended to feed a far greater multitude with less food. By this it appears there were a great many scholars, who lived in this community; and that they used a frugal diet.

And he said again, Give the people, that they may eat.] That is, do as I bid you, and make no objections.

For thus saith the Lord, They shall eat, and shall leave thereof.] As the multitude left of the loaves our Saviour caused to be set before them, John vi. 11.

Ver. 44. So he set before them, and they did eat, and left thereof, according to the word of the Lord.] Something like this was done by his master Elijah, for the woman of Sarepta, in time of famine; whose barrel of meal and cruse of oil wasted not for many days, till God sent rain upon the earth, (1 Kings xvii. 14. 16.)

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. NOW Naaman, captain of the host of the king of Syria.] Commander-in-chief of his whole army, whom we call general.

Was a great man with his master.] In great favour with him.

And honourable.] In high esteem with all the people.

Because by him the Lord had given deliverance unto Syria.] He had been victorious in such battles as he had fought; which this Divine writer would have the Israelites look upon as the Lord's doing.

He was also a mighty man of valour.] Being the person (as the Jews say in Midrasch Tehillim) who drew the bow at adventure and killed Ahab, (1 Kings xxii. 34.)

But he was a leper.] Which did not exclude him from the society of men, in that country, where the Jewish law was not in force. But it was a great blemish to him, and also like to prove deadly; there being no cure for this disease, which was very common in Syria, as I have elsewhere noticed.

Ver. 2. And the Syrians had gone out by companies.] The word which we translate company, doth not signify an army; but such troops (or parties, as we call them) as made excursions and inroads into the enemy's country, to get booty.

And had brought away captive out of the land of Israel a little young maid.] Young men and maids were a desirable part of the prey which they got; whom they sold for money, or employed them in their own service.

And she waited on Naaman's wife.] Either she was his part of the spoil in that expedition, or they made a present of her to him (being beautiful, perhaps, and ingenious), or he bought her of the soldiers.

Ver. 3. And she said unto her mistress, Would God my lord was with the prophet that is in Samaria!] The history left him last at Gilgal; but he used to be in several other places; and when she was taken captive was at Samaria.

For he would recover him of his leprosy.] She related, it is likely, the wonderful things which he had done; and therefore was confident he could work this cure.

Ver. 4. And one went in and told his lord, Thus and thus said the maid that is of the land of Israel.] Her words being related to Naaman, he went and told the king his master what she said, and begged his leave to go to the prophet in the land of Israel. The following words warrant this sense.

Ver. 5. And the king of Syria said, Go to, go, and I will send a letter to the king of Israel. And he departed, and took with him ten talents of silver, and six thousand pieces of gold, and ten changes of raiment.] That he might honourably reward the prophet, and those that attended him.

Ver. 6. And he brought the letter to the king of Israel, saying, Now, when this letter is come unto thee, behold, I have therewith sent my servant to thee, that thou mayest cure him of his leprosy.] The beginning of the letter is omitted, as not pertinent to the matter in hand. It is likely it contained the usual compliments; after which he desired him, together with this letter, to receive his servant Naaman, and to cure him of his leprosy; that is, to take care he might be cured by the prophet. But this not being plainly expressed, the king of Israel apprehended that the intention of this demand was only to pick a quarrel with him, and seek an occasion, or rather a pretence, for a war with him.

Ver. 7. And it came to pass, when the king of Israel had read the letter, that he rent his clothes, and said, Am I God, to kill and to make alive.] He rent his clothes either as one in great affliction and trouble, or (as some will have it) because he looked upon it as blasphemy, to ascribe that power to him which belonged to God alone. For none but he could cure a leprosy; which he expresses by killing and making alive. Every body, even beasts, can kill; but when one is killed, to make him alive again (thus these words must be understood in conjunction) is the work only of the Almighty.

That this man doth send unto me to recover a man of his leprosy?] To cure this disease was as hard as to raise a dead man to life; for the skin was dead, and the leprosy fretted and eat into the flesh.

Wherefore consider, I pray you, and see how he seeketh a quarrel against me.] Though he had seen what miracles Elisha had wrought, yet he either had forgot them, or thought this beyond his power; or, was loath to see still more demonstrations of his power with God; and so did not send to him upon this occasion.

Ver. 8. And it was so, when Elisha the man of God heard that the king of Israel had rent his clothes, he sent to the king, saying, Wherefore hast thou rent thy clothes? let him come now to me, and he shall know that there is a prophet in Israel.] As the word prophet commonly signifies a man that declares things which none could know but God, who reveals them by his Spirit; so here it signifies a man endued with a Divine power, who could do that which no man could effect unless God was with him.

Ver. 9. So Naaman came with his horses and chariots, and stood at the door of the house of Elisha.] Expecting, I suppose, that the prophet would come out to him; or rather out of reverence to the prophet, unto whom he sent a message, letting him understand the cause of his coming; for the prophet presently answers him, though by his servant, not by himself.

Ver. 10. And Elisha sent a messenger unto him, saying.] It is not to be thought that Elisha took state upon him; but it is to be ascribed to the retired sort of life which the prophets led, that he did not shew himself to Naaman. We see an instance of this in the foregoing chapter, where we read that he did not so much as speak with the great woman who entertained him at her house, and built an apartment on purpose for him; but let her understand what he had to say by his servant Gehazi, (ver. 12, 13, &c.)

Go and wash in Jordan seven times.] Thus lepers were sprinkled, by the law of Moses, seven times, (Lev. xiv. 7, &c.) But it is plain, by the next verse, Naaman expected the prophet would have been so civil as to come out to him, or invite him to his house, and discourse with him: neither of which the prophet thought fit to do; partly for a trial of his faith, and partly to let him know that this was not so difficult a thing as the king imagined, but so easy for him to effect by the power of God, that he need not come out to talk with him about it: let him but go to Jordan and wash there seven times, and the cure should be performed. Jordan had no more virtue in it (as he rightly saith afterward) than other rivers; nor was the earth of Israel better than that of Syria (though he begged two loads of it), but God presided more particularly over this country, and his power here appeared: and in this appeared the more, because water being cold, was very bad for this disease: the root of it being a white waterish humour, as Abarbinel notes, which would naturally, by this means, be increased.

And thy flesh shall come again to thee.] For the leprosy had eaten into it, and consumed it in part, as it did Miriam's, (Numb. xii. 12.)

And thou shalt be clean.] Freed from this filthy disease.

Ver. 11. But Naaman was wroth, and went away, and said, I thought, Surely he will come out to me, and call upon the name of his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper.] He was as angry with the prophet, as if he had scorned and mocked him. First, he thought himself despised, in that he did not come to him and salute him: and then he thought it a thing ridiculous to go and wash in Jordan; for what could that water do more than any other? Thus men slight common and easy things, and admire those that are rare and difficult; and in their passion reject that which God himself propounds to them, if it be not agreeable to their humours, and their conceits. In which passion, if he had continued, he had been a leper to his dying day.

Ver. 12. Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters in Israel?] The valley of Damascus, which lay between Libanus and Antilibanus, was washed by five rivers; the two principal of which descended from Mount Hermon, viz. Abana and Pharpar; the last of which run by the walls of Damascus, and the other run through the city, and divided it into two parts, as Bochartus observes.

May I not wash in them, and be clean? So he turned, and went away in a rage.] He did not consider that he was now under the direction of a prophet, who was supposed to speak from God, who might have prescribed what method he pleased for his cure; which was to come from his Divine power alone, and not from the virtue of any water whatsoever.

Ver. 13. And his servants came near, and spake unto him, and said, My father, if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldest thou not have done it? how much rather, when he saith to thee, Wash, and be clean?] Happy are they who have such excellent servants as these, who both had the courage to speak the truth to their master, and the prudence to order it with all submission and reverence. For my father was a title of honour in that country; by which name they called their lords: as kings were called the fathers of their country. And these servants, perhaps, had heard the young maid talk much of the power of the prophet, which made them very desirous their master would not refuse his advice; which they urge him to follow with great reason; by representing to him that it was the advice of a prophet, who was guided by God to give him these directions. And, as it was not fit for servants to say to their masters, when they order a thing, Why so? Why not otherways? so much less should a man say to God, or his minister, who speaks in his name; especially when he commands things that may be done without much trouble, or any pain. For if he had bade him cut and burn, as chirurgeons many times do in grievous sores, he would have submitted to it: and therefore it was unreasonable not to comply with his prescriptions, when he required him only to go and wash himself in the river Jordan, which was a thing very easy, in his way home, and would put him to no pain.

Ver. 14. Then went he down, and dipped himself seven times in Jordan, according to the saying of the man of God.] He shewed himself a person of great probity and discretion; who was not in such a rage but he could hear reason; and did not refuse good counsel from his servants; but suffered himself to be convinced and overruled to yield unto it.

And his flesh came again like the flesh of a little child, and he was clean.] God was not so angry with him, as he was with Elisha; but upon his repentance, and obedience to his directions, vouchsafed him a perfect cure; there being no mark left of his leprosy, but his skin as clear and smooth as that of a little child. This was the only cure of a leprosy that we read of, till Christ the great prophet came into the world.

Ver. 15. And he returned to the man of God, he and all his company, and came and stood before him.] Now Elisha seems to have admitted him into his presence.

And said, Now I know that there is no God in all the earth but in Israel.] He returned to give thanks to God, as the good Samaritan did to our Saviour; acknowledging the God that Elisha worshipped to be the true God, and that there was no other.

Now therefore, I pray thee, take a blessing of thy servant.] A reward, or rather a token of his gratitude to him; for the Hebrews call all gifts a blessing: the Hebrew word barac signifying not only benedicere, but benefacere.

Ver. 16. And he said, As the Lord liveth, before whom I stand, I will receive none. And he urged him to take it; but he refused.] He did not think it unlawful to take it, for he received gifts from others. But he would have strangers to their religion know how good the God of Israel was; who made his servants so good, that they did the greatest good to mankind for nothing. Which generous piety was apt to invite others to the worship and service of this great and good God. For it gives great authority to a teacher of virtue not to be covetous. (See Lactantius, lib. i. Div. Instit. cap. 4.)

Ver. 17. And Naaman said, Shall there not then, I pray thee, be given to thy servant two mules' burden of earth?] As much as two mules could carry or draw.

For thy servant will henceforth offer neither burnt-offering, nor sacrifice to any other god, but unto the Lord.] Though he refused to accept his present, yet he doubted not he would present him with two burdens of earth, which he intended to employ in erecting an altar, whereon he would sacrifice to no other god but the Lord. He judged it reasonable to have an altar out of God's land, because he saw he peculiarly dwelt in Israel. And though he might have taken enough as he went along in his way home, yet he desired it as a gift from the prophet; fancying, perhaps, that he would put a greater virtue into it by his blessing; as he had done into the waters of Jordan: therefore Ralbag thinks he desired to have this earth out of Elisha's house where he dwelt; and Abarbinel thinks, from under his very feet in the place where he stood; of which there is no certainty. But it is plain he desired to receive it from the prophet, who had convinced him that there was no god like to his; who had such power, and made men so virtuous, as to be above the love of money.

Ver. 18. In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant, that when my master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there.] This was the god of the Syrians, but no author informs us what god this was, nor whence so called. Only many conjecture, because Rimmon in Hebrew signifies a pomegranate, that Venus is hereby meant, to whom such fruit was sacred. But Scaliger understands this to be Jupiter, the thunderer, as they called him. And our Selden thinks it is derived from rum, which signifies high. Whence Hesychius saith, ὁ Ῥαμὰς signifies ὕψιστος θεὸς, the most high God.

And he leaneth on my hand.] Or shoulder: which he does out of state; or, perhaps, out of weakness, for his support. In the additions to the book of Esther, mention is made of two young women that waited on that queen, upon one of which she leaned, and the other held up her train, (xv. 4.) And it was not only the custom among the Persians and Syrians, but the Israelites also, as we read in this book, (vii. 2. 17.)

And I bow myself in the house of Rimmon.] Together with his master; who could not well bow, if Naaman stood upright, and did not bow his body with him.

When I bow down myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing.] He hoped he might, without offence to the Divine Majesty, whom he alone resolved to worship, keep the great office he had under the king his master, and consequently bow himself when he went with him into the temple of Rimmon: he who sees into the hearts of men, knowing it was no act of worship to that god; but only a necessary respect to his master. And so the word is used for civil honour, as well as religious adoration. Thus Lud. de Dieu hath clearly rendered this whole verse, In this thing the Lord pardon thy servant; when my master enters into the temple of Rimmon to worship there, he leans upon my hand, and so I bow myself (that is, together with him) in the house of Rimmon: when I bow myself in the house of Rimmon, the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing. Let him not take offence, since I intend not to worship Rimmon; as appeared by his sacrificing only to the God of Israel. An Israelite, indeed, was forbidden to bow before an idol, whatsoever his mind or intention was in that act: but a stranger was not bound by this law, as Mr. Selden shews the opinion of the Jews is, (lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 11.) Therefore, when Naaman went into the temple, not of his own accord, but merely to wait upon his master, and perform the duty of his office; since he professed himself a worshipper of the most high God alone, and brought earth out of his land, and sacrificed only upon the altar made of it: all he thought might understand he did not worship Rimmon, but only paid his respects to the king when he bowed with him.

Ver. 19. And he said unto him, Go in peace.] The prophet did not condemn this, but bade him not trouble himself about this matter; for he did not offend against God's law, which was not intended for such as he was: though there are some of the Jews who think that these words, go in peace, relate to the verse foregoing; that he need not to trouble himself about carrying earth with him out of the land of Israel to make an altar (for it doth not appear he gave him any), and so left this matter of bowing in the house of Rimmon undetermined. And no less a person than Bochartus hath a large dissertation about this whole matter; wherein he endeavours to defend their opinion, who think Naaman begs pardon for what he had done in times past, not for what he should continue to do; and renders these words (as Dr. Lightfoot also doth), when I have bowed, &c. But this seems to me altogether improbable; for then he would not have mentioned what he did as the king's servant; but simply the idolatry he had committed in worshipping Rimmon. Besides, the Oriental versions, as well as the Greek and the Vulgar, and the Hebrew doctors generally, as well as Christian interpreters, understand it as we do, that he speaks of the future act of bowing; which, being only a civil action, and he declaring himself publicly to be a worshipper only of the God of Israel, he hoped would not be imputed to him as a sin. And so the famous Buxtorfius, in a letter to Theod. Hackspan saith, "Omnes, quotquot vidi, interpretes referunt ad futurum," &c. All interpreters, as many as I have seen, refer this to the future, and not to the time past. And so doth the Chaldee paraphrast himself: and I am very much of the same opinion.

So he departed from him a little way.] About a mile from the city, as the Jewish doctors understand it.

Ver. 20. But Gehazi, the servant of the man of God said, Behold, my master hath spared Naaman the Syrian, in not receiving at his hands that which he brought; but, as the Lord liveth, I will run after him, and take somewhat of him.] He seems to be angry that his master had been so kind to one that needed not his charity, and was also one of another nation; and therefore, in his passion, swore he would take something of him. Which covetousness plunged him into a great many other sins, as the apostle observes it usually doth, (1 Tim. vi. 9, 10.) Dr. Lightfoot thinks the Hebrew text hath divinely omitted a letter in one word, that it might the more brand him for this villany. I will run, saith he, after Naaman, and take מומה a blot, instead of מאומה somewhat.

Ver. 21. And Gehazi followed Naaman: and when Naaman saw him, he lighted down from the chariot to meet him, and said, Is all well?] Behold the honour he gave to the prophet, in doing such honour to his servant; which testified he had a great sense of God, and of his goodness to him, in his heart.

Ver. 22. And he said, All is well. My master hath sent me, saying, Behold, even now there is come to me from Mount Ephraim two of the sons of the prophets.] It seems there was a school there, as well as at Jericho, Beth-el, Carmel, and other places.

Give them, I pray thee, a talent of silver, and two changes of raiment.] To relieve their poverty. This was the first fruit of his covetousness, which put him upon inventing such a wicked slander of his master. For why should Elisha desire so much silver for two young scholars? Which might tempt Naaman to think, that though he publicly declined to take a gift from him, yet he secretly desired it. (See Dr. Hammond on St. Matt. vi. annot. k.)

Ver. 23. And Naaman said, Be content, take two talents. And he urged him.] It is likely Gehazi pretended to keep strictly to his master's orders, and would have but one, till Naaman's generosity pressed and overcame him to take more.

And he bound two talents of silver in two bags, with two changes of raiment, and laid them upon two of his servants; and they bare them before him.] As servants do before persons of honour.

Ver. 24. And when he came to the tower.] To the place where Elisha lodged: or, as some will have it, to a secret place, where he laid up what he had got.

He took them from the men, and bestowed them in the house; and let the men go, and they departed.] For he was afraid his master should see them.

Ver. 25. And he came in, and stood before his master.] As servants were wont to do, to see if their master wanted any thing.

And Elisha said unto him, Whence comest thou, Gehazi? And he said, Thy servant went no whither.] This was another impudent lie, wherein he thought to deceive his master, though he was a prophet. Which was an impious endeavour to deceive the Spirit of God, whose minister Elisha was: like that lie of Ananias and Sapphira, Acts v. 3, &c.

Ver. 26. And he said, Went not my heart with thee, when the man turned again from his chariot to meet thee?] Did not God represent to my mind, as if I had been present, how Naaman came to meet thee, and what thou saidst to him, and what he gave thee? For, no doubt, he recited all that had passed between them; to convince him of his folly (in thinking to cheat him), and put him to shame and confusion.

Is it a time to receive money, and to receive garments, and vineyards, and olive-yards, and sheep, and oxen, and men-servants, and maid-servants?] Which Gehazi designed to purchase with the two talents: at a very unseasonable time, when the nation, for their sins, were in danger to be carried captive out of their land. Which, though it did not fall out till above a hundred and fifty years after this, yet great devastations followed the death of Elisha.

Ver. 27. The leprosy therefore of Naaman shall cleave unto thee, and unto thy seed for ever.] Unto many generations, as the word for ever frequently signifies. But the Hebrew doctors say this relates only unto his children that were then born; who were conscious to his crime, and approved of it. (See more of this, viii. 4, 5.)

And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow.] He punished him with the worst sort of leprosy, which was incurable. For his sin was exceeding great, or rather he was guilty of many sins besides those already mentioned; being a thief, and taking that to himself which was given to others. Nay, he was a sacrilegious person, in robbing the sons of the prophets, who were men belonging to God, in a special manner. The Hebrew doctors reckon seven sins, for which God punished men with the plague of leprosy, and endeavour to prove it out of Scripture; and Gehazi was guilty of more than one of them, and therefore justly punished in an extraordinary manner. They are, an evil tongue, shedding of blood, a false oath, uncovering of any forbidden nakedness, inflation of spirit, rapine, and envy.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. AND the sons of the prophets.] That were at Gilgal; for that is the place last mentioned where the prophet was, (iv. 38.) and was also near to Jordan, mentioned in the next verse.

Said unto Elisha, Behold now, the place where we dwell with thee.] They had their colleges sometimes in cities (as in Beth-el), and sometimes in the fields, and sometimes upon mountains. It is probable this was in the fields; where Elisha, for the present, was resident among them.

Is too strait for us.] Their number of scholars was so much increased under so eminent a master as he was, that there was not room enough for them.

Ver. 2. Let us go, we pray thee.] They were so much under his government, that they did not take the liberty to go any whither without his leave.

Unto Jordan.] Near to which many trees grew.

And take from thence every man a beam.] A piece of timber.

And let us make us a place there, where we may dwell.] A tabernacle large enough to contain them all. From whence we may gather, that the sons of the prophets did not spend all their time in studying the law, meditation, and prayer, and such holy exercises; but also employed themselves in some manufactures, as the apostles did in aftertimes, some of which were tent-makers, (Acts xviii. 3.) like to these here mentioned.

And he answered, Go ye.] He consented to their design, the place which they chose being very commodious for students. As St. Jerome observes, who, in more places than one (see his epistles to Rusticus and to Paulina), compares the monks of his time with these sons of the prophets, "Qui habitabant in agris, et solitudinibus, et faciebant sibi tabernacula prope fluenta Jordanis."

Ver. 3. And one said, Be content, I pray thee; and go with thy servants. And he answered, I will go.] They thought their design would prosper the better under his conduct; and that if any one questioned what they did, his authority would overawe them.

Ver. 4. So he went with them. And when they came to Jordan, they cut down wood.] They began to go about their work.

Ver. 5. But as one was felling a beam, the axe-head fell into the water.] Being not well fastened to the helve; or rather the helve breaking.

And he cried, and said, Alas, master! for it was borrowed.] Good men are religiously careful that none suffer by their kindness to them. This shews, that as these sons of the prophets wrought with their own hands, going themselves to cut down wood to build withal, so (some of them at least) they were but poor, being not furnished with tools for their work, but forced to borrow.

Ver. 6. And the man of God said, Where fell it? And he shewed him the place. And he cut down a stick.] To serve, I suppose, instead of a helve.

And cast it into the water, and the iron did swim.] A double miracle, as the Jews understand it, that iron, which was sunk down to the bottom, rose up; and then went to the stick, and was joined to it, at its helve. For to what end should he throw a stick into the water, but that it should serve this purpose?

Ver. 7. Therefore said he, Take it to thee. And he put out his hand and took it.] It fell near the river-side, or was brought thither when it rose up.

Ver. 8. Then the king of Syria warred against Israel, and took counsel with his servants, saying, In such and such a place shall be my camp.] He did not rely merely on the number of his forces, but secretly resolved, by the advice of his council, to place them in such posts where he might hope to surprise the Israelites. It may seem strange, that after such a great benefit lately received in the cure of Naaman, the king should send him, who was captain of his host, to fight against Israel. But who can tell how long this was after that time, when Naaman might be dead? or, perhaps, Naaman might have lost his place; because he refused to worship Rimmon; and no benefit will reconcile inveterate enemies.

Ver. 9. And the man of God sent to the king of Israel, saying, Beware that thou pass not such a place; for thither the Syrians are come down.] And had laid an ambush for him there.

Ver. 10. And the king of Israel sent to the place which the man of God told him and warned him of.] He sent some spies to see whether Elisha gave him true information.

And saved himself there, not once or twice.] By this means he frequently saved his soldiers from falling into the hands of the Syrians; who lay in wait for them in such places, where they would certainly have gone, if they had not been told of the danger.

Ver. 11. Therefore the heart of the king of Syria was sorely troubled for this thing; and he called his servants.] With whom he had consulted how to carry on this war, (ver. 8.)

And said unto them, Will ye not shew me which of us is for the king of Israel?] Betrays my counsels to him; for he could not think he should meet with such constant disappointments, unless it were by treachery.

Ver. 12. And one of his servants said, None, my lord, O king: but Elisha, the prophet that is in Israel, telleth the king of Israel the words thou speakest in thy bedchamber.] It is likely Naaman had spread the fame of the prophet so much in this court, that some of them made further inquiry after him; and heard more of his miraculous works; and thence concluded he could tell the greatest secrets, as well as to do such wonders as were reported of him.

Ver. 13. And he said, Go and spy where he is, that I may send and fetch him.] A very foolish design. As if the prophet could not as well know this, as he did the rest of his other counsels.

And it was told him, saying, He is in Dothan.] A city in the tribe of Manasseh; not far from Shechem and Samaria.

Ver. 14. Therefore sent he thither horses, and chariots, and a great host.] That the people of Dothan, being affrighted at the sight of such a number of soldiers, might not dare to defend the prophet.

And they came by night, and compassed the city about.] That no intelligence might be carried to Samaria.

Ver. 15. And when the servant of the man of God was risen early.] As students were wont to do.

And was gone forth.] Out of the door of the house, which stood high; the city being built upon a hill.

Behold, a host compassed the city both with horses and chariots: and his servant said unto him, Alas, my master! how shall we do?] Perhaps the Syrians had assured the inhabitants they intended no harm to them; but only came to take Elisha. Which the young man hearing, it put him in great fear; for being but newly come to his master in the room of Gehazi, and having perhaps seen none of his wonderful works, he gave himself and his master for lost men.

Ver. 16. And he answered, Fear not: for they that be with us are more than they that be with them.] Faith drives away fear; but it was hard for the young man to believe this, till he had more experience of God's providence over his prophet: and therefore Elisha prays he might have a demonstration of it.

Ver. 17. And Elisha prayed, and said, Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes, that he may see. And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man; and he saw: and the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire.] He beheld the camp of God there, (as the angels are called Gen. xxxii. 2.) ready at hand to defend his master. Legions of angels, (Matt. xxvi. 35.) which were far more numerous and powerful than the host of the Syrians which he saw compass the city; but did not see this heavenly host till God opened his eyes, and represented them to him. The ancients think that the angels, when present with us, appear where they please, and are invisible where they please, though present. Now this appearance of theirs in this place is called the opening of his eyes; because it had the same effect. For he beheld the mountain (on which, I suppose, the city stood), where he saw none but Syrians before, was now full of fiery chariots and horses, which, as it here follows, had encircled Elisha.

Round about Elisha.] That is, he saw in this vision, as if Elisha was in the midst of this glorious camp of angels; who defended him so that none could penetrate and break through unto him.

Ver. 18. And when they came down to him.] He seems to have gone out of the city to them, under the Divine protection; intending to go to Samaria. And they seeing him, asked him the way to the man of God.

Elisha prayed unto the Lord, and said, Smite this people, I pray thee, with blindness. And he smote them with blindness, according to the word of Elisha.] So that they might not be able perfectly to distinguish one thing from another.

Ver. 19. And Elisha said unto them, This is not the way, neither is this the city.] Some think we are not bound to speak truth to an enemy; but there is no need that this should be asserted here. For it was true that they were not in the way to find Elisha; whom they should not see till they came to another city.

Follow me, and I will bring you to the man whom ye seek.] As he really did. But their minds were struck with blindness, as well as their eyes; or else they would not have committed themselves to the conduct of a stranger, to follow him in an enemy's country, they knew not whither.

But he led them to Samaria.] This shews they were not wholly blind, for then they could not have been led by him; but were dark, as we speak, and could not clearly discern who it was that led them, nor whither they were going. Here the Jews cry, Behold, a double miracle! Elisha's servant saw that which appeared to nobody else; and the Syrians could not discern that which every body else saw.

Ver. 20. And it came to pass, when they were come into Samaria, that Elisha said, Lord, open the eyes of these men, that they may see. And the Lord opened their eyes, and they saw; that, behold, they were in the midst of Samaria.] To their great astonishment, no doubt, when they found that he had made them all captives, whom they came to carry away to Syria.

Ver. 21. And the king of Israel said to Elisha, when he saw them, My father.] This miracle touched him with great reverence to the prophet.

Shall I smite them? shall I smite them?] This repetition of the question expresses his eager desire to fall upon them, and kill them, if the prophet would have permitted.

Ver. 22. And he answered, Thou shalt not smite them.] There was a command to destroy the people of the seven nations; yet not if they yielded to them. But as for other persons, who were taken in the war, they were not bound to destroy them; but it was humanity rather to spare them. Whence it is, that the prophet here forbids the king to smite these, who were not under the curse of the people of Canaan.

Wouldest thou smite those whom thou hast taken captive with thy sword, and with thy bow?] As much as to say, Thou wouldest not be so cruel, as in cold blood to kill those whom thou thyself hadst taken prisoners in a battle. Much more then are those to be spared, who are not thy captives, but God's. Thou hast not taken them with thy sword, or with thy bow: but he hath brought them to thee, and delivered them into thy hand; not that thou mayest kill them, but use them kindly. To this purpose Ralbag. (See Selden, de Jure Nat. et Gent. p. 745.)

Set bread and water before them, that they may eat and drink, and go to their master.] And tell him what civility and kindness there is among the people of God. This is a rare example of that which St. Paul recommends to us, Rom. xii. 20. "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink," &c.

Ver. 23. And he prepared great provision for them: and when they had eaten and drunk, he sent them away, and they went to their master.] This is a new wonder, that the hearts of the Israelites should so yield unto the command of the prophet, as not only to spare, but to entertain bountifully their old enemies.

And the bands of the Syrians came no more into the land of Israel.] Great hatreds are sometimes overcome by unexpected and undeserved benefits; as many of the heathens have observed, that this is the noblest way to conquer them, particularly Valerius Maximus: "Speciosius injuriæ beneficiis vincuntur, quam mutui odii pertinacia pensantur;" injuries are more gloriously overcome by benefits, than requited by pertinacious mutual hatred. But the sense of benefits in bad natures doth not last long; for in the very next verse we read, how the king of Syria besieged Samaria. Which seems to contradict what is said here, that the Syrians came no more into the land of Israel. But the meaning of that is (for no man can think that any author whatsoever would contradict himself in the same breath), either that for this time they retreated quite, and laid aside all thoughts of war, though afterward they broke out again into hostility: or (which is the plainest) that their bands made no more incursions and inroads; but they resolved to come and fall upon them, not in small parties, and by ambushes, (as they did before, ver. 8.) but with a formed army, wherewith they laid siege to Samaria.

Ver. 24. And it came to pass after this, that Ben-hadad king of Syria.] The name of Ben-hadad was common to all the kings of Syria, as Pharaoh was to those of Egypt.

Gathered all his host, and went up, and besieged Samaria.] It seems the Israelites had not forces to appear against him in the field: so that he marched directly to Samaria, and laid siege to it.

Ver. 25. And there was a great famine in Samaria: and, behold, they besieged it, until an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver.] The siege lasted so long, or they were so ill provided for it, that there was a great scarcity of food in this city: insomuch that an ass's head was sold for so many shekels as make five pounds of our money. A great sum for the head, when the whole body was little worth; and it being an unclean creature, it was not lawful for the Israelites to eat (yea, was accounted unclean by the Arabians), unless in case of extreme necessity. See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 13. where he observes out of Plutarch, that there was such a scarcity in Artaxerxes's army, when he was among the Cadusii, that an ass's head was sold for threescore drachms.

And the fourth part of a cab.] A cab was a very small measure of corn; containing, as the Jews say, as much as twenty-four eggs would hold. It is never mentioned in the Scripture, but only here; though very often in the Talmud, in the title Kiddushim. (See Imbonacius, in the Biblioth. Mag. Rabbin. tom. v. p. 349.) All agree, it was such a measure as I have mentioned; so that the fourth part of it was no more than six eggs would contain, called a log, as Bochartus thinks.

Of dove's dung.] So the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and LXX. translate the Hebrew word hirjonim: and so a great many of the Jewish doctors, Jarchi, Kimchi, Ralbag, understand it. Though it be very hard to believe, that dove's dung should be so plentiful in a city as to be sold in any quantity, or that men should eat it; when every one knows there is no nourishment in such excrements, and less in that of doves than in others, as is observed by Bochartus: who, after he hath confuted many other opinions, hath made it very probable, that fitches or lentiles are here meant; which were the vilest of all food, and yet sold at this dear rate. For that some sort of food is here meant, is plain from what goes before. (See his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 7.)

For five pieces of silver.] Which the same author computes to be as much as nine French livres.

Ver. 26. And as the king of Israel was passing by upon the wall.] To see if they kept their guards well; or, to observe how the enemy lay.

There cried unto him a woman, saying, Help, my lord, O king!

Ver. 27. And he said, If the Lord do not help thee, whence shall I help thee? out of the barn-floor, or out of the wine-press?] Some take the first words to be a curse, and translate them as we do in the margin, Let not the Lord save (or help) thee. Like that among the gentiles, "Dii deæque te perdant;" may thou perish. Thus Josephus understands them to be the words of a man in a great passion, and full of fury, that she should implore relief from him, who could do nothing for himself. For he thought she had cried to him for victuals, as appears by the last words.

Ver. 28. And the king said unto her, What aileth thee?] When she had pacified his anger, or it cooled of itself, he asked her the cause of her cry.

And she answered, This woman.] Who stood by her.

Said unto me, Give thy son, that we may eat him to-day, and we will eat my son to-morrow.] Thus began the prophecy of Moses to be fulfilled, Deut. xxxviii. 54, 55, &c.

Ver. 29. So we boiled my son, and did eat him: and I said unto her on the next day, Give thy son, that we may eat him: and she hath hid her son.] Either that she might save him, or that she might eat him alone, and thereby preserve her life the longer.

Ver. 30. And it came to pass, when the king heard the words of the woman, that he rent his clothes.] Out of great grief at what the woman had said; or, perhaps, out of indignation at the prophet, with whom the next verse shews he was very angry.

And he passed by upon the wall, and the people looked, and, behold, he had sackcloth within upon his flesh.] His royal robes, which were uppermost, being torn, they saw sackcloth (in token of great humiliation) next to his skin. For these idolatrous kings were not so profane, but they observed some of the ancient rites of religion: among which this was one; to abase and afflict themselves, in times of great calamity, by putting sackcloth upon their naked body.

Ver. 31. Then he said, God do so to me, and more also, if the head of Elisha the son of Shaphat shall stand on him this day.] Such was the arbitrary power which these kings exercised; which took away men's lives, without any formal process against them; and the reason of this furious resolution seems to be, either because Elisha had hindered him from smiting the great host of the Syrians, when he had them cooped up in Samaria, (ver. 20—22.) which might have disabled them from bringing him into these straits: or, because Elisha did not employ his interest in God, as he expected, to give them deliverance. Therefore he swore he should not live till night.

Ver. 32. And Elisha sat in his house.] In the school, where the sons of the prophets came to be instructed by him.

And the elders sat with him.] We often read in Ezekiel of the elders of Israel sitting before the prophet to hear him, (viii. 1. xxii. 24.) And so some understand it here, of the chief persons in Samaria, who were come to consult him. But it rather signifies his chief scholars, some grave persons, who applied themselves to the study of Divine things, and were now with him.

And the king sent a man from before him.] Commanded one that attended him to go, and execute the sentence he had pronounced against Elisha.

But, ere the messenger came to him, he said to the elders, See ye how this son of a murderer hath sent to take away mine head?] He understood, by the spirit of prophecy, the wicked intentions of the king; who was like his father Ahab, that had murdered many of the prophets of the Lord.

Look, when the messenger cometh, shut the door, and hold him fast at the door: is not the sound of his master's feet behind him?] He charged them to lay hold of him before he came into the room, and not suffer him to enter; for the king would immediately follow him, to revoke his order. So he foresaw, by the same spirit of prophecy, that the king repented of what he had decreed, and was coming to revoke it; and therefore he only required the elders to do that which he knew the king would do himself, viz. stop the messenger at the door, and let him proceed no further. This will not warrant private men to apprehend public officers; nor to use such words to princes as the prophet here doth to Joram, whom he calls the son of a murderer, by a Divine motion. Which authorized him to represent him as the impious son of a very impious father.

Ver. 33. And, while he yet talked with them, behold, the messenger came down unto him: and he said, Behold, this evil is of the Lord, what should I wait for the Lord any longer?] Some imagine that the messenger being come, spake these words in the king's name. But it seems more reasonable to think the king, who was also come, spake them himself, in a fit of raging despair. He could not but acknowledge, that the Lord had brought them into this distress. Upon which Elisha exhorted him to wait till he would please (who only could do it) to deliver them. But he impatiently answered, he had waited so long in vain, that he had no hope left, since they were driven to such extremity, that women ate their own children. Or, these words may be thus interpreted (taking the former part of them to be spoken by the prophet, and the latter by the king); And he said (that is, the prophet said), Acknowledge the hand of God in this evil, which comes from him. To which the king replied, And what else can I expect from the Lord, unless it be such plagues? No, saith Elisha in the very next words, ye shall have plenty here to-morrow.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. AND Elisha said.] Unto the king, who followed the messenger, (see foregoing chapter, ver. 32, 33.) and spake such words as Elisha here satisfies him were very unreasonable.

Hear ye the word of the Lord; Thus saith the Lord, To-morrow, about this time, shall a measure of fine flour be sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel.] The Hebrew word seah signifies a certain measure, containing the thirtieth part of an omer: which is about a peck of our measure.

In the gate of Samaria.] Which was the market-place, as well as a place for other public meetings, (see 2 Sam. xix. 8.)

Ver. 2. Then a lord, on whose hand the king leaned.] Some think this was the messenger which the king sent to see execution done upon Elisha. Whosoever he was, he was greatly beloved by the king; for when he went abroad he leaned on him, which was a sign he was dear to him. For this state kings in those countries took upon them, to lean upon some favourite. As queen Esther, the Jews say, had a young lady on whom she rested her right hand, after the manner of the eastern kings. (See upon ver. 18.)

Answered the man of God, and said, Behold, if the Lord should make windows in heaven, might this thing be?] He was incredulous, and seems to have laughed at what the prophet said: looking upon it as unlikely, as that God would rain corn from heaven, as once he did manna.

And he said, Behold, thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not eat thereof.] A just punishment of his unbelief. And such will be the portion of those that believe not the promise of eternal life.

Ver. 3. And there were four leprous men.] The Jews will have these to have been Gehazi and his three sons; as they say in Gemara Sanhedrin, p. 416. edit. J. Coch.

At the entering of the gate.] Of the city of Samaria. From whence lepers were thrust out, as anciently out of the camp, (Lev. xiii. 46. xiv. 3. Numb. v. 23.) But they got as near the gate of the city as they could, for fear of the enemy. It appears by this that the Israelites observed the ceremonial law, though they were gross idolaters.

And they said one to another, Why sit we here until we die?] For the city could no longer supply their wants, having not sufficient for themselves.

Ver. 4. If we say, We will enter into the city, then the famine is in the city, and we shall die there.] Lepers might sometimes come into their cities, if there was a great occasion, keeping their due distance from every one; as appears, some think, from Gehazi's talking with the king himself, in the next chapter, (viii. 4.) but more plainly from this place. (See Grotius upon St. Luke vii. 12.)

And if we sit still here, we die also.] The besiegers having carried away all the food thereabout.

Now therefore come, and let us fall unto the host of the Syrians.] Who possibly might take compassion upon miserable people, though enemies to them.

If they save us alive, we shall live.] They will not let us starve, but give us food.

And if they kill us, we shall but die.] They knew the worst that could happen to them was to lose their lives; which they should certainly do where they were; and therefore they chose an uncertain evil before a certain.

Ver. 5. And they rose up in the twilight, to go unto the camp of the Syrians.] In the close of the evening, as appears from ver. 9. 12.

And when they were come to the uttermost part of the camp of Syria.] Unto their trenches.

Behold, there was no man there.] Not a man to guard them, nor so much as a centinel to watch them.

Ver. 6. For the Lord had made the host of Syria to hear a noise of chariots, and a noise of horses, even the noise of a great host.] By the ministry of angels he made such a rattling like that of chariots, and prancing of horses, that the Syrians imagined a great army was not only marching towards them, but ready to fall upon them.

And they said one to another, Lo, the king of Israel hath hired against us the kings of the Hittites, and the kings of Egypt, to come upon us.] Those people of the land of Canaan called Hittites, who dwelt about Hebron and Beer-sheba, were rooted out by the Israelites. But either some of them fled, and settled themselves in some neighbouring country, and there grew very populous; or else, we are to understand by the kings of the Hittites (as Josephus doth), the kings τῶν νήσων, of the isles, lib. ix. Antiq. cap. 2. As if chittim was the same with cetim, as all isles, he saith, are called. Every one of which had a king; as Egypt itself was then divided into several kingdoms; whose help, the Syrians thought, the king of Israel had procured.

Ver. 7. Wherefore they arose, and fled in the twilight.] Being but newly gone when the lepers came thither.

And they left their tents, and their horses, and their asses.] Asses were employed in war as well as horses; at least for carrying of their baggage. So Bochartus observes out of Pollux, χρεία δ' εἰς πολέμους σκευοφόρων μὴν ὄνων, asses are of use in war to carry burdens. There were several people, also, that fought upon asses, as others did upon horses; which he proves out of Ælian and other authors. (See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 13.)

Even the camp as it was, and fled for their life.] They thought of saving nothing but themselves; their fear being so great, that they left all they had behind them.

Ver. 8. And when these lepers came into the uttermost part of the camp, they went into one tent, and did eat and drink, and carried thence silver, and gold, and raiment, and went and hid it; and came again, and entered into another tent, and carried thence also, and went and hid it.] They had satisfied their hunger in the first tent, so that they had nothing now to do, but to get what treasure they could find, and secure it.

Ver. 9. Then they said one to another, We do not well.] When they had both well refreshed and enriched themselves, and also secured their booty, they began to reflect upon the distress of their brethren; and condemned themselves for making no more haste to impart unto them the discovery they had made of the enemy's flight, and the plenty of all things they found in their camp.

This is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace.] Do not publish the goodness of God to us all.

If we tarry till the morning-light, some mischief will come upon us.] The Syrians might possibly recover out of their fright, and return when they saw none pursue them: or, some of them might be lurking thereabout, and come and kill them.

Now therefore come, that we may go and tell the king's household.] Impart this joyful news to the city. For every good citizen is in duty bound to discover every thing that is for the public safety.

Ver. 10. So they came, and called to the porter of the city.] To him that was the chief commander at the gate of Samaria.

And they told them.] Him and the guard that was with him.

Saying, We came into the camp of the Syrians, and, behold, there was no man there, neither voice of man, but horses tied, and asses tied, and the tents as they were.] Standing without any body in them; but full of provision and riches.

Ver. 11. And he called the porters.] Of the king's house.

And they told it to the king's house within.] Reported it in the court, till it came to the king's ears.

Ver. 12. And the king arose in the night, and said unto his servants, I will now shew you what the Syrians have done to us.] What their stratagem is.

They know that we be hungry, therefore are they gone out of the camp, to hide themselves in the field, saying, When they shall come out of the city, we shall catch them alive, and get into the city.] His long sufferings had made him suspicious and cautious; and this was no improbable conjecture.

Ver. 13. And one of his servants answered and said, Let some take, I pray thee, five of the horses that remain, which are left in the city (behold, they are as all the multitude of Israel that are left in it; behold, I say, they are even as all the multitude of the Israelites that are consumed), and let us send and see.] He repeats his advice twice, that it might make the greater impression on the king. The sense of which is this: that they were almost consumed with hunger, and must shortly die, as all the horses and the Israelites had done, whom the famine had killed. Therefore, if these horses and men were taken by the Syrians, there would be no great loss of them; for they would be lost if they remained in Samaria.

Ver. 14. They took therefore two chariot-horses; and the king sent after the host of the Syrians, saying, Go and see.] Whether they were gone or not. Some understand the horses of two chariots, which might in all be five: but it is more probable the king would venture no more than two horsemen, which he thought enough; who took two of the horses of his own chariots to make discovery.

Ver. 15. And they went after them unto Jordan.] Finding the camp empty, as the lepers had related, they pursued them as far as this river.

And, lo, all the way was full of garments, which the Syrians had cast away in their haste: and the messengers returned, and told the king.] The certainty of their flight to their own country.

Ver. 16. And the people went out, and spoiled the tents of the Syrians. So a measure of fine flour was sold for a shekel, and two measures of barley for a shekel, according to the word of the Lord.] They found such store of provision in the tents of the Syrians, that it made this sudden change in the price of corn, according to Elisha's prediction.

Ver. 17. And the king appointed the lord, on whom his hand leaned, to have the charge of the gate.] To take care the people did not run out tumultuously, and leave the city empty; nor commit any disorder in the gate, being very eager to get victuals.

And the people trod upon him in the gate, and he died.] They came out in such crowds, and pressed upon him so hard, that they threw him down, and trod him to death.

As the man of God had said, who spake when the king came down to him.] See ver. 2.

Ver. 18. And it came to pass, as the man of God had spoken to the king, saying, Two measures of barley for a shekel, and a measure of fine flour for a shekel, shall be to-morrow at this time in the gate of Samaria.] By this it should seem there was a market kept in the gate of Samaria, where provisions were sold: and this lord was set to see good order kept, that they might neither take them by force, nor make any disturbance.

Ver. 19. And the lord answered the man of God, saying, Now, behold, if the Lord should make windows in heaven, might such a thing be? And he said, Thou shalt see it with thine eyes, but shalt not eat thereof.] This part of the history is repeated, because it is a most remarkable fulfilling of a Divine prediction, whereby their belief of God's providence, ordering all things in a wonderful manner, was confirmed.

Ver. 20. And so it fell out unto him: for the people trod upon him in the gate, and he died.] Before he could enjoy the benefit of that plenty which God had bestowed upon them. Which did not at all alter their hearts; but they continued so obstinately deaf to all the prophet's admonitions and miraculous works, that in the next chapter we read of another long famine coming upon them.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. THEN spake Elisha unto the woman, whose son he restored to life.] See iv. 35, 36.

Saying, Arise, and go thou and thy household, and sojourn where thou canst sojourn.] In some country out of the land of Israel.

For the Lord hath called for a famine.] He had already ordered and decreed it.

And it shall come upon the land seven years.] Continue as long again as that in the days of Ahab, which lasted three years and a half. For as their iniquities increased, so did their punishments. Some of the Jews will have this to be the terrible famine spoken of by Joel the prophet; who they fancy lived in these days. And four years of it, they say, were caused by noxious creatures, which ate up all the fruits of the earth; and the other three by a drought, for want of rain.

Ver. 2. And the woman arose, and did after the saying of the man of God.] Who by this monition hath left us an example of a grateful mind, which never thinks it can sufficiently requite benefits received; and she was abundantly satisfied, that what he predicted would certainly come to pass.

And she went with her household, and sojourned in the land of the Philistines seven years.] This country was so near, that she might easily remove her family thither, and likewise hear sometimes from her own country. They were idolaters, indeed, but they suffered those that were not to live quietly among them, as their forefathers had done; who entertained Abraham and Isaac with much friendship, and did not trouble themselves about their religion; as Jacob, in like manner, sojourned a long time among idolaters in Mesopotamia. This shews the severity of God's anger against Israel, that he accounted them worse than the Philistines; who had plenty among them, when the Israelites were almost starved.

Ver. 3. And it came to pass, at the seven years' end, that the woman returned out of the land of the Philistines: and she went forth to cry unto the king for her house, and for her land.] Which some think her kindred had seized, as if she had been dead. But it is more likely that she carried her relations along with her into the land of the Philistines; and it was the custom here, as in other places, that they who left their country had their goods confiscated. (See Grotius.)

Ver. 4. And the king talked with Gehazi, the servant of the man of God, saying, Tell me, I pray thee, all the great things that Elisha hath done.] Some of the Jews think, that the king seeing Gehazi, asked him how he came to be leprous; and thereupon he related to him the history of Naaman the Syrian: which moved the king, either to satisfy his curiosity, or pass away the time pleasantly, to desire to hear all the other miracles Elisha had wrought; but he had no intention to be convinced by them, and turn to God. But then here arises a question, how Gehazi came to be admitted to speak with him; being a leper, who was not to come into any company, much less into the king's presence. This difficulty, some think, cannot be solved without affirming, that this fell out before Gehazi left Elisha's service; such ὑστερολογία, as the Greeks call it, being frequent in Scripture; and the Jews, in Seder Olam Rabba, place this famine before the story of Naaman, which spoils what they say of the occasion of this discourse. But there is no need to assert this: for either Gehazi upon his repentance might be restored to health; or he might speak with the king at a due distance, as he walked in the field for his recreation; and desired to be entertained with a relation of Elisha's miracles. Thus Naaman conversed with Elisha's family at a distance; and the lepers called to our Saviour, as he went along the highway, (Luke xvii. 12.)

Ver. 5. And it came to pass, as he was telling the king how he restored a dead body to life, that, behold, the woman, whose son he restored to life, cried to the king for her house, and for her land. And Gehazi said, My lord, O king, this is the woman, and this is her son, whom Elisha restored to life.] By a wonderful providence she came to present her petition, and brought her son with her, in that very nick of time, when Gehazi was telling the story of his restoration to life; that the king might be the more fully satisfied of the truth of what he related from her own mouth.

Ver. 6. And when the king asked the woman, she told him.] That is, confirmed what Gehazi had said.

So the king appointed unto her a certain officer.] In the margin, an eunuch; that is, one of his bedchamber.

Saying, Restore all that was hers, and all the fruits of the field.] Not only her house and land, but all the profits that had been made of them, and brought into his exchequer.

Since the day that she left the land, even till now.] This was a high act of justice, and an argument of some goodness left in a bad man, that he would not gain any thing by her calamity.

Ver. 7. And Elisha went to Damascus.] In the time of the famine, I suppose he went thither, as the woman did to the Philistines.

And Ben-hadad king of Syria was sick: and it was told him, saying, The man of God is come hither.] Who having cured Naaman, had raised a great opinion of his power with God, in that country.

Ver. 8. And the king said unto Hazael.] Who was the captain of his host.

Take a present in thy hand, and go meet the man of God, and inquire of the Lord by him, saying, Shall I recover of this disease?] They who consulted prophets, were wont always to carry a present with them, in token of the honour they paid them; as appears by many instances, particularly of Jeroboam's wife in this book. It is probable, also, he begged his prayers for his recovery, acknowledging him to be a man of God.

Ver. 9. And Hazael went to meet him.] As he was coming into Damascus.

And took a present with him of every good thing of Damascus, forty camels' burden, and came and stood before him.] This was a very noble present; which, whether he accepted or refused, is not mentioned in the holy Scripture. Abarbinel thinks he accepted it, because nothing is said to the contrary, as there is in the case of Naaman, who presented him with silver, and gold, and raiment, and such-like things of value. Whereas this was only a provision of food, such as bread, and wine, and fruit, and fowl; which was a fit present for him to make to the prophet, who might be presumed to be weary with his journey, and as fit for him to accept for his refreshment.

Ver. 10. And Elisha said unto him, Go, say unto him, Thou mayest certainly recover; howbeit, the Lord hath shewed me that he shall certainly die.] His disease was not of such a nature as would endanger his life, if he did not lose it by some other means; as the prophet foresaw he would. For Josephus saith, his disease was only a deep melancholy, into which he fell upon the shameful flight of his army, when no enemy was near them. This affected his body, and took away his appetite; but might have been cured.

Ver. 11. And he settled his countenance steadfastly, until he was ashamed; and the man of God wept.] The most simple sense is, He looked upon Hazael so long, with a settled countenance, that Hazael was ashamed, and he himself fell a weeping. Perhaps he fastened his eyes upon him as a man astonished, and that in an ecstacy saw some dreadful thing represented to him. Others interpret it, he turned away his face on one side, until he was ashamed, because he wept; which he would not have had Hazael seen. Others, he settled his countenance, not to weep; but he could not refrain from tears.

Ver. 12. And Hazael said, Why weepeth my lord? And he answered, Because I know the evil thou wilt do unto the children of Israel: their strong holds wilt thou set on fire, their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child.] This last expresses the highest degree of barbarous cruelty; for which there was no occasion, if he did but kill the women with child, for the child in the womb would die with them, without ripping them up. Therefore a late learned man, looking on this as a thing unheard of, will have the word haroth, not to signify women with child, but castles or fortified places which he should demolish: though he cannot but acknowledge, that the cutting up women very naturally follows slaying their young men, and dashing their children, which goes just before. And he should have taken notice, that the very first evil he mentions that Hazael should do to them, is setting their strong holds on fire. (Gousset Comment. Linguæ Hebraicæ, p. 216.)

Ver. 13. And Hazael said, But what! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?] This is commonly understood as a disclaiming of such barbarity, which he abhorred as a beastly thing. But the words in the Hebrew sound otherways, being a submissive form of speech, wherein the speaker undervalues and debases himself, as appears from 1 Sam. xxiv. 15. 2 Sam. ix. 8. and run thus; But what is thy servant? a dog. As much as to say, A mean and contemptible creature, who can never have power to do such great things; which none but a prince can do.

And Elisha answered, The Lord hath shewed me that thou shalt be king over Syria.] This was as much as declaring and appointing him king of Syria: which Elijah ordered him to do; and was as much as if he had anointed him. (See 1 Kings xix. 15.)

Ver. 14. So he departed from Elisha, and came to his master, who said to him, What saith Elisha to thee? And he answered, He told me that thou shouldest surely recover.] He told him only the first part of his answer, and that not sincerely, as he intended. For he did not say he should surely recover, but that he might recover; his disease being in itself not mortal.

Ver. 15. And it came to pass on the morrow.] His eager desire to reign would not suffer him to expect his master's death, but he made haste to dispatch him the very next morning after he came from Elisha.

That he took a thick cloth, and dipped it in water.] The covering of his bed, which (as many think) was made of goats' hair; or, some other thick cloth, that would suck up a great deal of water.

And spread it upon his face, so that he died.] He being feverish (as Josephus thinks) and complaining of heat, Hazael pretended to cool him by this means; but indeed choked him; by thrusting the cloth, perhaps, into his mouth: so that he could make no noise, nor did any sign of violence remain upon his body; but the murder was committed so secretly, that it was thought he died a natural death. But nothing can be concealed from God, who took care to have the villany recorded to posterity, by revealing it to his prophet.

And Hazael reigned in his stead.] Being in great favour with the people, especially with the soldiery; and Ben-hadad, it is likely, leaving no son.

Ver. 16. And in the fifth year of Joram the son of Ahab king of Israel, Jehoshaphat being then king of Judah, Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat king of Judah began to reign.] All the seeming contradictions between this verse and chap. i. 17. and chap. iii. 1. are thus briefly reconciled by Huetius:—Jehoram beginning to reign with his father Jehoshaphat in his seventeenth year, and Joram king of Israel in his eighteenth, the first year of Joram king of Israel will fall out in the second year of Jehoram, king of Judah: whose father dying in the twenty-second year of his reign, Jehoram, king of Judah, began to reign alone in the fifth year of Joram king of Israel. (See Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. p. 204.)

Ver. 17. Thirty and two years old was he when he began to reign; and he reigned eight years in Jerusalem.] Part of which was with his father, as I now observed, and the rest by himself. Dr. Lightfoot observing three dates of the beginning of his reign, gives this account of it:—The first was when he was made viceroy with his father, at the time he went out of the land for the recovery of Ramoth-Gilead. The second was when his father went upon his expedition with Jehoram, king of Israel, against Moab (chap. iii. of this book), from which time, he thinks, the beginning of his reign is fixed here, and in 2 Chron. xxi. 20. For after this time, Jehoshaphat was little at Jerusalem, but abroad either in his own land (which he perambulated that he might reduce the people to the true religion), or in Moab, to bring them into subjection, (2 Chron. xix. 20.) And lastly, at his father's death he was completely king of Judah, 2 Chron. xxi. 1. (See Harm. of the Evang. Prolegom. sect. 6.) So that the clearest solution of the difficulty mentioned in the foregoing verse is this (as Dr. Alix, a great man in this learning, and all others, hath observed to me), that Joram had three beginnings of his reign. One in the seventeenth year of Jehoshaphat, when his father designed him to be king; the second in the twenty-third year of his father, when he was crowned; and the last when his father (after he had reigned five-and-twenty years) died; and he reigned alone a little more than four years. Thus Solomon was made king before his father died, and again after his death, as Abarbinel observes. (See 1 Kings ii. 12.)

Ver. 18. And he walked in the way of the kings of Israel, as did the house of Ahab; for the daughter of Ahab was his wife.] viz. Athaliah, ver. 26.

And he did evil in the sight of the Lord.] Being seduced by his wife to forsake the religion of his pious father and grandfather. Thus Ahab himself was led to the worship of Baal by his wife Jezebel. So dangerous it is to marry with idolaters; for this wife of Jehoram, in all likelihood, was the author of that cruel policy of murdering all his brethren, for fear they should disturb him in his kingdom. (2 Chron. xxi. 2—4.)

Ver. 19. Yet the Lord would not destroy Judah for David his servant's sake.] Though he punished them severely, (see 2 Chron. xxi. 14—17, &c.) yet he would not cut them all off, but had patience with them a long time, upon the account of that excellent servant of his, king David; unto whom he had made a promise, as it here follows, and to his seed after him, of a perpetual kingdom.

As he promised him, to give him always a light, and to his children.] A succession in this dignity (as I have expounded it before), which was completed in the Messiah, whose kingdom shall have no end.

Ver. 20. In his days Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah, and made a king over themselves.] After they had been subject to Judah a hundred and fifty years, ever since the time of David, who subdued that country. This was a great dishonour to him; but by this means the prophecy of Isaac was fulfilled. (Gen. xxvii. 40.)

Ver. 21. So Joram went over to Zair.] This word Zair is written differently from Seir; and therefore doth not signify any part of the country of Edom; but some city near to it.

And all the chariots with him.] With as great a force as he could raise, to reduce them to obedience.

And he rose by night, and smote the Edomites which compassed him about.] The Edomites were not wanting in their own defence, but had surrounded him with an army; through which he broke in the night, and routed them.

And the captains of the chariots: and the people fled into their tents.] To their own camp; where, it is likely, they were intrenched.

Ver. 22. Yet Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah.] Notwithstanding this victory, they could not recover their dominion over this country; but Edom continued a kingdom under its own king.

Unto this day.] When this book was written, which was not long after this revolt. And they were not brought again under the power of the Jews till after the captivity of Babylon: when Hyrcanus the son of Simon conquered them, and they received circumcision; and came to have a free commerce with the Jews. Insomuch that Herod the son of Antipater, who was an Edomite, obtained the kingdom of Judea; and endeavoured to pass for a Jew, because they had received circumcision under Hyrcanus.

Then Libnah revolted at the same time.] Which was the reason, perhaps, why he could not pursue his victory over the Edomites, and regain their country; because he had enough to do at home, there being a defection of his own subjects from him. For this was a considerable city in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 42.) and belonged to the priests, (Josh. xxi. 13.) Which example, it is likely, other neighbouring cities followed. For the reason why they revolted, was because he attempted to set up his idolatrous worship among them; contrary to the law of God and of the kingdom. (See 2 Chron. xxi. 10, 11.)

Ver. 23. And the rest of the acts of Joram, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] See 1 Kings xi. 41.

Ver. 24. And Joram slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David.] But not in the sepulchre of the kings, as we read 2 Chron. xxi. 20.

And Ahaziah his son reigned in his stead.

Ver. 25. In the twelfth year of Joram the son of Ahab, did Ahaziah the son of Jehoram king of Judah begin to reign.] In the conclusion of the eleventh and beginning of the twelfth: as appears from ix. 29.

Ver. 26. Twenty and two years old was Ahaziah when he began to reign; and he reigned one year in Jerusalem.] But in 2 Chron. xxii. 2. it is said, he was forty-two years old when he began to reign: which seeming contradiction was anciently solved in this manner (by the author of Seder Olam Rabba, whom a great many Jewish and Christian writers follow): that the forty-two years mentioned in the book of Chronicles are not to be computed from the birth of Ahaziah, but from the time of the decree of cutting off the house of Omri: which was in the thirty-first year of Asa, when Omri began to reign, who reigned six years, and after him Ahab twenty and two; and Ahaziah his son two years, and Joram twelve: all which put together make forty-two years. This Dr. Lightfoot hath expressed more plainly thus: "The forty-two years have not relation to the age of Ahaziah, but to the kingdom of the house of Omri. And therefore the words of the original are not to be translated, Ahaziah was forty-two years old; but Ahaziah was the son of forty-two years, as Seder Olam translates it. And the reason why his reign is thus differently set down from all other kings of Judah is, because he was a branch of the house of Omri by his mother's side, (ver. 18.) and therefore was fit to be reckoned not by the line of the kings of Judah, but by the house of Omri and Ahab." But there is an easier and more likely reconciliation of these two places, by Kimchi, Abarbinel, and others, which is, that Joram being invaded by the Arabians, and also diseased, made his son Ahaziah king, together with himself, when he was forty-two years old. In this condition things remained twenty years; and then his father dying, they made him king alone, when he was forty-two years old: thus a great number of Christian interpreters also understand it. But then they suppose that Jehoram being thirty-two years old when he began to reign, reigned eight years (as it is said ver. 17.) after his father's death, that is, happily and prosperously; but after that, falling into the hands of the Arabians, and growing sickly, he reigned ingloriously twenty years, till he was sixty years old, his son administering affairs all this time for him: but since the LXX. in the book of Chronicles read not forty-two, but twenty, many learned and good men think the ancient Hebrew copies agreed thereunto: but by the carelessness of transcribers, forty came in instead of twenty. Which it is better they think to acknowledge plainly, than to use forced and constrained interpretations, as the preceding seem to them to be. Perizonius hath lately censured them all, in these words, "Si quid ego video aut intelligo, multo rectius divinitati et auctoritati Scripturæ S. consulant, qui vitium istic librariorum in re per se levi agnoscunt, quam qui difficultatem volunt tollere, contortis, violentis, et absonis interpretationibus: quæ ab ipsa Scripturæ locutione, et clarissima Syntaxi longissime recedunt," &c. And then instances in this very place, and the foregoing expressions of it. (Prefat. in Ælian. Var. Histor. * * * * 2.)

And his mother's name was Athaliah, the daughter of Omri king of Israel.] So she is called also in 2 Chron. xxii. 2. that is, Omri's grand-daughter; who are often called daughters, as I have before observed. For it is certain Athaliah was the daughter of Ahab; but perhaps educated by Omri his father, and upon that account may be called his daughter. He was the youngest son of Jehoram, all whose other children and his wives were carried away by the Philistines and Arabians, when they made an inroad upon Judah, 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17. where he is called Jehoahaz.

Ver. 27. And he walked in the way of the house of Ahab, and did evil in the sight of the Lord, as did the house of Ahab.] Not only worshipped the calves, but also Baal.

For he was the son-in-law of the house of Ahab.] And so corrupted in his religion, by the affinity he made with that wicked family. Into which Jehoshaphat married his son, hoping, perhaps, to unite thereby the two kingdoms again: but it proved the ruin of his family; as appears by the book of Chronicles.

Ver. 28. And he went with Joram the son of Ahab to the war against Hazael king of Syria in Ramoth-Gilead.] Just as Jehoshaphat went with Ahab to the same place: which Joram, it seems, endeavoured to recover to Israel, as his father had done.

And the Syrians wounded Joram.] Not mortally, as they did Ahab: but so, that he was fain to leave the field to be cured of his wounds in Jezreel.

Ver. 29. And king Joram went back to be healed in Jezreel of the wounds the Syrians had given him in Ramah, when he fought against Hazael king of Syria.] Leaving his army at Ramoth-Gilead.

And Ahaziah the son of Jehoram, king of Judah, went down to see Joram the son of Ahab in Jezreel, because he was sick.] By this means the secret providence of God so ordered it, that they were both killed by Jehu, as a punishment of their idolatry,

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. AND Elisha the prophet called one of the sons of the prophets.] The prophet Elijah was commanded to do this which Elisha was now about to do; but Ahab's humiliation had moved God to defer the judgment pronounced upon him and his family; and so the execution of it was left to Elisha, who did not go himself because he was better known, and his business required secrecy; or, being old, he was unfit for such a journey: for the last time we read of him he was at Damascus. This young man, who was now attending him, the Jews in Seder Olam Rabba say, was Jonah the son of Amittai: which is the opinion also of Abarbinel, and other Hebrew doctors.

And said, Gird up thy loins.] Which implies he was to make expedition, and dispatch his business before it could be discovered.

And take this box of oil in thine hand, and go to Ramoth-

Gilead.] Where Joram had left his army; and, as some think, they had now possessed themselves of it.

Ver. 2. And when thou comest thither, look out there Jehu the son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi.] Who some think was left commander-in-chief of the king's army.

And make him rise up from among his brethren.] From the other officers of the army, (ver. 5.)

And carry him to an inner chamber.] Lest the rest of the captains should make any opposition, and apprehend him.

Ver. 3. Then take the box of oil, and pour it on his head, and say, Thus saith the Lord, I have anointed thee king over Israel.] The Jews think none of the kings of Israel were anointed, but only those of the house of David: nor all they neither, but only when there was a question about the succession. For had it not been for the faction of Adonijah, there had been no need of Solomon's unction. For which reason Jehu was anointed, because the succession to the kingdom of Israel was to be translated out of the right line of the family of Ahab unto another family, which had no right to the kingdom, but merely by this appointment of God: who not only by his word, but by this solemn rite, constituted him king of Israel.

Then open the door and flee, and tarry not.] Lest by any means what he had done should be discovered, and they might lay hold on him as a traitor.

Ver. 4. So the young man, even the young man the prophet, went to Ramoth-Gilead.] This argued a great faith in this young prophet, that he undertook so readily the execution of this command. For there was no small danger to anoint a new king; as Elisha himself plainly suggests; when he bade him flee away, as fast as he could, as soon as he had done.

Ver. 5. And when he came, the captains of the host were sitting.] In council, I suppose, how to carry on the war, or about some other business. Though some fancy they were at dinner.

And he said, I have an errand to thee, O captain.] Looking upon Jehu.

And Jehu said, Unto which of all us? And he said, To thee, O captain.] This shews that Jehu was the head of them, who asked the question in the name of the rest.

Ver. 6. And he arose, and went into the house.] Into a private room, (ver. 2.)

And he poured the oil on his head, and said unto him.] The oil being poured on his head, the Jews say he anointed him with it (as the manner was) in the form of a crown: in token that he was the head of the people, and had the supreme power over them committed to him.

Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, I have anointed thee king over the people of the Lord, even over Israel.] They were still the people of the Lord by right and by profession, though they worshipped other gods with him. And it belonged to him to appoint what ruler he pleased over them; which he did by his prophet. Without which authority, if Jehu had taken the government upon him, he had been an usurper.

Ver. 7. And thou shalt smite the house of Ahab thy master.] Now he acquaints him what God required of him upon this promotion.

That I may avenge the blood of my servants the prophets, and the blood of all the servants of the Lord, at the hand of Jezebel.] To execute God's judgment on the house of Ahab, which he pronounced long ago, for their cruel murders of his prophets, and other good men in Israel; particularly Naboth. In this Jehu acted not out of a spirit of private revenge, for he had no quarrel with the house of Ahab, but as God's minister, who by his prophet authorized him to do what follows.

Ver. 8. For the whole house of Ahab shall perish; and I will cut off from Ahab him that pisseth against the wall, and him that is shut up and left in Israel.] See upon 1 Kings xxi. 21.

Ver. 9. And I will make the house of Ahab like the house of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and like the house of Baasha the son of Ahijah.] See 1 Kings xiv. 10. xvi. 3.

Ver. 10. And the dogs shall eat Jezebel in the portion of Jezreel, and there shall be none to bury her.] See 1 Kings xxi. 23.

And he opened the door, and fled.] See ver. 3.

Ver. 11. Then Jehu came forth to the servants of his lord.] Returned to the council-chamber, where they continued sitting, (ver. 5.)

And one said unto him, Is all well?] They seeing the prophet look like a man in a fright, thought he brought some bad news.

Wherefore came this mad fellow unto thee?] So they call him, because he came in so abruptly upon them, when they were sitting in council; and because he fled away so hastily; and because they observed some motions in him which argued great disturbance. Though some think they, being profane idolaters, spake these words in scorn and contempt.

And he said unto them, Ye know the man, and his communication.] They might know him to be a prophet by his habit, and by his way of speaking, as one that had authority. And prophets they knew commonly came to speak something concerning religion. By which general answer he thought to have satisfied them, and put by their further inquiry, that he might take time to deliberate of the most opportune season to declare this message of God to him.

Ver. 12. And they said, It is false, tell us now.] They were confident he came about some matter of great importance, which he seeming unwilling to discover, they pressed him the harder to tell truth.

And he said, Thus and thus spake he unto me, saying, Thus saith the Lord, I have anointed thee king over Israel.] It is likely the spirit of courage, as well as of prudence, entered into Jehu, when he was anointed, so that he took heart to tell them boldly what the prophet had said. And the oil perhaps was still fresh upon his head, wherewith he anointed him, which he shewed to them.

Ver. 13. And they hasted.] God also moved the hearts of all the captains, immediately, without any consultation, to acknowledge him for their king.

And took every man his garment, and put it under him.] They made a kind of throne of their very garments, and raised him up above the rest of the company.

Upon the top of the stairs.] They did not stay till they came down into the street, but forthwith, upon the very top of the stairs of the place where they were sitting, acknowledged him for their sovereign, by spreading their garments under his feet, to tread upon. So De Dieu understands the words. There is a late author who guesses these were winding-stairs in a turret, on the top of which tower they placed Jehu, that all the people might see him, and hear him proclaimed their king. (Gousset in his Comment. Linguæ Hebraicæ, p. 173.)

And blew with the trumpet, saying, Jehu is king.] They proclaimed him to be appointed by God to be king of Israel, which used to be done by the sound of the trumpet. (1 Kings i. 32.)

Ver. 14. So Jehu the son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi, conspired against Joram.] Contrived, with the rest of the captains that commanded the army, how to destroy Joram. For which they had the fairer opportunity, because he was gone from the army to Jezreel, as it here follows.

(Now Joram had kept Ramoth-Gilead, he and all Israel, because of Hazael king of Syria.] That is, kept a strong garrison there, upon the frontiers of his kingdom; and left his army also thereabout (for they are meant by all Israel), for fear Hazael should make any new attempt to recover it.

Ver. 15. But king Joram was returned to be healed in Jezreel of the wounds which the Syrians had given him, when he fought with Hazael king of Syria).] This was said before, but here repeated, to shew how Jehu came to effect his design so easily. Which was because Joram was absent from his army: among whom if he had continued, it is likely, some of them, if not all, would have adhered to him, and fought for him.

And Jehu said, If it be your minds.] If they were all agreed that he should be their king.

Then let none go forth nor escape out of the city.] This shews that Ramoth-Gilead was in the possession of the Israelites. From whence he would have none to be sent, nor suffered to go forth, but the gates be narrowly watched.

To go to tell it in Jezreel.] For he knew that secrecy and speed were necessary to the execution of such great designs as he had in hand.

Ver. 16. And Jehu rode in a chariot, and went to Jezreel (for Joram lay there). And Ahaziah king of Judah was come down to see Joram.] This is repeated, to shew that Joram continued at Jezreel, whither he went from Ramoth: and that Ahaziah, who came to visit him, continued also with him.

Ver. 17. And there stood a watchman on the tower of Jezreel.] These watchmen seem to have been set on high places, in time of peace, as well as war, wheresoever the king was, that he might not be surprised. For David at Jerusalem was admonished by the watchman that his sons were safe, when he feared they had been lost, (2 Sam. xiii. 34.) as afterward, that news was coming from the army that fought against Absalom, (xviii. 24, 25.)

And he spied the company of Jehu as they came, and said, I see a company.] A troop, or squadron of horse, as we now speak.

And Joram said, Take a horseman, and send to meet them, and say, Is it peace?] He was afraid the Syrians had got the better of his army; or some more of his subjects had revolted, as Libnah had done.

Ver. 18. So there went one on horseback to meet him, and said, Thus saith the king, Is it peace? And Jehu said, What hast thou to do with peace? turn thee behind me.] The messenger spake in the king's name; but he spake to a greater king, who bade him not to trouble himself about peace or war, but follow him. Which he durst not refuse, seeing such a company of soldiers with Jehu.

And the watchman said, The messenger came to them, but he cometh not again.] Which put them in doubt what to think.

Ver. 19. And he sent out a second on horseback, which came unto them, and said, Thus saith the king, Is it peace? And Jehu said, What hast thou to do with peace? turn thee behind me.] To the same question the same answer was returned; that it did not concern him, whether they were friends or enemies; but his safest way was to follow Jehu.

Ver. 20. And the watchman told, saying, He came even unto them, and cometh not again: and the driving is like the driving of Jehu the son of Nimshi.] Who was his grandfather, but a more eminent person, it is likely, than Jehoshaphat his father; and so he was commonly called his son.

For he driveth furiously.] He was noted, it seems, for fierceness and eagerness in pursuing his designs. But the Chaldee paraphrast takes it quite otherwise, that he drove slowly; as if he would entice Joram to come out of the city and meet him, having no mind to engage in an assault or siege of Jezreel.

Ver. 21. And Joram said, Make ready. And his chariot was made ready. And Joram king of Israel, and Ahaziah king of Judah, went out each in his chariot, and they went out against Jehu.] Not to fight him, but to meet him before he came to the city, that if there was any sedition he might compose it by his authority; or, perhaps, in honour of Jehu, who he saw would deliver the news himself, and not entrust a messenger with it.

And met him in the portion of Naboth the Jezreelite.] By a special providence of God, which brought them together in that place.

Ver. 22. And it came to pass, when Joram saw Jehu, that he said, Is it peace, Jehu?] Seeing him look sternly, I suppose, he began to suspect some danger.

And he answered, What peace, so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel, and her witchcrafts, are so many?] He means her idolatries, wherewith she bewitched the people, still continued, and were multiplied. Some think, indeed, that she added corporal fornication to her spiritual, and used evil arts to provoke men to filthy lusts. And, indeed, all manner of lewdness was wont to accompany idolatry; and in Rev. ii. 20. they who are compared to Jezebel are said to entice Christians to fornication, and to eat things sacrificed to idols; unless by fornication we there understand idolatry, and by eating things sacrificed to idols, having communion with idolaters.

Ver. 23. Joram turned his hands.] The hand of him that drove the chariot.

And fled.] Towards Jezreel; where if he had kept, and inquired what Jehu came for, he might have defended himself for some time against him.

And said to Ahaziah, There is treachery, O Ahaziah!] Which he discovered too late, having no forces to resist those of Jehu.

Ver. 24. And Jehu drew a bow with his full strength, and smote Jehoram between his arms.] Or shoulders; it being, I suppose, a chariot open behind.

And the arrow went out at his heart, and he sunk down in his chariot.] God so ordered it, that he shot him quite through the heart, so that he died immediately.

Ver. 25. Then said Jehu to Bidkar his captain, Take him, and cast him in the portion of the field of Naboth the Jezreelite.] Part of which Ahab had made a garden; but the rest remained a field.

For remember how that, when I and thou rode together after Ahab his father.] With the rest of his guard, when he went to take possession of Naboth's vineyard. In the Hebrew the words are exactly thus: Remember, thou and I were among those who rode two and two together after Ahab, &c. That is, he was attended by his guard, who were wont to ride in pairs, two and two, and Jehu and Bidkar rode at that time together, and heard Elijah's words.

The Lord laid this burden upon him.] This punishment, which is frequently by the prophets called a burden, Isa. xiii. 1, &c. was denounced against Ahab, and extended to his son, 1 Kings xxi. 19. where these very words are not recorded; but Elijah said more than is there set down, which Jehu well remembered.

Ver. 26. Surely, I have seen yesterday the blood of Naboth, and the blood of his sons, saith the Lord.] Some think that Jezebel contrived the death of Naboth's sons, together with their father, that they might lay no claim to the possession of their father. But these words may signify no more (as Grotius and others have observed) than the poverty to which they were reduced. For all punishments and miseries are called blood among the Hebrews; (Lev. xvii. 4.) and to take away their estate, upon which they should have lived, was in effect to take away their blood, in which is the life of every creature; as we say now of grievous oppressors, that they suck the blood of others; and commonly call them blood-suckers.

And I will requite it in this plat, saith the Lord. Now therefore take and cast him into the plat of ground, according to the word of the Lord.] Without any burial; that, according to the prophecy, he might be eaten by the fowls of the air, (1 Kings xxi. 24.)

Ver. 27. But when Ahaziah king of Judah saw this, he fled by the way of the garden-house.] Which was built upon part of Naboth's vineyard.

And Jehu followed after him, and said, Smite him also in the chariot. And they did so, at the going up to Gur, which is by Ibleam: and he fled to Megiddo.] He could not get to his own country, and so sheltered himself at Megiddo, which was not far from Samaria, whither his servants carried him, as a safer place (for he was not mortally wounded), and there he hid himself for fear of Jehu, as we read 2 Chron. xxii. 9.

And he died there.] Not at Megiddo; but being searched for and taken in Samaria, he was brought to Jehu at Jezreel, where he commanded him to be slain. Which seems to be beyond his commission; but as he was an idolater, so he was of the bloody house of Ahab by his mother's side, who was Ahab's daughter: (viii. 18.) and his destruction was of God, (as the author of the second book of Chronicles observes, xxii. 7.) who prompted Jehu thus to understand his command. Thus Abarbinel understands those words, he died there. Not in Megiddo, mentioned before, but in that execution of God's judgments on the house of Ahab.

Ver. 28. And his servants carried him in a chariot to Jerusalem, and buried him in his sepulchre with his fathers, in the city of David.] Which honour Jehu permitted to be done him, because he was descended from the good prince Jehoshaphat. (See 2 Chron. xxii. 9.)

Ver. 29. And in the eleventh year of Joram the son of Ahab began Ahaziah to reign over Judah.] See the foregoing chapter, ver. 25.

Ver. 30. And when Jehu was come to Jezreel, Jezebel heard of it; and she painted her face, and tired her head, and looked out at a window.] In the Hebrew it is, she put her eyes in paint; that is, in stibium, which made the eyes look black, and was accounted beautiful; and also dilated the eyebrows, and made the eyes appear big; which, in some countries, was also thought very amiable. (See Grotius.) This was not intended to tempt Jehu with her beauty; but to keep up her dignity and state to the very last: for she was extremely proud.

Ver. 31. And as Jehu entered in at the gate, she said, Had Zimri peace, who slew his master?] She thought, perhaps, he would not meddle with a woman; and therefore took upon her to rebuke and upbraid him with what he had done against her son; bidding him remember what became of Zimri, who was cut off by Omri his father-in-law, the founder of Ahab's family.

Ver. 32. And he lifted up his face to the window, and said, Who is on my side, who? And there looked out to him two or three eunuchs.] Who, according to the custom of the eastern countries, were wont to attend upon queens in their chambers.

Ver. 33. And he said, Throw her down. So they threw her down.] See how suddenly courtiers change with the fortune of their master.

And some of her blood was sprinkled on the wall, and on the horses: and he trod her under foot.] With his horses. This some of the Jewish doctors, particularly Ralbag and Kimchi, look upon as a punishment, according to the lex talionis, like for like. As she had done, so she suffered. For she caused Naboth to be stoned; and now she was condemned to be stoned herself: for there were two ways of stoning; either by throwing stones at malefactors, till they had knocked them down and killed them; or by throwing them down upon the stones from a high place, and breaking them to pieces. As Amaziah did with the captives he took of Mount Seir, 2 Chron. xxv. 12. (See Selden, lib. i. de Synedriis, cap. 5. p. 76, &c.)

Ver. 34. And when he was come in, he did eat and drink, and said, Go, see now this cursed woman, and bury her.] That is, go and take care of her body, to see it decently buried.

For she is a king's daughter.] And was also the wife and the mother of a king, which moved him to have this regard to her, as all men naturally have to royal dignity; forgetting, in the mean time, what Elijah had prophesied against her in his hearing. Which he might easily do when he was merry, it is like, with eating and drinking liberally.

Ver. 35. And they went out to bury her; but they found no more of her than the skull, and the feet, and the palms of her hands.] All the rest being eaten by the dogs. For it is probable, when the horsemen were gone, who trod her under foot, the footmen stripped her, and left her naked in her own blood; exposed to the hungry dogs, that came out of the city and devoured her.

Ver. 36. Wherefore they came again, and told him: and he said, This is the word of the Lord, which he spake by his servant Elijah the prophet.] Which he now called to mind, as he did his prophecy concerning Ahab and his sons.

Saying, In the portion of Jezreel shall dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel.] See 1 Kings xxi. 23.

Ver. 37. And the carcass of Jezebel shall be as dung upon the face of the field, in the portion of Jezreel; so that they shall not say, This is Jezebel.] No memory of her, nothing whereby to know there had been such a woman as Jezebel, should remain of her; suppose a picture, or effigies, to which men might point, and say, This is Jezebel. In our language, perhaps we should have said, they shall not say, Here lies Jezebel: for no monument was made for her, she having no sepulchre but in the belly of dogs. These words are not mentioned in 1 Kings xxi. being sufficiently included in what is there recorded: but perfectly remembered by Jehu; who now more largely recites the words of Elijah.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. AND Ahab had seventy sons.] It is likely that grandsons are comprehended under the name of sons, as is usual in Scripture; though, by several wives, he might have as many sons as Gideon had.

In Samaria.] Unto which place the ruler of Jezreel had carried them, when they heard how Jehu had killed Joram; for fear they should fall into his hands: or, perhaps, during the war with Syria, their father had sent them thither, as a place of security (it being a strong city), in case of any ill accident that might happen.

And Jehu wrote letters, to Samaria, unto the rulers of Jezreel.] The chief noblemen of the kingdom, who, I suppose, were fled thither with the king's sons; and perhaps were met to deliberate what to do in this juncture, whether or not to set up one of Ahab's sons to be their king.

And to the elders.] The principal persons in Samaria.

And to those who brought up Ahab's children, saying.] These are called omanim (nourishers), because they had the care of his children from their infancy, and were now their governors, as we call them; who were of his kindred, (ver. 11.)

Ver. 2. Now, as soon as this letter cometh to you, seeing your master's sons are with you, and there are with you chariots and horses, a fenced city also, and armour;

Ver. 3. Look even out the best and meetest of your master's sons, and set him on his father's throne, and fight for your master's house.] This he said, because, perhaps, he heard they were consulting about a successor to Ahab. Or rather, he insults over them, and denounces war against them with scorn and derision, being secure of the event, that they were not able to oppose him.

Ver. 4. But they were exceedingly afraid, and said, Behold, two kings stood not before him: how then shall we stand?] They were timorous persons, bred up it is likely in ease and delicacy. For this argument had little in it; those two kings being unarmed, without any forces; which they were furnished withal to defend themselves, and their master's sons.

Ver. 5. And he that was over the house.] The high steward, as we call him, of the king's household.

And he that was over the city.] The governor of the city, who had all the soldiers under his command.

And the elders, and the bringers up of the king's children.] All the senators, and the great men that were entrusted with the care of the king's children.

Sent to Jehu, saying, We are thy servants, and will do all that thou shalt bid us; we will not make any king: do thou that which is good in thine eyes.] They basely submit to his pleasure, without making any composition: which it is likely they thought it to no purpose to endeavour, and did not expect such rigorous usage from him.

Ver. 6. Then he wrote a letter the second time to them, saying, If ye be mine, and if ye will hearken unto my voice, take the heads of your master's sons, and come to me to Jezreel by to-morrow this time (now the king's sons, being seventy persons, were with the great men of the city, which brought them up).] This is repeated, to shew the vile spirit of these great men; that could destroy so many royal persons, of whom they had the care, and who had offended nobody.

Ver. 7. And it came to pass, when the letter came to them, that they took the king's sons, and slew seventy persons, and put their heads in baskets.] They seem not to have deliberated about the matter, though in itself so horrid; but instantly obeyed him.

And sent him them to Jezreel.] Following after themselves, as appears from ver. 11. expecting, perhaps, to be thanked for what they had so readily done; but, quite contrary, came to the same miserable end.

Ver. 8. And there came a messenger, and told him, saying, They have brought the heads of the king's sons. And he said, Lay ye them in two heaps at the entering of the gate until the morning.] The gate was the place of public concourse for judgment, and other business; so that the laying them there was to expose them to public view, that every one might know there was none of Ahab's posterity left to reign over them.

Ver. 9. And it came to pass in the morning, that he went out, and stood, and said to all the people.] Who were there gathered together, gazing upon this amazing sight.

Ye be righteous.] Be not troubled; for none of you are to blame in all this.

Behold, I conspired against my master, and slew him; but who slew all these?] If any were guilty, he acknowledges it was himself. But since they had slain so many, why should he be to blame for slaying one? since he had authority from God for what he did.

Ver. 10. Know now, that there shall fall unto the earth nothing of the word of the Lord, which the Lord spake concerning the house of Ahab.] In these words he throws all the guilt from off himself; being only God's instrument to punish the house of Ahab, as he had foretold by Elijah. And therefore he resolved to proceed, till he had utterly extirpated all that depended on him.

For the Lord hath done.] As if he had said, This is not my doing, but the Lord's: whose command I obey.

That which he spake by his servant Elijah.] He mentions what he denounced, rather than what Elisha commanded, (ix. 8.) because the words of Elijah were publicly known; whereas Elisha's were spoken in private, and not by himself, but by one of the sons of the prophets, (ix. 7—9.)

Ver. 11. So Jehu slew all that remained of the house of Ahab in Jezreel, and all his great men.] Whom he had advanced to great offices, or dignities.

And his kinsfolks.] All that had any relation to him.

And his priests.] Who had served him in his idolatrous worship, and confirmed him in it.

Until he left him none remaining.] In that place: but there were still some left in Samaria, (ver. 17.)

Ver. 12. And he arose and departed, and came to Samaria.] Having finished his work in Jezreel, he went to prosecute it in the chief city of the kingdom; which most needed reformation.

And as he was at the shearing-house in the way.] In the Hebrew the words are, in the house of the shepherds' binding. For they bound the feet of their sheep when they sheared them; and this was the place where the shepherds of Samaria were wont to do it.

Ver. 13. Jehu met with the brethren of Ahaziah king of Judah, and said, Who are ye? And they answered, We are the brethren of Ahaziah, and we are going to salute the children of the king, and the children of the queen.] That is, the children of Joram, and the children of Jezebel. But the brethren of Ahaziah were carried captive before this, as we read 2 Chron. xxi. 17. therefore by brethren we must understand his brother's sons, as it is explained in 2 Chron. xxii. 8.

Ver. 14. And he said, Take them alive. And they took them, and he slew them at the pit of the shearing-house, even two-and-forty men; neither left he any of them.] They were allied to the family of Ahab by the mother's side, (viii. 18.) and therefore he thought his commission (ix. 8, 9.) extended thus far; being afraid, also, it is likely, that they might, if they lived, be avenged of him for the death of Joram, Ahaziah, Jezebel, and their children, whom they were going to see.

Ver. 15. And when he was departed thence, he lighted upon Jehonadab the son of Rechab, coming to meet him.] A very pious and prudent person, as appears by his precepts to his sons, in the thirty-fifth of Jeremiah. Who hearing what Jehu had done, came, I suppose, to congratulate with him his happiness in fulfilling God's commands; and to encourage him in his proceedings to destroy idolatry. Scaliger, indeed, in his Elench. Trihæres. cap. 24. against Serrarius, endeavours to prove that this Jehonadab was not he that gave those precepts to his sons; but another in the days of Jeremiah: for it is not likely, he thinks, that a man addicted to such a quiet life as he instituted would come to meet Jehu; and therefore this was some military person of great note, who Jehu thought might be serviceable to him. But this is a weak argument; for why might not Jonadab, though he loved retirement, come to congratulate Jehu's zeal against idolatry, and Jehu be glad of such a man's company, whose known piety would gain him greater respect than the attendance of any great captain could procure him?

And he saluted him.] Some think that Jehonadab saluted Jehu, and spake the words following. But it seems plain to me that they are the words of Jehu, who saluted him, as soon as he saw him, and inquired of his welfare.

And said, Is thy heart right, as my heart is with thy heart?] The king professed great love to him, and asked him if he loved him as sincerely, and approved his actions, as he did Jehonadab's institutions.

And Jehonadab answered, It is.] The expression is double in the Hebrew, Yes, yes; to signify a vehement affection. Or, as a late learned writer (Gousset, in his Comment. Hebr. Linguæ) will have it, the former is spoken by Jehonadab, who said It is; and the other by Jehu, who answered, Is it? then give me thy hand, &c.

If it be, give me thine hand.] In token of friendship (Gal. ii. 9.) and of fidelity: as it was among the Romans, it appears by many places in Virgil: for instance, Æneid. iii.

"Ipse pater dextram Anchises, haud multa moratus, Dat juveni, atque animum præsenti pignore firmat."

And he gave him his hand, and he took him up to him into his chariot.] Which was a great honour, and a token of high esteem, to ride with the king in the same chariot.

Ver. 16. And he said, Come with me, and see my zeal for the Lord.] To vindicate his honour, and fulfil his commands.

So they made him ride in his chariot.] He speaks in the plural number (they made him), because the servants, I suppose, opened the door, and helped him up in the chariot, when Jehu gave him his hand.

Ver. 17. And when he came to Samaria, he slew all that remained unto Ahab in Samaria, till he had destroyed him.] Utterly rooted out his family.

According to the saying of the Lord, which he spake by Elijah.] This is mentioned again; both to shew his warrant for what he did, and his exactness in fulfilling God's command.

Ver. 18. And Jehu gathered all the people together.] That is, all the heads of them, who represented the rest.

And said unto them, Ahab served Baal a little, but Jehu shall serve him much.] His zeal for the Lord exceeded its bounds; for he ought not to have taken any indirect course to fulfil his will: as he did in counterfeiting as much zeal for Baal, as he professed to Jehonadab he had for the Lord. God doth not stand in need of any man's sin to compass his ends: but Jehu made bold to dissemble deeply for the service of God; in which he cannot be excused.

Ver. 19. Now therefore call unto me all the prophets of Baal, all his servants, and all his priests, let none be wanting.] By servants he doth not here mean his worshippers; but, being joined with prophets and priests, they signified some that ministered with the priests in the worship of Baal: like the Levites among the people of God.

For I have a great sacrifice to do to Baal.] He might possibly mean a sacrifice not of beasts, but of men; even of all the worshippers of Baal; but he intended they should understand him otherwise, and therefore these words were spoken to deceive.

Whosoever shall be wanting, he shall not live.] He thought that some, who considered what slaughter he had made of the family of Ahab (who introduced the worship of Baal, whom he pretended more highly to honour than Ahab had done), might suspect his design; and therefore he terrifies them with the fear of death, if they did not come to this great sacrifice.

But Jehu did it in subtilty, that he might destroy the worshippers of Baal.] By destroying his prophets, and ministers, and priests; who being all cut off, his worship would fall to the ground. But the next verses extend this further, to all the worshippers of Baal in the whole country.

Ver. 20. And Jehu said, Proclaim a solemn assembly for Baal. And they proclaimed it.] The last day of the feast of tabernacles, the great day of the feast, is called by this name of Atzarah; which we translate a solemn assembly: when it was not lawful to do any servile work, but wholly attend to the service of God, (Lev. xxiii. 36.) Such a day he now caused to be sanctified (as the word is in the Hebrew) for the service of Baal.

Ver. 21. And Jehu sent through all Israel.] To give notice of this great feast; and to require every one, upon pain of death, to be present at it.

And all the worshippers of Baal came, and there was not a man left that came not. And they came into the house of Baal; and the house of Baal was full, from one end to another.] If this be meant of the whole number of Baalites throughout the kingdom, it seems scarce credible that the temple of Baal should be so large as to hold them all. But two things are to be considered; first, that this house or temple comprehended all the outward courts of it (as it did at the temple of Jerusalem), which were very spacious; and secondly, the number of his worshippers was much diminished since the death of Ahab: for Jehoram his successor had no great kindness for the worship of Baal, (iii. 2.) and men are apt to follow the example of their king. Besides, it is likely, Hazael king of Syria had destroyed many of them in his wars with Israel.

Ver. 22. And he said to him that was over the vestry, Bring forth vestments for all the worshippers of Baal. And he brought them forth vestments.] By all the worshippers of Baal, are not meant all the people that came to worship him: but his ministers and priests, who alone wore vestments of a different kind from the rest of the people; and so it was among the Jews, and all other nations.

Ver. 23. And Jehu went, and Jehonadab the son of Rechab, into the house of Baal, and said unto the worshippers of Baal, Search, and look that there be here with you none of the servants of the Lord, but the worshippers of Baal only.] He calls those that worshipped the golden calves the servants of the Lord: because they worshipped the Lord by them, and abhorred the worship of Baal: whose sacrifice he pretended to fear might be profaned, if any strangers should be present at it. According to the common saying among the heathen, Procul, o procul este profani.

Ver. 24. And when they went in to offer sacrifices and burnt-offerings.] When they had begun their sacred offices.

He appointed fourscore men without, and said, If any of the men whom I have brought into your hands escape, he that letteth him go, his life shall be for the life of him.] This was but a small number for such an execution. But, it is likely, though no more appeared, yet there were others ready at hand to support them, if need were, in the undertaking. Or rather, these were set at the several gates of the outward courts; that if any endeavoured to make their escape, they might kill them. But the next verse seems to signify there was a greater body of men that went for that purpose into the temple.

Ver. 25. And it came to pass, as soon as they had made an end of offering the burnt-offering, that Jehu said to the guard, and to the captains.] Of those troops that he had set to keep the peace, as he pretended, and prevent all disturbance.

Go in, and slay them, let none come forth. And they smote them with the edge of the sword; and the guard and the captains cast them out.] There is nothing in the Hebrew that answers to the word them: nor is it likely that the captains and soldiers troubled themselves to cast their bodies out of the temple; where they were rather buried in its ruins. But the meaning is, having done this execution, the guard and captains rushed out of the temple in great haste, and immediately ran to the city of the house of Baal, as it here follows.

And went to the city of the house of Baal.] That is, a place near to Samaria, where Baal had another temple; which gave name to the place: or rather, there were great buildings adjoining to the temple of Baal in Samaria, where the prophets, and priests, and their servants lived, called a city, because they were so large.

Ver. 26. And they brought forth the images out of the house of Baal, and burnt them.] They worshipped several other lesser gods (whose images they had in this temple), together with the supreme god, whom they called Baal; as the others were called Baalim. So Servius writes upon the first of the Georgics, that veteri ritu, according to ancient custom, after the priests had invoked the special gods, to whom the sacrifice was intended, "generaliter omnia numina invocabantur," all the gods were invoked, lest any of them should think themselves neglected.

Ver. 27. And they brake down the image of Baal, and brake down the house of Baal.] Demolished his temple, and the image of Baal in it: which was either the sun, or Belus.

And made it a draught-house unto this day.] It was turned into a jakes, as we now speak, a place where men went to ease nature; which was the highest contempt that could be put upon it.

Ver. 28. Thus Jehu destroyed Baal out of Israel.] So that he was never worshipped more in this country; but they were perfectly freed from this sort of idolatry. Which must be acknowledged to have been a very great work: all the eastern people, and particularly the Syrians and Zidonians, and other neighbouring nations, being addicted to this worship, and had been so from ancient time; as what I observed before shews, (1 Kings xvi. 31.) from the many cities, woods, mountains, and fountains, which before Joshua's time were known by the name of Baal: and there is mention of Baal-shalisha in this book, iv. 42.

Ver. 29. Howbeit from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, Jehu departed not from them, to wit, the golden calves that were in Beth-el, and in Dan.] Which he still worshipped; being afraid, as his predecessors were, that if he took them away, as he had done Baal, the people would return to the house of David. For which reason all the following kings of Israel continued this false worship till their captivity; when these calves were carried away with them. So they say in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 22. "In the twentieth year of Pekah came Tiglath-pilneser, and took away the golden calf that was in Dan, and departed;" which they endeavour to prove out of 2 Chron. xxviii. 20, 21. And a little after, "in the twelfth year of Ahaz, the Lord stirred up the spirit of the king of Assyria, and he carried away the golden calf in Beth-el, and departed: fulfilling what is written, Hosea x. 6."

Ver. 30. And the Lord said unto Jehu.] By some prophet; either Elisha, or the young man that was sent to anoint Jehu; or some other.

Because thou hast done well in executing that which is right in mine eyes, and hast done unto the house of Ahab according to all that was in mine heart, thy children of the fourth generation shall sit on the throne of Israel.] His partial obedience was not without its reward: which had been greater if he had been as zealous in all things as he was in this one instance; the following history shews the truth of this prediction: the kingdom continuing in his posterity, till the days of Zachariah, who was the fourth from Jehu, (xv. 8.) and reigned only so long, as to make good this prophecy.

Ver. 31. But Jehu took no care to walk in the law of the Lord God of Israel with all his heart: for he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam, which made Israel to sin.] This admonition from God (which sufficiently shewed he was not well pleased with him) did him no good; but policy prevailed against religion, and persuaded him to continue the old idolatry when he had destroyed the new.

Ver. 32. In those days the Lord began to cut Israel short: and Hazael smote them in all the coasts of Israel.] He took several of their frontier towns, I suppose, and thereby opened a way to make great ravages in their country. For though Jehu was a valiant man, yet God did not prosper him, because he was not a sincere servant of his.

Ver. 33. From Jordan eastward, all the land of Gilead, the Gadites, the Reubenites, and the Manassites, from Aroer (which is by the river Arnon), even Gilead and Bashan.] This fully explains what was said in the foregoing verse, that God cut them short. For Hazael took all their country beyond Jordan: the whole kingdom, which the Israelites took from Sihon and Og. Thus these countries which the Israelites first conquered were the first that they lost.

Ver. 34. Now the rest of the acts of Jehu, and all that he did, and all his might, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?] Which was extant in those days when this was written; and related his history more at large: of which this is a brief abridgment.

Ver. 35. And Jehu slept with his fathers; and they buried him in Samaria: and Jehoahaz his son reigned in his stead.

Ver. 36. And the time that Jehu reigned over Israel was twenty and eight years.] Longer than any of the kings of Israel his predecessors.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. AND when Athaliah, the mother of Ahaziah, saw that her son was dead, she arose, and destroyed all the seed-royal.] There were many of them cut off by Jehu, as we read in the foregoing chapter; and not a few by others, 2 Chron. xxi. 4. xxii. 1. but now their destruction was completed by Athaliah: who, as she was ambitious of government, so she was enraged to see Ahab's family cut off; and therefore resolved to do as much by the house of David: and perhaps she was afraid Jehu should come and kill her because she was of the house of Ahab; and therefore endeavoured to strengthen herself by getting into the throne, which she could not compass without the destruction of the royal family. For she was a wicked woman, as she is elsewhere called, and had played the harlot with another man, by whom she had children; as the Jewish doctors gather from 2 Chron. xxiv. 7.

Ver. 2. But Jehosheba the daughter of king Joram.] Not by Athaliah, but by another wife. For Athaliah would not have suffered her daughter to be married to the high-priest, nor would he (in all likelihood) have married the daughter of such a woman.

Sister of Ahaziah.] By the father's side.

Took Joash the son of Ahaziah, and stole him away from the king's sons that were slain.] Some think that he was thrown among them, and thought to be dead; but she snatched him away, and brought him to life: or, as P. Martyr understands it, his nurse threw him among the slain on purpose to save his life, and came afterward and stole him away. But the plain meaning seems to be, that they being all ordered to be slain, she secretly stole him away, and preserved him.

And they hid him.] That is, she and her husband Jehoiada, the high-priest, to whom she was married, (2 Chron. xxii. 11.)

And his nurse, in the bedchamber, from Athaliah, so that he was not slain.] It appears, by the next verse, that this bedchamber was in the house of the Lord; that is, the temple. Which doth not in the Scripture always signify the sanctuary; but, in a larger sense, comprehends all the courts belonging to it. So Kimchi observes, that the whole mountain of the house is called the house of the Lord. And this chamber here spoken of was in the outward court of all, called, by Josephus, πρῶτον ἱερὸν, the first holy place. For in the inner court nobody lay, nor might any woman come into it. (See L'Empereur, upon Codex Middoth. cap. 2. sect. 3.)

Ver. 3. And he was with her in the house of the Lord six years.] The ministers of God were so true to Jehoiada, that he lay thus long undiscovered.

And Athaliah did reign over the land.] Not de jure (as the lawyers spake), but de facto. For if we may believe the Jews, it was not lawful for a woman to reign over them. So Maimonides, in the treatise Melachim: "They do not place a woman on the throne," because it is said, Deut. xvii. 15. If thou wilt set a king over thee, and not a queen. "And so in all the prefectures in Israel, they place none but men." She being therefore an usurper, it may seem strange she held the throne so long as six years, against the constitution of the kingdom. But, in after-ages, there is an example of one that held it longer. For Alexandra, the widow of Jannæus, after the death of her husband, possessed herself of the throne, and reigned nine years, as Josephus relates, lib. xiii. Antiq. cap. 24. (See Schickard, in his Mischpat Hammelech, cap. 2. Theor. 3.)

Ver. 4. And the seventh year Jehoiada sent and fetched.] Jehoiada was not a mere private man, but a person of great authority in the kingdom, who, knowing Athaliah was an usurper, and that he had the right heir to the kingdom in his possession (which if he had not, his own wife had a better right than Athaliah), thought he had sufficient warrant to dethrone her, and set up him that had the undoubted title to the crown. Which he did when he was seven years old; because then he grew so big, that he could not well be longer concealed; and it was fit also he should be educated in a royal manner; which he could not be while he lay hid.

The rulers over hundreds.] The names of five of them are set down in 2 Chron. xxiii. 1. who were all, some think, of the tribe of Levi. For they of that tribe were the persons principally employed in this undertaking, as appears by the sequel. But we learn from that place in the Chronicles, ver. 2. that whosoever they were, they went about all Judah, and gathered not only the Levites, but the chief of the fathers of Israel.

With the captains of the guard.] The chief commanders of the soldiery, and those that had been the former king's guard: for it is not likely he durst call those who were the guard of the present queen.

And brought them to him into the house of the Lord.] Into that part of it where Joash was kept, where Jehoiada discoursed with them.

And made a covenant with them, and took an oath of them in the house of the Lord, and shewed them the king's son.] He discovered to them the true heir of the crown, and they entered into a covenant to restore him: which they bound with an oath of secrecy.

Ver. 5. And he commanded them, saying, This is the thing that ye should do.] These words, and those that follow, are certainly spoken to the priests and Levites (with whom those captains beforementioned were to join), as men whom Jehoiada had perfectly under his command, and whom he could trust: to whom he gives the following orders.

A third part of you that enter in on the sabbath, shall even be keepers of the watch of the king's house.] The priests and Levites took their turns in their attendance at the temple; and their course was finished in the space of a week. Every week a course went out, and another came in. Now they who now entered upon their week of attendance (which was on the eve of every sabbath) were divided by Jehoiada into three parts; one of which he here orders to guard the king's house: that is, that part of the temple on the north where he lodged, and was now educated.

Ver. 6. And a third part shall be at the gate of Sur.] That is, the east gate of the temple, towards the city; which was the principal (and, at the first, the only) entrance into the house of the Lord. This is called the gate of the foundation, 2 Chron. xxiii. 5. (and by five other names, if we may believe the Talmudists), where another part were ordered to guard it. Abarbinel thinks this eastern gate was called Sur, being as much as to say, go back; because no unclean person durst enter into this gate: and the gate of the foundation, because it was, as he speaks, the gate of the first sanctuary.

And a third part at the gate behind the guard.] The other third part he set at the south gate, which looked towards the royal palace; and through which Athaliah was wont to come, and therefore had a guard near this place. Behind which these Levites were placed by Jehoiada, to observe their motions.

So shall ye keep the watch of the house, that it be not broken down.] They were to take special care, that the house of the Lord was not any way profaned; suffering none to come nearer to it than they ought: and particularly watching those out of the palace, that they did not defile it. So De Dieu thinks the word massach (which we translate be not broken down) ought to be understood, being as much as be massach, by pulling away those that shall dare to pollute the holy place, and would come in to hurt the king. Or, as other learned men have interpreted it; they were to keep the watch of the house at the breach: which the wicked sons of Athaliah (which she had by another man) had made, as we read 2 Chron. xxiv. 7. Dr. Lightfoot thinks, that, besides these three parts for the design which Jehoiada intended, there were three more (six in all) for the ordinary service of the temple. For he would not have that neglected, while he took care of the affairs of the kingdom. (See his book of the Temple, chap. 20.)

Ver. 7. And two parts of all you that go forth on the sabbath.] It is well known, that David divided the priests into twenty-four courses, to attend the service of the temple in their turns: every one of which courses ministered their week from sabbath to sabbath. So Josephus saith expressly, he ordained each should minister eight days, ἀπὸ Σαββάτου ἐπὶ Σάββατον, from one sabbath to another, (lib. viii. Antiq. cap. 2.) For that course which went out did not depart till the sabbath was over; and that which came in entered when it began; as the learned Mr. Whiston in his late Chronology expounds the words of Josephus, p. 156.

Even they shall keep the watch of the house of the Lord about the king.] He adds two parts of those who had finished their course, and went off to go home into the country, whom he would have to stay at Jerusalem, and assist the rest beforenamed; especially in strengthening that part of the temple that lay towards the palace; or rather to be the king's guard, when he came out of his lodgings (where he was at present) into the court of the Lord's house.

Ver. 8. And ye shall compass the king round about, every man with his weapons in his hand: and he that cometh within the ranges, he shall be slain.] By the ranges is to be understood, if not the ranks of men that stood about the mountain of the house of the Lord, the ranks of trees that grew on either side of the causey, or the rails that were set on either side of it, for the stay and safety of those that passed upon it. (See Dr. Lightfoot in the same place.)

And be ye with the king as he goeth out, and as he cometh in.] When he went out to walk, or do any other thing; and when he returned to his apartment.

Ver. 9. And the captains of the hundreds did according to all that Jehoiada commanded: and they took every man his men that were to come in on the sabbath, with those that should go out on the sabbath, and came to Jehoiada the priest.] To shew they were all disposed according to his order.

Ver. 10. And to the captains of the hundreds did the priest give king David's spears and shields, that were in the house of the Lord.] They did not come armed into the temple, lest they should give any suspicion; but Johoiada furnished them with such weapons as the temple afforded; particularly with the spears and shields, which king David had used, and dedicated after all his wars as monuments of God's goodness to him; and perhaps several spears and shields of great men, which he had taken as spoils in his wars.

Ver. 11. And the guard stood, every man with his weapon in his hand, round about the king, from the right corner of the temple to the left corner of the temple, along by the altar and the temple.] The guard within the court mentioned ver. 7. stood from the south part of the temple towards the palace, to the north part of it, where the king lay hid, about the great altar of burnt-offering (which was at the east gate) and the sanctuary; and then the king was brought forth, and placed below the altar, that all might see him.

Ver. 12. And he brought out the king's son, and put the crown upon him, and gave him the testimony, and they made him king, and anointed him.] Having produced Joash, he put the crown on his head (which I suppose was kept in the sanctuary), and then put the book of the law into his hand, according to Deut. xvii. 18, 19. which is called the testimony, because God therein testified what he would have the king and them all do. And thereupon he declared him to be king of Israel, and then anointed him: which it was not necessary to do (and therefore he is said to be made king before it was done), being the son of a king, had not Athaliah disturbed the succession, and pretended to the kingdom. Therefore, to settle all things, he was anointed as Solomon and Jehu were. But there is a doubt what is meant by eduth, which we translate testimony; supposing it comes from the root, which signifies to testify. But there are those, particularly Forsterus, Avenarius, and others of greater note, who derive it from the Hebrew word adah, which signifies to clothe, put on, and adorn; and so take eduth for some royal ornament, which was a mark of kingly dignity: and that, it is probable, might be a bracelet which Jehoiada put upon the young king, together with the crown. This conjecture is countenanced by what we read of the Amalekite, who brought the bracelet on Saul's arm to David, as well as the crown that was on his head. (See Fortunatus Scacchus Myrothec. iii. cap. 41.)

And they clapped their hands, and said, God save the king!] The guards and the people (as the next verse explains it) testified their joy by clapping their hands and shouting, as they did at king's Solomon's coronation, (1 Kings i. 34. 39.) For clapping of hands was a token of joy, as appears by many places, (Psal. xlvii. 1. Isa. lv. 12.)

Ver. 13. And when Athaliah heard the noise of the guards, and of the people.] Who were now assembled to see their king.

She came to the people into the temple of the Lord.] Into the outward court where they were met together. And she seems in a great fright to have come alone, or but few attendants with her.

Ver. 14. And when she looked, behold, the king stood by a pillar, as the manner was.] Some of the Jews, and many great men among Christian writers, understand by this pillar the brazen scaffold which Solomon erected at the dedication of the temple, (2 Chron. vi. 13.) But the plainest meaning seems to me, that he stood by the post of the east gate in the inner court, where the station of the king was. Which Vitringa hath made probable, in his Synagoga Vet. p. 31, &c. where he observes, that the king alone entered at the east gate on the sabbath and the new moons; but on the other days at the south or north gate, where the people entered; which he gathers from Ezek. xlvi. 1, 2. He stood, I suppose, only to be better seen by the people; otherwise sitting was a posture of authority.

And the princes, and the trumpeters by the king; and all the people of the land rejoiced, and blew with trumpets.] This made her soon apprehend the danger she was in, as it here follows. For the people, when they saw their young king, expressed their joy, it is likely, in some such acclamations as the people of Rome made at the inauguration of Claudius, "Claudi Auguste, Principem te, aut qualis tu es semper Octavianus, te respublica requirebat, tu frater, tu pater, tu amicus, tu bonus senator, tu vero princeps," as Trebel. Pollio relates in his life. For though Joash had done nothing praiseworthy, being but a child; yet they rejoiced in the felicity which they promised themselves in his reign, under the government of such a man as Jehoiada.

And Athaliah rent her clothes, and cried, Treason, treason!] Adding, as Josephus relates, Take that boy and kill him; meaning Joash, in whose behalf this conspiracy, as she called it, was made against her. But she spake like a distracted woman, there being nobody on her side to execute any of her commands.

Ver. 15. And Jehoiada the priest commanded the captains of hundreds, and the officers of the host, and said unto them, Have her forth without the ranges.] Through which they had suffered her to come, being a queen, contrary to the order, ver. 8.

And him that followeth her kill with the sword.] If any body appeared to abet and rescue her, he commanded him to be slain.

For the priest had said, Let her not be slain in the house of the Lord.] From whence they dragged her, until they had brought her down to the bottom of the causey, and there they slew her.

Ver. 16. And they laid hands on her; and she went by the way by the which the horses came into the king's house: and there she was slain.] That is, saith the same author (chap. 5. sect. 2. of the Temple), they got her out of the mountain of the house, and brought her down the causey; and when she came near the horse-gate, through which the horses went up out of the stables of Millo, when the king had occasion for them, there they slew her.

By the which the horses came into the king's house.] There was another horse-gate in the main wall of the city, (Jer. xxxi. 39.) but that was distinct from this; which was peculiar to the king's horses: and therefore a distinctive character is set upon it, that it was the horse-gate towards the king's house, (2 Chron. xxiii. 15.) So it should be rendered, rather than by the king's house: for neither of these gates was near his house, but at a distance from it; and we may call this gate here spoken of, the back-way to the king's house at the stable-gate.

Ver. 17. And Jehoiada made a covenant between the Lord and the king and the people, that they should be the Lord's people.] He first takes care about religion, and engaged them in a solemn covenant to root out idolatry, and to restore the true worship of God, and continue in it.

Between the king also and the people.] That they should be his obedient subjects, and he should govern them by the law. This was directly agreeable to the apostolic precept, "Fear God, and honour the king."

Ver. 18. And all the people of the land went to the house of Baal, and brake it down; his altars and his images brake they in pieces thoroughly.] Accordingly they began immediately to make good their covenant, in destroying the worship of Baal: which had been introduced among the people of Judah by Jehoram, (viii. 18.) and was continued by Ahaziah, (ver. 27.)

And slew Mattan the priest of Baal before the altar.] To which it is possible he fled, as a place of refuge; or they dragged him hither to make him a victim to his god.

And the priest appointed officers over the house of the Lord.] Levites to keep the door, lest any one who was unclean should enter into it. (See more, 2 Chron. xxiii. 18, 19.)

Ver. 19. And he took the rulers over hundreds, and the captains of the guards, and the people of the land.] Brought them out of the temple, that they might conduct the king to his palace, as it here follows.

And they brought down the king from the house of the Lord, and came by the way of the gate of the guard to the king's house.] By that gate of the king's palace, where a guard was to be kept for his safety.

And he sat on the throne of the kings.] Which was the accomplishment of his inauguration.

Ver. 20. And all the people of the land rejoiced.] Applauding what Jehoiada had done.

And the city was in quiet.] Nobody appeared in defence of Athaliah.

And they slew Athaliah with the sword beside the king's house.] Not far from it: the people having so little kindness for her, that they suffered her to be slain without any opposition. In the Chronicles, indeed, the words are, the city was in quiet after that they had slain Athaliah, (2 Chron. xxii. 21.) Which may import there was some bustle before, when she was apprehended; but after her death there was no stir: nor do we read they were so much concerned for her as to bury her.

Ver. 21. Seven years old was Jehoash when he began to reign.] Being so very young, he was very unfit for so weighty a charge; but he was under the direction of so excellent a counsellor, that while Jehoiada lived, all things went well, and the nation was very happy, as we read in the next chapter. But that good man being dead, he was seduced by some greatmen about him to idolatry: (2 Chron. xxiv. 17, &c.) which shews him to have been a weak prince, who wanted judgment in things of greatest moment.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. IN the seventh year of Jehu, Jehoash began to reign; and forty years reigned he in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Zibiah of Beer-sheba.

Ver. 2. And Jehoash did that which was right in the sight of the Lord all his days wherein Jehoiada the priest instructed him.] This history shews of what advantage it is to have good instructors and counsellors about a king. For Jehoiada preserved Joash in good ways while he lived: but when he was dead, Joash changed his manners, and was persuaded by the flatteries of some of his courtiers to fall into idolatry; and he killed the son of this pious Jehoiada, who reproved him for it, (2 Chron. xxiv. 17. 21.)

Ver. 3. But the high places were not taken away: the people still sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places.] These private altars (on which they sacrificed to the true God), I observed before, were not removed by the best of their kings till the reign of Hezekiah. And this king was too young, and his authority too weak (though he had Jehoiada to assist him), to attempt to break such a long-continued custom, especially when some of the princes in their hearts were idolaters.

Ver. 4. And Jehoash said unto the priests.] The house of God being suffered to run to decay, in the time of Athaliah and her son; Joash, in gratitude to God, who had preserved him there, resolved to have it repaired; and, in order to it, commanded what money should be set apart for that purpose.

All the money of the dedicated things that is brought into the house of the Lord.] That had been, or should hereafter be brought and dedicated to the service of God and of the temple.

Even the money of every one that passeth the account.] This and the following money he commanded the priests and Levites to go through the kingdom, and gather it for the repair of the temple, as we are told, 2 Chron. xxiv. 5. They were not to expect till the people should bring it in, but go and gather it, every man of his acquaintance, where he knew it to be due. And so the foregoing words are to be translated, not that is brought, but to be brought into the house of the Lord. Which money arose three ways; the first is here mentioned, the money of every one that passeth (for the words the account are not in the Hebrew), which some understand of the offering which pious people of other nations made, who came to worship at Jerusalem: (1 Kings viii. 41.) or rather, of those who were come to twenty years of age, and being past that, were to pay half a shekel. This had been much neglected in the time of Athaliah (as the Jewish doctors think), but now being carefully gathered, there was enough to maintain the daily sacrifice (which was supported out of this money), and to carry on also the reparation of the temple. Though Abarbinel thinks it was wholly applied to the reparation; and the people voluntarily offered for the maintaining of the daily morning and evening sacrifice.

The money that every man is set at.] This was the second way: by the money that every man who had vowed himself to God, was to pay, by the estimation that the priest should make for his redemption; according to that law, Lev. xxviii. 2, 3. For so the words are here in the Hebrew, the money of a man whose taxation is the money of his soul: that is, who is taxed such a sum of money, whereby his soul might be freed from the vow wherewith he had bound himself. For till this money was paid, his life was not his own, but God's.

And all the money that cometh into any man's heart to bring into the house of the Lord.] This was the third sort of money for the reparation of the temple; that which any man would give freely for that service which they were to receive of them.

Ver. 5. Let the priests take it to them, every man of his acquaintance, and let them repair the breaches of the house, wheresoever any breach shall be found.] This money, thus collected, he entrusted with the priests, and commanded them to see it employed to the use for which it was given.

Ver. 6. And it was so, that in the three-and-twentieth year of king Jehoash, the priests had not repaired the breaches of the house.] They were both dilatory and careless in gathering the money, (2 Chron. xxiv. 5.) and did not bring in what they had gathered to begin the work. Whereupon the king revoked his former order, and entrusted other men (as it here follows) with this work. Thus are things seldom done well, that are committed to the care of many.

Ver. 7. Then king Jehoash called Jehoiada the priest, and the other priests, and said unto them, Why repair ye not the breaches of the house? Now therefore receive no more money of your acquaintance, but deliver it for the breaches of the house.] He ordered two things; first, that they should gather no more money of the people; and secondly, that they should not have the care of seeing the temple repaired; but pay what had been gathered into other hands.

Ver. 8. And the priests consented to receive no more money of the people, neither to repair the breaches of the house.] They submitted to the king's new orders, and wholly committed the business to those whom he thought fit to employ.

Ver. 9. But Jehoiada the priest took a chest.] By the king's order, (2 Chron. xxiv. 8.)

And bored a hole in the lid of it, and set it beside the altar, on the right side as one cometh into the house of the Lord.] On the right side of the gate that went into the court of the priests: not far from the altar which was within the court, as appears from 2 Chron. xxiv. 8. Dr. Lightfoot thinks these two texts do not relate to the same time. For at the first the chest was set in the very court of the priests near to the altar, as it is here said in this place: so that the money still passed through the priests' fingers; who took it of the people and put it into the chest which was in their court, where the people could not come at it. But the money not coming in so fast as was expected this way; he removed the chest, or made another, and set it without the court, at the entrance of it, where every one might have access unto it. And he proclaimed through all the country they should bring in their money thither: which came in so plentifully, that there was enough for the repair of the house, and for other uses also.

And the priests that kept the door put therein all the money brought into the house of the Lord.] There was a proclamation made, that all the people should bring in their half-shekel, which Moses commanded every one of such an age to pay: and they brought it to the priests who stood at the door that let into their court, and saw them put it into the chest, (2 Chron. xxiv. 9.)

Ver. 10. And it was so, when they saw there was much money in the chest, that the king's scribe and the high-priest came up, and they put up in bags, and told the money that was found in the house of the Lord.] The high-priest would have a witness of his actions, lest he should be suspected of any fraud, as perhaps others had been; and would not open the chest without the assistance of the king's secretary of state; nor would he open it in the temple, but had it brought by the Levites into the king's office; and there the secretary and the high-priest, or any officer of his, emptied the chest, and told the money, and then put it up in bags, which it is likely they sealed; and then they sent the chest into its place again. This they did every day, as we read 2 Chron. xxiv. 11.

Ver. 11. And they gave the money, being told, into the hands of them that did the work, and had the oversight of the house of the Lord.] These bags of money were delivered (by the king and Jehoiada, 2 Chron. xxiv. 12.) not to the priests, whom the king had found tardy, and perhaps faulty, in converting the money to their own uses; but to some select persons, who had this peculiar business committed to them, to see the reparation, and to employ good workmen, and to pay them their wages.

And they laid it out to the carpenters and builders that wrought upon the house of the Lord.] To buy materials for the work, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 12. And to masons, and hewers of stone, and to buy timber and hewed stone to repair the breaches of the house of the Lord, and for all that was laid out for the house to repair it.] For all other things, of what kind soever they were, which they found necessary for the reparation.

Ver. 13. Howbeit, there were not made for the house of the Lord bowls of silver, snuffers, basons, trumpets, any vessels of gold, or vessels of silver, of the money that was brought into the house of the Lord.] Though these were wanting, yet the money was limited to the reparations of the house; and the king ordered that no vessel of any sort should be bought for the temple, till the temple itself was put into a good condition. So the LXX. render it, there shall none be made for the house any vessels, &c. (that is, he commanded there should be none made), but all given to the forenamed workmen, as long as there needed any reparations. So it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 14. But they gave that to the workmen, and repaired therewith the house of the Lord.] The masons and carpenters, and such-like workmen, had all the money, to be laid out according to their discretion, upon the reparation of the temple alone, till the work was finished. And then they gave an account of what money remained in their hands, and that was laid out to purchase such vessels as are before mentioned, for the service of the temple, (2 Chron. xxiv. 14.)

Ver. 15. Moreover, they reckoned not with the men into whose hands they delivered the money to be bestowed on workmen; for they dealt faithfully.] They were so confident of the honesty of the overseers, that they took no account of the money they had paid the workmen; who were also men of such clear reputation, that what they laid out was not questioned. This was a rare example of fidelity in managing the public money; and there was one man in Greece, Aristides, who was so trusty in the opinion of all the people.

Ver. 16. The trespass-money and the sin-money was not brought into the house of the Lord: it was the priests'.] This money was not applied to the aforesaid use; but put into the hands of the priests, that sacrifices for trespasses and sins might be offered for those that gave it.

Ver. 17. Then Hazael king of Syria went up and fought against Gath, and took it.] This was a city of the Philistines, but taken by king David, and added to the dominions of Israel, (2 Sam. viii. 1. 1 Chron. xviii. 1.) and now taken from them by Hazael.

And Hazael set his face to go up to Jerusalem.] Having made himself master of this place, he plainly declared, by the disposition of his affairs, that he intended to make an attempt upon Jerusalem. This fell out after Jehoash had forsaken God, and fallen to idolatry; as appears by the book of the Chronicles; where a much different relation is made of the expedition of the Syrians. Insomuch that Abarbinel thinks (which is approved by several Christian writers) there were two expeditions. In the first of which Hazael came up in person against them, as is here related; but they purchased peace of him: and then in the end of the year, after they had killed Zachariah, the war was renewed; though Hazael did not come himself, but sent a small army, which they were not able to oppose, which destroyed a great many of the people, and sent great spoils to Damascus, (2 Chron. xxiv. 23. 25.)

Ver. 18. And Jehoash king of Judah took all the hallowed things that Jehoshaphat, and Jehoram, and Ahaziah, his fathers, kings of Judah, had dedicated, and his own hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the house of the Lord, and in the king's house, and sent it to Hazael king of Syria; and he went away from Jerusalem.] The preservation of his kingdom, he thought, warranted this; but he had brought these dangers upon himself by his apostacy from God.

Ver. 19. And the rest of the acts of Joash, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?

Ver. 20. And his servants arose, and made a conspiracy, and slew Joash in the house of Millo, which goeth down to Silla.] The Syrians had left him labouring under great diseases at this place called Millo: where his servants slew him in his bed, as we read 2 Chron. xxiv. 25. There was another place called Millo, hard by the king's palace at Jerusalem: therefore, to distinguish this from that, this is called Millo that goeth down to Silla; as Abarbinel thinks.

Ver. 21. For Jozachar the son of Shimeath.] He was called by another name also, viz. Zabad.

And Jehozabad the son of Shomer.] This was his father's name, it is likely, and his mother was called Shimrith, who was a Moabitess; as Shimeath was an Ammonitess, (2 Chron. xxiv. 26.)

His servants, smote him, and he died.] They were friends of Jehoiada (as Josephus thinks), who took this revenge upon Joash, for the death of Zachariah the son of Jehoiada, as is expressly noted, 2 Chron. xxiv. 25.

And they buried him with his fathers in the city of David.] But not in the sepulchre of the kings, (2 Chron. xxiv. 25.) For though they did him so much honour as to bury him in the royal city, yet not all the honour that was usual; because he had forsaken God, and slain one of his prophets.

And Amaziah his son reigned in his stead.] His servants did not kill him, with an intention to usurp the kingdom: but only to revenge the blood of Zachariah. For they suffered his son to succeed Joash peaceably, who slew those that had slain his father, (2 Chron. xxv. 3.)

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. IN the three-and-twentieth year of Joash the son of Ahaziah king of Judah, Jehoahaz the son of Jehu began to reign over Israel in Samaria, and reigned seventeen years.] Some have raised a doubt about this account, because Joash began to reign in the seventh year of Jehu, (xii. 2.) who reigned but twenty-eight years; (x. 36.) from whence if seven years be deducted, there remains no more than one-and-twenty, not three-and-twenty years, as is here said. To which Kimchi and Abarbinel answer, There were two incomplete years: for when it is said Joash reigned in the seventh year of Jehu, it must be understood of the beginning of his seventh year; and in like manner, when he speaks here of the three-and-twentieth year of Joash, it must be understood of the beginning of the same year. And so they are called three-and-twenty, when they were but one-and-twenty perfect years. But it is better to say (as my worthy friend Dr. Alix thinks) that there was an interregnum of a year between the death of Jehu and the first of Jehoahaz.

Ver. 2. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, and followed the sins of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin; he departed not therefrom.] Was not reclaimed by the severe punishments God inflicted on him.

Ver. 3. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel; and he delivered them into the hand of Hazael king of Syria, and Ben-hadad the son of Hazael, all their days.] The word their is not in the Hebrew; so that it may be translated all his days, as it is explained ver. 22.

Ver. 4. And Jehoahaz besought the Lord, and the Lord hearkened unto him.] Not for his sake, but for the sake of the pious ancestors of this people, with whom he had made a covenant of great mercy to be shewed to their posterity; which in their great distress he now afforded them. (See ver. 23.)

For he saw the oppression of Israel, because the king of Syria oppressed them.] Intending their utter ruin, which God would not yet permit, but bear longer with them.

Ver. 5. (And God gave Israel a saviour, so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians.] Some understand by this saviour, an extraordinary captain, whom God raised up to fight their battles with great success. But it being said, that while Hazael lived he oppressed them, (ver. 22.) it is more reasonable to understand by this saviour, the son of Jehoahaz; who, when Hazael was dead, delivered them from their bondage, (ver. 25.) And, perhaps, he did this in his father's lifetime, who made him joint sovereign with himself.

And the children of Israel dwelt in their tents, as aforetime.] They lived quietly and securely, not only in their fortified towns, but in the villages and the fields.

Ver. 6. Nevertheless, they departed not from the sins of the house of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin, but walked therein.] Neither their miseries, nor God's mercies to them, made any alteration in them; but they continued in those sins which had ruined the house of Jeroboam, and many of his successors.

And there remained the grove also in Samaria).] We read of a grove which Ahab planted in honour of Baal, 1 Kings xvi. 33. But his worship being utterly destroyed by Jehu, I cannot but think that he cut down that grove: and therefore the grove here mentioned had in it the image of some other god.

Ver. 7. Neither did he leave of the people to Jehoahaz but fifty horsemen, and ten chariots.] With the men belonging to them.

And ten thousand footmen.] This explains what he means by the people in the foregoing words; not all the people of Israel, but the soldiers, or men of war; of which there were no more left than this small number.

For the king of Syria had destroyed them.] God left them in his hand to make this destruction among them, killing some, and carrying others captive.

And had made them like the dust by thrashing.] By perpetual wars and captivities; which made very great depopulations.

Ver. 8. Now the rest of the acts of Jehoahaz, and all that he did, and his might, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?] The judgments of God upon him were the most remarkable, because he was a man of might: and was so far from being able to stand before the Syrians, that they beat him to dust.

Ver. 9. And Jehoahaz slept with his fathers, and they buried him in Samaria, and Joash his son reigned in his stead.] Called in the next verse Jehoash.

Ver. 10. In the thirty-seventh year of Joash king of Judah began Jehoash the son of Jehoahaz to reign over Israel in Samaria, and reigned sixteen years.] A difficulty seems to arise, by comparing this verse with the first: where it is said, Jehoahaz king of Israel began to reign in the twenty-third year of Joash king of Judah, and reigned seventeen years: from whence it follows, that Jehoash began to reign not in the thirty-seventh, but in the thirty-ninth, or fortieth year of Joash king of Judah. But this only shews the truth of what I said upon ver. 5. that he reigned with his father three years: after God was so gracious as to raise up a deliverer to them; who was this son of his, by whom peace was restored to them. This we note in the margin, he reigned in concert with his father, (xiv. 1.)

Ver. 11. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord; he departed not from all the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin: but he walked therein.

Ver. 12. And the rest of the acts of Joash, and all that he did, and his might wherewith he fought against Amaziah king of Judah, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?] They were all recorded in the book so often mentioned; (see 1 Kings xi. 41.) and his fight with Amaziah is particularly related, and set down at large, in 2 Chron. xxv. 17, 18, &c.

Ver. 13. And Joash slept with his fathers, and Jeroboam sat upon his throne.] From whence some of the Jewish doctors gather, that he reigned with his father at least one year; though Abarbinel denies it, but without reason.

And Joash was buried in Samaria with the kings of Israel.] He doth not here conclude this history of Joash; for he afterward relates great things done by him. But being to speak of the death of Elisha, upon which those things depended, he interposes that before he proceeds further to relate his acts.

Ver. 14. Now Elisha was fallen sick of his sickness whereof he died.] This was in the tenth year of Joash, as they say in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 19. and from thence gather how long Elisha continued a prophet in Israel, viz. from the nineteenth year of Jehoshaphat till this time; which was sixty-five years.

And Joash the king of Israel came down unto him, and wept over his face.] This was no sign of his hearty affection to him (for he would not hearken to his word), but he bewailed himself, and his people, who were in danger shortly to lose so great a defender.

And said, My father, my father, the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!] They are the words of Elisha concerning Elijah, when he was taken up to heaven, (ii. 12.) signifying the great authority he had maintained among them (which is included in the word father), and that by his counsel and prayers they had obtained glorious victories over their enemies.

Ver. 15. And Elisha said unto him, Take bow and arrows: and he took unto him bow and arrows.] This was to represent the wars he was to have with the Syrians.

Ver. 16. And he said to the king of Israel, Put thy hand upon the bow; and he put his hand upon it: and Elisha put his hands upon the king's hands.] This was to represent that they were not to trust in their arms, and their valour; but in God alone, who would give them the victory.

Ver. 17. And he said, Open the window eastward. And he opened it.] Part of Syria lay east or north-east from Judea: and the Syrians also had possessed themselves of all the land of Israel eastward; (x. 33.) from whence he signified, by what follows, Joash should expel them.

Then Elisha said, Shoot: and he shot. And he said, The arrow of the Lord's deliverance, the arrow of deliverance from Syria.] A sign the Lord would wound the Syrians by the arms of the Israelites, and give them a glorious deliverance from their tyranny.

For thou shalt smite the Syrians in Aphek.] In the territories belonging to it, (of which, see 1 Sam. iv. 1. xxix. 1.) The Syrians had taken Gath; and Aphek, I take it, was not far from it: so that it was as much as to say, they should drive them out of the country; as it follows.

Till thou hast destroyed them.] Not all the people of Syria, but all their forces wherewith they infested Israel.

Ver. 18. And he said, Take the arrows: and he took them. And he said unto the king of Israel, Smite upon the ground: and he smote thrice, and stayed.] That which he represented before by the shooting of an arrow, he represents again by smiting upon the ground with the arrows; viz. victory over the Syrians, whom he should overthrow and cast down to the ground in battle.

Ver. 19. And the man of God was wroth with him, and said, Thou shouldest have smitten five or six times, then shouldest thou have smitten Syria till thou hadst consumed them: whereas now thou shalt smite Syria but thrice.] By the former sign the king of Israel might have understood that this was intended to signify the same thing; and I suppose the prophet spake so, as to give him to understand he would have him smite a good many times. And he was angry at his sloth and unbelief, which made him stop at the third stroke; for if he had done it oftener, he should have utterly disabled them. He had before represented great victories which he should obtain; but not till now, how often he should overcome; which he was admonished by God to let him know by this sign. And it is probable the prophet himself did not know, till he saw how often he smote on the ground.

Ver. 20. And Elisha died, and they buried him: and the bands of the Moabites invaded the land at the coming in of the year.] Which was the usual time when people went out to war, as I have shewn upon 2 Sam. xi. 1. (see there); but whether it was the next spring after his death, or some years after, is doubted: but the words seem plainly to import it was the next spring.

Ver. 21. And it came to pass, as they were burying a man.] Carrying him to his grave.

They spied a band of men.] A party of the Moabites, who were coming towards the place where they were to lay the corpse.

And they cast him into the sepulchre of Elisha.] Which being near to the place where they then were, they rolled away the stone, and laid the body by Elisha's; for fear, if they proceeded to the sepulchre prepared for this man, they should fall into the hands of the Moabites.

And when the man was let down, and touched the bones of Elisha.] From hence some conclude, that this invasion of the Moabites was some years after Elisha's death; when his flesh was consumed, and only his bones remained.

That he revived, and stood upon his feet.] By which miracle God did the highest honour to his prophet, and confirmed both the truth of what he had promised the king, and the belief of a future life. For this was something more than he had done in Elisha's lifetime, when he could not without many prayers, and stretching himself with great application upon the body of the child, raise it to life again; whereas now, upon touching of his dead body only, God restored a man, in an instant, to perfect health; for he stood upon his feet, and, it is likely, walked home with those that brought him to be buried. It is a poor conceit of Abarbinel and others, that he was a wicked man, whom God rather would raise to life again, than suffer his dead body to rest by such a holy person as Elisha. It had been enough, if this had been the reason, to have thrown this dead body out of Elisha's sepulchre, and let it lie upon the ground.

Ver. 22. But Hazael king of Syria oppressed Israel all the days of Jehoahaz.] None of these things which Elisha promised were accomplished while Hazael lived; but after his death, Joash the son of Jehoahaz (as it here follows) vanquished Ben-hadad the son of Hazael.

Ver. 23. And the Lord was gracious unto them, and had compassion upon them, and respect unto them, because of his covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.] For whose sake he spared them, and would not let the oppression of the Syrians continue so long as to ruin them.

And would not destroy them, neither cast he them out of his presence as yet.] But allowed them a longer space for repentance.

Ver. 24. So Hazael king of Syria died, and Ben-hadad his son reigned in his stead.] The name of Ben-hadad had for a long time been common to the kings of Syria, and now was renewed in another family.

Ver. 25. And Joash the son of Jehoahaz took again, out of the hand of Ben-hadad the son of Hazael, the cities which he had taken out of the hand of Jehoahaz his father by war.] He took all the country on the other side of Jordan in the days of Jehu; (x. 33.) besides which he made further conquests on this side Jordan, in the days of Jehoahaz: whether Jehoash recovered all is not certain; but what his father lost, it is here said he regained.

Three times did Joash beat him, and recovered the cities of Israel.] It is not recorded where these three battles were fought; but the success of them was so great, that he retook all that his father had lost.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. IN the second year of Joash the son of Jehoahaz king of Israel, reigned Amaziah the son of Joash king of Judah.] This was, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, the thirty-eighth year of his father Joash king of Judah; three years current before his death. For his father had thrown himself into such a miserable condition by his apostacy, and his murder of Zachariah, (xii. 17, 18.) that he was become unfit to manage the kingdom. (See Harm. of the Evang. Proleg. cap. 6.)

Ver. 2. He was twenty-five years old when he began to reign, and reigned twenty-nine years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Jehoaddan of Jerusalem.] Joash king of Israel reigned sixteen years, (xiii. 10.) therefore Amaziah reigned fourteen years while he lived, and after his death fifteen years; which make twenty-nine. (See ver. 17.)

Ver. 3. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, yet not like David his father: he did in all things according as Joash his father did.] For both of them in the beginning of their reigns did very well; but both in their latter end fell into idolatry. Both of them also, as Abarbinel observes, contemned God's prophets, who spake to them in the name of the Lord.

Ver. 4. Howbeit the high places were not taken away; for yet the people did sacrifice and burn incense on the high places.] Even in the best part of his reign, before he fell to idolatry, this licence continued, which had been long practised against the law of God. In this he imitated his father, (xii. 3.)

Ver. 5. And it came to pass, when the kingdom was confirmed in his hand, that he slew his servants which had slain the king his father.] He durst not venture upon this piece of justice presently, till he was well settled in his authority, and had divested those of all power who were the friends of those murderers. Who seem to have continued still at court, for they are called his servants.

Ver. 6. But the children of the murderers slew he not: according to that which is written in the book of the law of Moses, wherein the Lord commanded, saying, The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, nor the children for the fathers; but every man shall be put to death for his own sin.] In this he acted like a good man, and was not moved to cut off the children, contrary to law, for fear they should make a faction against him, and take revenge for their father's death.

Ver. 7. He slew of Edom.] He alone, and the men of Judah, made the following slaughter: having, at the command of a prophet, abandoned the help of the Israelites, though he had purchased it with a great sum of money; (2 Chron. xxv. 7—10.) the Edomites had revolted from Judah in the days of Joram, (viii. 10.) and now Amaziah endeavours to reduce them.

In the valley of Salt.] A place mentioned 2 Sam. viii. 13. where see what I have observed concerning the reason of this name.

Ten thousand.] And he took as many captives. (See 2 Chron. xxv. 12.)

And he took Selah by war.] The metropolis of Arabia Petræa; which took its name from hence: for Selah is the same with the word Petra, a rock; upon which the city stood. From this rock he seems to have thrown down the ten thousand whom he took alive, and broke in pieces, as is said in the forenamed place, 2 Chron. xxv. 12. Hagar signifies the same, as Bochartus observes, by which name the Arabians called it, from the rocky mountain which hung over this place, which St. Paul calls by the Arabic name Hagar.

And called the name of it Joktheel unto this day.] Which name imports, obedience of God, or to God: because, having taken it, he settled, as some imagine, the laws and statutes of Moses in this place; or rather, he acknowledged, by giving it this name, that the possession of this place was a reward of his obedience to the man of God, who required him to dismiss all the forces he had hired of the Israelites, (2 Chron. xxv. 10.)

Ver. 8. Then Amaziah king of Judah sent a messenger to Jehoash, king of Israel, saying, Come, let us look one another in the face.] Being flushed with his great victory over the Edomites, and incensed by the damages the Israelites had done him, (2 Chron. xxv. 13.) he sent this challenge to the king of Israel, saying, Let us set our armies in battle-array one against the other, and try our strength. Which some think he did only to try their military skill and prowess; not to revenge injuries, or get his own again. Which, if he had intended, he would have assaulted the Israelites on a sudden; and not given them such a fair warning to stand upon their defence. But it is more probable, that, being encouraged, as I said, by his late victory, he resolved to be revenged for the slaughter of his ancestors by Jehu, (chap. ix.) and for the late spoil the Israelites had made in his country; (2 Chron. xxv. 10. 13.) but he resolved to have satisfaction in a fair and honourable way, and not by surprise. And the words may be thus understood: Either give me satisfaction, or let us try it out in a battle. It is probable, also, he might think of conquering the kingdom of Israel, if he did not satisfy him, and bring it back to the house of David: for so Jehoash understood him, as Josephus thinks, and the sequel shews.

Ver. 9. And Jehoash king of Israel sent to Amaziah king of Judah, saying, The thistle that was in Lebanon sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon.] He compares himself to a cedar, and Amaziah to a thistle; which is a poor shrub, not worthy of that name; but having drawn blood on some poor traveller, and sorely afflicted him (as Amaziah had done the Edomites), grew very proud, and would be no longer one of the shrubs, but equal to the most goodly trees.

Saying, Give me thy daughter to my son to wife.] Make an affinity with me, and let us be one kingdom. So some understand it, that Jehoash thought he would have him join his great kingdom, which was ten tribes, unto his poor one of two tribes; that, being united, there should be but one king over them all; and they should try their fortune in a pitched battle, which of them two should be the king. But this seems to be too much strained. He only intimates, that if he should desire a friendly alliance with him, he despised it as below him, as much as a thistle is below a cedar.

And there passed by a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trod down the thistle.] This represents how easily his soldiers (who are compared to wild beasts) would repress his insolence.

Ver. 10. Thou hast indeed smitten the Edomites, and thine heart hath lifted thee up.] This hath made thee proud.

Glory in this, and tarry at home.] Be content with the honour thou hast won, and be quiet.

For why shouldest thou meddle to thy hurt, that thou shouldest fall, even thou, and Judah with thee?] He admonishes him to desist from this needless provocation of his neighbours; which might end in his ruin.

Ver. 11. But Amaziah would not hearken: therefore Jehoash king of Israel went up, and he and Amaziah looked one another in the face.] Encountered one another in a fight.

At Beth-shemesh, which belongeth to Judah.] See 1 Sam. vi. 12.

Ver. 12. And Judah was put to the worse before Israel, and they fled every man to their tents.] So their houses were called, from their having no other habitations for a long time in the wilderness; and in Canaan many continued in such dwellings. Josephus saith, the people of Judah did not strike a stroke; but being possessed with a panic fear, when they saw a formidable army set in battle-array against them, ran away.

Ver. 13. And Jehoash king of Israel took Amaziah king of Judah, the son of Jehoash the son of Ahaziah, at Beth-shemesh.] I suppose his ancestors are mentioned to shew that this was the greater disgrace to him; being descended from a race of kings, which Jehoash was not.

And came to Jerusalem.] Bringing Amaziah with him; and letting the inhabitants know (as Josephus saith) that he would slay him before their eyes, if they did not immediately open their gates unto him; which was accordingly done.

And broke down the wall of Jerusalem, from the gate of Ephraim unto the corner gate, four hundred cubits.] That the city might lie open to his invasion, if they should break the conditions he imposed upon them.

Ver. 14. And he took all the gold and silver, and all the vessels that were found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king's house, and hostages.] The sons, I suppose, of the principal persons of the city, for a security that they would be quiet, and give him no disturbance.

And returned to Samaria.] For he had enough to do to defend himself from the Syrians; and therefore did not intend a conquest of the kingdom of Judah, nor set a garrison in Jerusalem: but contented himself with the spoil of it; and perhaps made them tributaries to him. This was a heavy punishment upon Amaziah for going after other gods, (2 Chron. xxv. 20.)

Ver. 15. Now the rest of the acts of Jehoash which he did, and his might, and how he fought with Amaziah king of Judah, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?] There were many other things which happened in this war, as Abarbinel observes, besides these here compendiously related; for which he refers to a record which was very well known in those days, but now is lost.

Ver. 16. And Jehoash slept with his fathers, and was buried in Samaria with the kings of Israel, and Jeroboam his son reigned in his stead.

Ver. 17. And Amaziah the son of Joash king of Judah, lived after the death of Jehoash, the son of Jehoahaz king of Israel, fifteen years.] But in no great credit with his people; for Rasi thinks he lived most of his time in Lachish, whither he was forced to fly (as it follows), by reason of a conspiracy against him in Jerusalem.

Ver. 18. And the rest of the acts of Amaziah, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] He mentions nothing of his might which he shewed; being a weak prince, who lost the reputation of his country.

Ver. 19. Now they made a conspiracy against him in Jerusalem.] Their city having been exposed to reproach by the great breach made in their wall, and spoiled of its best ornaments, and some of their children carried away as hostages for their good behaviour, he became very odious to the great men of the city; all this being brought upon them by his pride, and rashness, and apostacy from God, (xxv. 27.)

And he fled to Lachish.] The conspiracy, it seems, grew so strong, that he could not resist it; but was forced to seek for safety by flight, in a fortified city upon the borders of the Philistines.

But they sent after him to Lachish, and slew him there.] They sent to have him privately murdered (as Josephus reports it), which some undertook and effected.

Ver. 20. And they brought him on horses.] In a chariot.

And they buried him in Jerusalem with his fathers in the city of David.] They did him some honour when he was dead, though they hated him when he was alive.

Ver. 21. And all the people of Judah took Azariah.] Called Uzziah in the next chapter, ver. 30. and in 2 Chron. xxvi. 1. Both signify the same thing; one being as much as the help of God, the other the strength of God.

(Which was sixteen years old), and made him king instead of his father Amaziah.] But this was twelve years after Amaziah's death: for he was made king in the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam, (see upon xv. 1.) who began to reign in the fifteenth of Amaziah, (ver. 23.)

Ver. 22. He built Elath.] Repaired it.

And restored it to Judah.] It was a city belonging to Edom, (Deut. ii. 8. 2 Chron. viii. 17.) which king David, I suppose, took when he conquered this country; but in the days of Joram the Edomites revolted, and recovered Elath.

After that the king slept with his fathers.] It is a probable opinion of Abarbinel, that the king his father, after the great slaughter of the Edomites, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, took this place; but did not annex it to the kingdom of Judah, by reason of his succeeding troubles. Which Azariah did, by building a wall about it, and fortifying it; whereby he secured the possession of it.

Ver. 23. In the fifteenth year of Amaziah king of Judah, Jeroboam the son of Joash king of Israel began to reign in Samaria, and reigned forty and one years.] Which was much longer than any of the kings of Israel: Jehu himself, the first of his family, reigning but twenty-eight years, which was longer than any before him, as I observed, x. 36.

Ver. 24. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord: he departed not from all the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.] As he had the name, so he trod in the steps of him who first corrupted Israel with idolatry.

Ver. 25. He restored the coast of Israel, from the entering of Hamath to the sea of the plain.] As Joash his father had restored many cities which Ben-hadad had taken; so Jeroboam restored a large territory which other kings had taken from them; viz. all the country from Libanus on the north, to the lake Asphaltites on the south.

According to the word of the Lord God of Israel, which he spake by the hand of his servant Jonah, the son of Amittai, the prophet, which was of Gath-hepher.] The prophet Jonah encouraged them to this war, promising them success in it. Whose words are not here set down; but this place shews that God was very merciful to them, though a very wicked people, still in continuing prophets among them, when Elisha was dead. And this prophet, the Jews fancy, was the son of the woman of Sarepta, whom Elijah raised from the dead. For which I cannot find they have any ground, but this poor conceit, that he is called the son of Amittai, i. e. of truth, say they: because his mother said to the prophet, when he restored her son to her, Now I know the word of God in thy mouth is truth, (1 Kings xvii. 24.) But this is fully confuted from this single observation, that he is said to be of Gath-hepher, which was far from Sarepta, towards Tiberias in the tribe of Zebulun, as St. Jerome tells us.

Ver. 26. For the Lord saw the affliction of Israel, that it was very bitter.] He shewed them this favour, not for any goodness that was in them; but in compassion to their misery, which was greater than could be expressed.

For there was not any shut up, nor any left.] Men of all sorts were destroyed: or, as some interpret it, they had lost all they had in their houses, and all that was in the field. But see of this phrase, 1 Kings xiv. 10. xxi. 21.

Nor any helper for Israel.] None to relieve, much less to deliver them.

Ver. 27. And the Lord said not that he would blot out the name of Israel from under heaven: but he saved them by the hand of Jeroboam the son of Joash.] But since the Lord had not yet decreed to root them out of their own land; therefore he saved them, even by this wicked prince, for the present, from their enemies; who would otherwise have made an utter end of them.

Ver. 28. Now the rest of the acts of Jeroboam, and all that he did, and his might, how he warred, and how he recovered Damascus, and Hamath, which belonged to Judah, for Israel, &c.] Or rather, by Israel, as Abarbinel expounds it; by the hand or power of Israel they were restored. For when David fought against the Syrians, and brought them in subjection to him, he put garrisons into Damascus and Hamath, (2 Sam. viii. 6, &c.) Which the Syrians afterward recovered when they rebelled against Judah: but Jeroboam possessed himself of them again, and by his valour made them as subject to Israel as they had been to Judah.

Ver. 29. And Jeroboam slept with his fathers, even with the kings of Israel; and Zachariah his son reigned in his stead.] He was the third king of Israel of Jehu's race, and so might be said to sleep with his fathers of Israel.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. IN the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam king of Israel, began Azariah son of Amaziah king of Judah to reign.] Here is a great difficulty, in the solving of which interpreters much vary: for Amaziah the father of Azariah lived but fifteen years after the beginning of Jeroboam's reign; (xiv. 17.) therefore Azariah began his reign, not in the twenty-seventh, but in the beginning of the seventeenth of Jeroboam. Some think Jeroboam reigned with his father eleven years: others, that there was an interregnum: that is, the throne was vacant eleven, or rather twelve years, between the death of Amaziah and the inauguration of Azariah. Dr. Lightfoot makes no doubt of the truth of this: that Azariah being but sixteen years old in the seven-and-twentieth of Jeroboam, he was but four years old at his father's death; and the throne being empty for eleven or twelve years, the government was managed by some of the grandees in his minority. But Ralbag will have these twenty-seven years of Jeroboam not to be those which were past, but those which were to come; and the meaning is, Azariah was made king when Jeroboam had yet twenty-seven years to reign; before the family of Jehu came to an end. For after this Jeroboam reigned twenty-six years, and his son six months; which make twenty-seven imperfect years. This Abarbinel thinks is the literal sense: but the other is more agreeable to the constant account of the reigns of other kings. (See Mr. Whiston, in his late View of the Chronology of the Old Testament, p. 91.)

Ver. 2. Sixteen years old was he when he began to reign, and he reigned fifty-two years in Jerusalem; and his mother's name was Jecholiah of Jerusalem.] In which time, which was longer than any king of Judah or Israel reigned, he did many great things; which are recorded in 2 Chron. xxvi. from ver. 5. to 16.

Ver. 3. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, according to all that Amaziah his father had done.] He governed well in the former part of his reign, and was prospered by God; (2 Chron. xxvi. 5.) but offended in the latter end of it, as Amaziah his father had done.

Ver. 4. Save that the high places were not removed: the people sacrificed and offered incense still on the high places.] Which was a common error (as I have often observed) which continued through the reign of the best of their kings, till the time of Hezekiah.

Ver. 5. And the Lord smote the king, so that he was a leper to the day of his death, and he dwelt in a several house.] The cause of this stroke is related at large in 2 Chron. xxvi. 16, &c. And by a several house the Jews understand a house in the country, which was domus libera: where he might have liberty to take his pleasure, but not to meddle with public affairs.

And Jotham the king's son was over the house, judging the people of the land.] Over the king's house, as it is in 2 Chron. xxvi. 23. That is, he lived in the palace, and managed all the affairs of the court, and of the kingdom. This was in the seven-and-twentieth year of Azariah, when he was smote with the leprosy (as Rasi makes account), and he continued a leper twenty-five years, during which time Jotham took upon him the administration of the government, his father being incapable of it.

Ver. 6. And the rest of the acts of Azariah, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?

Ver. 7. So Azariah slept with his fathers; and they buried him with his fathers in the city of David; and Jotham his son reigned in his stead.] He was not buried in the very city of David, but in the field of the burial which belonged to the kings, (2 Chron. xxvi. 23.) In which field, it is probable, the sepulchre of the kings was: wherein they would not bury Azariah, because he was a leper; but yet very near to the sepulchre, where his ancestors lay interred.

Ver. 8. In the thirty-eighth year of Azariah king of Judah did Zachariah the son of Jeroboam reign over Israel in Samaria six months.] Some are confident the throne was vacant two-and-twenty years between the death of Jeroboam and the inauguration of his son; either through wars from abroad (which Jeroboam might have provoked against his house, by the conquest of Hamath and Damascus), or through war at home, which appears, they think, from this disastrous end of Zachariah, ver. 10. (See Dr. Lightfoot, in his Prolegomena to his Harmony of the Evangelists, sect. 6.) But there are few that follow this opinion, though one most learned in these, as well as other things (Dr. Alix), thinks there was an interregnum of twenty-four years. If there be any difficulty in this account, most think it is sufficiently solved, by saying, that it was the thirty-eighth year, from the time that Azariah began to reign with his father.

Ver. 9. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, as his fathers had done: he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.] Therefore God cut him off speedily; the time approaching, when he intended to put an end to the kingdom of Israel.

Ver. 10. And Shallum the son of Jabesh conspired against him, and smote him before the people, and slew him, and reigned in his stead.] It is uncertain who this Shallum was, or what was the pretence of his conspiracy, and of his possessing himself of the throne; but it is pretty plain, I think, that he laid his treason privately and secret, (ver. 15.) and then made an open assault upon the king's person in the face of all the people.

Ver. 11. And the rest of the acts of Zachariah, behold, they are written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel.] We read of nothing that he did; therefore the meaning is, that his behaviour in the six months' time wherein he reigned, how he managed things, and provoked this conspiracy, are recorded elsewhere: the author of this book intending only to give a brief account of the remaining kings of Israel.

Ver. 12. This was the word of the Lord which he spake to Jehu, saying, Thy sons shall sit on the throne of Israel, unto the fourth generation. And so it came to pass.] How unfaithful soever they proved to God, he faithfully kept his promise which he made to Jehu: whose sons Jehoahaz, Jehoash, Jeroboam, and Zachariah, succeeded him in the throne of Israel. But this Shallum put an end to that family, and fulfilled the prophecy of Hosea, i. 4. "I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel." For though Jehu had a command from God to destroy the house of Ahab, yet he did it with such ill affections, and for such wrong ends, that God avenged that blood by this man, who slew Zachariah, and the rest of his posterity, if there were any: at least, he made the kingdom to cease in this family, and not long after in all Israel; who were rooted out, and never restored to their country, as Judah was.

Ver. 13. Shallum the son of Jabesh began to reign in the nine-and-thirtieth year of Uzziah, king of Judah; and he reigned a full month in Samaria.] We are not told how he reigned, but it is likely he followed the steps of Jeroboam, who made Israel to sin.

Ver. 14. For Menahem the son of Gadi went up from Tirzah, and came to Samaria, and smote Shallum, the son of Jabesh, in Samaria, and slew him, and reigned in his stead.] Josephus thinks Menahem was general of the army of Israel, which besieged Tirzah when Zachariah was slain: and he hearing what Shallum had done, came and served him in his kind, and made himself king.

Ver. 15. And the rest of the acts of Shallum, and the conspiracy which he made, behold, they are written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel.] A larger account was given of his conspiracy, and the occasion of it, and his success in it, in that book; where some other memorable acts, which it seems he did in a month's time, were recorded.

Ver. 16. Then Menahem smote Tiphsah, and the coasts thereof from Tirzah: because they opened not to him, therefore he smote it.] Some take this Tiphsah to be the same with that mentioned in 1 Kings iv. 24. But that lay upon the river Euphrates, whereas this was near to Tirzah; which was once the royal city of Israel: to the siege of which Josephus thinks Menahem returned after the slaughter of Shallum; not as general of the host, but as their king: but they knowing he had no title to the kingdom, would not open their gates to him. Therefore he took it by force, and spoiled it, and all the territory about it, until he came to Tiphsah, which he used more cruelly.

And all the women therein that were with child he ripped up.] By which barbarity he thought to terrify the whole kingdom, that none might dare to withstand him.

Ver. 17. In the thirty-ninth year of Azariah, king of Judah, began Menahem the son of Gadi to reign over Israel, and reigned ten years in Samaria.] He seems to have reigned with such fury, that none durst oppose him; but he possessed the throne ten years before God cut him off.

Ver. 18. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord: he departed not all his days from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.

Ver. 19. And Pul the king of Assyria came against the land.] That is, the land of Israel. He was governor of Babylon, who, together with Arbaces the Mede, slew Sardanapulus, the last of the Assyrian kings, and translated the empire to the Chaldeans. For he reigned over Babylon and Nineveh, and Arbaces over the Medes and Persians. He was the first king of Assyria that invaded Israel, and began their transportation out of their own country; as Abarbinel gathers from 1 Chron. v. 26. And this is the first time that we find any mention of the kingdom of Assyria, since the days of Nimrod, who erected a small kingdom here, (Gen. x. 11.) And they were no great people, one would think, when the seventy-second psalm was penned, where they are reckoned as auxiliaries to the children of Lot, against the Israelites, together with other small nations; but now they had a great and powerful empire.

And Menahem gave Pul a thousand talents of silver, that his hand might be with him, to confirm the kingdom in his hand.] By this great present he not only turned away the army of Pul from him, but purchased his friendship; so that he helped to establish his authority. Which was very tottering, by reason he was not only an usurper, but had exercised extreme great cruelty upon his people, which no doubt made him extremely hated, (ver. 10.)

Ver. 20. And Menahem exacted the money of Israel, even of all the mighty men of wealth, of each man fifty shekels of silver, to give to the king of Assyria.] By this means, I suppose, he thought to ingratiate himself with the common people; upon whom he laid no tax, but charged only the rich, according to the proportion of their wealth. For the Hebrew words do not import that he made every rich man in Israel pay fifty shekels; but that he gave to the king of Assyria so many shekels for every man, that is, for every one in his army. So they run exactly, to give to the king of Assyria fifty shekels of silver for each man.

So the king of Assyria turned back, and stayed not there in the land.] At that time he departed; but it is likely he afterward returned, in the reign of Pekah, and made the deportation beforementioned.

Ver. 21. And the rest of the acts of Menahem, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel?

Ver. 22. And Menahem slept with his fathers, and Pekahiah his son reigned in his stead.] This shews him to have been a mighty man, that, notwithstanding his violence and cruelty, he left the kingdom in his family: which the two foregoing kings could not do. But it is evident, there was an interregnum of a year between the reign of Menahem and Pekahiah: for Pekahiah did not begin his reign till the fiftieth year of Azariah (as it here follows), and Menahem died the year before; for he began to reign in the thirty-ninth of Azariah, (ver. 17.) and reigned but ten years.

Ver. 23. In the fiftieth year of Azariah king of Judah, Pekahiah, the son of Menahem, began to reign over Israel in Samaria, and reigned two years.] His reign was short; both because he himself was wicked, and his father also was an usurper.

Ver. 24. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord: he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.] He was the wicked son of a wicked father; and so perished (as it here follows) by such a conspiracy as his father made against Shallum.

Ver. 25. And Pekah the son of Remaliah, a captain of his, conspired against him, and smote him in Samaria, in the palace of the king's house, with Argob and Arieh.] These were two valiant men, who some think were in the conspiracy with him against Pekahiah. But Abarbinel rather thinks they were two eminent courtiers, who were always about the king.

And with him fifty men of the Gileadites.] Who were his guards, and, perhaps, assisted him in his treason.

And he killed him, and reigned in his stead.] He was a great commander under Pekahiah; for the Hebrew word shalish signifies more than a bare captain. Therefore Josephus calls him a chiliarch, or an officer over a thousand men. And the word carrying in it the notion of three, some later writers have therefore thought him to be the third person in the kingdom, next the king. No question he was some considerable person, who had soldiers at his command to execute his designs.

Ver. 26. And the rest of the acts of Pekahiah, and all that he did, behold, they are written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel.

Ver. 27. In the fifty-second year of Azariah king of Judah, Pekah the son of Remaliah began to reign over Israel in Samaria, and reigned twenty years.] This is the fifth king that reigned over Israel during the reign of Azariah king of Judah.

Ver. 28. He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord: he departed not from the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin.

Ver. 29. In the days of Pekah king of Israel.] In the last year of his reign, as the Jews say in Seder Olam Rabba.

Came Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria.] He was the son of Pul, and is called by other authors Phul, or Phul-Assur, and here Tiglath-Pul-Assur: the former part of this name being taken from the river Tigris, which is called by the inhabitants Diglito; from whose borders this king came.

And took Ijon, and Abel-beth-maachah.] Two strong towns mentioned 1 Kings xv. 20. (See there.)

And Janoah.] A city in the tribe of Ephraim. (See Josh. xvi. 6.)

And Kedesh, and Hazor.] Which were in the tribe of Naphtali, (Josh. xii. 22. xix. 36.)

And Gilead.] Which was on the other side Jordan.

And Galilee, all the land of Naphtali.] The upper Galilee; which was possessed by this tribe, and by Zebulun.

And carried them captive to Assyria.] This was the second deportation of the ten tribes; the first being made by Pul, as I said before, who carried away the two tribes and half beyond Jordan; and this second was made by his son, who carried away two other tribes: then, nine years after, followed a third, in the days of the next king, (xviii. 9.) when the remainder of the ten tribes were carried away from their own land. The tribe of Judah still remained; but about eight years after the former, part of that was carried away by Sennacherib, when he took all their fenced cities; (xviii. 13.) which, with respect to the whole country, the Jews call the fourth deportation. Then a fifth followed, (xxiv. 15.) and a sixth; (xxv. 1, &c.) the last is mentioned, xxv. 25. Thus they are reckoned up by Abarbinel; and in this second (the Jews say, in Seder Olam Rabba), Tiglath-pileser carried away the golden calf which was in Dan. But see a more exact account of Judah's captivity in Mr. Whiston's learned Chronology of the Old Testament, p. 52.

Ver. 30. And Hoshea the son of Elah made a conspiracy against Pekah the son of Remaliah.] Who Hoshea was, or what was the ground of his conspiracy, is not recorded; but we may suppose it to have been because he governed ill, and, by his cruel war with Judah, had brought the king of Assyria upon his own kingdom, (2 Chron. xxviii. 16.) and thereby lost a great part of it.

And smote him, and slew him.] As Pekah had served Pekahiah.

And reigned in his stead, in the twentieth year of Jotham king of Judah.] These words create a difficulty; for it is said, ver. 33. that Jotham reigned but sixteen years. Which Seder Olam Rabba thus reconciles (for none can think any writer whatsoever would so soon contradict himself), that this conspiracy was begun in the latter end of Jotham's reign, but not put in execution till four years after his death. So that these words are to be understood as if he had said, Twenty years after Jotham began to reign over Judah Pekah was slain. Dr. Lightfoot gives another account of it; that the wickedness of Ahaz was so great, that the holy writer would not mention him on this occasion, but rather speaks of his good father, as if he were yet alive, in which he follows R. Solomon Jarchi. But this hath no show of truth in it; since so much is said of Ahaz in the following part of this history. A late very learned writer (in his Short View of the Chronology of the Old Testament, p. 47.) hath given a better account of it, in these words: "Because there had been yet no mention made of Ahaz's reign, therefore the old epocha of his predecessor Jotham is still made use of." But the plain truth is, that Jotham reigned four years with his father Azariah.

Ver. 31. And the rest of the acts of Pekah, and all that he did, behold, they are written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Israel.] In that book which is now called by the name of Chronicles his war with Judah is recorded, (2 Chron. xxviii.)

Ver. 32. In the second year of Pekah the son of Remaliah king of Israel, began Jotham the son of Uzziah king of Judah to reign.] Why he should be all along called Azariah, and here only Uzziah, and ver. 34. no account can be given; unless it were to shew he had two names, as I have observed, 2 Chron. xxvi. 1. And it appears by the book of Chronicles, that Uzziah was as much used when that book was written as the other.

Ver. 33. Twenty-five years old was he when he began to reign.] Alone by himself; for he reigned some time with his father during his leprosy. (See Dr. Lightfoot in his Prolegom. to the Harm. of the Evang. sect. 6.)

And he reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Jerusha, the daughter of Zadok.] It is not said of what place, as is usual: this Zadok being so well known, that there was no need to set down his dwelling.

Ver. 34. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord.] Οὐδεμίας ἀρετῆς ἀπελείπετο, he wanted no virtue belonging to a good prince, as Josephus writes; (lib. ix. Antiq. cap. 11.) being (saith he) "pious towards God, just towards men, and studious of the public good."

He did according to all that his father Uzziah had done.] That is, according to all the good he had done; but did not imitate him in invading the priests' office.

Ver. 35. Howbeit, the high places were not removed: the people sacrificed and burnt incense still in the high places.

He built the higher gate of the house of the Lord.] Which was between the house of the king and the house of the Lord, (xviii. 20.) It was built by Solomon; but this king added a noble structure to it.

Ver. 36. Now the rest of the acts of Jotham, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] See 2 Chron. xxvii.

Ver. 37. (In those days the Lord began to send against Judah Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah the son of Remaliah).] These two kings entered into a confederacy against Judah, and made preparations for war before Jotham died; but he was so happy as to be laid in his grave in peace; their design being not executed until the reign of the next king.

Ver. 38. And Jotham slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David his father: and Ahaz his son reigned in his stead.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. IN the seventeenth year of Pekah the son of Remaliah, Ahaz the son of Jotham king of Judah began to reign.

Ver. 2. Twenty years old was Ahaz when he began to reign, and reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem.] He was a little more than twenty years old. (See upon xviii. 2.)

And did not that which was right in the sight of the Lord his God, like David his father.] As might have been expected from the good education which, no doubt, so pious a man as Jotham his father gave him; who left him an excellent example.

Ver. 3. But he walked in the ways of the kings of Israel; yea, and made his son to pass through the fire, according to the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out be- fore the children of Israel.] He was far worse than any of the preceding kings of Israel; for he imitated those abominable idolaters whom God rooted out of the land of Canaan: who it is most certain sometimes burnt their children in the fire, as sacrifices to their gods, (Deut. xii. 31.) and the children of Israel it is as certain imitated them, (Ezek. xvi. 20, 21. xxxiii. 37. 39.) But whether Ahaz did that, or only made his son pass through the fire by way of lustration (as they called it), cannot be determined. It is no argument that he did not offer him as a burnt-sacrifice, because Hezekiah outlived him; for he had more sons, it is likely, than him. See, concerning this horrible impiety, what I have noted upon Lev. xviii. 21. and upon Deut. xviii. 10.

Ver. 4. And he sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places, and on the hills, and under every green tree.] He added this to all his other sins (of consecrating his son to Moloch by passing him through the fire, if not offering him in sacrifice), that he himself sacrificed in high places, and on hills, and under every green tree; by his example encouraging this practice, which other kings had only tolerated. So we read, that people sacrificed in high places, even in good kings' reigns, xii. 3. xiv. 4. xv. 4, &c. but, as they sacrificed to God in those reigns, so we never read till now that any of those kings sacrificed there themselves, as this king did; who not merely suffered this, but gave countenance to it by his own practice, and thereby strengthened this licence of private sacrificing, contrary to the law of God; and, which was worst of all, sacrificing to other gods: it being very probable that he fancied some deity to inhabit under every well-spread flourishing tree.

Ver. 5. Then Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah son of Remaliah king of Israel, came up to Jerusalem to war: and they besieged Ahaz, but could not overcome him.] This seems not to agree with 2 Chron. xxviii. 5, &c. where these two princes are represented as getting great victories over him. To which Abarbinel answers, that these things happened at different times. For the wars mentioned in the book of Chronicles were made severally by these two kings, wherein they prospered; being the ministers of Divine Providence. But when now they joined their forces together, and not only came against other cities, but against Jerusalem, God was pleased to make them miscarry.

Ver. 6. At that time Rezin king of Syria.] When he broke up the siege of Jerusalem, upon intelligence he received that Tiglath-pileser was coming to its relief.

Restored Elath to Syria.] This was a considerable port upon the Red Sea.

And drave the Jews from Elath: and the Syrians came to Elath, and dwelt there to this day.] This city had been recovered to the dominion of Judah by Azariah, (xiv. 22.) who took it from the Syrians; who now took it from them again, that they might not quite lose the fruit of their expedition against Jerusalem.

Ver. 7. So Ahaz sent messengers to Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria.] There is a learned man of our own, who hath lately given another account of the name of Pileser, than that abovementioned, (xv. 29.) For he thinks it is compounded of the names of two of their gods; Pil being the same with Bel, and Azer or Azar was the name of a planet worshipped by the Persians, viz. Mars: and they much affected to have the names of their gods in their own names; which was a common thing also among the Jews: for which reason the name of Tiglath was added, which was the name of Tigris (as I observed before), which, as all great beneficial rivers, mountains, and trees, was accounted sacred among the heathen. (See Dr. Hyde, Histor. Relig. Vet. Persar. cap. 3.).

Saying, I am thy servant and thy son: come up, and save me out of the hand of the king of Syria, and out of the hand of the king of Israel, which rise up against me.] He not only put himself and all he had into his protection; but made himself his subject, to hold all he had of him by his favour. For that is the meaning of I am thy servant and thy son; that is, he was content to be his vassal, if he would be his protector.

Ver. 8. And Ahaz took the silver and the gold that was found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king's house, and sent it for a present to the king of Assyria.] These treasures had been sent some years ago by Jehoash to the king of Syria; (xii. 18.) but it seems they were well replenished again by the piety of his successors, Amaziah, Azariah, but especially Jotham.

Ver. 9. And the king of Assyria hearkened unto him: for the king of Assyria went up against Damascus, and took it.] It is very uncertain when king Ahaz sent to desire this help. If it was when they were preparing to besiege Jerusalem, it was the effect of his great infidelity; for God had been so gracious to him, as to promise by the prophet Isaiah that those kings should do him no hurt, (Isa. vii. 4.) giving him a sign also to strengthen his faith. Others think, it was after the king of Syria and the king of Israel had miserably harassed Ahaz's country, though they could not take Jerusalem, as we read 2 Chron. xxviii. 5, 6, &c. Whensoever it was, the king of Assyria gave a powerful diversion to the king of Syria, invading his country, and besieging the chief city of it, of which he made himself master.

And carried the people of it captive to Kir.] A place in the country of the upper Media, as Josephus tells us: from whence he brought some people to plant in Damascus.

And slew Rezin.] Who was the last of their kings; for the Syrians never got up again, as the Jews observe in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 20. Whether he was legal successor to Ben-hadad the son of Hazael, or an usurper, is not certain.

Ver. 10. And king Ahaz went to Damascus to meet Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria.] To compliment him upon his success; and perhaps to do him homage, and to request him to do as much against Pekah as he had done against Rezin. For some think that after this he went and took all those places from Israel which are mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 29. And after all he fell upon Judah itself, and made great spoil there also, as is suggested in 2 Chron. xxviii. 20, 21.

And he saw an altar that was in Damascus.] A beautiful altar, both for the matter and form of it.

And king Ahaz sent to Urijah the priest the fashion of the altar, and the pattern of it, according to all the workmanship thereof.] Not only the height, and breadth, and shape of it; but all the carvings, I suppose, with the figures and images wherewith it was adorned.

Ver. 11. And Urijah the priest built an altar, according to all that king Ahaz had sent from Damascus: so Urijah the priest made it against the king came from Damascus.] He took care to have it done exactly according to the pattern; directly contrary to the command of God, who had appointed what kind of altar he would have, (Exod. xxvii. 1, 2, &c.) and that no other should be made of any matter or figure whatsoever. But there are always some men to be found, that will comply with the most wicked commands.

Ver. 12. And when the king was come from Damascus, the king saw the altar.] That is, liked it, and approved of it, as made perfectly agreeable to his mind.

And the king approached to the altar, and offered thereon.] The morning sacrifice: which he was so presumptuous, perhaps, as to offer himself. But not to God; for we are told expressly, 2 Chron. xxviii. 23. that he sacrificed to the gods of Damascus. A wonderful blindness! to worship those gods, and expect help from them, who could not preserve their own country from ruin.

Ver. 13. And he burnt his burnt-offering.] Some understand it, that he burnt it with spices.

And his meat-offering, and poured his drink-offering, and sprinkled the blood of his peace-offerings, upon the altar.] These were all prescribed by the law of Moses: but he offered them in a wrong place, and unto other gods.

Ver. 14. And he brought also the brazen altar, that was before the Lord, from the fore-front of the house, from between the altar and the house of the Lord, and put it on the north side of the altar.] By these words, it is plain that Urijah had little more modesty than Ahaz: for he had placed Ahaz's altar behind the altar of the Lord, between it and the east gate of the court of the priests. But when Ahaz came, he removed Solomon's altar out of its place, which was before the sanctuary, and set it towards the north side of the court; that he might bring up his own, and set it there, where the altar of the Lord had stood. (See Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, chap. 34. latter end.)

Ver. 15. And king Ahaz commanded Urijah the priest, saying, Upon the great altar.] Which he had now erected in the place of God's altar.

Burn the morning burnt-offering, and the evening meat-offering, and the king's burnt-sacrifice, and his meat-offering, with the burnt-offering of all the people of the land, and their meat-offering, and their drink-offerings, and sprinkle upon it all the blood of the burnt-offering, and all the blood of the sacrifice.] He makes a solemn injunction, that all the public sacrifices, of what sort soever they were, whether made by himself or by the people, should be constantly offered upon his altar. Which he calls the great altar, because it was much bigger, I suppose, than the altar of God.

And the brazen altar shall be for me to inquire by.] He would not have it thought that he intended wholly to lay aside the altar made by Solomon: but rather to do it great honour, by reserving it for his own private use; when he pleased to inquire of God by it. But there being no mention of the name of the Lord, some think the meaning is no more, but that he would have it stand where he had set it; till he considered what to do with it: and they fancy that he made the famous dial of Ahaz with the brass of it. So they understand the Hebrew words li lebaker—I will take care of it, and order what shall be done with it. And therefore, according to this interpretation, he laid it quite aside. But the other seems more agreeable to the Hebrew phrase, it shall be to me to inquire, or seek, or pray: a private altar for his proper use: whereby he pretended to have still some regard to it, though he had degraded it.

Ver. 16. So did Urijah the priest, according to all that king Ahaz commanded.] Whatsoever good inclinations he had, they were all overruled by the commands of the king, with which he entirely complied.

Ver. 17. And king Ahaz cut off the borders of the bases.] See 1 Kings vii. 28, 29.

And removed the laver from off them; and took down the sea from off the brazen oxen that were under it, and put it upon a pavement of stones.] This was done out of contempt, that the sea might not appear so great and stately, nor be so useful to the priests, as it was before. For he intended quite to abolish, not only to deface, the service of God at the temple. So we read in 2 Chron. xxviii. 24. that he shut up the doors of the house of God, that none should worship there.

Ver. 18. And the covert for the sabbath that they had built in the house.] There is a vast variety of opinions concerning this musach (which we translate covert), and why it is called the covert for the sabbath. The most probable is, that it was a covered place, where the king sat in the porch of the temple, or at the entrance of it, upon the sabbath, or other great solemnities, which were called by that name. Thus Procopius Gazæus: This Ahaz took away, intending not to trouble himself to come to the temple; but to sacrifice any where: in every corner of Jerusalem, and in the several cities of Judah, which he would have be thought as holy as Jerusalem, (2 Chron. xxviii. 24, 25.) And it is a probable conjecture of a very learned man of our own, that Ahaz did this to express his hatred and contempt of the sabbath: for the worship of idols and violation of the sabbath are frequently joined together in Scripture, especially in Ezek. xx. 16. xxii. 8, 9. xxiv. 37, 38. and in a remarkable place in the Maccabees, i. 44. (See Spencer, de Leg. Hebræor. lib. i. cap. 1. 12.)

And the king's entry without, turned he from the house of the Lord.] The passage through which the king came from his own house to the temple, he turned another way.

For the king of Assyria.] That he might ingratiate himself with him, by contemning his own country religion, and approaching nearer to his. But Procopius takes it the quite contrary way; that he did this for fear of the king of Assyria. Which moved him to make a shorter passage into the house of the Lord, that he might flee thither instantly for safety, in case of any danger: which is not probable, because he profaned it, and shut up the doors of it.

Ver. 19. Now the rest of the acts of Ahaz which he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?

Ver. 20. And Ahaz slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David; and Hezekiah his son reigned in his stead.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. IN the twelfth year of Ahaz king of Judah, began Hoshea the son of Elah to reign in Samaria over Israel nine years.] This doth not agree with xv. 30. where it is said he began to reign in the twentieth year of Jotham, which was the fourth of Ahaz. To this Ralbag thinks it sufficient to say, that till the twelfth year of Ahaz he was but a servant of the king of Assyria; nor was reputed a king, but only a governor under him. And so Abarbinel. And it is no improbable conjecture of Dr. Lightfoot's, that Ahaz gave him a great deal of trouble, after the death of Pekah, in revenge of the slaughters he had made in Judah: so that he kept Hoshea out of the throne a great while, and upon this account is called the king of Israel, (2 Chron. xxviii. 19.) as well as because he walked in the ways of those kings. Our learned chronologer Mr. Whiston thinks there was an interregnum, for the space of full twelve years, from the death of Jeroboam the second. Which he takes to be most probable, and almost certain, from those words of Hosea, who prophesied in that king's time: "Now (or ere long) they shall say, We have no king, because we feared not the Lord; what then should a king do to us?" Hos. x. 3. (See his Short View of the Chronology of the Old Testament, p. 48.)

And he reigned in Samaria over Israel nine years.] viz. After his peaceable possession of the throne: for, from the time that he pretended to it, upon the slaughter of Pekah, he reigned seventeen or eighteen years; viz. twelve in the time of Ahaz, who reigned sixteen years, and six in the time of Hezekiah, (xviii. 10.)

Ver. 2. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, but not as the kings of Israel that were before him.] For he did not hinder his people from going to worship at Jerusalem: but, as the Hebrew doctors say, took away the guard that Jeroboam set in the passage, to keep men from going to the solemn feasts there. And one of the golden calves being carried away captive, his devotion, it is likely, was not great for the other remaining. And yet, notwithstanding, God exterminated Israel in his days: to shew (saith Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 22.) that it was not merely for the sake of their kings, upon whom the Israelites cast all the blame of their depravation, that they were carried captive. (See ver. 17—19, &c.)

Ver. 3. Against him came up Shalmaneser king of Assyria.] Some take this to be but another name for Tiglath-pileser. For which I find no ground, and rather think Shalmaneser was his son, and successor in the kingdom of Assyria.

And Hoshea became his servant, and gave him presents.] Made himself a tributary to him; and presented him with gifts in token of his subjection to him, and as an earnest of his future obedience.

Ver. 4. And the king of Assyria found conspiracy in Hoshea: for he had sent messengers to So, king of Egypt, and brought no present to the king of Assyria, as he had done year by year.] He designed to shake off his yoke, and be no longer his subject, as he found by two undeniable evidences. First, that he had sent to treat with the king of Egypt; and denied him the usual tribute, which he was bound to pay him every year. St. Jerome calls this king of Egypt Sua, and Josephus calls him Soan, and the LXX. Segor, who is the same with the famous Sabacon, an Ethiopian mentioned by Diodorus Siculus and Herodotus. (See Sir J. Marsham, Can. Chron. sect. 16. and our famous Usher, in his Annals, vid. A. 3989.)

Therefore the king of Assyria shut him up, and bound him in prison.] He first besieged Samaria, and when he had taken it made him a close prisoner: the history of which follows.

Ver. 5. Then the king of Assyria went up throughout all the land.] He first possessed himself of the country of Moab (as the same great primate observes), that he might leave no enemies at his back; and destroyed their two chief cities, Ar and Kir-hares, according to the prediction of Isaiah, xvi. ver. 1. and the last: and then he invaded the kingdom of Israel, and possessed himself of it.

And went up to Samaria, and besieged it three years.] Josephus rightly observes two expeditions of this king against the land of Israel: first, when he made Hoshea tributary to him; and now, when he made himself master of the whole country, and besieged the capital city, (lib. ix. Antiq. cap. 13.)

Ver. 6. In the ninth year of Hoshea the king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah and in Habor, by the river of Gozan.] There is no reason that any should imagine these Israelites were carried into Colchis, Iberia, Armenia the less, and the farthest Scythia, when the Scripture saith so expressly that they were carried into Assyria, and the cities of the Medes; and when the very places are to be found into which they are said here to be carried in those countries, viz. Chalac, and Chabor, and Gozan: for what was Chalach (as Bochartus observes) but Ptolemy's Chalachena, or the north of Assyria? and Chabor is plainly enough the same with his Χαβώρας, a mountain between Media and Assyria. Between which mountain and the Caspian Sea there is the city Gauzania, that is Gozan, between the two channels of the river Cyrus.

And in the cities of the Medes.] Whither Tiglath-pileser had carried others of them out of Galilee.

Ver. 7. For so it was, that the children of Israel had sinned against the Lord their God, which had brought them up out of the land of Egypt, from under the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and had served other gods.] This they had done a long time: for, from the beginning of Jeroboam's schism to the carrying Israel captive was two hundred and sixty-three years.

Ver. 8. And walked in the statutes of the heathen, whom God cast out from before the children of Israel.] Of the Amorites and other impious people, whom he expelled from the land of Canaan to make room for them.

And of the kings of Israel, which they had made.] viz. The golden calves, whose worship the kings of Israel had ordained, to keep them from going up to worship God at Jerusalem.

Ver. 9. And the children of Israel did secretly those things which were not right against the Lord their God.] Besides the public impiety authorized by their kings, they privately exercised idolatry, according to their own fancy.

And they built them high places in all their city.] They were not content to worship upon hills and mountains, but they raised high places in all cities to offer sacrifice.

From the tower of the watchmen to the fenced city.] In all places, both those that were desert, and those that were inhabited; or both in the country and in the city. For the towers of the watchmen are thought to be those little houses which the country people built, wherein to watch their flocks and their fruits, and preserve them from wild beasts or robbers.

Ver. 10. And they set them up images and groves in every high hill, and under every green tree.] The Hebrew word

Asherim, which we translate groves, should be rendered idols of that name, as Selden hath observed, Syntag. de Diis Syris, ii. cap. 2. where he plainly demonstrates this word doth not signify the grove, but the numen or deity placed in the grove. For how should groves be set under every green tree? as it is here said the Asherim were. And thus Kimchi saith in the root Ashur, that every wooden thing that was worshipped was called Asherah. And Procopius Gazæus observes, that this word, which the LXX. here translate ἄλση, groves, others every where translate Ἀσταρώθ, which word, saith he, δηλοῖ τὴν Ἀστάρτην, Ἀφροδίτην, denotes Astarte, that is, Venus.

Ver. 11. And there they burnt incense in all the high places, as did the heathen, whom the Lord carried away before them; and wrought wicked things to provoke the Lord to anger.] For, as the son of Sirach expresses it, they sought out all wickedness, till the vengeance came upon them. (See Ecclus. xlvii. ult.)

Ver. 12. For they served idols, whereof the Lord had said unto them, Ye shall not do these things.] They worshipped many other gods, which were mere idols, against the express command of God, (Exod. xx. 23. Deut. iv. 15, 16, &c.)

Ver. 13. Yet the Lord testified against Israel and Judah, by all the prophets, and by all the seers.] I have before noted, that Abarbinel, in his commentary on these books, hath observed one or more prophets that were in every king's reign, both in Israel and Judah, from the time of Saul to Zedekiah, in whose time Jerusalem was laid desolate. These admonished them of their duty, as it here follows, and endeavoured to preserve them in God's true religion, or to recover them when they apostatized from it; particularly in the days of this very king, when Israel was carried captive, they had the prophets Hosea, Amos, Isaiah, and Micah: and in the days of the last king when Judah was carried captive, they had Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

Saying, Turn ye from your evil ways, and keep my commandments, and my statutes, according to all the laws which I commanded your fathers, and which I sent to you by my servants the prophets.] As he had given them his laws by Moses; so he continued a succession of prophets after him, whom he sent to call upon them to observe these laws.

Ver. 14. Notwithstanding they would not hear, but hardened their necks, like the neck of their fathers.] A metaphor taken from refractory oxen, that will not bow down their necks to the yoke. Even so the Israelites refused to submit to the yoke of God's laws.

That did not believe in the Lord their God.] This was the original of all the sins they committed: they did not believe God's prophets, but hearkened to deceivers.

Ver. 15. And they rejected his statutes, and his covenant that he made with their fathers, and his testimonies which he testified against them.] By his servants the prophets.

And they followed vanities.] So idols are called, which, as the apostle speaks, are nothing; having no power to do either hurt or good.

And became vain.] Like the idols they worshipped; senseless, sottish, and good for nothing.

And went after the heathen that were round about them, concerning whom the Lord had charged them, that they should not do like them.] See Exod. xxiii. 24. 32. and many other places.

Ver. 16. And they left all the commandments of the Lord their God, and made them molten images, even two calves, and made a grove.] The making a grove was a greater impiety than is commonly imagined. For in their groves they worshipped Baalim, as appears from Judg. iii. 7.; that is, heroes, to whom those groves were consecrated, being their sepulchre. And here many filthy rites were practised, in honour of Venus, Bacchus, and such-like deities.

And worshipped all the host of heaven, and served Baal.] They grew worse and worse, not contenting themselves with the worship of the two calves, &c. but worshipped the stars of heaven, (against which Moses had given them a particular caution, Deut. iv. 19.) Saturn, Jupiter, Venus, and the moon, but especially Baal, which was the sun.

Ver. 17. And they caused their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire, and used divination and enchantments.] Which were the most abominable sins of the heathen. (See Lev. xviii. 21. xix. 26. xx. 2, 3, &c. Deut. xviii. 10. and upon ver. 3. of the foregoing chapter.)

And sold themselves to do evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger.] They were so industrious to do wickedly, and so incessant in it, as if they had been slaves that were sold to that drudgery.

Ver. 18. Therefore the Lord was very angry with Israel, and removed them out of his sight.] From the holy land, where his temple was, in which he dwelt among them.

Till there was none left but the tribe of Judah only.] Unto whom adhered part of Benjamin and the Levites; who, as it here follows, imitated the wickedness of Israel; but yet had some mixture of good kings among them. Whereas all the kings of Israel persisted in the sins of Jeroboam; and therefore, before their removal out of their land, they suffered great calamities, no less than nine of their kings being killed (as Abarbinel notes) before their last king was carried captive.

Ver. 19. Also Judah kept not the commandments of the Lord their God, but walked in the statutes of Israel which they made.] Followed the idolatrous devices of the ten tribes; as they did most notoriously in the last reign of Ahaz: whose son Hezekiah indeed made a noble reformation; but it lasted no longer than his time, so extremely was this nation corrupted.

Ver. 20. And the Lord rejected.] With loathing and abhorrence, as the word imports.

All the house of Israel.] The whole ten tribes.

And afflicted them, and delivered them into the hands of spoilers, until he had cast them out of his sight.] See x. 32, 33. xiii. 3. 7.

Ver. 21. For he rent Israel from the house of David.] Here was the foundation of their ruin.

And he made Jeroboam the son of Nebat their king; and Jeroboam drave Israel from following the Lord, and made Israel sin a great sin.] Of which he was the author; but they were too forward to comply with him.

Ver. 22. For the children of Israel walked in all the sins of Jeroboam which he did: they departed not from them.] They were so inclined to idolatry, that a long succession of God's judgments upon them could not reclaim them.

Ver. 23. Until the Lord removed Israel out of his sight, as he had said by all his servants the prophets.] Unto whose admonitions and threatenings they had no regard.

So was Israel carried away out of their own land to Assyria unto this day.] As they sold themselves to do evil, (ver. 17.) so God delivered them up to be slaves to those whose gods they had worshipped, (ver. 16, 17.)

Ver. 24. And the king of Assyria brought men.] This was not done by Shalmaneser, but by his son Esar-haddon, (Ezra iv. 2.)

From Babylon.] Which was then subject to the king of Assyria; but not long after revolted.

And from Cuthah.] A city of Chaldea, as Abarbinel expounds it: and so doth our Dr. Hyde out of several Persian writers, (Hist. Relig. Vet. Pers. cap. 2.) But it rather here signifies a country called Cush also (which, perhaps, had its name from the forenamed city), from whence the greatest part of this colony being brought, the people in aftertimes were called Cuthæi. For the same author truly observes, that the country called Cush was, in the Babylonish dialect (afterward called the Chaldean), called Cuth. For they were wont to change the letter schin into thau. In this country, in the land of Shinar, Cush first settled; and his posterity spread itself into Arabia.

And from Ava.] The Avites were a very ancient people, who were driven by the Caphtorim out of Hazerim; and went and settled beyond Euphrates. (See upon Deut. ii. 23.)

And from Hamath.] This was a city of Syria, on the borders of Canaan; which was now subject to the king of Assyria, by a late conquest of it, (xvi. 9.)

And from Sepharvaim.] There is a city called Siphara, on the side of which the river Euphrates runs, not far from the sea. From this mixture of nations it was, that afterward there happened such a confusion of laws, and manners, and rites of religion, as was in this country.

And placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel; and they possessed Samaria.] That is, the whole country, wherein the ten tribes formerly dwelt.

And dwelt in the cities thereof.] Which were not destroyed, I suppose, but left standing, with a design to send new inhabitants into them.

Ver. 25. And it was so, at the beginning of their dwelling there, that they feared not the Lord; therefore the Lord sent lions among them, which slew some of them.] And did not the Israelites also want the fear of the Lord, as Abarbinel here notes, and yet were not devoured by lions? To which he answers, that though the Israelites also served idols, yet they did not deny the Divine power and providence; but imagined these idols to be the intermediate causes by which the Divine influences might be conveyed unto them: for it is plain Jeroboam did not deny the Lord, (1 Kings xiii. 6.) but acknowledged his power. But these new inhabitants believed the idols which they worshipped to be true gods; and therefore were destroyed by lions, because they did not acknowledge the power and providence of God over all inferior beings, whose land this was; and hereby he vindicated his ancient inheritance and possession to himself.

Ver. 26. Wherefore they spake unto the king of Assyria, saying, The nations which thou hast removed, and placed in the cities of Samaria, know not the manner of the God of the land: therefore he hath sent lions among them, and, behold, they slay them; because they know not the manner of the God of the land.] They took the God of Israel to be of the same kind with their own, who affected a particular country and people, and would be honoured with peculiar rites, which were acceptable to him, and none else. The Syrians had the same conceit of topical gods, as I observed upon 1 Kings xx. 23. and see below, xviii. 35.

Ver. 27. Then the king of Assyria commanded, saying, Carry thither one of the priests, whom ye brought from thence, and let them go and dwell there, and let him teach them the manner of the God of the land.] The Jews in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 38. tell the story thus: that the king of Assyria called the elders of Israel together, and said, All the while you dwelt in the land of Samaria, it was not infested with lions; what is the reason that my people are devoured by them? To which they answered, Our lord the king, this land will not receive any uncircumcised nation. Let two of you go then (replied the king) and circumcise them, and teach them the book of the law. So R. Dosithæus and R. Zachariah were sent, who did the business. Here they make bold to go beyond the Scripture, in making two great doctors to have been sent, when there was but one. Though it is very probable there were some associates who accompanied this principal priest: for the text saith, when the king bade them carry one of the priests thither, he added, and let them dwell there. Which signifies he did not go alone: though he alone was to teach them, as it follows, the manner of the God of the land.

Ver. 28. Then one of the priests, whom they had carried away from Samaria, came and dwelt in Beth-el, and taught them how they should fear the Lord.] That is, how they should worship and serve him. From whence many learned men conclude, that he brought the book of the law with him, without which he could not fully instruct them how to worship God, and govern themselves: which book they suppose was written in the Babylonian character, because it was to teach a colony of that nation. This is opposed by a late learned man, who earnestly contends, that the book of the law was not brought to them till the time of Sanballat; and therefore this priest instructed them without the book, only by tradition. Which is not probable; for they would have had little regard to him, if he had not produced the authority of that holy book, delivered to them by that great lawgiver Moses, the man of God: for, that he taught them the right way of worshipping God according to the law, as it was practised in Judah, is very likely; being sensible that God abhorred the other worship which Israel practised; for which he had thrown them out of their land.

Ver. 29. Howbeit every nation made gods of their own, and put them in the houses of the high places which the Samaritans had made, every nation in their cities wherein they dwelt.] It seems the people of Israel, who are here called Samaritans, had built little temples in the high places; wherein these new inhabitants worshipped the gods of the country from which they came, (that is, the gods of Assyria, Ezek. xxvii. 7.) together with the God of Israel.

Ver. 30. And the men of Babylon made Succoth-benoth.] The Jewish doctors do but trifle in their exposition of this word, which they say signifies a hen and chickens. The word plainly imports, the tabernacles of daughters, or of young maidens: who were consecrated to Venus, whose name Mr. Selden probably conjectures was derived from Benoth. The old idolaters, it is evident, did prostitute their daughters in honour of Venus, as not only Strabo, Herodotus, and other profane writers testify; but some think is suggested in holy Scripture, Lev. xix. 29. And therefore they of Babylon are said to make the tabernacles of daughters; that is, chapels wherein their daughters were prostituted to every one that came to worship Venus, as the manner was in Babylon, from whence the forenamed authors testify this filthiness had its original. (See Selden, de Diis Syris Syntag. ii. cap. 7. and Vossius, de Idololatr. lib. ii. cap. 22.)

And the men of Cuth made Nergal.] Which the Jews would have to signify a cock. But their conjecture is better, who think it signified fire. For the men of Cuth are those that were afterward called Persians; who, it is certain, anciently worshipped the fire. (See Selden, cap. 8.) But the famous Bochartus ingenuously confesses he doth not know what Nergal was; but that there is a sort of palm-tree called Nergil by the Persians, Arabians, and Indians, of which they report strange things. From whence, perhaps, the Persians gave the name of Nergal to this idol, as in Syria their god was called Rimmon, from the pomegranate. (Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 16.)

And the men of Hamath made Ashima.] I know no ground the Jews have to say, this word Ashima signifies a smooth goat. Our great Selden modestly acknowledges he doth not know what god it was, (ib. cap. 9.) But a late author takes Ashima to be the same with Mars: because among the ancients A S signified the same with Ἄρης among the Greeks; and schemah is as much as hearing or obedient, (Jo. Gensius de Victimis Humanis, par. i. p. 92.) And this A S he conjectures is the same whom the Romans called Hesus, whom Lucan mentions in his Pharsalia, lib. i. ver. 443.

——— "Horrentque feris altaribus Hesus."

But, after all, I think my learned friend Dr. Alix hath made the most probable conjecture, that Ashima is the name of God, whom the Hebrews call Hashem, the name: from whence Ashima, I doubt not, is derived. Accordingly Aben Ezra saith, in his preface to the book of Esther, that he saw in a Samaritan Pentateuch, Gen. i. 1. Bara Ashima, instead of Bara Elohim. Which Bochart censures as a falsity, because no such word is to be found in the whole Samaritan Pentateuch; but it might be then in some paraphrase upon it.

Ver. 31. And the Avites made Nibhaz and Tartak.] Nobody knows what these were; for no credit is to be given to the Jews, who say, the former was in the shape of a dog, and the other of an ass. Selden thinks they were the same idol called by different names, but was not able to give an account of them.

And the Sepharvites burnt their children in the fire to Adrammelech and Anammelech, the gods of Sepharvaim.] These were the same gods with Moloch; unto whom the same sacrifices were offered. The Jews, after their vain fancies, make one of them to have been in the form of a peacock, and the other of a pheasant: but in all probability they were but different names of Moloch, which was the sun, as is evident from xxiii. 10, 11.; and the addition of Addir, which signifies magnificent or potent, makes Adrammelech as much as the mighty Moloch; and of Ana, which signifies to answer, makes Anammelech as much as oracular Moloch. For Moloch, and Melech, and Milcom, are all the very same in the language of different people, signifying a king: the sun being by them accounted the king, as the moon the queen of heaven. And there is nothing more known than that the gentiles burnt their children in sacrifice to him. But whether these people did so, or only made them pass through the fire to purify them, may be questioned; though the words seem to import the former: which was the practice of the Phœnicians, Syrians, Tyrians, Carthaginians, Cretans, Arabians, and many other nations; and is still practised by the Americans, and other gentiles.

A learned writer of our own, Dr. Hyde, in the book beforementioned, had a quite different apprehension of these words: for he will have Adrammelech to signify the king of the flock, Adre being as much as Greges; and Anammelech he thinks is much of the same signification, Ana being as much as Pecus, in the Persian language: always signifying collectively in the plural number, the lesser cattle, sheep and goats. Of which he imagines these gods had the care, and were therefore worshipped; the riches of those people consisting much in cattle. They were also celestial constellations (as he there observes), which they imagined promoted the breeding and growth of cattle.

Ver. 32. So they feared the Lord.] Worshipped the Lord God of Israel.

And made unto themselves of the lowest of them priests of the high places, which sacrificed for them in the houses of the high places.] I suppose these sacrifices were offered to the God of Israel, but in high places, and by priests of their own making. As for their sacrifices to the gods of their several countries, no doubt they brought priests along with them, to perform the service belonging to them.

Ver. 33. They feared the Lord, and served their own gods, after the manner of the nations whom they carried away from thence.] That is, after the manner of the ten tribes, who worshipped the Lord, and the golden calves together with him, and sometimes Baal, and other gods, (ver. 16.)

Ver. 34. Unto this day they do after the former manners: they fear not the Lord, neither do they after their statutes, or after their ordinances, or after the law and commandment which the Lord commanded the children of Jacob, whom he named Israel.] These, and the following words, give an account of the children of Israel; who, being carried captive out of their own land (as hath been related), were not at all amended thereby; but still neglected all the laws which God had given them, and did not worship him alone; and therefore in truth they feared not the Lord.

Ver. 35. With whom the Lord had made a covenant, and charged them, saying, Ye shall not fear other gods, nor bow yourselves to them, nor save them, nor sacrifice to them.] Whose sins he aggravates (and thereby justifies his severe proceedings against them) by representing them as a select people, who were in a strict and gracious covenant with him, obliging them not to shew the least respect to any other god but himself.

Ver. 36. But the Lord, who brought you up out of the land of Egypt with great power, and a stretched-out arm, him shall ye fear, and him shall ye worship, and to him shall ye do sacrifice.] This was a benefit, one would think, that should never have been forgotten; but eternally engaged them to his service, who delivered them from so vile a slavery.

Ver. 37. And the statutes, and the ordinances, and the law, and the commandment, which he wrote for you, ye shall observe to do for evermore; and ye shall not fear other gods.] This is repeated again, being so very often mentioned in the book of the law, that they should worship no other god.

Ver. 38. And the covenant that I have made with you ye shall not forget; neither shall ye fear other gods.] Which was the principal thing in the covenant.

Ver. 39. But the Lord your God ye shall fear; and he shall deliver you out of the hand of all your enemies.] As he did whensoever they renounced idolatry, and promised to worship him alone; as we read throughout their whole history in these holy books.

Ver. 40. Howbeit they did not hearken, but they did after their former manner.] They soon revolted, when they solemnly protested to repent; and did just as they had done before, as the same books testify.

Ver. 41. So those nations feared the Lord, and served their graven images, both their children, and their children's children: as did their fathers, so do they unto this day.] Just thus did the nations who came in their room into the country of Samaria: they joined their own gods with the Lord God of Israel, and continued so to do, they and their posterity, unto the time this book was written, and long after. For, as Mr. Mede hath observed, this medley of religions lasted above three hundred years, till towards the end of the Persian monarchy. At which time Manasse, brother to Jadda the high-priest of the Jews (that were returned to their own land), married the daughter of Sanballat, governor of Samaria. And after his example, other Jews of the best rank having married strange wives, contrary to the law, and being loath to leave them, betook themselves thither also; whom Sanballat entertained, and made his son-in-law their priest. And when Alexander the Great subdued the Persian monarchy, he obtained leave of him to build a temple upon Mount Gerizim, where Manasseh exercised the office of high-priest. This was very prejudicial to the Jews, and the occasion of a schism; whilst those who were discontented or excommunicated at Jerusalem were wont to run hither. Yet by this means the Samaritans (having gotten one of the sons of Aaron for their priest, and so many Jews being mingled among them) were brought to throw away all their false gods, and worship the God of Israel only. Yet so, that though they seemed to themselves to be the true worshippers of God, they retained a smack of idolatry; worshipping God under a visible representation, viz. that of a dove. Just as their predecessors, the ten tribes, worshipped the same God under the similitude of a calf, (book i. discourse 13.) And indeed this inclination to have some sensible representation of God was so universal, that they who had none, were thought by the gentile world to worship nothing.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass, in the third year of Hoshea son of Elah king of Israel, that Hezekiah the son of Ahaz king of Judah began to reign.] The third year of those nine which are mentioned before, xvii. 1. (See there.)

Ver. 2. Twenty and five years old was he when he began to reign; and he reigned twenty and nine years in Jerusalem: his mother's name also was Abi, daughter of Zachariah.] Unto this it is objected, that Ahaz lived but thirty and six years; (xvi. 2.) and therefore, according to this account, begat Hezekiah when he was but eleven years old, which seems incredible. To which Capellus in his Chronologia answers, that he reigned two or three years with his father; which is not likely, for the text saith he was twenty-five years old when he began to reign, after his father's death, which is beforementioned. And the solution of the Jews, mentioned by St. Jerome, is not much better, who say, he did not begin to reign presently after his father's death, but there was an interregnum for some years; because of a sedition that was in Jerusalem. But as there is no proof of this, so it is improbable that Hezekiah, who was a grown man, and beloved of the people, should not presently succeed his father. Calvisius's account is still worse, who will have Hezekiah to have been only the adopted son of Ahaz: which spoils the descent of our Saviour from David, as Bochartus observes: who therefore plainly admits that he did beget Hezekiah, when he was eleven or twelve years old. For so it may be understood, that he was but just entered upon the twenty-fifth year of his age, when he began his reign; and so but twenty-four complete. Therefore his father begat him about the twelfth year of his age. For if, from thirty-six years, four-and-twenty be taken, there remain twelve. And if we suppose, as we may very well, that Ahaz was near one-and-twenty years old when he began to reign, and near seventeen years older before he died (for the Scriptures, no more than other writers, do not take notice whether the year be perfect or imperfect), then he might be near fourteen years old when he begat Hezekiah. But take it according to the first account, that he was but eleven or twelve years old, Bochartus hath given a vast number of instances of persons that procreated children at that age. For ripeness for procreation is not to be precisely determined, either by physicians, philosophers, or lawyers (who have been pleased to fix the time); but consideration is to be had of the climate wherein men live, of the temper and constitution of their bodies, of their diet, and many other things; as he observes in an epistle to Nicol. Carbonellus, in his additions to the last edition of his Phaleg. p. 920.

Ver. 3. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, according to all that David his father did.] A character which is not given, I think, to any of the kings of Judah, since the reign of Asa, (1 Kings xv. 11.)

Ver. 4. He removed the high places.] Which none of his predecessors had the courage to attempt. But the carrying of the ten tribes captive, I suppose, mightily awakened both him and all the people, for the present (while it was fresh before their eyes), to observe the law of God very strictly.

And brake the images, and cut down the groves.] Which his father Ahaz had multiplied, (xvi. 14. 2 Chron. xxviii. 2. 24, 25.)

And brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made.] Which had been piously preserved as a monument of God's wonderful mercy to them in the wilderness; as Gideon intended his ephod should be of another deliverance, (Judg. viii. 27.) But as they went a whoring after that, so they did after this, as the Jews phrase it in Avoda Zara: and therefore Hezekiah broke it in pieces; that is, as the Talmudists there explain it, ground it to powder, and then scattered it into the air, that nothing of it might remain to be worshipped as a relic by superstitious people. And yet there is a fable that some fragments of it did remain until Josiah's time; and at this day, as Sigonius relates in his history of the kingdom of Italy, they shew this brazen serpent entire at the church of St. Ambrose, in Milan. But the wiser Romanists are ashamed of it, and acknowledge it is not the serpent made by Moses (which being broken in pieces by Hezekiah, was never restored), but another made in imitation of it. (See Buxtorf. Histor. Serpentis Æneï, cap. 6.)

For unto this day the children of Israel had burnt incense to it.] When this superstition began, we are not told; but nobody gives a better account of it than David Kimchi, whose words are these:—From the time that the kings of Israel did evil, and the children of Israel followed idolatry, until the reign of Hezekiah, they offered incense to it. For it being written in the law of Moses, whosoever looks upon it shall live, they fancied they might obtain blessings by its mediation, and therefore thought it worthy to be worshipped. It had been kept from Moses's days in memory of a miracle, just as the pot of manna also was; and Asa and Jehoshaphat did not extirpate it when they rooted out idolatry, because in their reign they did not observe that the people worshipped this serpent, or burnt incense to it, and therefore they left it as a memorial. But Hezekiah thought fit to take it quite away, when he abolished other idolatry, because in the time of his father they worshipped it as an idol. And though pious people among them accounted it only to be a memorial of a wonderful work, yet he judged it better to abolish it, though the memory of the miracle were lost together with it, than suffer it to remain, and leave the Israelites in danger to commit idolatry hereafter with it.

And he called it Nehushtan.] Some think Hezekiah called it by this name; others, that the Israelites called it so; the words signifying indifferently it was called Nehushtan, viz. by way of contempt and scorn. For the letter nun at the end of a word, the Jews say, is added by way of diminution. And nechosheth signifying brass, this is as much as to say, this serpent was mere brass or copper, and had no power in it, no profit, no ability to help, no divinity; and therefore not to be worshipped with Divine honour. Thus Kimchi: It being called by this name signified as much as if Hezekiah had said, "How could it come into any man's heart to think that this serpent could do any thing, which is mere brass?" Or, as Ralbag expounds it, "This serpent hath no more virtue in it than the common brass in their houses." For he takes an, in the end of the word, to be the same with am, ipsorum. But there is a great and good man of our own, who, having endeavoured to shew that the destruction of the old serpent the devil was fore-shadowed by the lifting up the brazen serpent in the wilderness, concludes that Hezekiah was moved with the greater indignation against the worship of it, because in truth it never was a type of our Saviour and Redeemer, but a figure of his grand enemy. This made him express such detestation of it, as is imported, he thinks, in the word Nehushtan. The signification of which is not to be found in our lexicons: for though nechosheth signify no more than brass, yet Nehushtan imports no less than our English words, foul fiend, the old dragon, or Satan. (See Dr. Jackson, Humiliation of the Son of God, chap. 31. parag. 6.)

Ver. 5. He trusted in the Lord God of Israel.] And not in the help of foreign forces, as his father Ahaz did; (xvi. 7.) nay, which that good king Asa called in to his assistance, (1 Kings xv. 18, 19.)

So that after him was none like him among all the kings of Judah, nor any that were before him.] Since the time that the kingdoms of Judah and Israel were divided.

Ver. 6. For he clave to the Lord, and departed not from following him, but kept his commandments, which the Lord commanded Moses.] He continued to observe God's laws through the whole course of his reign, to the conclusion of it; and did not like some of his predecessors, who began well, but fell off in the end of their days, as Joash and Amaziah did, (xii. 2. xiv. 3. 2 Chron. xxiv. 2. 19. xxv. 14.)

Ver. 7. And the Lord was with him; and he prospered whithersoever he went: and he rebelled against the king of Assyria, and served him not.] His prosperous success in all his enterprises, which was a visible token of God's presence with him, emboldened him to throw off the yoke of the king of Assyria, to which Ahaz had basely submitted; (xvi. 7.) which was not properly rebellion in Hezekiah, for Ahaz could not subject his kingdom to the Assyrian monarch, but only for his own time: his son was not bound to be his slave. Therefore the meaning is, he owned not the authority of the Assyrian king over him, but looked upon himself as a free sovereign in his own kingdom, independent upon him. In this, perhaps, he was a little too forward, being very much lifted up by his victories; but it is plain he was not able to maintain himself free from all subjection to the king of Assyria, (ver. 14.)

Ver. 8. He smote the Philistines, even unto Gaza, and the borders thereof, from the tower of the watchmen to the fenced city.] We had this phrase before, xvii. 19. (See there.) And these words seem to signify that he smote them all the country over, and recovered from them more than his father had lost, (2 Chron. xxviii. 18.) According to the prophecy of Isaiah, xiv. 18. where he bids the Philistines not to rejoice, because the rod that smote them was broken; (that is, Uzziah was dead, who had sorely afflicted them, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, 7.) for out of his root should come another, that would more grievously gall them, which was Hezekiah.

Ver. 9. And it came to pass, in the fourth year of king Hezekiah (which was the seventh year of Hoshea son of Elah king of Israel), that Shalmaneser king of Assyria came up against Samaria, and besieged it.] We had an account of the taking of Samaria before; and therefore the mentioning of it here again may seem needless. But, as now the year of Hezekiah's reign is set down wherein it was taken, so Abarbinel thinks the intention of the Divine writer was to connect these two histories together; the taking of Samaria, and the ascent of Sennacherib against Jerusalem; who, eight years after the destruction of the former, with great pride and confidence imagined he should do as much by the latter.

Ver. 10. And at the end of three years they took it: even in the sixth year of Hezekiah (that is the ninth year of Hoshea), Samaria was taken.

Ver. 11. And the king of Assyria did carry away Israel into Assyria, and put them in Halah and in Habor by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes.] As was before related, (chap. xvii. 6.) but could not be too often repeated, to make posterity dread the judgments of God, that were fallen upon them for their sins; as it follows again in the next words.

Ver. 12. Because they obeyed not the voice of the Lord their God, but transgressed his covenant, and all that Moses the servant of the Lord commanded, and would not hear them, nor do them.] See xvii. 34, 35.

Ver. 13. Now, in the fourteenth year of king Hezekiah did Sennacherib king of Assyria.] He was the son of Shalmaneser, and succeeded him in his kingdom after his death; as we read in the book of Tobit, i. 15.

Come up against all the fenced cities of Judah, and took them.] That is, took a great many of them, (2 Chron. xxxii. 1.)

Ver. 14. And Hezekiah king of Judah sent to the king of Assyria to Lachish.] This shews he had not taken all the fenced cities, for Lachish was a city of Judah, (Josh. xv. 39.) which is mentioned before in this book, (xiv. 19.) and was not yet taken, though siege was laid to it. Which, when he had taken, he intended to go up against Jerusalem; (2 Chron. xxxii. 2.) which moved Hezekiah to divert him from his purpose, by begging his pardon, as it here follows, for what he had done in shaking off his yoke.

Saying, I have offended.] In denying to be subject to him, which no doubt was the reason of this invasion.

Return from me: that which thou puttest upon me I will bear.] Though he had made great provision against him, as we read 2 Chron. xxxii. 3, 4, &c. yet he durst not venture to abide a siege; but chose rather to divert him, by submitting to such conditions as he would impose upon him.

And the king of Assyria appointed to Hezekiah three hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold.] This was a great burden, though it was not a yearly tribute, but only a present payment; which his weakness forced him to submit unto.

Ver. 15. And Hezekiah gave him all the silver that was found in the house of the Lord.] Which in public necessities they thought it was lawful to make use of, for their preservation. Yet the Talmudists reckon this one of the three ill things that Hezekiah did, in cutting off the golden plates, mentioned in the next verse. (See Selden, de Synedr. lib. ii. cap. 1. n. 4.)

And in the treasures of the king's house.] Which had been so exhausted before, that he was forced to raise the money by other means, as it follows, ver. 16.

Ver. 16. At that time did Hezekiah cut off the gold from the doors of the temple of the Lord, and from the pillars which Hezekiah king of Judah had overlaid, and gave it to the king of Assyria.] It is very probable, that when Ahaz defaced the temple, and shut up the doors of it, (xvi. 17. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 2. 4.) he cut off this gold; which Hezekiah took care to repair; but was now constrained to cut it off himself. Upon which words Procopius Gazæus seems to me to have very well observed; that Hezekiah, finding he had not sufficient treasure of his own, to answer the imposition laid upon him, was driven by necessity to make use of things sacred, lest the enemy should burn the city and the temple. But what was thus employed, pious kings were wont to restore, as soon as they were able, out of the spoils of war, when it was ended.

Ver. 17. And the king of Assyria sent Tartan, and Rab-saris, and Rab-shakeh, from Lachish to king Hezekiah with a great host against Jerusalem: and they went up and came to Jerusalem.] Some of the Jews think that Sennacherib, having received the tribute from Hezekiah, went to his own land; but because Hezekiah did not continue to send it every year, after some time returned to Judea again, and besieged Jerusalem. But there is not a word of this, either in this book, or the Chronicles, or in the prophet Isaiah: therefore it is more probable, that, having received the money he demanded, he made his expedition into Egypt, of which Herodotus and others, and some think Isaiah also, speak, as Sir John Marsham observes, (Isa. x. 26. 28.) But as he was the first king of Assyria that invaded Egypt, so he went no further than to the entrance of it, to Pelusium, which he could not take, and so at his return broke his faith with Hezekiah; and notwithstanding his present, wherewith he pretended to be satisfied, laid siege to Jerusalem.

And when they were come up, they came and stood by the conduit of the upper pool, which is in the highway of the fuller's field.] They took up their head-quarters, as we now speak, by the conduit or canal, into which water was derived from the upper fish-pond or pool; which was in the highway to the field, where the fullers, after they had washed their clothes in that pool, were wont to spread them.

Ver. 18. And when they had called to the king.] They were so bold as to demand audience of the king himself, that they might treat with him in person for a surrender.

There came out to them Eliakim the son of Hilkiah, which was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and Joah the son of Asaph the recorder.] Though he would not vouchsafe to go himself, yet he sent his major-domo, as they now speak, and his secretary, or a principal doctor of the law, and the master of the requests. For since the king of Assyria sent three messengers, he thought fit to send as many. Isaiah, indeed, mentions only Rab-shakeh, as sent by the king of Assyria: which Seder Olam Rabba thinks is meant of the first legation; but in the second, when he besieged Libnah, (xix. 8.) he joined Tartan and Rabsaris with him. It is very uncertain what officer Shebna was; for he is said Isa. xxii. 15. to be over the house, and the LXX. sometimes make him treasurer, sometimes scribe, and Mr. Selden thinks he might be præfectus prætorio. (Lib. de Succes. in Pontif. p. 142.)

Ver. 19. And Rab-shakeh said unto them.] He was the chief speaker, being an eloquent man; and, as the Hebrew doctors will have it (whom Procopius follows), an apostate Jew. Which is not altogether improbable; both because he could speak readily in the Hebrew tongue, and when he blasphemed the Divine Majesty, the king and his nobles rent their clothes; which was not usual, unless he that uttered such blasphemous words was an Israelite. Some think his name imports that he was the principal cupbearer to the king of Assyria.

Speak ye now to Hezekiah, saying, Thus saith the great king, the king of Assyria.] He assumed to himself the style of the great king, because of his great conquests and large dominions.

What confidence is this wherein thou trustest?] As much as to say, it was the greatest folly to think any body could defend him from so great a king.

Ver. 20. Thou sayest (but they are but vain words), I have counsel and strength for the war.] In reason, he thought Hezekiah should not stand out against his master, unless he had all things necessary for his defence: but he did delude his people, if he told them, that he wanted neither skill to manage war, nor power to execute good counsels.

Now, on whom dost thou trust, that thou rebellest against me?] He derides him, as full of vain hopes; and upbraids him with his rebellion. Of which he was thought formerly to be guilty, but could not now be justly accused of it, when he had submitted to him with such a great present. These are therefore words of the highest pride and insolence.

Ver. 21. Now, behold, thou trustest upon the staff of this bruised reed, even upon Egypt.] He thought it probable he would seek for succour from Egypt, being a neighbouring country; which would be ready to assist him, that they might be revenged of the king of Assyria for his late invasion. But he represents Egypt as very weak, and utterly unable to help him; being sorely crushed, though not destroyed, by Sennacherib.

On which if a man lean, it will go into his hand, and pierce it: so is Pharaoh king of Egypt unto all that trust on him.] He represents the power of Egypt to be as brittle as the cane or reeds that grow on the banks of the Nile (to which he seems to allude), on which if a man leaned, they brake, and the splinters run into his hand. Such is Pharaoh, saith he, a man gets no help, but mischief, by relying upon him; as he doth who takes one of those canes for his staff to support him.

Ver. 22. But if ye say unto me, We trust in the Lord our God: is not that he whose high places and altars Hezekiah hath taken away; and hath said to Judah and Jerusalem, Ye shall worship before this altar in Jerusalem?] This weak arguing proceeded from his ignorance of that God and his law, in whom Hezekiah trusted. Which made him call those crimes, which were his greatest virtues; in prohibiting their offering sacrifice in any other place but that which God appointed.

Ver. 23. Now therefore, I pray thee, give pledges to my lord the king of Assyria, and I will deliver thee two thousand horses, if thou be able on thy part to set riders upon them.] He seems to challenge him to come out, and fight with his master: and, if he could give security to make that use of them, he would furnish him with two thousand horses, provided he was able to find so many men to sit upon them. Which are words of the highest contempt, and undervaluing of his power. Or, the meaning may be, he would lay a wager with him, he could not find men to sit upon so many horses; for few were good horsemen in Judea, where horses were scarce.

Ver. 24. How then wilt thou turn away the face of one captain of the least of my master's servants.] Much less stand before his whole army.

And put thy trust on Egypt for chariots and horsemen?] With which Egypt abounded above most other countries; who sometimes furnished the Israelites with horses, but none like Egypt. For which reason Moses forbids them to multiply horses, lest it should cause them to return to Egypt; (Deut. xvii. 16.) and the prophet reproves them severely for going to Egypt for help, and staying upon horses, &c. (Isa. xxxi. 1. 3.)

Ver. 25. Am I now come up without the Lord against this place to destroy it? The Lord said unto me, Go up against this land, and destroy it.] If he had not been a Jew, yet he had learned the name of their God; and pretended his master was come up against Jerusalem, by a commission from him. Which were vain words; (as he calls Hezekiah's, ver. 20.) for there were none of his prophets among the Assyrians. But, perhaps, he concluded from what the Assyrian king had done to Samaria, God intended he should do so to Jerusalem.

Ver. 26. Then said Eliakim the son of Hilkiah, and Shebna, and Joah, unto Rab-shakeh, saying, Speak, I pray thee, unto thy servants in the Syrian language (for we understand it); and speak not with us in the Jews' language, in the ears of the people that are on the wall.] I suppose Eliakim perceived the people to be frighted with his big words, and therefore entreated him, in the name of the other commissioners sent to treat with him, to speak no longer in the Jews' language, but in his own: for he was not sent to treat with the people, but with them who understood the Syrian tongue very well.

Ver. 27. But Rab-shakeh said unto them, Hath my master sent me to thy master, and to thee, to speak these words? hath he not sent me to the men that sit on the wall, that they may eat their own dung, and drink their own piss with you?] To make them know that he will reduce them to the greatest extremity, if they do not submit unto him? for it is an hyperbolical speech, importing such straits as were never known.

Ver. 28. And Rab-shakeh stood, and cried with a loud voice in the Jews' language, and spake, saying, Hear the words of the great king, the king of Assyria.] He seems to have raised both himself and his voice higher, that he might be better heard by all.

Ver. 29. Thus saith the king, Let not Hezekiah deceive you; for he shall not be able to deliver you out of my hand.] He repeats, with the greatest assurance, the power of his king, and the weakness of Hezekiah: representing from thence how they were deluded with empty promises, if he persuaded them he should be able to preserve them.

Ver. 30. Neither let Hezekiah make you trust in the Lord, saying, The Lord will surely deliver us, and this city shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria.] This was the highest presumption to persuade them not to place their hope in God, as if his master was stronger than he.

Ver. 31. Hearken not to Hezekiah: but make an agreement with me by a present, and come out to me, and then eat ye every man of his own vine, and every one of his fig-tree, and drink ye every one the waters of his cistern.] Having represented to them the miseries unto which a siege would reduce them, he invites them to a surrender upon advantageous conditions.

Ver. 32. Until I come and take you away to a land like your own land; a land of corn and wine, a land of bread and vineyards, a land of oil-olive and of honey, that ye may live, and not die: and hearken not to Hezekiah, when he persuadeth you, saying, The Lord will deliver us.] If they would seek the favour of the king of Assyria, by making him a present, and delivering themselves up to his mercy, he promises they should be transported to a better country than that to which the Israelites were carried: and, in the meantime, every one enjoy his own possessions. But he was afraid Heze-kiah's avowed confidence in God would prevail with them, to trust to him for deliverance, which makes him so often desire them not to depend upon that.

Ver. 33. Hath any of the gods of the nations delivered at all his land out of the hand of the king of Assyria?] He argues very popularly and strongly, if his supposition had been true, That the God of Israel, the God of the whole earth (yea, of heaven and earth), was like those of all other nations, who presided only over one country or city.

Ver. 34. Where are the gods of Hamath and of Arpad?] Those were cities or countries, which the king of Assyria had conquered.

Where are the gods of Sepharvaim.] Mentioned before, xvii. 31.

Hena, and Ivah?] Some think these were the gods of Sepharvaim; which is confuted by the place beforenamed. They were rather cities, whose gods could not protect them.

Have they delivered Samaria out of my hand?] That is, have the gods of Samaria been able to do more than the rest?

Ver. 35. Who are they among all the gods of the countries that have delivered their country out of my hand, that the Lord should deliver Jerusalem out of my hand?] He desires an instance of one god, that had been able to save his country when his master invaded it: and therefore it was best for them to yield their city up to him, since God himself could not preserve it, unless he could do more than any other had done, which he concluded was unlikely. It must be acknowledged that Rab-shakeh was an excellent orator, as well as a soldier, not inferior in eloquence to Julius Cæsar.

Ver. 36. But the people held their peace, and answered him not a word: for the king's commandment was, saying, Answer him not.] This was a very wise order, because he might have made some advantage by a sudden answer; and it was no less pious: for Hezekiah believed God would answer for himself, not in words, but in such deeds as would demonstrate he was above all gods.

Ver. 37. Then came Eliakim the son of Hilkiah, which was over the household, and Shebna the scribe, and Joah the son of Asaph the recorder, to Hezekiah, with their clothes rent, and told him the words of Rab-shakeh.] It was the custom of the Jews to rend their clothes, when they heard a man blaspheme God's name: and if we will believe them, when the witnesses of a blasphemy did but repeat the words before the judges, they rent their clothes. Accordingly Hezekiah, when his commissioners gave an account of Rab-shakeh's words to him, he did so, (xix. 1.) But they have determined, that they were not bound to rend their clothes, unless he was an Israelite that blasphemed. Therefore they have resolved, as I said before, that Rab-shakeh was an apostate Israelite. And this custom was common to all nations (as appears from Homer, Herodotus, and Virgil), who expressed great grief in this manner.

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when king Hezekiah heard it, that he rent his clothes.] See the last verse of the foregoing chapter.

And covered himself with sackcloth, and went into the house of the Lord.] He fasted and mourned, and went into the temple to pray. Sometimes they put on sackcloth next to their skin, instead of a shirt: but here it seems to signify only, that he was clothed in this vile habit, in token of his great trouble and sorrow.

Ver. 2. And he sent Eliakim, which was over the household, and Shebna the scribe.] See xviii. 18.

And the elders of the priests.] The principal persons among the priests.

Covered with sackcloth, to Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz.] In the same mournful habit to beg his prayers to God for them.

Ver. 3. And they said unto him, Thus saith Hezekiah, This day is a day of trouble, and of rebuke, and blasphemy.] They represent to him the great straits in which they were, and the reproaches cast upon them: and (which was worst of all) the blasphemy they had heard against God.

For the children are come to the birth, and there is not strength to bring forth.] And the present danger wherein they were of perishing, unless speedily relieved: like that of a woman, whose child being fallen down, after many throes, to the place of birth, she was so spent that she had no strength left to bring it forth. Or, as Procopius Gazæus expounds it, "We are in pain to hear such blasphemous words, and have no power to punish those wicked wretches as they deserve."

Ver. 4. It may be the Lord thy God will hear the words of Rab-shakeh.] So as to take notice of them, and punish him.

Whom the king of Assyria hath sent to reproach the living God; and will reprove the words which the Lord thy God hath heard.] Reprove him for the words (as the Targum expounds it), the which he had spoken against God. But Lud. de Dieu, following R. Solomon Jarchi, thinks that the word we translate reprove, signifies to prove, and, by arguments, to demonstrate. And so refers it to Rab-shakeh in this manner: "It may be the Lord will hear all the words of Rab-shakeh, whom the king of Assyria hath sent to reproach the living God: and that openly with a bold face, fearing nothing, because all things succeed according to their hearts' desire." And he saith, he shall wonder if this sense displease any body.

Wherefore lift up thy prayer for the remnant that is left.] That Judah might not be carried captive, as Israel had been.

Ver. 5. So the servants of king Hezekiah came to Isaiah.] And delivered the foregoing message to him.

Ver. 6. And Isaiah said unto them, Thus shall ye say to your master, Thus saith the Lord, Be not afraid of the words which thou hast heard, with which the servants of the king of Assyria have blasphemed me.

Ver. 7. Behold, I will send a blast on him.] A pestilential blast, which destroyed his army in one night: (ver. 35.) others translate it a spirit; which is the same. For God sent an angel, who smote them with that pestilence.

And he shall hear a rumour, and shall return to his own land.] The report, perhaps, was renewed after that stroke, that Tirhakah (of whom he had heard before, ver. 9.) was coming against him; which made him haste away, with the small remains of his army, to his own country.

And I will cause him to fall by the sword in his own land.] Which was fulfilled, ver. 37.

Ver. 8. So Rab-shakeh returned.] Not with the host that he brought with him, (xviii. 17.) but he himself returned to give his master an account of what he had done; and left Rabsaris to carry on the siege, and straiten the city, till he could come with the whole army against it.

And found the king of Assyria warring against Libnah: for he had heard that he was departed from Lachish.] Being unable, I suppose, to make himself master of it.

Ver. 9. And when he heard say of Tirhakah king of Ethiopia, He is come out to fight against thee.] Whether he fought with Tirhakah or not, and what the success was, doth not appear. But it is to be noted, that there were two countries called Cush (which we translate Ethiopia); one in Africa beyond Egypt, the other in Arabia, which is the Ethiopia here meant. For the king of the other was far off, and must have marched through Egypt before he could come to fight with Sennacherib. But this was near, and was able to raise a powerful army, as appears by the vast forces which Zerah brought against Asa, (2 Chron. xiv. 9.) And thus 2 Chron. xxi. 16. as Bochartus observes, must necessarily be understood, where the Arabians, whom God stirred up against Jehoram, are said to be near to the Ethiopians, which cannot be true of those beyond Egypt. (See his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 2.)

He sent messengers again to Hezekiah, saying.] Among which Rab-shakeh was the chief.

Ver. 10. Thus shall ye speak to Hezekiah king of Judah, saying.] They could not come to the speech of him; but sent him a letter containing the words following, (ver. 14.)

Let not thy God in whom thou trustest deceive thee, saying, Jerusalem shall not be delivered into the hand of the king of Assyria.] He had heard, I suppose, that Hezekiah declared he trusted in the Lord, and had assurance from him, that he the king of Assyria should not prevail against him.

Ver. 11. Behold, thou hast heard what the king of Assyria hath done to all lands, by destroying them utterly.] This letter is of the same import with the former message, presuming the God of Israel was like the gods of other countries, and had no more power than they to preserve his worshippers.

And shalt thou be delivered?] Such questions imply a strong denial; and therefore it is as much as to say, Thou shalt be delivered no more than they were.

Ver. 12. Have the gods of the nations delivered them which my fathers have destroyed.] He argues from the long successes his ancestors had enjoyed: none of the gods, whose countries they had destroyed, making opposition to them for some ages.

As Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph, and the children of Eden which were in Thelasar?] These were places well known in those days; there was a Gozan and Hara in Media, as Bochartus observes, lib. iii. Phaleg. cap. 14. Where Rezeph was is uncertain; but Ptolemy mentions such a city in Syria, where St. Jerome places Thelasar: and there were more cities than one in those countries called Adana, which is the same with Eden.

Ver. 13. Where is the king of Hamath, and the king of Arpad, and the king of the city of Sepharvaim, of Hena, and Ivah?] Places beforementioned, xviii. 34. Nothing can be further observed of this, but that the fury of Rab-shakeh increased: so that what he had uttered in words, he now more deliberately set down in writing: affirming boldly, that their God was a deceiver, if he promised them deliverance.

Ver. 14. And Hezekiah received the letter of the hand of the messengers, and read it: and Hezekiah went up into the house of the Lord, and spread it before the Lord.] He could approach no nearer than to the outward court of the temple: where, at the entrance of the priests' court, he looked towards the sanctuary, God's dwelling-place, and laid this letter before him.

Ver. 15. And Hezekiah prayed before the Lord, and said, O Lord God of Israel, which dwellest between the cherubims, thou art the God, even thou alone, of all the kingdoms of the earth; thou hast made heaven and earth.] Here he directly thwarts the blasphemous opinion of the Assyrians beforementioned, (xvii. 27. xviii. 35.) that the God of Israel was but the particular Lord of that country; not the universal Sovereign, which Hezekiah acknowledged him to be, because the Creator of the whole world.

Ver. 16. Lord, bow down thine ear, and hear; open, Lord, thine eyes, and see; and hear the words of Sennacherib, which hath sent him to reproach the living God.] That is, sent Rab-shakeh. He speaks in such language as men use, when they earnestly beseech others not to neglect their supplication; but vouchsafe to attend, and to give a gracious answer to them.

Ver. 17. Of a truth, Lord, the kings of Assyria have destroyed the nations and their lands.] Do not boast of more than they have done.

Ver. 18. And have cast their gods into the fire: for they were no gods, but the work of men's hands, wood and stone; therefore have they destroyed them.] They had prevailed, he acknowledges, over their gods, as well as over men; but it was because they were not so good as men, being mere wood and stone.

Ver. 19. Now therefore, O Lord our God, I beseech thee, save thou us out of his hands, that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that thou art the Lord God, even thou only.] He beseeches him to distinguish himself upon those idols; by giving them such a deliverance as might demonstrate to all the world that he was the living God (as he is often called), superior to all others, who were not able to save their worshippers.

Ver. 20. Then Isaiah the son of Amoz sent to Hezekiah, saying, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, That which thou hast prayed to me against Sennacherib king of Assyria I have heard] He knew by the spirit of prophecy, that Hezekiah had represented his case to God in the temple; who bade Isaiah assure him his petition was granted.

Ver. 21. This is the word that the Lord hath spoken concerning him; The virgin, the daughter of Zion, hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn; the daughter of Jerusalem hath shaken her head at thee.] These words comprehend the whole city. For by the daughter of Zion he means the people that inhabited the upper part of the city, where the king's palace stood: and by the daughter of Jerusalem, the people of the lower part of the city; and all that was not comprehended under the name of Zion. They shaked their heads at him; which is the same with despising, and laughing him to scorn. For shaking the head is the posture of those that mock at others, (Psal. xxii. 7. Matt. xxvii. 39.) He calls Zion a virgin, because this fortress, since David conquered it, had remained inviolable, and had never been taken by any enemy. Joash, indeed, king of Israel, took Jerusalem, and brake down the wall of it; (xiv. 13, 14.) but I think the fort of Zion had never been taken.

Ver. 22. Whom hast thou reproached and blasphemed? and against whom hast thou exalted thy voice.] So Rabshakeh did, xviii. 28.

And lifted up thine eyes on high?] As those do who have haughty thoughts of themselves; and overlook others with contempt and scorn, (Prov. xxi. 4.)

Even against the Holy One of Israel.] God is called the Holy One, with respect to his peerless perfections; and the Holy One of Israel, as having a peculiar respect to them above all people, who therefore should be defended by his almighty power.

Ver. 23. By thy messengers thou hast reproached the Lord, and hast said, With the multitude of my chariots I am come up to the height of the mountains, to the sides of Lebanon, and will cut down the tall cedars thereof, and the choice fir-trees thereof; and I will enter into the lodgings of his borders, and into the forest of his Carmel.] This is an admirable description of the boastings of a king puffed up with great success, and is as much as if he had said, What place is there into which I cannot make my way? when I have gone, even with my chariots in great number, to the top of high mountains; to Lebanon itself, through the most difficult passages, which I have opened and planed for them? Who shall hinder me from cutting down its tallest cedars and fir-trees (perhaps he means their princes and great men), and, when I have done, from marching and taking up my quarters in the extremest borders of the land, climbing up to the top of Carmel (which was towards the Mediterranean Sea), or entering into all the fruitful places of the country, by making an entire conquest of it? For so Carmel often signifies, not a mountain, but a fruitful field, in the language of this prophet, Isa. x. 18. xvi. 10.

Ver. 24. I have digged and drunk strange waters.] He brags that he had marched with his vast army through strange countries, and in the driest places, where it was thought his army would die with thirst; but he digged till he found water.

And with the sole of my feet have I dried up all the rivers of the besieged places.] This is commonly thought to signify, that he had gone dry-shod with his whole army over great rivers, whose streams he turned another way; and so had taken the strongest fortresses, surrounded with deep waters and great ramparts. But Bochartus hath made a plainer paraphrase upon these words, which he thus translates: I have dried up the rivers of Egypt. As much as to say, "I will enter as easily into Egypt, in which you confide, as if, when I come thither, all the rivers wherewith it is environed, should be dried up." (See his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 15.) For the Hebrew word masor (which we translate every where besieged places, or defences, or fortresses) should rather be taken for the singular of Mesoraim, which by contraction is called Mitzraim, that is, Egypt. And if this be allowed, the sense then here is, as I said before, I have dried up all the rivers of Egypt: which was the highest vaunt he could make of his power, and numerous forces. Thus Isa. xix. 6. The brooks of defences shall be dried up; is interpreted by Kimchi, The rivers of Egypt shall be emptied and dried up. And more plainly, Micah vii. 12. where from the fortress to the river is so obscure, that it is not to be understood; but from Egypt to Euphrates is such clear sense, that one cannot but think it should be so translated; for those were the bounds of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 25. Hast thou not heard long ago how I have done it, and of ancient times that I have formed it?] These are the words of God, in answer to those empty boasts:—But what is this to what I have done? Hast thou not heard how I brought my people dry-shod through the Red Sea? How in ancient times, I say, long before thou or thy ancestors were born, I did this by my own strength alone, without the help of nature or art? For so the word jatzar, which we translate formed, is used Gen. ii. 8. and other places.

Now have I brought it to pass, that thou shouldest be to lay waste fenced cities into ruinous heaps.] And it is I that have now brought thee to do all these things of which thou braggedst. Thou couldest not have done one of them without my leave, who therefore permitted it, that I might punish those cities by thy hand, which I had devoted to destruction. (See Isa. x. 5, 6. 13—15.)

Ver. 26. Therefore were their inhabitants of small power; they were dismayed and confounded; they were as the grass of the field, and as the green herb, as the grass on the house-tops, and as corn blasted before it be grown up.] This was the reason, that the people of those cities whereof thou spakest (ver. 12, 13.) were so very feeble, and unable to oppose thee; because I delivered them into thy hand.

Ver. 27. But I know thy abode, and thy going out, and thy coming in, and thy rage against me.] As much as to say, There are none of thy motions hidden from me. For before thou camest from thy own country, I knew with what design thou marchedst out, and what thou hast done since wheresoever thou hast entered; and understand with what rage and fury thou art come up to destroy my dwelling-place.

Ver. 28. Because thy rage against me, and thy tumult is come up into my ears.] I have heard the noise thou makest with thy furious threatenings, and with thy great army which hath entered Judea.

Therefore I will put my hook in thy nose, and my bridle in thy lips, and I will turn thee back by the way that thou camest.] He compares his absolute power over him to that of a fisherman, who, let a fish tumble ever so much in the water, hath it fast by a hook he hath fixed in his nose; or to a man upon a horse or a mule, whom he can turn which way he pleases, when he hath a curb in their mouths. Even so, saith God, will I do with thee: draw thee back, press thou ever so much to compass thy designs, into thy own country, without any success.

Ver. 29. And this shall be a sign unto thee.] This is spoken to Hezekiah.

Ye shall eat this year such things as grow of themselves, and in the second year that which springeth of the same; and in the third year sow ye, and reap, and plant vineyards, and eat the fruit thereof.] This was not a sign of the truth of his prophecy, because it was to come after that was fulfilled; but a token of God's extraordinary favour and love to them, when Sennacherib was gone; and they were in fear of another enemy, viz. a grievous famine. For though he had trodden down or eaten up all the corn with his army, yet they should find sufficient left to maintain them this year, which was the fourteenth of Hezekiah. And though the next was the sabbatical year, in which they were to let the land rest, and neither sow nor reap, yet he promises enough should grow up of itself to sustain them, without any culture, out of the corn scattered in the former year. And then, in the sixteenth year, God assures them of liberty to till their land as they were wont, and that they should sow and reap as in a time of peace, when no enemy appeared, nor there was any fear of any. But until the corn sprung up and was ripe that year, they lived upon what grew of itself in the sabbatical year, without tillage. Which demonstrates the wonderful providence of God over this people, in taking care they should want nothing in those years, without any care of their own, if they believed in his word. See Lev. xxv. where the precept about this sabbatical year is delivered; and was observed by this people, from the first conquest and division of the land of Canaan, forty-seven years after the coming out of Egypt. (See Dr. Alix, Reflections on the Old Testament, par. ii. chap. 1.)

Ver. 30. And the remnant that is escaped of the house of Judah shall yet again take root downward, and bear fruit upward.] He pursues the metaphor from corn that is sown in the ground; signifying, that they should have firm possession of their own country; and therein increase, and multiply, and flourish exceedingly.

Ver. 31. For out of Jerusalem shall go forth a remnant, and they that escape out of Mount Zion.] For they who were now shut up in Jerusalem should be at liberty: and they who escaped the enemy's fury in the country, and fled thither for refuge, should go out of Mount Zion to their own possessions.

The zeal of the Lord of hosts shall do this.] His great love to his own honour, and to his people, shall do these wonders; to vindicate his glory from that contempt which was cast upon it by Sennacherib.

Ver. 32. Therefore thus saith the Lord concerning the king of Assyria, He shall not come into this city, nor shoot an arrow there, nor come before it with a shield, nor cast a bank against it.] He promises the king of Assyria should be so far from possessing himself of the city at this time, that he should not assault it, by shooting so much as an arrow in it: no, nor appear with his army against it, or raise bulwarks to besiege it. Or, as the Hebrews understand it, they should not cast a stone out of their engines against it. Rabsaris, I observed ver. 8. continued the siege; but whatsoever he did before, after this message of Isaiah he made no attempt upon them.

Ver. 33. By the way that he came, by the same way he shall return, and shall not come into this city, saith the Lord.] He confirms what he said before, (ver. 28.)

Ver. 34. For I will defend this city to save it.] To preserve it from destruction.

For my own sake, and for my servant David's sake.] Upon which account he had formerly spared them, when they deserved to be punished, (1 Kings xi. 12, 13.)

Ver. 35. And it came to pass that night.] The Jews in the Gemara Sanhedrin, (cap. 11. n. 20.) say, that in the very night after they set down before Jerusalem, and were so weary that they made no attempt upon the city, this which follows fell out. Others think it was the same night that Hezekiah received Sennacherib's railing letter; which is more probable than the opinion of our Dr. Jackson, who will have it that it was the same night, about two years after. (See upon the Attributes, sect. 3. chap. 26.) However it was, the blow was the more remarkable, because it was given in that very night, wherein he had lifted up himself against the God of heaven; as Belshazzar afterward did, and had his fatal stroke given him in like manner. (See Dan. v. 30.)

That the angel of the Lord went out, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred fourscore and five thousand men: and when they arose in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses.] By a pestilential disease, as Josephus calls it, λοιμικὸν νόσον, such a vast number were suddenly cut off. It is a question, whether this destruction was made in the army that besieged Libnah, or in that host which Rab-shakeh brought up against Jerusalem. Josephus thinks the latter; for it is probable Rab-shakeh was come with his whole host against Jerusalem, which before was straitened by Rabsaris; and κατὰ τὴν πρώτην τῆς πολιορκίας νύκτα, the first night after they had begirt the city (as the Jews say, I observed, in Sanhedrin), the angel of the Lord made this great slaughter among them: lib. x. Antiq. cap. 2. where a little before, in the end of the first chapter, he takes notice of a horrible lie which Herodotus reports from the Egyptians: who say their king, being also a priest, by his prayers to his god, brought this destruction upon the Assyrians, as they lay before Pelusium: a great army of rats coming in the night, and gnawing all their bow-strings in pieces, so that they could not fight. So studious they were to pervert the truth, and corrupt the sacred story.

Ver. 36. So Sennacherib king of Assyria departed, and went and returned, and dwelt at Nineveh.] Being afraid that Tirhakah should come and destroy the remainders of his broken army, (ver. 9.)

Ver. 37. And it came to pass as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god.] The LXX. here call this god Nesorach; and upon Isaiah, where this story is again told, Asarach. But what any of these names signify, Mr. Selden acknowledges he cannot tell, having in all his reading never met with any thing that might explain it. But Kircher adventures to say it was the image of a ship, representing the ark of Noah: the relics of which, Josephus tells us, some reported were, in his time, in the neighbouring mountains of Armenia. And a later writer, Beyerus (in his additions to Selden, de Diis Syris), thinks it signifies as much as the bird of Noah, that is, a dove, which was worshipped by the Assyrians: or, as others conjecture (for they can do no more), this word is derived from nes, which in Chaldee signifies a province, and rac, which signifies a king; that is, Jupiter the king, and conservator of that province.

That Adrammelech and Sharezer his sons smote him with the sword.] Which they might the more easily do, when he suspected no danger. The reason of it was, because (in his danger, we may suppose) he had vowed that he would offer them up unto his god: therefore they sacrificed him, to prevent being sacrificed themselves. One of them seems to have been called after the name of a god worshipped in those countries, (xv. 11. 31.)

And they escaped into the land of Armenia.] Which was not far off; and where there were mountains of very difficult ascent, and inhabited by a warlike people.

And Esar-haddon his son reigned in his stead.] Who was the king that sent a colony to people the country of Samaria, (as I observed before from Ezra iv. 2.) and the rather, because he feared Hezekiah might have taken possession of it, after such a defeat as his father Sennacherib had received. His name is curtailed several ways: for in the book of Tobit he is called Sar-chedon, (i. 21.) the first syllable of his name being cut off; and the LXX. cut off the next, calling him Aser-dan; and Isaiah cuts off both, calling him Sargon, (xx. 1.)

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. IN those days was Hezekiah sick unto death.] This is set down after the death of Sennacherib; but with this general note only of the time, wherein this sickness fell out, in those days. Which, as primate Usher observes in his Annals, doth not relate to what went just before (to the time when the king of Assyria invaded the land), as is evident from ver. 6. of this chapter; where he promises to add fifteen years to his life, and also to deliver him from the king of Assyria. Which deliverance, therefore, was after this sickness, which was in the latter end of his fourteenth year; to which if we add fifteen, they make up the whole twenty-nine years of his reign.

And the prophet Isaiah the son of Amoz came to him, and said, Thus saith the Lord, Set thy house in order; for thou shalt die, and not live.] That is, his disease was, in its own nature, mortal, and could not be cured by any human remedy: therefore he wished him to settle his estate, and, as we speak, to make his will; how all things in his house should be disposed when he was dead.

Ver. 2. Then he turned his face unto the wall, and prayed unto the Lord, saying.] That is, towards the wall of the sanctuary, as the Targum expounds it. (See Dr. Hammond upon Acts x. annot. b.) He thought, as it was not beyond the power of God to restore him, so he had not peremptorily decreed that he should die: but there was a tacit condition in the message, (as in other cases, Jonah iii. 4.) otherwise he would not have prayed to be spared.

Ver. 3. I beseech thee, O Lord, remember how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight.] He was not conscious to himself that he had omitted any thing which was to be done for the restoring the true worship of God. In which he had been so exact, as to take away the high places, which had continued ever since the time of David, and none durst remove them: and therefore he presumed to beg that he might live, to settle and establish what he had begun to do.

And Hezekiah wept sore.] One reason was, as many think, that he had not yet a son to succeed him on the throne. For he lived after this fifteen years; and when he died Manasseh was but twelve years old, who therefore was born after this sickness.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass, afore Isaiah was gone out into the middle court, that the word of the Lord came unto him, saying.] It is doubtful whether we are to understand the middle of the court of the king's house, or the middle of the city; for the one is in the text, the other in the margin of the Hebrew Bibles. But it is not material which we follow; for the meaning is, that he was not gone far before he was ordered to go back, and carry a new message that his prayer was heard.

Ver. 5. Turn again, and tell Hezekiah the captain of my people, Thus saith the Lord, The God of David thy father, I have heard thy prayer, and seen thy tears: behold, I will heal thee; on the third day thou shalt go up into the house of the Lord.] Recover his strength so fast, as to be able in three days' time to go to the temple, and give God thanks for his cure; which appears by this to have been miraculous.

Ver. 6. And I will add unto thy days fifteen years.] More than he could have lived according to the course of nature.

And I will deliver this city out of the hand of the king of Assyria; and I will defend this city for my own sake, and for my servant David's sake.] For this sickness was that year when he threatened to destroy it. (See upon ver. 1.) It was a great encouragement to faithful obedience, that God so often mentions David's services with such a kind remembrance of them.

Ver. 7. And Isaiah said, Take a lump of figs: and they took and laid it on the bile, and he recovered.] There might be some natural virtue in this cataplasm, to soften and ripen a hard humour, as this seems to have been (some think a plague-sore), but it was a supernatural power which made so speedy a cure; of which God used this as a sign.

Ver. 8. And Hezekiah said unto Isaiah, What shall be the sign that the Lord will heal me, and that I shall go up into the house of the Lord the third day?] He did believe, no doubt, what the prophet said, otherwise he would have been sharply reproved. But he made bold to desire a confirmation of his faith, as good men had done in other cases: particularly Gideon, who threw down the altar of Baal, and cut down the grove at God's command, and blew the trumpet, and gathered an army, which were arguments of a strong faith; and yet, after all this, desired a sign from God, that God would deliver Israel by his hand. (Judg. vi. 25. 34. 36, 37, &c.)

Ver. 9. And Isaiah said, This sign shalt thou have of the Lord, that the Lord will do the thing that he hath spoken; Shall the shadow go forward ten degrees, or back ten degrees?] Sometimes God, who is a free agent, intending to convince men by great wonders that he is to be believed, is so graciously condescending, as to give them leave to choose what they would have him do, or when, that his power may be the more notorious, and no room left for doubting. So he did with Pharaoh, Exod. viii. 9, 10. and with Ahaz, Isa. vii. 11. and here with his son Hezekiah.

Ver. 10. And Hezekiah said, It is a light thing for the shadow to go down ten degrees: nay, but let the shadow return backward ten degrees.] It was comparatively small, because to go forward was the natural course of it; but to return back was a miracle, both in the thing and in the manner of it.

Ver. 11. And Isaiah the prophet cried unto the Lord; and he brought the shadow ten degrees backward, by which it had gone down in the dial of Ahaz.] It is observed by many modern interpreters, that there is not a word here spoken concerning the sun's going back; but only of the shadow upon the dial, which might by the power of God go either forward or backward, the sun still holding its course, as it was wont to do. And the degrees or lines in the dial may signify either hours, or half hours, or, as some think, quarters. (See Vossius, de Orig. et Progressu Idol. lib. ii. cap. 9.) Now the going back being three times mentioned in this chapter, and always spoken of the shadow, therefore they conclude the miracle was wrought upon the dial only, not upon the very body of the sun. It is said, indeed, in Isa. xxxviii. 8. So the sun returned ten degrees; but they think that may be meant of the shadow of the sun (as it goes before), God so disposing the rays of the sun, and ordering the light, that no shadow should be projected, but where the prophet foretold. This I thought fit to represent; but must add, that the ancient Jews, and Christians too, took the words of Isaiah to signify that the sun itself went back, and not merely the shadow. Whom primate Usher in his Annals follows, whose words are these: The sun and all the heavenly bodies went back; and as much was detracted from the next night as was added to this day. (A. M. 4001.) Which was done, I suppose, on a sudden, by the power of God, and lasted not long before all was restored again to their usual place; so that no change was made in the state of the heavenly bodies. But, that there was some change for the present, was observed both in the northern part of the world at Babylon, (from whence Merodach-Baladan sent to inquire about this wonder, 2 Chron. xxxii. 31.) and also in the southern, in the land of Egypt. As we may gather from a remarkable passage in Herodotus, who tells us in his Euterpe, cap. i. 42. that the Egyptians had observed strange alterations in the motions of the sun; so that it had risen four times, ἐξ ἡθέων, out of its usual course, ἐντεῦθεν νῦν δὶς καταδύεται, ἐντεῦθεν δὶς ἐπαντέλλαι, &c. it rising twice where it now sets, and setting twice where it now rises; and yet, οὐδὲν τῶν κατ' Αἴγυπτίων ὑπὸ ταῦτα ἑτεροιωθῆναι; and yet no change at all made among the Egyptians by these things, neither in the earth, nor the river, nor any thing else. This is a plain evidence that their neighbours (and many others, it is like) had heard of the unusual motions of the sun (though without any alteration in the heavenly bodies, which were soon returned to their former station), but had not a perfect knowledge of them, or had corrupted their knowledge; for to those two mentioned in Scripture, in the time of Joshua and Hezekiah, the Egyptians added two more, and make them to have been near the same time. But the Jews themselves have been thus fabulous, who say in the chapter Chelek, that the day on which Ahaz died was but two hours long; but now when Hezekiah's life was prolonged, God restored those ten hours which were then wanting, and so brought time even. (See Schickard, in his Bechinah Happeruschim, p. 122.). They also believe this miracle was wrought a little before sun-set; but that excellent person, whom I have often mentioned, Dr. Alix, thinks it evident it was before noon, about our ten of the clock.

Ver. 12. At that time Berodach-Baladan, the son of Baladan, king of Babylon.] Who is called Merodach-Baladan in Isa. xxxix. 1. Merodach was the name of an idol among the Babylonians, as Baal or Bel was another; together with Adan or Adonis, as Sir J. Marsham observes. Josephus calls him Βαλάδας, and so doth Berosus. He was but a tributary to the king of Assyria, till Nebuchadnezzar came to reign, who cast off the yoke of Assyria, and made that monarchy subject to him.

Sent letters.] Some think to make a league with him against the king of Assyria: and, it is likely, to inquire about the wonder done in the land, (2 Chron. xxxii. 31.)

And a present unto Hezekiah.] As the manner was when they sought any one's friendship.

For he had heard that Hezekiah had been sick.] And therefore in these letters, I suppose, he also congratulated his happy recovery to health.

Ver. 13. And Hezekiah hearkened unto them.] He gave them a friendly and benign audience (as Abarbinel explains it), being glad at their coming, as Isaiah tells us, (xxxix. 2.) because he knew them to be enemies to Sennacherib. And the words seem to import that they came about some weighty business, to which he consented.

And shewed them all the house of his precious things, the silver, and the gold, and the spices, and the precious ointment, and all the house of his armour, and all that was found in his treasures.] He was so pleased, or rather transported with joy, at the honour the king of Babylon had done him, that he not only gave them a gracious audience, as was said before, but ordered his officers to shew them all the rarities he had in his treasures. For though his country had been lamentably harassed by the king of Assyria, and he had endeavoured to appease him with great gifts, (xviii. 14, 15.) yet there were many good things remaining in Jerusalem; and great presents had been made to Hezekiah, since the stroke from heaven upon Sennacherib's army, (2 Chron. xxxii. 23.) The precious ointment here mentioned, is called, by Kimchi and other Hebrew doctors, apharsemon; which they say was the true balsam; not to be found any where, but near to Jericho.

There was nothing in his house, nor in all his dominions, that Hezekiah shewed them not.] There were other valuable things in other parts of the realm, besides those in his own palace at Jerusalem, which he thought worth their seeing, and therefore ordered his officers to shew them to these ambassadors.

Ver. 14. Then came Isaiah the prophet unto king Hezekiah, and said unto him, What said these men? and from whence came they unto thee? And Hezekiah said, They are come from a far country, even from Babylon.] He answers to the last part of Isaiah's question, but not a word of the first, what their business with him was? and he calls that a far country from whence they came (though it was not very remote), to express the great honour that was done him, by a prince at such a distance from him.

Ver. 15. And he said, What have they seen in thy house?] He knew well enough what they had seen; but had a mind to hear whether Hezekiah would confess the truth, or excuse his folly.

And Hezekiah answered, All the things that are in my house have they seen: there is nothing among my treasures that I have not shewed them.] He honestly relates the truth; being insensible of how dangerous a piece of vanity he had been guilty; in shewing strangers those treasures, which he might well think would invite them to endeavour to make themselves masters of them.

Ver. 16. And Isaiah said to Hezekiah, Hear the word of the Lord.] How he resents this action. Which was the more blameable, because he had lately received such great benefits from God, and seen such an astonishing wonder as he wrought for the confirmation of his faith; whereby he should have been moved not to glory in any thing but the goodness of God to him, nor confide in the friendship of great princes, but only in the power of the Almighty.

Ver. 17. Behold, the days come, that all that is in thine house, and that which thy fathers have laid up unto this day.] There had been several great kings in Judah who had overcome many enemies, and got great spoils, some remainders of which were still in their stores: but Isaiah foretells all should be carried away to that very place, from whence he had been complimented by those ambassadors.

Shall be carried into Babylon: nothing shall be left, saith the Lord.] The most pertinent observation that I can make upon these words, is that of Dr. Jackson (in his Answer to John's Question), where he saith, that whosoever will consider the state of things in this time, and the small power which the Babylonians now had, in respect of their mighty neighbour the king of Assyria (whom the Jews had reason to fear above all other princes); the accomplishment of this prophecy of Isaiah was, according to human conjecture, far more unlikely and improbable, than if a man should in the last age have taken upon him to foretell, that the duke of Saxony, or some such prince in Germany, should conquer France and Spain, and lead them captive to Dresden. But the word of the Lord stands fast for ever; and Isaiah was proved a hundred and twenty-five years after to be a true prophet.

Ver. 18. And of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt beget, shall they take away.] That is, his posterity descended from him.

And they shall be eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon.] Wait upon him as his servants, (xxiv. 15.) This was partly fulfilled in Daniel and his companions, (Dan. i. 1.)

Ver. 19. Then said Hezekiah unto Isaiah, Good is the word of the Lord which thou hast spoken. And he said, Is it not good, if peace and truth be in my days?] As if he had said, Thanks be to God it is no worse; let him do his pleasure. Have I not reason to be thankful, if, according to his promise, he deliver me from the king of Assyria, (ver. 6.) and not only prolong my days, but let me enjoy firm peace and true religion as long as I live? Some take this to be a careless speech, as if he did not concern himself what became of his posterity, so he himself did live happily. But this is inconsistent with such a pious mind as he had; which, no doubt, was sensible of the vanity and pride for which the prophet reproved him; and submitted to the punishment of it, which might have been immediately inflicted, if God had not been very merciful unto him.

Ver. 20. And the rest of the acts of Hezekiah, and all his might, and how he made a pool, and a conduit, and brought water into the city.] If he brought water into the city by private passages, whereby the enemy was deprived of the benefit of it, while the city enjoyed it (as Grotius understands it), it was certainly a work of admirable contrivance. (See 2 Chron. xxxii. 3.)

Are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] The same great person here observes, that the book of the Chronicles spoken of here, and in other places, were journals, as these books were annals. Out of which journals Ezra took many more passages in his book of the Chronicles, not omitting what he had written in these annals.

Ver. 21. And Hezekiah slept with his fathers: and Manasseh his son reigned in his stead.] Here is no mention of his burial with his fathers in the city of David: but Ezra, in 2 Chron. xxxii. 33. tells us they buried him "in the chiefest of the sepulchres of the sons of David," and that all the people "did him honour at his death."

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. MANASSEH was twelve years old when he began to reign; and he reigned fifty and five years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Hephzi-bah.] The years wherein he was captive in Babylon (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11.) must be comprehended in this number.

Ver. 2. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, after the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord cast out before the children of Israel.] He set up the gentile worship again: for being young, he was easily drawn aside by the princes and nobles, who never heartily joined in Hezekiah's reformation; but were in all probability displeased at it; and so revolted as soon as he was dead. For one cannot conceive how such a sudden change should be made in religion, and such gross idolatry restored, but from the general corruption of the great men, who had the management of this young king.

Ver. 3. For he built up the high places which Hezekiah his father had destroyed, and he reared up the altars for Baal, and made a grove, as did Ahab king of Israel, and worshipped all the hosts of heaven, and served them.] The sun, the moon, and the stars, as Procopius Gazæus explains it.

Ver. 4. And he built altars.] To the gods of the neighbouring nations.

In the house of the Lord.] In the very sanctuary itself; for the outward courts are mentioned in the next verse.

Of which the Lord said, In Jerusalem will I put my name.] Where God appointed, that he himself alone should be worshipped, (2 Sam. vii. 13.)

Ver. 5. And he built altars for all the host of heaven in the two courts of the house of the Lord.] The inner court, which was that of the priests, and the outward, which was that of the people, were profaned, together with the sanctuary.

Ver. 6. And he made his son pass through the fire.] In 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6. it is said he caused his children to pass through the fire; which was a most abominable practice, strictly forbidden by Moses upon pain of death, (Lev. xviii. 21. xx. 2, 3.)

And observed times, and used enchantments.] See Lev. xix. 21. Deut. xviii. 10, 11.

And dealt with familiar spirits, and wizards.] See Lev. xix. 31.

He wrought much wickedness in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger.] For there were none before him who committed such things as these; which were the highest provocations of God's displeasure.

Ver. 7. And he set a graven image of the grove which he had made in the house.] The Hebrew words in this place are Pesel haasherah, which our Selden hath well resolved (by comparing this with other texts) signify a wooden image of Ashtaroth, or Astarte. (Syntagm. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 2.) For Baal and Astarte were chief gods of the Sidonians, whose worship was introduced by Ahab; whom Manasseh imitated, (ver. 3.)

Of which the Lord said unto David, and to Solomon his son, In this house, and in Jerusalem, which I have chosen out of all the tribes of Israel, will I put my name for ever.] I observed before what God said to David, and what he said to Solomon is recorded, 1 Kings viii. 29. ix. 3. But Manasseh endeavoured to make the name of the God of Israel to be forgotten; by placing other gods in his house.

Ver. 8. Neither will I make the feet of Israel move any more out of the land which I gave their fathers; only if they will observe to do according to all that I have commanded them, and according to all the law that my servant Moses commanded them.] This promise was included in the choice God made of Jerusalem to fix his dwelling-place there: which was a security to them against all their enemies, if they proved obedient to him.

Ver. 9. But they hearkened not.] They had always been a rebellious people.

And Manasseh seduced them to do more evil than did the nations whom the Lord destroyed before the children of Israel.] But in his reign their wickedness was grown to such a height, that it exceeded all that the people of Canaan had done; whom God expelled to make room for the Israelites. For he broke all the laws of Moses, and worshipped more idols than they did. We never read of horses consecrated to the sun till his time, (see xxiii. 11.) who in all probability brought in that idolatry.

Ver. 10. And the Lord spake by his servants the prophets, saying.] Abarbinel makes account that Hosea, Joel, Nahum, and Habakkuk, all prophesied in his days. And some think Obadiah also, and Isaiah: who, as the Jews say, was sawn asunder by him.

Ver. 11. Because Manasseh king of Judah hath done these abominations, and hath done wickedly above all that the Amorites did, which were before him.] The whole people of Canaan are comprehended under the name of Amorites; who were most eminent of all the seven nations. (See Gen. xv. 16.)

And hath made Judah also to sin with his idols.] They were too much inclined to idolatry, by the long corruptions that had been among them; but he made them far worse than otherwise they would have been. For, as Jeremiah charges them, in the next reign but one, "according to the number of their cities were their gods, and according to the number of the streets of Jerusalem, they set up altars to that shameful thing, to burn incense to Baal." (Jer. xi. 13.)

Ver. 12. Therefore thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Behold, I am bringing such evil upon Jerusalem and Judah, that whosoever heareth of it, both his ears shall tingle.] The report of it shall strike terror and horror into men, as Procopius Gazæus expounds it. (See 1 Sam. iii. 11.)

Ver. 13. And I will stretch over Jerusalem the line of Samaria.] A metaphor from those who set out men's lots and portions, by drawing a line to divide them: and is as much as to say, he would give to Jerusalem the same measure that he had done to Samaria; that is, pull it down to the ground; consume some of them by famine, others by the sword, and carry the rest into captivity, as the same Procopius glosses.

And the plummet of the house of Ahab.] As they imitated his sin, so they should have his punishment; whose house was utterly destroyed. It seems to be a metaphor from builders, who measure with a line and a plummet what part of a building shall stand, and what be demolished.

And I will wipe Jerusalem as a man wipeth a dish, wiping it, and turning it upside down.] That is, leave no more people in it than you see any thing in a dish after it is emptied, and wiped, and turned upside down; as the manner is when it is perfectly cleansed. So the meaning is, I will cleanse her of all her inhabitants, and leave none remaining. The Hebrew word which we translate dish, the LXX. translate ὁ ἀλάβαστρος, an alabaster box of precious ointment, as the Chaldee translates it selucta, in which the Greek word λήκυθος lurks, (as the illustrious Spanhemius observes upon Callimachus's hymn in Palad. ver. 13.) signifying that Jerusalem was once in high esteem with God, like a precious ointment; but having lost its savour, he would reject her as a man doth such ointment when it is nothing worth.

Ver. 14. And I will forsake the remnant of mine inheritance.] That is, Judah, who alone was left when the ten tribes were gone.

And deliver them into the hands of their enemies, and they shall become a prey, and a spoil unto all their enemies.] As their brethren, the children of Israel, had been.

Ver. 15. Because they have done that which was evil in my sight, and have provoked me to anger from the day that their fathers came out of Egypt, even unto this day.] God now intended to punish them for all their former rebellions, ever since they were a people; which Manasseh had completed, whose sin was so great, that it is sometimes mentioned as the sole cause of their captivity. (See Jer. xv. 4.)

Ver. 16. Moreover, Manasseh shed innocent blood very much.] Upon which words Procopius Gazæus thus glosses: "He chiefly destroyed those who opposed themselves to his impiety, and denounced the Divine anger against him (that is, the prophets). They say he caused the prophet Isaiah to be sawed in sunder." So the Jews say in the Babylonian Talmud, in the treatise Jebamoth, and Justin Martyr in his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, and St. Jerome upon Isa. xx. 27. Nay, the words of the apostle, Heb. xi. 37. ἐπρίσθησαν are commonly referred to this, as primate Usher observes in his Annals, ad A. M. 3306.

Till he had filled Jerusalem from one end to another.] Top-full, as we speak. For it is a metaphor from measures wet or dry, when they are filled up to the brim.

Besides his sin wherewith he made Judah to sin, in doing that which was evil in the sight of the Lord.] That is, besides his abominable idolatry.

Ver. 17. Now the rest of the acts of Manasseh, and all that he did, and his sin that he sinned, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] All that he did in his captivity, and after, was written in the journals, from whence Ezra took what we find in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, &c.

Ver. 18. And Manasseh slept with his fathers, and was buried in the garden of his own house, in the garden of Uzza: and Amon his son reigned in his stead.] Some think this was the place where Uzziah was buried, (2 Chron. xxvi. 23.) and that he chose to be buried here, as unworthy, because of his manifold sins (of which he repented), to be laid in the common sepulchre of the kings of Judah.

Ver. 19. Amon was twenty and two years old when he began to reign, and he reigned two years in Jerusalem.] Which is the number of years to which the sons of those kings arrived, who provoked God to anger; as some of the Jews observe in the son of Jeroboam, the son of Baasha, and the son of Ahab. (1 Kings xv. 25. xvi. 8. xxii. 51.)

And his mother's name was Meshullemeth, the daughter of Haruz of Jotbah.

Ver. 20. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, as his father Manasseh did.] He imitated him in all things but in his repentance, as is observed, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 23.

Ver. 21. And he walked in all the ways that his father walked in, and served the idols that his father served, and worshipped them.] For he was bred up in idolatry, and solemnly consecrated by his father to the service of Moloch, (ver. 6.)

Ver. 22. And he forsook the God of his fathers, and walked not in the way of the Lord.] As Hezekiah, and Jotham, and others of his pious ancestors had done. There are two doctors also in the chapter Chelek, the one of which saith, he burnt the book of the law; the other, that he lay with his own mother.

Ver. 23. And the servants of Amon conspired against him, and slew him in his own house.] As he forsook God, whose servant he ought to have been; so his servants forsook him, and murdered him in his own palace.

Ver. 24. And the people of the land slew all them that had conspired against king Amon.] It was a thing of such pernicious example to kill their king, though very bad, that the people would not suffer it to go unpunished.

And the people of the land made Josiah his son king in his stead.] The common people seem to have been better disposed than the great men; who, it is probable, were engaged in the conspiracy against Amon. But it is not likely that the common people took upon them to constitute a king, but their elders and great men met, together with the people, upon such occasions as this, to declare to whom the right of succession belonged. Therefore, by the people of the land, must be meant the people assembled in the common council of the nation.

Ver. 25. Now, the rest of the acts of Amon which he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?] There is nothing said here of him, but that he was a gross idolater: which was not the ground of the conspiracy against him; but it is likely was related in the book here mentioned.

Ver. 26. And he was buried in his sepulchre, in the garden of Uzza: and Josiah his son reigned in his stead.] He was buried either in his father's sepulchre, or in one that he made for himself in the same place.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. JOSIAH was eight years old when he began to reign, and he reigned thirty and one years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Jedidah, the daughter of Adaiah of Boscath.] Who it is likely was a good woman, and took care to instil early good principles into him.

Ver. 2. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in all the way of David his father, and turned not aside to the right hand, or to the left.] In him was verified the words of Solomon, (Prov. xx. 11.) "Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure, and whether it be right." For when he had reigned eight years, while he was yet young, as Ezra observes, he began to reform all abuses in religion, (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3, &c.)

Ver. 3. And it came to pass in the eighteenth year of king Josiah, that the king sent Shaphan the son of Azaliah, the son of Meshullam the scribe, to the house of the Lord, saying.] This was in the eighteenth year of his reign, not of his age, as we are told, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8.

Ver. 4. Go up to Hilkiah the high-priest, that he may sum the silver which is brought into the house of the Lord.] He ordered him to give him an exact account of what money had been offered by pious people, for the reparation of the house of the Lord; as had been done in the reign of Jehoash, (xii. 4, &c.)

Which the keepers of the door have gathered of the people.] They were the Levites, as we learn from 2 Chron. xxxiv. 9.

Ver. 5. And let them deliver it into the hand of the doers of the work, that have the oversight of the house of the Lord: and let them give it to the doers of the work which is in the house of the Lord, to repair the breaches of the house.] They entrusted certain persons with the money, who were to oversee the work, (whose names are recorded in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 12.) and they delivered it to the workmen to buy materials for the reparation of the house, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 6. Unto carpenters, and builders, and masons, and to buy timber and hewn stone to repair the house.] Builders (as distinguished from carpenters and masons) were such as laid the timber and the stone together, which the other had prepared.

Ver. 7. Howbeit, there was no reckoning made with them of the money that was delivered into their hand, because they dealt faithfully.] They were men of such approved honesty (like those in the days of Jehoash, xii. 15.) that there was no need to call them to an account how they laid out the money.

Ver. 8. And Hilkiah the high-priest said unto Shaphan the scribe, I have found the book of the law in the house of the Lord: and Hilkiah gave the book to Shaphan, and he read it.] The book of Deuteronomy, saith Procopius Gazæus. But it was rather the whole book of the law written by Moses; that authentic copy which by God's command was laid up in the most holy place, (Deut. xxxi. 24, &c.) About which the Hebrew doctors made great difficulties in their explication of this place, particularly R. Lipman in his Nitzacon, out of which Hottinger hath alleged a long passage concerning this matter, in his Historica Ecclesiastica, N. T. sect. 16. par. iv. p. 137. where he justly thinks it a wonder that Josiah should so early fear God, and begin to reform religion, if he had never seen the book of the law before this time. And how should the people have kept such a Passover, and the priests been so well instructed in the rites of it this very year? (2 Chron. xxxiv. 19.) For the copies of the book now found could not be so soon made and dispersed every where as to teach them these things. It is most likely therefore, nay certain, that though this was the original book, yet the Jews had many copies of the law among them, though some of them perhaps imperfect or corrupted. For they report that Manasseh blotted the name of Jehovah out of all the books he could find. Hilkiah, therefore, rejoiced that he had found the original, by which all might be corrected. Which had been hid, it is probable, from the impious fury of their idolatrous kings, in some secret place of the temple, where it was now found when they were about to repair it: and the finding it at this very time, when Josiah was making a reformation of religion, could not but be looked upon as a remarkable providence, which very much affected him, as we read afterward.

Ver. 9. And Shaphan the scribe came to the king, and brought the king word again, saying, Thy servants have gathered the money that was found in the house, and have delivered it into the hand of them that do the work, that have the oversight of the house of the Lord.] He gives him an account that he had executed his commands, given him ver. 4—6.

Ver. 10. And Shaphan the scribe shewed the king, saying, Hilkiah the priest hath delivered me a book: and Shaphan read it before the king.] Some part of it. It is said, indeed, in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 30. that "they read in the ears of the people all the book of the law." But that was done afterward, and was done by parcels, not all at one time. And so it follows here, xxiii. 2. that Josiah read, that is, caused some by his order to read, all the words of the book of the covenant that was found in the house of the Lord, in the ears of all the people.

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, when the king had heard the words of the book of the law, that he rent his clothes.] Being very much affrighted when he heard the dreadful threatenings against the transgressor of the law, read out of the book of Deuteronomy. At which the book opened, either bythe special providence of God, or by the design of Shaphan, who had read the book before he brought it to the king, (ver. 8.) The Jerusalem Talmud, and from thence Abarbinel, saith, that he happened to read the place where the punishment of their king is denounced, (Deut. xxviii. 36.) or, that he observed the time drew near, when the punishments God threatened would be inflicted, for their long offences against this law. According to what the king himself here saith, ver. 13. "Great is the wrath of the Lord that is kindled against us," &c. By all which it is plain, the king had not written a copy of the law with his own hand, according to the command, Deut. xvii. 8. Disuse often cancels the most excellent laws. For it is too probable they had a long time neglected also to read the law publicly every seventh year, (Deut. xxxiv. 9, 10.)

Ver. 12. And the king commanded Hilkiah the priest, and Ahikam the son of Shaphan, and Achor the son of Micaiah, and Shaphan the scribe, and Asaiah a servant of the king's, saying.] Shaphan was a servant of the king, being secretary, or some such officer; but Asaiah, I suppose, was one that waited on his person, and was always about him.

Ver. 13. Go ye and inquire of the Lord for me, and for the people.] Of Jerusalem.

And for all Judah, concerning the words of this book that is found: for great is the wrath of the Lord that is kindled against us, because our fathers have not hearkened unto the words of this book, to do according to all that which is written concerning us.] I suppose he sent them to inquire whether there were any hopes his anger might be appeased, and by what means.

Ver. 14. So Hilkiah the priest, and Ahikam, and Achbor, and Shaphan, and Asahiah, went unto Huldah the prophetess, the wife of Shallum the son of Tikvah, the son of Harha, keeper of the wardrobe.] It is certain that both Jeremiah and Zephaniah prophesied in the reign of Josiah; therefore it may seem strange that they did not resort to one of them. Of which Abarbinel gives this account, That Jeremiah was at this time absent from Jerusalem, being gone to convert the ten tribes; or rather, being at his own house in Anathoth. And the same he supposes of Zephaniah, that he was not near at hand; and therefore they went to Huldah, who lived at Jerusalem; and the rather, as some suppose, because women are more inclined to pity and compassion than men. But this is an absurd reason, as Abarbinel well observes: for the prophets did not speak according to their own inclinations, but as God dictated to them. The Jews have a tradition in Massecheth Megillah, that eight prophets descended from Rahab, whereof Huldah was one. And Kimchi upon this place saith, Our doctors write, that three prophesied in the days of Josiah; viz. Jeremiah in the streets or villages, Zephaniah in the synagogues, and Huldah among the women.

Now she dwelt in Jerusalem in the college, and they communed with her.] The Hebrew word mishneh, which we translate college (and which the Targum takes to signify a school), is, in the margin of our Bibles, translated the second part. For there were three walls about Jerusalem, as Abarbinel observes. Within the first of which lived artificers, and the common people; within the second, the better sort, the wise men, prophets, and prophetesses, lived; and within the third, was the mountain of the Lord, as they speak. Now of the middle part of Jerusalem they think the holy writer here speaks, in which Huldah dwelt.

Ver. 15. And she said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Tell the man that sent you unto me.] He speaks in the prophetical style, and with great boldness tells him the plain truth.

Ver. 16. Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring evil upon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the words of the book which the king of Judah hath read.] All the plagues threatened in Deut. xxviii. and other places.

Ver. 17. Because they have forsaken me, and have burnt incense unto other gods, that they might provoke me to anger with all the work of their hands: therefore, my wrath shall be kindled against this place, and shall not be quenched.] This was the answer to the king's inquiry; that the decree of God was peremptory and irresistible, against Judah and Jerusalem, for their extirpation; and he adds the reason thereof.

Ver. 18. But to the king of Judah which sent you to inquire of the Lord, thus shall ye say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, As touching the words which thou hast heard.] As far as they concerned his person.

Ver. 19. Because thy heart was tender, and thou hast humbled thyself before the Lord, when thou heardest what I spake against this place, and against the inhabitants thereof, that they should become a desolation and a curse, and hast rent thy clothes, and went before me: I also have heard thee, saith the Lord.] Here are four tokens, as some observe, of a true repentance and conversion unto God. First, softness of heart; which is opposed to that hardness which arises from unbelief of God's threatenings; because faith makes men tenderly affected with them. Secondly, great humility, arising from a sense of his unworthiness of any mercy. These two were inward: the other were outward tokens of this inward sense; which were rending his clothes, and weeping for his own, and for the public offences; which moved God to take some pity upon him, though he resolved to destroy the nation.

Ver. 20. Behold, therefore, I will gather thee unto thy fathers.] The time hasting for their utter destruction, God would let him live but a short time; which was a mercy to him, that he might not see the miseries that were coming upon them.

And thou shalt go unto thy grave in peace; and thine eyes shall not see all the evil which I will bring upon this place.] Though he was slain in battle, (xxiii. 29.) yet he went to his grave in peace; because, as the next words explain it, he did not live to see the calamities which were inevitably threatened to come upon the nation; but left his kingdom in a peaceable condition. For the Egyptians, who slew him, gave them no long disturbance, and the Babylonians were not yet ready to come up against them.

And they brought the king word again.] Who immediately set himself to do all the good he could for his time; though he could not prevent the evil that was coming.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. AND the king sent, and they gathered unto him all the elders of Judah and of Jerusalem.] Whom he acquainted with what he intended to do; and, I suppose, had their consent, which gave the greater authority to what follows.

Ver. 2. And the king went up into the house of the Lord, and all the men of Judah, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and the priests, and the prophets.] Jeremiah and Zephaniah were the principal prophets; and, it is likely, there were many more who are not mentioned.

And all the people, both small and great: and he read in their ears all the words of the book of the covenant.] He ordered some to read (xxii. 10.) in several places, so that all might hear; for it is not likely that one man's voice could reach so great a multitude.

Which was found in the house of the Lord.] And, some of the Jews say, was found lying open at that very place, where those words presented themselves, (Deut. xxviii. 36.) which awakened the king to cause all the law of God to be read to them.

Ver. 3. And the king stood by a pillar.] Unto which his throne adjoined; wherein the king was placed when he came to the temple, as the Hebrew doctors will have it. The king's seat, saith Jacob Juda Leo, was in the court of the Israelites, at the entrance into the court of the priests, by a marble pillar. There he sat when he came into the temple to worship God: there Joash was made king by Jehoiada: (xi. 14.) there Hezekiah read before the Lord the blasphemous letter which the king of Assyria sent him; (xix. 14.) and there Josiah now made a covenant with God that he would serve him. (See Vitringa Proleg. ad lib. de Synag. Veteri. cap. 4.)

And made a covenant before the Lord, to walk after the Lord, and to keep his commandments, and his testimonies, and his statutes.] That is, all his laws of all sorts.

With all their heart, and with all their soul.] He made this covenant in his own name, and in the name of all the people, whom he engaged faithfully to God's service.

To perform the words of the covenant that were written in this book: and all the people stood to the covenant.] They gave their consent to the covenant; standing before the Lord as he did, and not stirring from the place where he propounded it unto them.

Ver. 4. And the king commanded Hilkiah the high-priest.] It was very proper to commit the reformation of the house of God to the high-priest; and those who ministered under him. Some will have Hilkiah to be the father of Jeremiah, as is asserted by Greg. Abulfaragius, in his Histor. Dynastarum, p. 68. Which is an error; for Jeremiah was a priest of Anathoth, whither Abiathar was banished, of the seed of Ithamar, from whom it is likely he was descended, (1 Kings ii. 26.)

And the priests of the second order.] They that were under the high-priest; especially the sagan (as the Targum here hath it), who was the vicar of the high-priest, and stood at his right hand when he officiated, as the Jews tell us in Joma, where they say a man could not be made a high-priest unless he had been first a sagan.

And the keepers of the door.] Whom the Jews call amarcelim; which word we find xii. 10. where the Targum expounds it, priests that were treasurers: that is, such Levites as had the custody of the sacred money, which was for the repair of the temple. And the Hebrew phrase is not much different, the keepers of the thresholds; that is, the entrance into those chambers (as Hottinger thinks) wherein were kept such things as were of public use in the temple. Of which there were seven; wherein the priests' garments were laid up, and other such-like things.

To bring forth out of the temple of the Lord all the vessels that were made for Baal.] The word we translate vessels, or instruments, signifies all the various furniture belonging to Baal, and the rest of the false gods, which served either for offering of incense, or sacrifices, or the vestments of the priests, &c.

For Baal.] Who was the principal idol, whose worship Ahab first introduced, and Manasseh restored after Jehu had abolished it, as was said before, xxi. 3.

And for the grove.] I observed before, that by a grove is meant the image or idol of the grove; which Ahab had brought in also. (See there, xxi. 3. 7. and here below, ver. 6.)

And for all the host of heaven.] That is, the planets, and the rest of the stars, which the Sabæans, and Chaldeans, and other eastern people, worshipped. Whom the Jews impiously imitated, though they had been taught, in the very beginning of their law, that the sun, the moon, and all the stars, were all created by their God.

And he burnt them without Jerusalem in the fields of Kidron, and carried the ashes of them into Beth-el.] Which place (where, as Kimchi speaks, was the very foundation of idolatry) he polluted and profaned, by casting this filth there; that they who were wont to worship the calves in that place might avoid it, and not come near it.

Ver. 5. And he put down the idolatrous priests, whom the kings of Judah had ordained to burn incense in the high places in the cities of Judah, and in the places round about Jerusalem.] These idolatrous priests are called chemarim in the Hebrew, because they were clothed in black garments: (as Kimchi gives the reason, both upon this place and upon Zephan. i. 4.) whereas the priests of the Most High were clothed in white; especially those whose genealogy was not questioned. They, indeed, who could not make out their descent, were clothed in a black habit, to distinguish them from undoubted priests: and so were they who had any defect or blemish in their body, as appears from the Talmud in Middoth. And indeed it is certain, that they among the heathens, who sacrificed to the infernal gods, were clothed with such vestments, as appears by Canidia in Horace, lib. i. sat. 8. and Medea in Apollonius Rhodius, lib. iii. ver. 861.; from whence some think they had the name of μελανηφόροι, which we find in some ancient inscriptions. And thus the Egyptians bewailed Osiris, all which was suitable to their mighty sacrifices; wherein they were sad for the absence of the sun, who was meant by Osiris, as Gilbertus Cuperus observes in his Harpocrates, p. 129. And here now we have found the original of these chemarim, priests clothed in black. For it was a black ox which represented Osiris among the Egyptians, and it was covered ἱματίῳ μέλανι βυσσίνῳ, with a black silk garment; from whence, in all likelihood, the priests came to be so clothed.

Them also that burnt incense unto Baal, to the sun, and to the moon.] Here Baal is distinguished from the sun; and therefore signifies the same with Belus, who was a deified king: and indeed it is highly probable, that not only Baal, but Moloch and Adonis, were the names only of some very potent kings, who were adored when they were dead, and in time were thought to be real gods.

And to the planets, and to all the hosts of heaven.] The Hebrew word Mazaloth, which the LXX. pronounce Mazuroth, is thought by Procopius Gazæus to be the name of a star, and most likely the evening star: which others take to signify a constellation, as we translate it in the margin; or all the twelve signs. For the Jewish astronomers call the zodiac, ophan-hamazaloth, the circle of the signs.

Ver. 6. And he brought out the grove from the house of the Lord, without Jerusalem, unto the brook Kidron.] By the grove, as I have observed before, is meant the image of the grove, or, in plainer words, Ashtaroth: for so Procopius Gazæus saith, that where the LXX. translate this word the grove, others render it Ἀσήρωθ, or Ἀστάρωθ; that is, Ἀστάρτη, or Venus. For τῆς Ἀφροδίτης τὸ ξόανον ἔνδον ἑστησαν ἐν τῷ θείῳ νεῷ, they had set up the statue of Venus in the temple of God. (See Selden, Syntag. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 2.)

And burnt it at the brook Kidron, and stamped it small to powder, and cast the powder thereof upon the graves of the children of the people.] Which by the law were impure and unclean; and such he declared these ashes to be, and actually made them to be unclean, that none might touch them; much less gather them up as sacred relics. And so Kimchi expounds this place, He brought forth the wooden statue of Diana, which Manasseh had placed there, (xxi. 7.) and having burnt it and stamped it to powder, scattered the ashes on the graves of the idolaters, in detestation and contempt of their idolatry.

Ver. 7. And he brake down the houses of the Sodomites, which were by the house of the Lord.] From this some gather they were come to such a height of wickedness, that there were those among them who exposed their bodies to be abused contrary to nature, in honour of those filthy deities which they worshipped. For these public houses were near the temple of the Lord; and therefore these were persons consecrated to impurity, contrary to Deut. xxiii. 17. (See 1 Kings xiv. 24.) And so the ancient interpreters here understand corporal filthiness: only the Chaldee translates it, the houses of things consecrated to idols. R. Solomon Jarchi thinks it probable, that among those who worshipped the statues of the moon, or Venus, there were those who prostituted themselves to filthy mixtures. But Mr. Selden, by Kedeschim (which we translate Sodomites), understands the priests of Astarte, whom St. Jerome, upon Hosea iv. calls exsectos, upon pretence of greater purity, depriving themselves of those parts that serve for procreation of children.

Where the women wove hangings for the grove.] For Asherah, or Astarte, beforementioned; as Selden expounds it in the forenamed place. These hangings, or curtains, encompassed the image, and made a kind of house for it, as the Hebrew word imports, which the Greeks called καίσκους and ναΐδια, little temples or habitations. Into those tents the worshippers went, and there committed all manner of lewdness; for they had not arrived to such a degree of impudence, as not to seek for privacy in their filthiness.

Ver. 8. And he brought all the priests out of the cities of Judah.] Would not suffer them to dwell there, to corrupt the people.

And defiled the high places where priests had burnt incense.] He made them, saith Kimchi, receptacles of impurity, by casting dead carcasses there, and other such-like unclean things; that so he might remove out of the people's hearts all idolatry: for where sweet odours were wont before to be, there was nothing but stench.

From Geba to Beer-sheba.] That is, throughout the whole country; for Geba was in the northern parts, and Beer-sheba in the southern. (See 1 Kings xv. 22. Judg. xx. 1.)

And brake down the high places of the gates that were in the entering in of the gate of Joshua, the governor of the city, which were on a man's left hand at the gate of the city.] The high places of the gates seem to have been erected there, to offer incense to those tutelar gods, unto whom their idolatrous kings had committed the protection of their city. And Kimchi thinks that the governor of the city had his private household god, and a portable altar whereon he offered to his domestic idol. Which Josiah did not spare: but let the greatest men see his impartial zeal against all idolatry.

Ver. 9. Nevertheless the priests of the high places came not up to the altar of the Lord in Jerusalem, but they did eat of the unleavened bread among their brethren.] He mixed mercy together with severity. For though he did not suffer those priests, who had offered incense in those high places, (directly contrary to the law, Deut. xii. 11.) to offer sacrifices at God's altar; because they had defiled themselves with that sinful worship, though to the true God; yet he permitted them to partake of the bread of the priests, which comprehends all those parts of any sacrifice that were the priest's portion. He mentions, indeed, only the meat-offering, which was to be of unleavened bread; (Lev. ii. 4, 5. 11.) but that is put by a synecdoche for all other offerings belonging to the priests. So that they were put into the condition of those priests that had any blemish; who might not offer the bread of their God: (Lev. xxi. 17—21.) but they might eat the bread of their God, both of the holy and most holy, (Lev. xxi. 22. Ezek. xliv. 10.)

Ver. 10. And he defiled Topheth, which is in the valley of the son of Hinnom.] By throwing all manner of filth into it, as well as by throwing down the altars on which they sacrificed their children, as the Syriac and Arabic seem to understand it.

That no man might make his son or his daughter pass through the fire to Moloch.] Though a great number of the Hebrew doctors think that their passing their children through the fire, was nothing more than making them pass between two fires, whereby they were consecrated to that idol; yet it is certain, as I have shewn before, (xvi. 3.) that they offered their children sometimes as burnt-sacrifices to idols; which was a thing so horrid, that perhaps they invented this instead of it, to make them pass through two fires: or, perhaps, the opinion of Maimonides may be true, that they did not burn their children to Moloch, as they did to other idols; but the entire worship of Moloch was absolved, by making children only pass through the fire to him; as his words are in his book of Idolatry, cap. 6. sect. 5.; which may be confirmed from Jer. xix. 5. where he saith, they burnt their sons with fire unto Baal in Topheth. (See Selden, Syntag. i. de Diis Syris, cap. 6. where he largely treats of this.)

Ver. 11. And he took away.] That is, he destroyed, as the Hebrew word signifies, ver. 5. where we translate it, he put down the chemarim; that is, destroyed or slew those priests, as Bochartus interprets it. So Lev. xxvi. 6. we translate the same word, I will rid evil beasts out of the land; that is, destroy them. The LXX. here translate it κατέκαυσε, he burnt the horses; as before, κατέκαυσε χωμήριμ, he burnt the priests. Though, perhaps, in both places it should be κατέπαυσε, he made to cease, as the Hebrew word literally signifies.

The horses that the kings of Judah had given to the sun.] That is, had consecrated to the sun; as Lev. xx. 2. they are said to give their children to Moloch. A great number of authors tell us, that among several nations these animals were sacred to the sun (as hawks and some other creatures were), because of their swiftness in their course. But it is uncertain whether they were kept to be sacrificed to the sun (as they were among the Massagetæ, Persians, Armenians, and other people mentioned by Bochartus), or only to be led forth in pomp (as some of the Jews speak) every morning to meet the rising sun. Or, as others take it, the worshippers of the sun got upon these horses early in the morning, and rode out to adore the sun at its rising. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. xi. cap. 10.)

At the entering in of the house of the Lord, by the chamber of Nathan-melech the chamberlain.] Or, the eunuch, who was some great officer in the court.

Which was in the suburbs.] So the Targum interprets the word Parvarim; which most translations retain as the name of a place, unto which the street in which these horses were kept reached; from the chamber of Nathan-melech. He was the principal officer, perhaps, that looked after them; and had the oversight of all those stables which were built from the temple gate to Parvarim. And perhaps he rode out himself every morning upon one of them, to salute the rising sun in the king's name.

And burnt the chariots of the sun with fire.] The ancients fancied the sun itself was carried about in a chariot (as Bochart observes in the place abovementioned), and therefore chariots as well as horses were dedicated to it. Which he makes an argument, that they were not mere brazen, silver, or golden statues of horses that are here meant; but real living horses to draw those chariots. (See Vossius, de Orig. et Prog. Idol. lib. xi. cap. 4.) Some of those who think they were only "imagines equorum et quadrigarum," (as Selden speaks, Syntag. ii. de Diis Syris, cap. 8.) images of horses and chariots, made of some metal or other, imagine they were represented in the shape of griffins, as the famous M. Spoon thought. (See Dr. Hyde, de Relig. Vet. Pers. p. 117.)

Ver. 12. And the altars that were on the top of the upper chamber of Ahaz, which the kings of Judah had made.] They were not satisfied with the public altars they had made, in a vast number of high places: but the roofs of their houses being flat, they made altars there, (see Jer. xix. 13. xxxii. 29. Zephan. i. 5.) and particularly upon the king's palace, where they worshipped the sun, moon, and stars. But this could not privilege them from destruction, that they were on the top of the king's house.

And the altars that Manasseh had made in the two courts of the house of the Lord, did the king beat down, and brake them down from thence, and cast the dust of them into the brook Kidron.] It is said in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 13. that when Manasseh repented, he took away all the altars he had made in the mountain of the house of the Lord: and I suppose those in the courts of the priests and of the people were then removed. But Amon set them up again in the very place where Manasseh had erected them; and so they are here called his altars.

Ver. 13. And the high places that were before Jerusalem, which were on the right hand of the mount of Corruption.] That is, Mount Olivet, (1 Kings xi. 2.) which was anciently called Harmischah, the mount of Unction; because of the olives that grew there in great plenty; but, by way of contempt and scorn, was called by the prophets Harmaschith, the mount of Corruption, because of the idols that were placed there, whereby the people were corrupted in their religion.

Which Solomon the king of Israel had builded for Ashtoreth the abomination of the Zidonians, and for Chemosh the abomination of the Moabites, and for Milcom the abomination of the children of Ammon.] It is not to be doubted but these detestable idols had been taken away by such religious kings as Asa, Jehoshaphat, and Hezekiah; but they were restored again by their impious successors, in the very same place, and the same figure with those ancient ones; and so are here called those that Solomon made, because he was the first author of them, or at least permitted them to be made by his wives, and connived at their worship, as R. Levi thinks.

Did the king defile.] By dead men's bones, and other unclean things, which he threw into those places.

Ver. 14. And he brake down the images, and cut down the groves.] Wherein the images were.

And filled their places with the bones of men.] Which he caused to be digged out of their graves, and burnt; being the bones of idolatrous priests, (ver. 16.)

Ver. 15. Moreover, the altar that was at Beth-el.] For this city and the territories thereof had been under the power of Judah, ever since the reign of Ahijah, (2 Chron. xiii. 19, 20.)

And the high places which Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin, had made, both that altar and the high place, he brake down, and burnt the high place, and stamped it small as powder, and burnt the grove.] That is, he burnt the golden calf, as Mr. Selden thinks; for Asherah commonly signifies some image, as he shews in his discourse about Astarte, whose image it is likely this was; for the golden calf, as the Jews think, was carried away before this. But that is not certain: and Selden's opinion is probable, that the golden calves were made of wood gilded over, and thence called golden, which were easily burnt. (Syntag. i. de Diis Syris, cap. 4.)

Ver. 16. And as Josiah turned himself.] Looking round about him; being resolved to trust no man's eyes but his own, in discovering the monuments of idolatry.

He spied the sepulchres that were there in the mount.] It is not said whose sepulchres they were; but it is probable of the idolatrous priests (for in the Chronicles he is said to have burnt their bones), and of the prophets and great men, who had been instruments to promote Jeroboam's idolatry.

And sent and took the bones out of the sepulchres, and burnt them upon the altar, and polluted it.] For nothing was more unclean than that which had touched dead men's bones.

According to the word of the Lord, which the man of God proclaimed, who proclaimed these words.] Who foretold three hundred and sixty years ago these very things should be done by a king called Josiah, (1 Kings xiii. 2.)

Ver. 17. Then he said, What title is that that I see?] There was one stone, or pillar, I suppose, more eminent than the rest, with the name of the persons buried under it: and therefore called a title, because there was an inscription engraven upon it, according to the custom among the Jews (as now among us), to preserve thereby the memory of those they loved.

And the men of the city told him, It is the sepulchre of the man of God, which came from Judah, and proclaimed these things that thou hast done against the altar of Beth-el.] The king was the more curious (as Rasi, and Kimchi also, tell the story out of the Midrasch) to know whose grave that was; because on one side of it he saw nettles and thistles grow, and on the other side myrtles and other odoriferous plants; signifying that there lay a true prophet and a false. For which there is no ground, but their fabulous fancy.

Ver. 18. And he said, Let him alone; let no man move his bones.] It is pertinently observed by Joh. Wolfius, that if pious persons in those days had had the same opinion about relics which now is in the church of Rome, the king would not merely have ordered his bones to lie quiet and undisturbed, but put them into golden boxes, and carried them to Jerusalem, to be there religiously worshipped by the people.

And they let his bones alone, and the bones of the prophet that came out of Samaria.] That is, out of the country of Samaria.

Ver. 19. And all the houses also of the high places.] What these houses were, whether places for worship, or for the habitation of the priests of the high places (mentioned in the next verse), is uncertain. It is most likely the former; because they provoked God to anger.

That were in the cities of Samaria, which the kings of Israel had made to provoke the Lord to anger.] In such cities of Samaria as were in the possession of the king of Judah; for upon the fall of the Assyrian empire, many of the cities, no doubt, became subject to their old masters.

Josiah took away, and did unto them according to all the acts that he had done in Beth-el.] That is, he brake them down, and burnt them, and stamped them to powder. (ver. 15.)

Ver. 20. And he slew all the priests of the high places that were there upon the altars.] There were some priests of the high places (of whom we read before, ver. 8, 9.) that he did not kill; for they were such as sacrificed only unto God in the high places. But those whom he slew, were either the priests of Jeroboam who worshipped the calves, and had no right to the priesthood, (but had invaded it by the favour of their king), or such priests of the order of Aaron as sacrificed to Baal, or other false gods.

And burnt men's bones upon them.] Which was the highest pollution of those altars, (ver. 13, 14.)

And returned to Jerusalem.] Having made a progress through all the country, to abolish idolatrous worship where it was practised; he returned to Jerusalem, there to restore the solemnities of true religion.

Ver. 21. And the king commanded all the people, saying, Keep the Passover unto the Lord your God, as it is written in the book of this covenant.] Which he had bound them and himself to observe, (ver. 3.) and now tried them whether they would stand to the covenant, as they promised, by making a proclamation through the whole kingdom that they should keep this feast, which was a commemoration of the greatest benefit God ever bestowed on them, before the giving them the law, for it made them a free nation.

Ver. 22. Surely there was not held such a Passover, from the days of the judges, nor in all the days of the kings of Israel, and of the kings of Judah.] Since the time of the prophet Samuel, the last of their judges, there had never been such a great concourse of people at any Passover, nor such a multitude of sacrifices offered; nor such an exact observation of the rites and ceremonies belonging to this feast. For in the time of Hezekiah many were absent; and many had not purified themselves as they ought: but now, as Ralbag expounds it, they were all turned to the Lord, and there were no idolaters nor apostates among them. (See Selden, lib. i. de Syned. cap. 12. p. 478.)

Ver. 23. But in the eighteenth year of king Josiah, wherein this Passover was held unto the Lord in Jerusalem.] In the same year that he took care to have the temple repaired, (xxii. 3.) and to purge it from all idols, (xxiii. 4.) he restored the true worship of God to such purity, as it had not been in for some ages.

Ver. 24. Moreover, the workers with familiar spirits, and the wizards.] Of which see what I have noted upon Lev. xix. 31. xx. 6.

And the images.] In the Hebrew the teraphim, which were very ancient among idolaters, as I have observed upon the book of Genesis, xxxi. 19.

And the idols.] Of which there were many sorts, that are all comprehended in this word.

And all the abominations that were spied in the land of Judah, and in Jerusalem.] What these abominations were is not certain, but it is likely they were such as Ezekiel saw and describes in aftertimes; when God shewed him what odious things they committed secretly. (See Ezek. viii. 6. 9, 10. 13. 15, &c.)

Did Josiah put away, that he might perform the words of the law, which were written in the book that Hilkiah the priest found in the house of the Lord.] He had his spies, it is probable, to discover all secret idolatry, as well as public, which, being found out, he abolished, as abominable unto God.

Ver. 25. And like unto him was there no king before him, that turned to the Lord with all his heart, and with all his soul, and with all his might, according to all the law of Moses; neither after him arose there any like him.] He doth not compare him with David and Hezekiah (as Procopius Gazæus here notes), but with other pious kings, such as Asa, Jehoshaphat, and Jotham; who were far inferior to him in piety. And Hezekiah himself was not so exact, and did not make such a thorough search as he did, after all idolatrous practices. The nation also was so much corrupted since his days, by his son Manasseh, who reigned a long time, that it made the work of reformation more difficult in the time of Josiah. Yet in some regard Hezekiah excelled him; and therefore the same character is given of him xviii. 5. which is here given of Josiah; because of his trust in God, in the time of his greatest distress, for which he was very eminent. But as to repentance, Josiah was most exemplary.

Ver. 26. Notwithstanding the Lord turned not from the fierceness of his great wrath, wherewith his anger was kindled against Judah, because of all the provocations that Manasseh had provoked him withal.] Though Josiah was most sincere in what he did, and omitted nothing to restore the purity of God's worship among them; yet he could not procure the preservation of the nation from destruction, but only a forbearance of it for a time. For the people were so corrupted by Manasseh, that they rather complied with Josiah in his reformation, than heartily desired it, out of an inward affection to it. The innocent blood also shed by Manasseh was unpardonable, (xxiv. 3, 4.) Of which the people it is likely approved, and so fell under an irreversible sentence of destruction. (See Ezek. xxiv. 6.)

Ver. 27. And the Lord said, I will remove Judah also out of my sight, as I have removed Israel, and will cast off this city Jerusalem, which I have chosen, and the house of which I said, My name shall be there.] He peremptorily decreed that they should be carried away captive, as the ten tribes had been; and that his Divine presence among them should not save them; but he would abandon his own dwelling-place, and, removing from them, leave them a prey to their enemies: which we find livelily represented in Ezek. x. 18, 19. where the prophet saw the glory of the Lord departing from his house, and carried away by the cherubims.

This may seem strange, as Abarbinel observes, that God should thus visit the sins of Manasseh, of which he had repented; and not be reconciled after Josiah had abolished all monuments of idolatry, and the Israelites had kept such a Passover, as is beforementioned: unto which he answers, that though it be said Manasseh repented, yet it is not said he turned to God with all his heart, and with all his soul, as Josiah did. For Manasseh repented only when he was in great distress; and though he repented, the people did not; but fell to their idolatrous practices as soon as he was dead, following his wicked son Amon. Nay, he thinks in the days of Josiah they were little better, as he gathers from the eleventh and twelfth of Jeremiah. To which may be added what we read in the prophet Zephaniah, who lived in the days of Josiah, and threatened in the name of God, "I will utterly consume all things from off the land, and consume both man and beast," (Zeph. i. 2, 3.) For they were still private idolaters, though they complied with the public reformation; swearing by the Lord, and by Malcom; and when the high places were taken away, worshipping the host of heaven upon the house-tops, (ver. 5.)

Ver. 28. Now the rest of the acts of Josiah, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?

Ver. 29. In his days Pharaoh-Nechoh king of Egypt.] Whom Herodotus, in his second book, calls Νεκὼς, and mentions the fight which he had with the Syrians, ἐν Μαγδόλῳ. (See Usher's Annals, ad A. M. 3394.)

Went up against the king of Assyria.] Who was then king of Babylon; for he had subdued the Assyrians, and brought them under his empire. There are those, indeed, who think this happened before that time, and that this king of Egypt went to revenge the injuries done them by Sennacherib; and he hoped for the better success, because he was much weakened by that slaughter the angel had made of his army; and because the Medes and Babylonians had rebelled against the Assyrians. But why Josiah should go to help the Assyrians no account can be given. Our forementioned primate hath better expounded it, that as the king of Persia, having subdued Babylon and Assyria, is called the king of Assyria; (Ezra vi. 22.) so here the king of Babylon, having subdued Assyria, is called king of Assyria. Besides that, Babylon was anciently accounted a part of Assyria; and the land of the Chaldeans is said to be founded by the Assyrians, (Isa. xxiii. 13.) And thus Josephus expressly saith, (lib. x. Antiq. cap. 6.) Μήδους πολεμῶν καὶ τοὺς Βαβυλωνίους, οἱ τὴν Ἀσσύριον κατέλυσαν ἀρχήν. The king of Egypt came to fight the Medes and Babylonians, who had overturned the Assyrian empire.

To the river Euphrates.] To besiege Carchemish, which lap upon that river, as we read 2 Chron. xxxv. 20. which city was possessed by the Assyrians in the time of Sennacherib; (Isa. x. 9.) but their empire being overthrown, it returned under the power of the Babylonians.

And king Josiah went against him.] Being afraid he intended to invade his country in his passage; or to divert him from his expedition against the Babylonians, with whom he was in league. It is likely the latter was the reason; for the king of Egypt assured him he had no quarrel with him, and yet he would fight him, (2 Chron. xxxv. 21, 22.)

And he slew him in Megiddo.] Gave him a mortal wound; of which he died, not till he came to Jerusalem, (2 Chron. xxxv. 24.)

When he had seen him.] At the first brunt, as soon as they had joined battle. (See xiv. 8.)

Ver. 30. And his servants carried him in a chariot dead from Megiddo.] Mortally wounded (as I said before), which befel him, the Jews think, because he did not ask counsel of the Lord, by the prophet Jeremiah.

And brought him to Jerusalem, and buried him in his own sepulchre.] With such lamentations, as we no where read were made for any other king, (2 Chron. xxxv. 25.) which continued so long that it became a proverb, (Zech. xii. 11.)

And the people of the land took Jehoahaz the son of Josiah, and anointed him, and made him king in his father's stead.] He is called Shallum, Jer. xxii. 11. and was younger than Jehoiakim, as appears by this, that he was but twenty-three years old when he began to reign, and reigned but three months: after which Jehoiakim being made king, was twenty-five years old, (ver. 31. 36.) But the people preferred Jehoahaz before him, because perhaps he was the more warlike person. And they anointed him, as Abarbinel thinks, because, perhaps, he was not the first-born, and his title questionable. For they anointed persons only when there was a controversy about the succession. Ralbag, also, is of opinion, that the people by force made him a king against his will; which he will have to be the import of that phrase, they took Jehoahaz, &c.

Ver. 31. Jehoahaz was twenty-three years old when he began to reign, and he reigned three months in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Hamutal, the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah.] His father Josiah had four sons, and this was the youngest of them, as appears from 2 Chron. iii. 15. where he is called Shallum, as he is by the prophet Jeremiah. Which name our great primate thinks seemed to the people to be of an ill omen (for Shallum king of Israel reigned but one month), which made them change it into Jehoahaz; which proved not much more fortunate to him, for he reigned but three months, ad A. M. 3371.

Ver. 32. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his fathers had done.] After the example of Ahaz, Manasseh, Amon, and such-like wicked kings; his mother, perhaps, having infused ill principles into him.

Ver. 33. And Pharaoh-Nechoh put him in bands at Riblah, in the land of Hamath, that he might not reign in Jerusalem.] When he returned from his expedition against the Babylonians, he deposed this prince, as an usurper; or hearing that he intended to be revenged of him for his father's death; or that he was of a turbulent spirit, and so put it out of his power to give him any disturbance.

And put the land to a tribute of a hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold.] In token of their subjection to him.

Ver. 34. And Pharaoh-Nechoh made Eliakim the son of Josiah king in the room of Josiah his father.] For the eldest son Johanan, in all likelihood, was dead.

And turned his name to Jehoiakim.] As the manner of conquerors was, to change the names of those whom they had subdued, in token of their absolute power over them. (See Dan. i. 7.) And the forenamed primate thinks he gave him this name, that he might testify he ascribed his victory over the Babylonians to Jehovah, the God of Israel; who, he said, excited him to that expedition, (2 Chron. xxxv. 21, 22.)

And he took Jehoahaz away, and he came to Egypt, and died there.] According to the prophecy of Jeremiah, whom God sent to call this new king and the people to repentance, (xxii. 1—3.) "Weep ye not for the dead (i. e. for Josiah), neither bemoan him, but weep sorely for him that goeth away (that is, for Shallum), for he shall return no more, nor see his native country, &c. but he shall die in the place whither they shall lead him captive," &c. (Jer. xxii. 10—12.)

Ver. 35. And Jehoiakim gave the silver and the gold to Pharaoh; but he taxed the land to give the money, according to the commandment of Pharaoh.] For the treasures of the Lord's house, and of the king's, it seems were empty.

He exacted the silver and the gold of the people of the land, of every one according to his taxation, to give it to Pharaoh-Nechoh.] Proportionable to every man's estate.

Ver. 36. Jehoiakim was twenty and five years old when he began to reign; and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Zebudah, the daughter of Pedaiah of Rumah.] In the very beginning of his reign Jeremiah was sent to him with a message from God, to bring him to repentance, Jer. xxvi. 1—3. xxvii. where he seems (ver. 12.) to have told his brother Zedekiah that he should be king, if Jehoiakim was disobedient; and exhorts him not to be so.

Ver. 37. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his fathers had done.] See ver. 32. For he killed the prophet Urijah, and was at the charge to fetch him out of Egypt, whither he fled to save his life, (Jer. xxvi. 20, 21, &c.) And if it had not been for Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, who had been a great man in his father Josiah's court, he had served Jeremiah in the same manner, ver. 24.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. IN his days Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came up.] He is called by heathen writers, Nabo-col-assar: and, as primate Usher thinks, Nebopolassar was his father. He begun his reign in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, as Jeremiah tells us; (xxv. 1.) when, having smote the army of Pharaoh-Nechoh, at Carchemish, near Euphrates, (Jer. xlvi. 2.) he came up to make the Jews tributaries to him, as they had been to Pharaoh.

And Jehoiakim became his servant three years; and he turned and rebelled against him.] He omits his being bound in chains, and carried to Babylon, which was in the fifth year of king Nebuchadnezzar, and the eighth of Jehoiakim, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6. where, having been kept awhile, and promising fidelity to Nebuchadnezzar, he restored him to his kingdom, in which he served him three years; and then in his ninth year rebelled against him, by the instigation, it is probable, of Pharaoh, who began to gather strength again. But this proved fatal to him, for Pharaoh was not able to help him, (ver. 7.)

Ver. 2. And the Lord sent against him bands of the Chaldees, and bands of the Syrians, and bands of the Moabites, and bands of the children of Ammon, and sent them against Judah to destroy it.] These were all subject to Nebuchadnezzar, whom he sent to chastise Jehoiakim, before he came himself, and besieged Jerusalem, and carried away part of the vessels of the house of the Lord, &c. For this was the third year mentioned by Daniel, after he was restored to his kingdom, (Dan. i. 1, 2.) when he, Hananiah, Michael, and Azariah, were carried captive to Babylon, (ver. 6.)

According to the word of the Lord, which he spake by his servants the prophets.] By the prophet Isaiah, xx. 17, 18. of this book, and by Huldah, xxii. 16. and Jeremiah, in the fourteenth and fifteenth chapters.

Ver. 3. Surely at the commandment of the Lord came this upon Judah, to remove them out of his sight, for the sins of Manasseh, according to all that he did.] By God's special order those people came up against Judah (therefore, in the verse before he is said to send them), because they were incurable. For Manasseh had so corrupted the whole body of the people, that Josiah's reformation could not recover them; but immediately upon his death, his son relapsed to the old idolatry.

Ver. 4. And also for the innocent blood that he shed (for he filled Jerusalem with innocent blood), which the Lord would not pardon.] See xxi. 16. Upon the repentance of Manasseh, and the reformation made by Josiah, God deferred their punishment; but he resolved not to grant them an absolute pardon of their iniquity; which provoked him to decree their extirpation.

Ver. 5. Now the rest of the acts of Jehoiakim, and all that he did, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Judah?

Ver. 6. So Jehoiakim slept with his fathers.] It appears by this, that to sleep with one's fathers, signifies no more than to die, as they did. For Jehoiakim was not buried with them, nor died in his bed; but being taken by the Chaldeans, he died as they led him out of Jerusalem, and, according to the prophecy of Jeremiah, (xxii. 18, 19.) they cast him out of the gates, and he had the burial of an ass; that is, lay upon the ground unburied. Abarbinel thinks he died in the way to Babylon; and his body was left in the highway, without any care taken to inter it; but it lay exposed to the sun by day, and to the frost by night. (Jer. xxxvi. 30.)

And Jehoiachin his son reigned in his stead.] Who is called also Jechoniah, 1 Chron. iii. 16. and more briefly Choniah (by way of contempt, as some think), Jer. xxii. 24.

Ver. 7. And the king of Egypt came not again any more out of his land: for the king of Babylon had taken, from the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates, all that pertained to the king of Egypt.] After the fight at Carchemish, (which I mentioned ver. 1.) Nebuchadnezzar conquered all the places that the king of Egypt held, between that and the river of Egypt; concerning which, see my notes on Gen. xv. 18. So that he durst not stir out of the limits of his own country, which was bounded by that river, till the reign of Zedekiah, when the king of Egypt adventured to come up to help him, but in vain; for he was forced to return to his own land, (Jer. xxxvii. 7, 8.)

Ver. 8. Jehoiachin was eighteen years old when he began to reign.] That is, when he began to reign alone after his father's death: but his father when he was but eight years old made him his associate in the kingdom, (2 Chron. xxxvi. 9.) that he might continue the kingdom in his family, and there might be no contention among his sons about it. Thus this account and that in the Chronicles are easily reconciled. When his father had reigned one year, he took him to reign with him; and so he came to reign ten years with his father, and three months alone. Now here Ezra mentions only the time he reigned alone, but there he speaks of all the years he reigned with his father and alone. Abarbinel gives another account of this difficulty, with which I shall not trouble the reader; it seeming to me a little more forced than this solution of it. And the plainest way is to acknowledge an error in the transcriber of the book of Chronicles.

And he reigned in Jerusalem three months, &c.] And ten days, as it is explained 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9. but such small numbers are wont to be omitted in greater sums. (See 1 Kings xvi. 18.)

Ver. 9. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his father had done.] A wonderful thing, that he should not be moved to do better, by the sad example of his father, and his predecessor.

Ver. 10. At that time the servants of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came up against Jerusalem, and the city was besieged.] It is likely that Nebuchadnezzar heard he was entered into a confederacy with the king of Egypt, as his successor did; and therefore sent an army against him in the very beginning of his reign, to lay siege to Jerusalem, against which he intended to come himself. Some of the Jews say, that the counsellors of Nebuchadnezzar represented to him how unadvisedly he had acted in making him king, whose father had been in rebellion against him; using this proverb, "From an ill dog never comes a good whelp." Whereupon he resolved to depose him, and make Zedekiah king.

Ver. 11. And Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came against the city, and his servants did besiege it.] He first sent an army under his great commanders, and then came in person, and found they had obeyed his orders, and invested the city.

Ver. 12. And Jehoiachin the king of Judah went out to the king of Babylon, he, and his mother, and his servants, and his princes, and his officers.] He made a surrender of the city into the hands of the king of Babylon; by the counsel of Jeremiah, perhaps, who advised the same to his successor more than once. (Jer. xxi. 9. xxvii. 17. xxxviii. 2.) And happy was it for him that he obeyed, and gave up himself to the king of Babylon; for God declared by the figure of good and bad figs, that he had sent them into the land of the Chaldeans for their good; whereas they that remained in the land should be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth, for their hurt. (See Jer. xxiv. 5—8, &c.)

And the king of Babylon took him in the eighth year of his reign.] That is, in the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar's reign; for he began to reign in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, who reigned seven more after that, which was the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar.

Ver. 13. And he carried out thence all the treasures of the house of the Lord, and all the treasures of the king's house.] There being no mention of the carrying away of the ark, either here, or in the book of the Chronicles, or in Jeremiah, among the holy things of the temple, it is probable that it was burnt, together with the temple, in the next reign, when the remaining holy things were carried away, but nothing said of this. For what the Jews say of its being hidden by the prophet Jeremiah in a certain cave in Mount Nebo is a mere fable; there being no ark in the second temple, as they confess; which there might have been, if it had been only hidden till the temple was restored.

And cut in pieces all the vessels of gold which Solomon the king of Israel had made in the temple of the Lord.] That is, all in a manner, but not absolutely all; for some were remaining, or else renewed again (which is not likely), xxvi. 14, 15. And by cutting in pieces must be meant no more than their being cut off from the temple; which was deprived of a principal part of its treasure; for these vessels were preserved entire, and not cut in pieces, as appears from Dan. v. 2.

As the Lord had said.] By the prophet Isaiah unto Hezekiah, (xx. 17.) As for the pillars, and the sea, and the bases, and the residue of the vessels that were not now taken away, they were only reserved till the next reign; when Jeremiah prophesied they should be carried away also, (Jer. xxvii. 19—22.)

Ver. 14. And he carried away all Jerusalem.] He explains what he means by the following words; which restrain it to the principal persons.

And all the princes, and all the mighty men of valour, even ten thousand captives.] Among whom was Ezekiel; who began his prophecy from this captivity, (Ezek. i. 2, 3.) and calls it our captivity, (xl. 1.) Mordecai, of the tribe of Benjamin, was carried away at this time, (Esther ii. 5—7.) if we believe the Jews.

And all the craftsmen and smiths.] By craftsmen, some understand carpenters; who were artificers, as the smiths were.

None remained, save the poorest people of the land.] Who were so numerous, that Zedekiah was tempted to rebel, and that against his oath of fidelity to the king of Babylon.

Ver. 15. And he carried Jehoiachin to Babylon, and the king's mother, and the king's wives, and the officers, and the mighty men of the land; those carried he into captivity from Jerusalem to Babylon.] All that belonged to the court, or that were of any quality in the country. (See Jer. xxiv. 1. xxix. 1, 2. Ezek. xvii. 12, 13.)

Ver. 16. And all the men of might, even seven thousand, and craftsmen and smiths a thousand; all that were strong and apt for war, even them the king of Babylon brought captive to Babylon.] This, and the foregoing verses, Abarbinel explains in this manner:—By the ten thousand mentioned ver. 14. are meant in general the whole number of Judah and Benjamin, that were now carried captive. Then here he comes to shew how this number was made up; (ver. 15, 16.) Jehoiachin, and all his court and great men, were seven thousand, the craftsmen and smiths a thousand. The rest were not mighty men, nor such tradesmen, but ministers and servants of the court, and other considerable men in the country, who made up two thousand more, and completed the ten thousand. Jeremiah computes them to have been but a little above three thousand that were now carried away to Babylon: but he reckons only those that were carried from Jerusalem; whereas here is an account of those that were carried from other cities, and out of the tribe of Benjamin, which were seven thousand. There was another captivity before this, in the last year of king Nebupolazzar, (Dan. i. 1—3.) but then only a few select persons were carried away to wait upon the king of Babylon; and therefore are not mentioned, either by Jeremiah, or by this Divine writer. But a very learned friend of mine, (in his late Chronology of the Old Testament, p. 49.) thinks that the first captivity was the greatest of all; those words, (xxiv. 3.) This came upon Judah to remove them out of God's sight, implying (in his opinion) that not only some of the seed-royal, with some others, but the body of the people were led into captivity. And therefore he dates the seventy years' captivity from that time; viz. the fourth year of Jehoiakim, in the beginning of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. (See Jer. xxv. 1. 11, 12.)

Ver. 17. And the king of Babylon made Mattaniah his father's brother king in his stead, and changed his name to Zedekiah.] Which signifies the justice of God: and seems to have been given him, to put him in mind of the just judgment of God, which would fall upon him, if he broke the oath of fidelity which he took to the king of Babylon, (2 Chron. xxxvi. 13. Ezek. xvii. 13, 14. 18.)

Ver. 18. And Zedekiah was twenty and one years old when he began to reign; and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem, &c.] In the end of which he was carried captive, (Jer. i. 3.)

Ver. 19. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that Jehoiakim had done.] Not regarding what Jeremiah said unto him, but shut him up in prison, &c. (Jer. xxxiii. 1, 2. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 12.) And his servants, and the people of the land, were as bad as himself, (Jer. xxxvii. 1, 2.)

Ver. 20. For through the anger of the Lord it came to pass in Judah and Jerusalem, until he had cast them out from his presence, that Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon.] God was so highly displeased with this wicked people, that he permitted Zedekiah to break his faith with Nebuchadnezzar, and to rebel against him, forgetting for what cause he changed his name. Unto his revolt, it is probable, he was persuaded by the ambassadors which the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, sent unto him, to solicit him to throw off the yoke of the king of Babylon, (Jer. xxvii. 2—4, &c.). Which was the greater crime, because he had made him swear by God he would be true to him, (Chron. xxxvi. 13.) The king of Egypt also, it is likely, promised him help, as I noted before, (ver. 7. and see Ezek. xvii. 15.) And Hananiah a false prophet assured him God would in two years' time break the yoke of the king of Babylon, and bring back all the vessels of the house of God, with Jehoiachin and all the captives. (See Jer. xxviii. 1—4, &c.) Jeremiah, indeed, proved that he had made them trust in a lie, by predicting his death that very year, which accordingly fell out, (ver. 15—17.) But they still persisted in their vain hopes, there being other deceivers, that prophesied falsely in God's name, (Jer. xxix. 8, 9.) And they most of all deceived themselves with proud conceits that they were the true seed of Abraham, who had a right to that land, (Ezek. xxxiii. 24.)

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass in the ninth year of his reign, in the tenth month, on the tenth day of the month, that Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came, he, and all his host, against Jerusalem.] See Jer. xxxix. 1. lii. 4.

And pitched against it.] Encamped themselves before it.

And they built forts against it round about.] On which to place their batteries, and keep any relief from coming to them.

Ver. 2. And the city was besieged to the eleventh year of king Zedekiah.] There was another siege began before this; viz. in the third year of Zedekiah; but during this second siege, the king of Egypt came to help Zedekiah: which made the Chaldeans raise the siege for a time, (Jerem. xxxvii. 12.) And then Jeremiah endeavoured to get out of the city, but was hindered; and bade them not flatter themselves, for the Chaldeans should return and burn the city with fire; as he had told Zedekiah before, (xxxiv. 1, 2, &c.)

Ver. 3. And on the ninth day of the fourth month the famine prevailed in the city, and there was no bread for the people of the land.] Who had fled thither out of the country to secure themselves and their families. This famine is described as very terrible, in the book of the Lamentations of Jeremiah, iv. 10.

Ver. 4. And the city was broken up, and all the men of war fled by night by the way of the gate, between two walls, which is by the king's garden (now the Chaldeans were against the city round about); and the king went the way towards the plain.] It is a hard matter to understand how they made their escape, since the Chaldeans had begirt the city round about; unless we suppose they kept strong guards only at the gates of the city; but the Chaldeans having made a breach in the wall, they got away privately between the wall and the outworks, in a passage which the Chaldeans did not suspect: and the king ran into the champaigne country, with some of his forces attending him. The Jews think there were subterranean conduits from the royal garden into the plain, through which Zedekiah went out: but this is without any ground.

Ver. 5. And the army of the Chaldeans pursued after the king, and overtook him in the plains of Jericho: and all his army was scattered from him.] Every man shifting away, and endeavouring to save himself in such places as he could flee unto.

Ver. 6. So they took the king, and brought him to the king of Babylon to Riblah.] Where he lay to attend the success of the siege, and to send them supplies, and intercept any relief that might come to them.

And they gave judgment upon him.] A great council, I suppose, was called; who passed a solemn sentence upon him, in condemning him as a rebellious subject. Thus was fulfilled the prophecy of Jeremiah, that he should see the king of Babylon, and speak with him, (Jer. xxxii. 4. xxxiv. 3.)

Ver. 7. And they slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes.] See Jer. lii. 11.

And put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him with fetters of brass, and carried him to Babylon.] Thus two famous prophecies were fulfilled, which seemed to contradict one the other (whereby Zedekiah, perhaps, was tempted not to believe them): one of Jeremiah, that he should be carried to Babylon; (xxxii. 5. xxxiv. 3.) and the other of Ezekiel, that he should not see Babylon, (xii. 13.) The event made good both; for he was carried thither blind.

Ver. 8. And in the fifth month, on the seventh day of the month (which is the nineteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon), came Nebuzar-adan, captain of the guard, a servant of the king of Babylon, unto Jerusalem.] It is said in Jer. lii. 12. that he came on the tenth day of this month; that is, he came from Riblah upon the seventh, and arrived at Jerusalem on the tenth. Or, if he came to Jerusalem on the seventh, he did not burn the temple till the tenth; but spent the eighth and ninth days, as the Jews say, in eating, drinking, and making merry. Nebuchadnezzar did not come himself to Jerusalem, but he sent this great man to execute his commands; who, the Jews say, became a proselyte.

Ver. 9. And he burnt the house of the Lord.] After it had stood four hundred years, as Sir John Marsham computes it. But primate Usher makes account it was burnt four hundred twenty-four years, three months, and eight days, after it began first to be built by Solomon. But neither of these accounts are true, if we believe all the learned Jews, (Kimchi, Ralbag, Abarbinel, &c.) who agree that it stood four hundred and thirty years. Josephus stands amazed at this, that the second temple was burnt by the Romans, in this very month, and the same day of the month, (lib. vi. de Bello Judaico, cap. 27.) And so we read in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 30. that the Levites were in their desks singing the very same song in both destructions, which was this: He shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and shall cut them off in their own wickedness: yea, the Lord our God shall cut them off, (Psal. xciv. 23.)

And the king's house, and all the houses of Jerusalem, and every great man's house burnt he with fire.] By col beth gadol, which signify every great house, the Talmudists understand all the synagogues. But Kimchi, Ralbag, and Abarbinel, interpret the words as we do. And so the Targum; yea, Jarchi himself, who is the most tenacious of the Talmudical interpreters, after he had said, The houses of the synagogues, where the law and prayers were read, adds these words, and the palaces of the princes; not daring (as Vitringa observes) to vouch the former for a literal interpretation, (lib. de Synag. par. ii. cap. 11.)

Ver. 10. And all the army of the Chaldeans, that were with the captain of the guard, brake down the walls of Jerusalem round about.] That they who were left there might not be able to make any resistance hereafter; and that it might no longer be looked upon as a city, but as an open village.

Ver. 11. Now the rest of the people that were left in the city, and the fugitives that fell away to the king of Babylon, with the remnant of the multitude.] That is, all that escaped the sword and the famine; and all that fled to the king of Babylon, and put themselves under his protection.

Did Nebuzar-adan, captain of the guard, carry away.] Who were in all eight hundred thirty and two persons; as we read in Jer. lii. 29. where he saith, in the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar (that is, in the end of it, and the beginning of his nineteenth year), he carried away this number.

Ver. 12. But the captain of the guard left of the poor of the land to be vine-dressers and husbandmen.] What should move the Talmudists by the Hebrew word ceremim to understand gatherers of balsam; and by jogebim, fishers for purple, is hard to understand (though Bochartus hath attempted some account of it); when Jeremiah tells us expressly that he gave these poor people vineyards and fields; which shews what they were, (Jer. xxxix. 10.)

Ver. 13. And the pillars of brass that were in the house of the Lord, and the bases, and the brazen sea that was in the house of the Lord, did the Chaldeans break in pieces, and carried the brass of them to Babylon.] They were too cumbersome to be carried away whole, therefore he brake them in pieces, and so transported the brass of which they were made.

Ver. 14. And the pots, and the shovels, and the snuffers, and the spoons, and all the vessels of brass, wherewith they ministered, took they away.

Ver. 15. And the fire-pans, and the bowls, and such things as were of gold, in gold, and of silver, in silver, the captain of the guard took away.] He did not alter these, but carried them away as he found them; that he might give a punctual account of them to his master. And the singular providence of God herein appeared, that these vessels were not embezzled, nor employed to any common use, but put into the house of the king of Babylon's god, viz. Belus, where they were preserved to be restored, in God's appointed time, by Cyrus. So we read they were, Ezra i. 7, 8, &c.

Ver. 16. And the two pillars, one sea, and the bases which Solomon had made for the house of the Lord: the brass of all these vessels was without weight.] So we read they were, when they were first made, (1 Kings vii. 47.)

Ver. 17. And the height of one pillar was eighteen cubits, and the chapiter upon it was brass; and the height of the chapiter three cubits; and the wreathen work, and pomegranates upon the chapiter round about, all of brass: and like unto these had the second pillar with wreathen work.] These two pillars are more fully described in 1 Kings vii. 15, &c. and in Jer. lii. 21, &c.

Ver. 18. And the captain of the guard took Seraiah the chief priest, and Zephaniah the second priest.] Whom the Jews call the sagan; who was the deputy of the high-priest, in case of sickness, or any incapacity to officiate.

And the three keepers of the door.] Of the vessels of the temple, saith Kimchi; or of the treasury.

Ver. 19. And out of the city he took an officer that was set over the men of war, and five men of them that were in the king's presence.] Who constantly attended the king's person wheresoever he was.

Which were in the city.] Where at first they found but five of them: but afterward seven, (Jer. lii. 26.)

And the principal scribe of the host, which mustered the people of the land.] The muster-master-general, as we speak, or some such great officer.

And threescore people of the land that were found in the city.] These were some eminent persons who had concealed themselves in some private place; but, before Nebuzar-adan left Jerusalem, were discovered. And the Jews will have it that they were the men of the great Sanhedrin; whose whole number of seventy-one persons they make a shift to find here; viz. the three keepers of the door, and the seven near attendants upon the king, and the scribe; which with these threescore, make seventy-one. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 16. p. 671.)

Ver. 20. And Nebuzar-adan, captain of the guard, took them, and brought them to the king of Babylon at Riblah.] That he might dispose of them as he thought fit; they being not vulgar persons, like those whom he had ordered to be carried captive, or left in the land.

Ver. 21. And the king of Babylon smote them, and slew them at Riblah, in the land of Hamath.] Passed the sentence of death upon them; which was forthwith executed: because he looked upon them, it is likely, as the king's principal counsellors, who advised him to rebel against him. And the judgment of God, Strigelius here observes, was remarkable upon impious priests, whom he suffered not to live, because they had been great instruments in promoting idolatry.

So Judah was carried away out of their land.] Four hundred sixty and eight years after the beginning of the reign of David; three hundred eighty and eight years since the division of the ten tribes from Judah and Benjamin; and a hundred thirty-four years since the destruction of the ten tribes; as our primate of Ireland makes account.

Ver. 22. And for the people that remained in the land of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon had left.] Ver. 12.

Even over them he made Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, ruler.] His father Ahikam was a great friend of Jeremiah's, (Jer. xxvi. 14.) and therefore Gedaliah may be presumed to have been so likewise; and by his advice, it is likely, was one of those that went out to the king of Babylon, (ver. 11.)

Ver. 23. And when the captains of the armies, they and their men, heard that the king of Babylon had made Gedaliah governor.] That is, such as fled away with Zedekiah, (ver. 5.) and those that fled perhaps before the siege to the Moabites, and Ammonites, and Edomites, and other neighbouring countries. (See Jer. xl. 7. 11, 12.)

There came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, even Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and Johanan the son of Careah, and Seraiah the son of Tanhumeth the Netophathite, and Jaazaniah the son of a Maachathite, they and their men.] He reckons up the principal persons that came in to him, with those under their command. Jeremiah also himself put himself under his protection, (Jer. xl. 5, 6.)

Ver. 24. And Gedaliah sware unto them, and to their men, and said unto them, Fear not to be the servants of the Chaldeans: dwell in the land, and serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you.] He was so well assured of the king of Babylon's favour to him, that he secured them by an oath, they should be safe under his government; provided they would serve the king of Babylon, which it was their interest to do.

Ver. 25. And it came to pass in the seventh month.] After he had been governor about two months.

That Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, the son of Elishama, of the seed-royal.] His pride (being of the seed-royal) tempted him to conspire against Gedaliah; though he had no power to maintain any authority in the country; but was forced presently to flee away. Nor was the king of Moab, who instigated him to this villany, (Jer. xl. 14.) able to support him.

Came, and ten men with him.] These ten men were commanders, no doubt, of some forces under them; for so few were not sufficient to make a slaughter of Gedaliah, and all the Jews and Chaldeans that were with him. (See Jer. xli. 1—3.)

And he smote Gedaliah, that he died, and the Jews and the Chaldees that were with him at Mizpah.] This story is told more largely in the fortieth and forty-first of Jeremiah; where we read that Gedaliah was admonished of this intended conspiracy against him; but, like other good men, who are commonly void of suspicion, because they have no design to hurt others, he did not believe what was told him.

Ver. 26. And all the people, small and great, and the captains of the armies, arose, and came to Egypt; for they were afraid of the Chaldees.] Contrary to the persuasion of Jeremiah (by whom they pretended they would be advised), who assured them that they should be safe if they would stay in the land of Judah, but should perish if they went into Egypt. (See Jer. xlii. 9, 10, &c.) Thus this populous and fertile country was laid waste and desolate; part of the people being carried captive to Babylon, part of those that were left in the land being slain with Gedaliah, the remainder flying into Egypt. So that it was left to be overrun with briers and thorns, and to be inhabited by wild beasts. Only some of the neighbouring nations seem to have settled themselves in some parts of it. (See Jer. xii. 14. Ezek. xxxvi. 4, 5.)

Ver. 27. And it came to pass, in the thirty-seventh year of the captivity of Jehoiachin king of Judah, in the twelfth month, on the seven-and-twentieth day of the month.] It was resolved on the twenty-fifth day of the month, and executed two days after. So this place is easily reconciled with Jer. lii. 35.

In the year he began to reign, did Evil-Merodach lift up the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah out of prison.] Raised him from his dejected condition; for in affliction men hang down their heads. By this it appears that Nebuchadnezzar reigned five-and-forty years; for Jechoniah was carried captive in the eighth year of his reign, (xxiv. 12.) and now had been prisoner thirty-seven years, when Nebuchadnezzar was newly dead. Which two sums put together make forty-five. This is the account of the Jews; but, according to the canon of Ptolemy, he reigned but three-and-forty years: and therefore primate Usher makes him to have reigned two years with his father.

Ver. 28. And he spake kindly unto him, and set his throne above the throne of the kings that were with him in Babylon.] He had the kings of several countries with him in Babylon, whom his father had taken captive, and made prisoners: unto whom he not only left the name and titles of kings, but now gave them some liberty, and bestowed a royal seat upon them. But he preferred Jehoiachin above them all; either because of the great fame of his royal ancestors David and Solomon, from whom he was descended; or, as the Jews say, because he had made a friendship in prison with Evil-Merodach, who was thrown into it by his father Nebuchadnezzar for his maleadministration of the government, during the seven years that he was moped.

Ver. 29. And changed his prison-garments.] Bestowed on him royal apparel; that he might be fit to keep him company.

And he did eat bread continually before him all the days of his life.] Was frequently invited to his own table, as Crœsus was to that of Cyrus. Victorinus Strigelius thinks it not unlikely that he had learned the doctrine of the true God from the prophet Daniel, as Nebuchadnezzar his father had done; who in a public edict professed as much: and upon this account he shewed such great kindness to Jechoniah. For which cause he got the name of Evil-Merodach among impious princes; that is, Foolish Merodach.

Ver. 30. And his allowance was a constant allowance given him of the king, a daily rate for every day, all the days of his life.] The meaning may be, that when he did not eat with the king, he lived upon a pension, that was duly paid him every day for meat, drink, clothing, lodging, and other expenses. Or if the word continually (in the foregoing verse) be understood literally, that he always ate with the king: then this allowance was made for his family and attendants; as in the case of Mephibosheth, (2 Sam. ix. 10.) Jeremiah, in the conclusion of his book, gives the same account of the king's extraordinary kindness to him; which continued, he saith, to the day of his death.

FIRST BOOK OF THE CHRONICLES.

IT is the common opinion of the Jews that these books were written by Ezra: which is the more probable, because the book of Ezra begins with the same words (without the least variation) wherewith these books end: which argues one and the same person to have written both; who, to connect his history together, makes use of his own words, as Grotius observes other ancient authors have done. Howsoever, it appears from hence, that these books were written after the captivity, since they mention their restoration by Cyrus: and it is also evident from 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. that they were written after the time of the prophet Jeremiah.

Huetius, in his learned work, Demonstratio Evangelica, thus far agrees with this opinion of the Jews, that he thinks Ezra digested these books; and added to them the first six chapters of the book which bears his name, which afterward he continued: but Nehemiah, he thinks, had some hand in this work: which was gathered not only out of the public journals, but of the writings of the prophets, Shimeah, Iddo, Jehu, Nathan, Abijah, Isaiah, and others; and, it is likely, out of some genealogies (R. Solomon saith, upon the seventh chapter, that after their return he found three), and out of the other books of Holy Scripture before published, as Kimchi adds: and thus Procopius Gazæus,

That which confirms this opinion, is what we read in the second book, chap. v. 9. where it is said of the ark and its staves, which Solomon brought into his temple, there they are to this day. Which words are so far (as Huetius observes) from proving that these books were written before the captivity (after which the ark was no more heard of), that Ezra took this passage, and that in 1 Kings viii. 8. where are almost the same words, out of some other ancient book, and set them down word for word as he found them there. For having wrote the books of the Kings in the time of the captivity, he found at their return more ancient registers, containing larger accounts of several transactions; which he thought good to add to what he had before written, to make the history more complete: which Dr. Alix (in his Reflections upon the Books of the Old Testament, vol. ii. chap. 1.) thinks was done about six-and-twenty years after the writing of the books of the Kings, in the eighteenth year after the captivity was ended.

This seems to be implied in the Hebrew title of these books, which is Dibre hajamim, signifying they contain such things as were contained in the diaries or day-books, wherein the passages of those times were recorded, if any thing memorable happened every day. The word Jamim also signifying years, these books may be called Annals: which the Greeks call Παραλειπόμενα: as much as to say, those things are here supplied which were omitted in other books of Holy Scripture, especially in the books of the Kings, as other things are here amplified and enlarged: others explained and made more clear. For instance, in the conclusion of this first book, he gives an account of the things which David did in his old age: in ordering the courses of the priests, and of the Levites, the singers, and musicians; and in making vast preparations for the building of the temple by his son; none of which had been mentioned in the foregoing books. Thus Xenophon (Strigelius observes) wrote Paralipomena of the Peloponnesian war, which had been written before by Thucydides.

He begins these books with a genealogy from the beginning of the world to his own time, which had not been done in any book of Scripture before: but was necessary to be done now, that a distinction between their tribes and families being preserved (which was in danger to be lost by their dispersion in the captivity), it might clearly appear, the Messiah sprung out of that tribe and family, from which he was to descend, according to the ancient prophecies. For, as Procopius Gazæus observes, from these books it is that we learn, among other things, that Nathan, from whom St. Luke derives the genealogy of our Saviour, was the brother of Solomon by David and Bath-sheba.

To conclude this preface, it may be noted, that no book in the world shews the original propagation of mankind, but only the Holy Scriptures. They who were ignorant of them having nothing of true antiquity, devised senseless fables of their descent, they knew not how, nor from whom. The Arcadians fancied that they were before the moon: the people of Thessaly, that they sprung from stones. The Athenians took themselves to be αὐτόχθονες, who sprung up out of the ground; and affirmed, they were more ancient than Japetus; who, in truth, was the father of the Greeks; Javan, from whom came the Iones, being the son of Japheth, as these holy books shew. See upon 2 Chron. xxix. 21. a little additional proof that these books were written by Ezra.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. ADAM, Sheth, Enosh.] He mentions only their names briefly: but the meaning is, that Adam begat Sheth, and Sheth begat Enosh: and so the rest are to be understood. Adam, indeed, had two sons before he begat Sheth: but one of them was murdered without issue, and the other was accursed; so that all who descended from him perished in the flood: therefore these only that came from Sheth are remembered.

This may seem to be sufficiently recorded, as much of that which follows is, in the book of Genesis: so that there was no need, some may imagine, to repeat it here: but there being a genealogy to be drawn of the several families of the Jews, it was fit to begin it with an account of the honour they had to be the select people of God, whose original and descent was manifest and plain from the very first man, who was the son of God. This was the peculiar glory of the Jewish nation, that they alone were able to derive their pedigree from the first man that God created; of which no other nation could boast, or make a shadow of pretence. Besides, by the recital of this, the Divine writer of this book designed to keep up the belief that the world was not eternal, but had a beginning, as is recorded in the book of Genesis.

Ver. 2. Kenan.] We translate it Cainan, Gen. v. 9.

Mahalaleel, Jered.] See Gen. v. 12. 15.

Ver. 3. Henoch, Methuselah, Lamech.] See concerning these, Gen. v. 18. 21. 25.

Ver. 4. Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth.] These were the three sons of Noah: among whom Japheth was the eldest, (Gen. x. 21.) and therefore his genealogy is first mentioned. But Shem being the person in whose posterity true religion was preserved, and from whom the promised seed was to come, is first named both here and in Gen. v. 31. x. 1.

Ver. 5. The sons of Japheth; Gomer, and Magog, and Madai, and Javan, and Tubal, and Meshech, and Tiras.] Thus they were reckoned up in the same order, Gen. x. 2. where see concerning them.

Ver. 6. The sons of Gomer; Ashchenaz, and Riphath, and Togarmah.] The same account we have in Gen. x. 3.

Ver. 7. And the sons of Javan; Elishah, and Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim.] The same we read, Gen. x. 4. And neither there nor here is any mention of the rest of Japheth's posterity, but only of Gomer and Javan. (See Gen. x. 5. in the latter end of my annotations on that verse.)

Ver. 8. The sons of Ham; Cush, and Mizraim, Put, and Canaan.] In this place, and in this order, they are mentioned in Gen. x. 6. And the reason, I suppose, why his genealogy is mentioned before Shem's, is, because from Shem the genealogy of Abraham and the Jewish nation was to be derived: which it was thought fit to set down without any interruption.

Ver. 9. And the sons of Cush; Seba, and Havilah, and Sabta, and Raamah, and Sabtecha. And the sons of Raamah; Sheba, and Dedan.] See Gen. x. 7. where an account is given of the sons of Cush, and of his two grandsons by one of them.

Ver. 10. And Cush begat Nimrod.] He mentions him alone by himself, because he was the most eminent among all his sons. (See upon Gen. x. 8. where I have given an account of the next words.)

He began to be mighty upon the earth.] That is, was the first that raised a great kingdom.

Ver. 11. And Mizraim begat Ludim, and Anamim, and Lehabim, and Naphtuhim.] The very same account we have in Gen. x. 13. where I have shewn in what parts of the world their posterity settled.

Ver. 12. And Pathrusim, and Casluhim.] See Gen. x. 14.

(Of whom came the Philistines).] Who were a colony from the Casluhim.

And Caphthorim.] See Gen. x. 14.

Ver. 13. And Canaan begat Zidon his first-born, and Heth.] See Gen. x. 15.

Ver. 14. The Jebusite also, and the Amorite, and the Girgashite,

Ver. 15. The Hivite, and the Arkite, and the Sinite,

Ver. 16. And the Arvadite, and the Zemarite, and the Hamathite.] In this very order they are set down by Moses, in Gen. x. 16—18. (See what I have noted there.)

Ver. 17. The sons of Shem; Elam, and Asshur, and Arphaxad, and Lud, and Aram.] Thus they are set down in Gen. x. 22. and Arphaxad is mentioned after Elam and Asshur, just as Aaron is after Moses in Exod. vi. 27. though he was the elder brother. For, as the Jews often note, the Scripture doth not strictly observe the order of time.

And Uz, and Hul, and Gether, and Meshech.] These were not the sons of Shem, but his grandsons by Aram his youngest son: as appears from Gen. x. 22. But nothing is more usual in Scripture, than to call grandsons by the name of sons. As Laban is called the son of Nahor, Gen. xxix. 5. being his grandchild by Beth-el. And Mephibosheth is called the son of Saul, 2 Sam. xix. 24. because he was descended from him by his son Jonathan. Meshech had two names; for he is called Mash, Gen. x. 23. and possessed the mountain of Masins in Mesopotamia; as Bochart thinks in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 11. Though Mash may very well be thought not to be another name, but only the contraction of Meshech: who some think was the father of the Cappadocians.

Ver. 18. And Arphaxad begat Shelah, and Shelah begat Eber.] He follows Moses exactly; who gives no account of the posterity of the two sons of Shem first mentioned, but only of the third, Arphaxad: that he might the sooner come to him from whom the Israelites descended. Here the LXX. interpose Cainan between Arphaxad and Shelah: but it is not in the Greek Muscovite translation; as is observed by primate Usher, in his Letters, ccxcvi. (And see Bochart, in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 13.)

Ver. 19. And unto Eber were born two sons.] Gen. x. 25.

The name of one was Peleg (because in his days the earth was divided).] That is, the inhabitants of the earth were divided, and dispersed; according to the division of their languages. (See my annotations there.)

And his brother's name was Joktan.] Who had a more numerous issue than any hitherto mentioned.

Ver. 20. And Joktan begat Almodad, and Sheleph, and Hazarmaveth, and Jerah.] See concerning these, Gen. x. 26.

Ver. 21. Hadoram also, and Uzal, and Diklah.] See Gen. x. 27.

Ver. 22. And Ebal, and Abimael, and Sheba.] See Gen. x. 28. where the first of these is called Obal: from whence some have argued, that the name in this place is corrupted. As if, in process of time, there might not be a variation in the vowel: Moses pronouncing the name as they spake it in his time, and this author as they spake in his.

Ver. 23. And Ophir, and Havilah, and Jobab. All these were the sons of Joktan.] Who were thirteen in all: and all but one settled their habitation in Arabia. (See Gen. x. 29.)

Ver. 24. Shem, Arphaxad, Shelah.] These are repeated from ver. 17, 18. to shew how Abraham was descended from Shem: who was the most eminent of all Noah's sons; whom he solemnly blessed: the Messiah being to spring from him, (Gen. ix. 36.) For from Adam the promise of the Messiah was translated to Seth; and from Seth to Shem; from Shem to Eber; from whom the Hebrew nation, some think, derived their name; and had this precious promise committed to their trust, above all other nations in the world.

Ver. 25. Eber, Peleg, Reu,

Ver. 26. Serug, Nahor, and Terah.] This genealogy from Eber, is recorded by Moses in Gen. xi. 16—18, &c.

Ver. 27. Abram, the same is Abraham.] God changed his name from Abram to Abraham, when he established his covenant with him, (Gen. xvii. 5, &c.) and made him the father of many nations.

Ver. 28. The sons of Abraham; Isaac, and Ishmael.] Isaac is first mentioned, being the son of a free-woman, and the heir of the promise: though Ishmael was elder than he, but born of a bond-woman.

Ver. 29. These are their generations: The first-born of Ishmael, Nebaioth.] To shew how God made Abraham the father of many nations, he reckons up twelve great persons descended from his son Ishmael; the first of which was Nebaioth: concerning whom, and the rest that follow, see Gen. xxv. 13, 14, &c.

Then Kedar, and Adbeel, and Mibsam.] I shall only observe here, that as from Nebaioth came the people called Nabatæi; so from Kedar came the Cedreni, whom geographers call Cedrei, and Cedranitæ, as Bochart observes.

Ver. 30. Mishma, and Duma, Massa, Hadad, and Tema,

Ver. 31. Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah. These are the sons of Ishmael.] In what country they dwelt, see Gen. xxv. 18.

Ver. 32. Now the sons of Keturah, Abraham's concubine.] After the death of Sarah, Abraham married Keturah: and having many children by her, this holy writer names them, to shew how faithfully God made good the name he gave him, by making Abraham the father of many more nations.

She bare Zimran, and Jokshan, and Medan, and Midian, and Ishbak, and Shuah.] See Gen. xxv. 2.

The sons of Jokshan; Sheba, and Dedan.] There were four Shebas, as I there observed; and one more of the name of Dedan: and this man's sons are there mentioned, though here omitted.

Ver. 33. And the sons of Midian; Ephah, and Epher, and Henoch, and Abida, and Eldaah.] See Gen. xxv. 4. The first of these, as Bochart thinks, was the same with the Greek Hippos, a mountain and a village of which name Ptolemy describes on the same shore, a little below Madian, which he calls Modiana, in his Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 3.

All these are the sons of Keturah.] Her sons or grandsons.

Ver. 34. And Abraham begat Isaac. The sons of Isaac; Esau, and Israel.

Ver. 35. The sons of Esau; Eliphaz, Reuel, and Jeush, and Jaalam, and Korah.] These were by several wives, as we read Gen. xxxvi. 10. 14.

Ver. 36. The sons of Eliphaz; Teman, and Omar, Zephi, and Gatam, Kenaz, and Timnah, and Amalek.] It is plain from Gen. xxxvi. 12. that Timnah was not one of his sons, but his concubine; by whom he begat Amalek. This therefore is a short form of speech, as much as if he had said, Of Timnah Amalek. Who was not equal to the rest of his sons, and therefore he mentions his mother's name. Kimchi hath expressed this so well, that it may be for the reader's use to transcribe some of his words: which may serve for a rule in such-like cases. "In my judgment (saith he) the Scripture uses here a concise and compendious way of speaking: for there was no need that Ezra should recount all these things exactly and accurately, which had been done before in the law (he means in the book of Genesis), therefore he describes these genealogies briefly." Thus he doth in the seventeenth verse of this chapter, mentioning Uz and Hul after Aram: who were not his sons but his grandsons. R. Solomon hath the same observation. (See Buxtorf's Anticritica, par. ii. cap. 2.)

Ver. 37. The sons of Reuel; Nahath, Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah.] Who are called dukes, as the sons of Eliphaz also are; (see Gen. xxxvi. 15. 17.) that is, rulers, or governors of the country, but not with kingly authority.

Ver. 38. And the sons of Seir; Lotan, and Shobal, and Zibeon, and Anah, and Dishon, and Ezar, and Dishan.] This Seir was not Esau, nor of his posterity, but the ancient lord of this country, from whom it had its name, (see Gen. xxxvi. 20.) whose genealogy is here set down, that it may be understood from whom Timnah and Amalek sprung.

Ver. 39. And the sons of Lotan; Hori, and Homam: and Timnah was Lotan's sister.] This woman was Eliphaz's concubine, and bare him Amalek, (ver. 36.) who, by his mother's side, was Seir's grandson.

Ver. 40. And of the sons of Shobal; Alian (or Abian), and Manahath, and Ebal, Shephi, and Onam.] See Gen. xxxvi. 23.

And the sons of Zibeon; Aiah, and Anah.] The latter of which was a person of great note. (See Gen. xxxvi. 24.)

Ver. 41. The sons of Anah; Dishon. And the sons of Dishon; Amram, and Eshban, and Ithran, and Cheran.] The first-born of these was otherwise called Hemdan, Gen. xxxvi. 26. which was the name, it is possible, whereby he was known among Esau's posterity: though anciently his name was Amram.

Ver. 42. The sons of Ezer; Bilhan, and Zavan, and Jakan. The sons of Dishan; Uz, and Aran.] Among all these persons descended from Seir, seven of them were dukes: who reigned perhaps at the same time in several parts of the country, (Gen. xxxvi. 29, 30.) By which it appears, that this was the ancient form of government before Esau conquered this country: which his posterity at the first followed, but afterward was changed into kingly, as it here follows.

Ver. 43. Now these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom before any king reigned over the children of Israel.] See this explained in Gen. xxxvi. 31.

Bela the son of Beor.] This Beor was not Balaam's father, for he was a Mesopotamian, not an Edomite; but one of the same name, as Aben Ezra well observes.

And the name of his city was Dinhabah.] Of which he was governor, perhaps, before he was made king: and therefore therein he reigned, and made it the seat of his kingdom.

Ver. 44. And when Bela was dead, Jobab, the son of Zerah of Bozrah, reigned in his stead.] See concerning this succession, Gen. xxxvi. 33. Bozrah was a city in Edom, as three prophets plainly describe it, (Isa. xxxiv. 6. Jer. xlix. 13. Amos i. 12.) And one of these represents it also as a city of Moab: because, as some think, it was in the confines of both countries: or rather, in the opinion of Bochartus, there were two Bozrahs; the one in Idumea, the other in Moab.

Ver. 45. And when Jobab was dead, Husham, of the land of the Temanites, reigned in his stead.] We know nothing of Husham; but he seems not to have been the son of Jobab, but one of another family, in another part of the country. Some take this Jobab to have been Job: which opinion is exploded by Aben Ezra.

Ver. 46. And when Husham was dead, Hadad the son of Bedad (which smote Midian in the field of Moab) reigned in his stead: and the name of his city was Avith.] See Gen. xxxvi. 35. where R. Solomon saith, the Midianites making war against the Moabites, this king of Edom came to help the Moabites.

Ver. 47. And when Hadad was dead, Samlah of Masrekah reigned in his stead.

Ver. 48. And when Samlah was dead, Shaul of Rehoboth by the river reigned in his stead.] See Gen. xxxvi. 37.

Ver. 49. And when Shaul was dead, Baal-hanan the son of Achbor reigned in his stead.

Ver. 50. And when Baal-hanan was dead, Hadad (or Hadar) reigned in his stead: and the name of his city was Pai (or Pau); and his wife's name Mehetabel.] See Gen. xxxvi. 39.

The daughter of Matred, the daughter of Mezahab.] Some of the Jews fancy this Mezahab to have been a very ingenious woman, being the first that found out the art of drawing gold out into wires or threads: for zahab signifies gold in Hebrew. But the LXX. take this for the name of a man, and translate it υἱοῦ Μαιζοώβ.

Ver. 51. Hadad died also. And the dukes of Edom were; duke Timnah, duke Aliah, duke Jetheth.

Ver. 52. Duke Aholibamah, duke Elah, duke Pinon.

Ver. 53. Duke Kenaz, duke Teman, duke Mibzar.

Ver. 54. Duke Magdiel, duke Iram. These are the dukes of Edom.] After the death of Hadad, the form of government was altered again: for there were no more kings for a long time; but they returned to the first constitution, which they found, when they conquered the country; which was governed by dukes. (See Gen. xxxvi. 40.) And thus it was in Israel, after they came into the land of Canaan. They were first governed by judges, who had not kingly power. After which, from the time of Saul, they were governed by kings till their captivity. At their return, they had no more kings, but only such governors as Zerubbabel was. Some have imagined that Esau was the first king of this country: but in all likelihood, if he was, he would have left his son Eliphaz in the same authority; who was but a duke, (Gen. xxxvi. 15, 16.) Therefore Esau contented himself with that form of government which he found among the Horites: which continued till Bela made himself king, (ver. 43.) The difference between their kings and dukes was (as Esthius observes), that the former ruled absolutely, according to their pleasure: the power of the other was limited and bounded by certain prescribed laws.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. THESE are the sons of Israel; Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun,

Ver. 2. Dan, Joseph, and Benjamin, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher.] He reckons up his first four sons in the order wherein they were born, (Gen. xxix. 32, &c.) and next to them their two brethren by the same mother, Leah, (Gen. xxx. 18. 20.) Afterward, I can give no reason why Dan and Naphtali (the two sons of Bilhah) are not mentioned together, and Joseph and Benjamin, the two sons of Rachel, and Gad and Asher, the two sons of Zelpah.

Ver. 3. The sons of Judah; Er, and Onan, and Shelah.] There is a plain reason why the genealogy of Judah is set down in the first place; because this tribe had obtained a superiority and pre-eminence among the rest, before the time of David; ever since the prophecy of Jacob, in the blessing he pronounced upon him, (Gen. xlix. 10.) For Judah, when they came into the wilderness, was ordered to march first; (Numb. ii. 3.) and accordingly we find they did, when they removed from Mount Sinai, (Numb. x. 14.) And when the princes of the tribes offered at the dedication of the altar, the prince of the tribe of Judah offered on the first day, (Numb. vii. 12.) When they came into Canaan, they obtained of Joshua a portion for Caleb without casting of any lot, as there was in the dividing of the land, (Josh. xiv. 6.) And when Joshua was dead, they were appointed by God to go up first against the Canaanites, to take from them what remained unconquered, (Judg. i. 2.) From David's time, every one knows, till the captivity of Babylon, a kingly power continued in this tribe: and Zerubbabel was of the same, who was their leader when they returned to their own land.

Which were born unto him of the daughter of Shua the Canaanitess.] See an account of this in Gen. xxxviii. 2.

And Er, the first-born of Judah, was evil in the sight of the Lord, and he slew him.] See ver. 7. of the same chapter. His second son also, though he be not represented under so bad a character, yet displeased God so much, that he slew him also, (ver. 9, 10.)

Ver. 4. And Tamar his daughter-in-law bare him Pharez and Zerah. All the sons of Judah were five.] See there, ver. 29. 50.

Ver. 5. And the sons of Pharez; Hezron, and Hamul.] Who were born unto him before they went into Egypt, (Gen. xlvi. 12.)

Ver. 6. And the sons of Zerah; Zimri, and Ethan, and Heman, and Calcol, and Dara: five of them in all.] These were born after they came into Egypt; for there is no mention of them in the book of Genesis. And the Jews in Seder Olam Rabba, and in Jalkut, say, these men prophesied when they were in Egypt: for they suppose them to be the same with those mentioned 1 Kings iv. 31. If they were, then Zerah had two names, and was also called Mahol: but there is great reason to think they were not the same, as I have shewn in my annotations there.

Ver. 7. The sons of Carmi.] This man was the son of Zimri: who, in Josh. vii. 18. is called Zabdi; for by length of time his name might easily be thus altered. And, indeed, in copying proper names, one might easily mistake.

Achar, the troubler of Israel, who transgressed in the thing accursed.] He who is there called Achan, is here elegantly called Achar; which signifies troubler: because he had brought Israel into great danger, by the sin he committed in the accursed thing. The remembrance of this some thought fit he should carry in his name: which in process of time was changed, by common use and custom, from Achan into Achar. Which is more likely, than that there should be an error here in the transcriber. (See Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31.)

Ver. 8. And the sons of Ethan; Azariah.] Here is but one son mentioned: but it is usual in Scripture to speak of a singular person in the plural number, (Gen. xlvi. 23.) to include all his descendants.

Ver. 9. The sons of Hezron, that were born unto him; Jerahmeel, and Ram, and Chelubai.] This Ram is mentioned in the genealogy of our Saviour, (Matt. i. 3, 4.) and called Aram.

Ver. 10. And Ram begat Amminadab, and Amminadab begat Nahshon, the prince of the children of Judah.] When they came out of Egypt, and pitched under their several standards, (Numb. ii. 3.)

Ver. 11. And Nahshon begat Salma, and Salma begat Boaz,

Ver. 12. And Boaz begat Obed, and Obed begat Jesse.] These three are the principal persons in all this genealogy, as Pellicanus observes; being put into the genealogy of our Saviour, who was descended from David by these three great ancestors.

Ver. 13. And Jesse begat his first-born Eliab, and Abinadab the second, and Shimma the third,

Ver. 14. Nethaneel the fourth, Raddai the fifth,

Ver. 15. Ozem the sixth, David the seventh.] It is manifest from 1 Sam. xvi. 10, 11. that Jesse had eight sons: but some think one of them was only an adopted son, and therefore not here mentioned: and they gather from 2 Sam. xxi. 2. that his name was Jonathan, by a mistake; for that Jonathan was David's nephew by his brother Shamma. The truest account therefore is, that one of Jesse's sons was dead, before David came to the kingdom. So Rasi.

Ver. 16. Whose sisters were Zeruiah, and Abigail.] Who were the sisters of David last mentioned.

And the sons of Zeruiah; Abishai, and Joab, and Asahel, three.] Who were all eminent commanders under David.

Ver. 17. And Abigail bare Amasa.] Another valiant man, who was murdered by Joab.

And the father of Amasa was Jether the Ishmeelite.] He was an Ishmeelite by birth, but by religion an Israelite: or, as others will have it, he was born an Israelite, but bred so long among the Ishmeelites, that many called him by that name. (See 2 Sam. xvii. 25.) The father of Abishai, Joab, and Asahel, is no where mentioned; being not eminent, it seems, as this Jether was; but their glory was by their mother's side.

Ver. 18. And Caleb the son of Hezron begat children.] It is plain this is not Caleb, whom Moses sent to search out the land of Canaan; for he was the son of Jephunneh, of whom he gives an account below, (iv. 15.) This man is called Chelubai, ver. 9. of this chapter.

Of Azubah his wife.] It is an ungrounded fancy of the Talmudists, in Sota, who say she was called Azubah (which signifies forsaken) because Caleb married her for the love of God, when nobody would have her.

And of Jerioth.] This is understood by Conradus Pellicanus, as if he had said, that of his wife Azubah he begat Jerioth: for there is nothing in the Hebrew that answers to the word children.

Her sons are these; Jesher, and Shobab, and Ardon.] That is, these were the sons of Jerioth.

Ver. 19. And when Azubah was dead, Caleb took unto him Ephrath, which bare him Hur.] This was a very continent man, who had but one wife at a time; and loved Azubah so well, that he married no other while she lived. His second wife also was of such note, that gave name to a place in the country of Judah,(ver. 24.)

Ver. 20. And Hur begat Uri, und Uri begat Bezaleel.

Ver. 21. And afterward Hezron went in to the daughter of Machir.] After the death of Ephrath, I suppose, he married another woman of an eminent family.

The father of Gilead.] The prince of the country of Gilead; as the word father often signifies.

Whom he married when he was sixty years old, and she bare him Segub.

Ver. 22. And Segub begat Jair.] Who is called the son of Manasseh in Numb. xxxii. 41. because his grandmother was of that tribe, the daughter of Machir, the son of Manasseh, (Numb. xx. 29.)

Who had three-and-twenty cities in the land of Gilead.] In the right of his wife, as the common opinion of the Jewish doctors is: who observe in Scripture two instances of husbands that inherited the estate of their wives, though in another tribe. The first is in Josh. xxiv. 33. and the other in this place; where Kimchi notes, that this Jair, "the son of Segub, took a wife in the land of Gilead, unto whom he succeeded as her heir in her possessions, when she was dead: these twenty-three cities being her inheritance." (See Selden, de Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 18.)

Ver. 23. And he took Geshur, and Aram, with the towns of Jair, from them.] They were afterward called by his name, who conquered them, and took them from the neighbouring Geshurites and Syrians.

With Kenath and the towns thereof, even threescore cities.] The metropolis of which was Kenath: in the taking of which he employed a great commander, called Nobah, Numb. xxxii. 42. who, I suppose, was of the same tribe and family.

All these belonged to the sons of Machir, the father of Gilead.] His posterity possessed these towns.

Ver. 24. And after that Hezron was dead in Caleb-Ephratah.] This city was called after the name of both husband and wife, (ver. 19.) they being both famous persons. And it was also called Beth-lehem, from the fruitfulness of the place.

Then Abiah, Hezron's wife, bare him Ashur.] He married her when he was very old, (for he was threescore when he took his former wife, ver. 21.) and died before the child was born, whom he begat of her. The Jews look upon his marrying when he was so old, as proceeding from a great desire of posterity in the family of Pharez, from whom the Messiah was to descend. The same we see in Boaz, who married Ruth when he was old.

The father of Tekoa.] Who gave name to a famous town in this country, (2 Sam. xiv. 2. Jer. iii. 6.)

Ver. 25. And the sons of Jerahmeel, the first-born of Hezron, were Ram the first-born, and Bunah, and Oren, and Ozem, and Ahijah.

Ver. 26. Jerahmeel had also another wife, whose name was Atarah: she was the mother of Onam.] There being (according to our translation of the foregoing verse) mention of his former wife, it seems not to be unreasonable to take Ahijah to have been the mother of Ram, and the rest, which he had by Ahijah. So the words may be understood, supposing the particle mem to be wanting before Ahijah.

Ver. 27. And the sons of Ram, the first-born of Jerahmeel, were Maaz, and Jamin, and Eker.

Ver. 28. And the sons of Onam were Shammai, and Jada. And the sons of Shammai, Nadab, and Abishur.] He sets not down the names of the children of Jerahmeel's eldest son, by his first wife; but of both those he had by his second. The rest, perhaps, had no children, as is noted afterward of one of his grandsons, ver. 30.

Ver. 29. And the name of the wife of Abishur was Abihail, and she bare him Ahban, and Molid.] This, though the second son, it seems married first; and therefore his children are mentioned before the other.

Ver. 30. And the sons of Nadab; Seled, and Appaim; but Seled died without children.

Ver. 31. And the sons of Appaim; Ishi.] The plural number is often used when one son or daughter only is spoken of, (as I observed ver. 8.) for in that one all the posterity are comprehended. The next words are another example of this.

And the sons of Ishi; Sheshan. And the children of Sheshan; Ahlai.] It is plain from ver. 34, 35. that this Ahlai was not a son, but a daughter.

Ver. 32. And the sons of Jada, the brother of Shammai.] Mentioned in ver. 28.

Jether, and Jonathan: and Jether died without children.] He had neither son nor daughter.

Ver. 33. And the sons of Jonathan; Peleth, and Zaza. These were the sons of Jerahmeel.] Whose male line he carries no farther; because, perhaps, it failed in these last named.

Ver. 34. Now Sheshan had no sons, but daughters.] We read of no more than one daughter that he had; but he speaks in the plural number, as before, ver. 31.

And Sheshan had a servant, an Egyptian, whose name was Jarha.] Who being a proselyte, it is probable, to the Jewish religion, and a faithful servant to his master, he gave him his freedom, and married his daughter to him.

Ver. 35. And Sheshan gave his daughter to Jarha his servant to wife, and she bare him Attai.] This servant was very dear to him, and perhaps ruler of his house, as Eliezer of Damascus was to Abraham; who, if he had not had a son, he looked upon as his heir to all his estate, (Gen. xv. 23.)

Ver. 36. And Attai begat Nathan, and Nathan begat Zabad.

Ver. 37. And Zabad begat Ephlal, and Ephlal begat Obed.

Ver. 38. And Obed begat Jehu, and Jehu begat Azariah.

Ver. 39. And Azariah begat Helez, and Helez begat Eleasah.

Ver. 40. And Eleasah begat Sisamai, and Sisamai begat Shallum.

Ver 41. And Shallum begat Jekamiah, and Jekamiah begat Elishama.] We cannot now understand why so long a genealogy should be inserted here of the descendants of Sheshan's daughter by an Egyptian. The Jews imagine it is the genealogy of Ishmael (who slew Gedaliah, whom the king of Babylon left the governor of the land after he had taken Jerusalem), who they fancy was the son of Nethaniah the son of Elishama, last mentioned, (as Jeremiah describes him, chap. xli. 1.) which we might have believed, if this genealogy had so concluded: in which, as there is no mention of Nethaniah, as the son of Elishama (but the genealogy ends with Elishama, and goes no further), so it is not probable, that the descent of so infamous a person, though of the seed-royal, should be deduced thus largely.

Ver. 42. Now the sons of Caleb.] Called Chelubai, ver. 9.

The brother of Jerahmeel.] This is added to shew he speaks of the same Caleb there mentioned, and ver. 18.

Were Mesha his first-born.] By a third wife; for his children by Azubah and Ephrath are named before.

The father of Ziph.] The prince of Ziph, as some understand it. There were two places of this name, in the tribe of Judah. (See Josh. xv. 24, 25.)

And the sons of Mareshah, the father of Hebron.] Hebron here is the name of a man, not of a place: for his posterity is immediately mentioned: but Kimchi makes this to be the sense of these and the foregoing words: The sons of Ziph were Mareshah, the father of Hebron. Which is very natural.

Ver. 43. The sons of Hebron; Korah, and Tappuah, and Rekem, and Shema.

Ver. 44. And Shema begat Raham, the father of Jorkoam; and Rekem begat Shammai.

Ver. 45. And the son of Shammai was Maon: and Maon was the father of Beth-zur.] Who gave name to a place in the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xv. 58.) Which Josephus saith was in the mountainous part of it, as the word imports. Maon also is a well-known name to a wilderness in this tribe.

Ver. 46. And Ephah, Caleb's concubine, bare Haran, and Moza, and Gazez.] Besides his forenamed wives, he married a concubine: which was an inferior sort of wife, as I have shewn upon Gen. xxv. 6.

And Haran begat Gazez.] This is another Gazez; to whom Haran gave the name of his younger brother.

Ver. 47. And the sons of Jahdai; Regem, and Jotham, and Geshan, and Pelet, and Ephah, and Shaaph.] We read nothing of Jahdai in the foregoing genealogy: but the Jews take him for one of the sons of Ephah beforenamed; and most probably Moza, next brother to Haran: whose posterity is here set down, as Haran's was before. Moza therefore had two names; which was not unusual among the Jews.

Ver. 48. And Maachah, Caleb's concubine, bare Sheber, and Tirhanah.] This Caleb was a great man, and could maintain many wives; which he took, and had a numerous issue by them.

Ver. 49. She bare also Shaaph the father of Madmannah, Sheva the father of Machbenah, and the father of Gibea.] By the word father in this verse, in all likelihood, is meant the prince or ruler of these places. For Gibea was a city in the tribe of Judah; and so was Madmannah, (Josh. xv. 31. 57.)

And the daughter of Caleb was Achsa.] Who is mentioned in the books of Joshua and Judges: but it is not said by what wife he had her. She was married to a great man, Othniel, (Josh. xv. 17. Judg. i. 12.)

Ver. 50. These were the sons of Caleb the son of Hur, the first-born of Ephratah.] This was another Caleb, descended from the foregoing, by Hur his son by Ephrath, (ver. 19.) who had this son, whom he called Caleb, after the name of his grandfather.

Shobal the father of Kirjath-jearim.] The Targum translates it the prince of Kirjath-jearim: which is a place, as Beth-lehem, and Beth-gader were, of which two other persons are presently after said to be the father. But Kimchi takes the word father in the proper sense, and thinks Shobal's posterity possessed the city of Kirjath-jearim.

Ver. 51. Salma the father of Beth-lehem, and Hareph the father of Beth-gader.] It is not material which way we understand this; either as the Targum or as Kimchi expounds the word father in the foregoing verse.

Ver. 52. Shobal, the father of Kirjath-jearim, had sons; Haroeh, and half of the Manahethites.] The Hebrew words being Haroeh, Hatzi, Hammenioth, the LXX. expound them, as if Shobal had three sons, Araa, and Aisi, and Ammanith. But Kimchi takes the last word for the name of a place; which is evident from ver. 54. where the other half of it is mentioned: and of one half he thinks Haroeh was the lord and governor. But Jacchiades follows the LXX. and leaves Kimchi's explication.

Ver. 53. And the families of Kirjath-jearim; the Ithrites, and the Puhites, and the Shumathites, and the Mishraites.] The inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim were divided into several families (as Kimchi interprets it), and these here mentioned were the heads of families, denominated from Ithra or Jether, and Puhah, &c. as from Jimna came the family of the Jimnites, and from Beriah the family of the Berites, in Numb. xxvi. 44.

Of them came the Zareathites, and the Eshtaulites.] The same Kimchi observes, that Zarah and Eshtaol were two cities in the tribe of Judah; which were built by two of Kirjath-jearim of this name. Who inhabited these places, and left two great families, who were from them called Zareathites, and Eshtaulites.

Ver. 54. And the sons of Salma; Beth-lehem, and the Netophathites, Ataroth, the house of Joab, and half of the Manahethites, and the Zorites.] This Salma, the son of Caleb the younger, (ver. 51.) had a numerous posterity. For from him descended the inhabitants of Beth-lehem (so we are to understand this word, for Beth-lehem was the name of a place, not of a man), the Netophathites, and those of Ataroth, and Beth-Joab (so these words we translate the house of Joab should be rendered; for he is not speaking of Joab's family, but of Caleb's), and half of the Manahethites, and the Zorites, who were a people possessed of a town called Zorah: where the other half dwelt.

Ver. 55. And the families of the scribes which dwelt at Jabez.] This place, Kimchi thinks, might possibly be built by Jabez, (an honourable person, mentioned chap. iv. 9.) in which some doctors of the law dwelt, who were of the family of Salma; for of these he is still speaking.

The Tirathites, the Shimeathites, and Suchathites. These are the Kenites that came of Hemath, the father of the house of Rechab.] These Kenites, as R. Solomon thinks, were the inhabitants of a place called Cani, in the tribe of Judah: (Josh. xv. 57.) though it must be acknowledged also, some of the Kenites, the posterity of Jethro, did settle in the same tribe, (Judg. i. 16.) of whom, some think, Ezra here speaks. And then Hemath descended from Jethro, who was the father, that is, the prince, of Beth-Rechab; so the last words may be understood. There were other Kenites, descended from Heber, who dwelt in the tribe of Naphtali, or Manasseh, (Judg. iv. 11.)

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. NOW these were the sons of David.] Having given a large account of the posterity of Hezron, he returns to David beforementioned, chap. ii. 15.

Which were born unto him in Hebron.] Before he was king of all Israel.

The first-born Amnon, of Ahinoam the Jezreelitess; the second, Daniel, of Abigail the Carmelitess.] This second son is called Chileab in 2 Sam. iii. 3. where I have given an account of it. And here it may be noted, once for all, that it was a frequent thing among the Jews for men to have two names; especially when they lived sometimes in one country and sometimes in another. This appears from a famous case mentioned in the Gemara of Codex Gittin, where it is resolved, that if a man have two wives, one in Judea, and another in Galilee, and he gave a bill of divorce to her in Judea, subscribing to it his name whereby he is known in Galilee, the bill is void. And in like manner, if he write his name whereby he goes in Judea, unto a bill of divorce to his wife in Galilee, it is of no effect.

Ver. 2. The third, Absalom, the son of Maachah, the daughter of Talmai king of Geshur; the fourth, Adonijah, the son of Haggith.

Ver. 3. The fifth, Shephatiah of Abital; the sixth, Ithream, of Eglah his wife.] This Eglah is generally thought by the Jews to be Michal daughter of Saul, (see my notes upon 2 Sam. iii. 5.) who, some think, is peculiarly called his wife, because she was his only legal wife, according to the Divine institution: all the rest he took by custom then reigning.

Ver. 4. These six were born to him in Hebron; and there he reigned seven years and six months: and in Jerusalem he reigned thirty-three years.] This hath been explained in 2 Sam. v.

Ver. 5. And these were born to him in Jerusalem; Shimea, and Shobab, and Nathan, and Solomon, four, of Bath-shua daughter of Ammiel.] In 2 Sam. xi. 3. she is called Bath-sheba (as she is through the whole Scripture), and her father Eliam. But I observed just now, it was usual among the Jews to have two names: though there is no great difference in this first of these, no more than there is between Shammah and Shimea; the vowels being only changed, not the consonants, of which the names consist. Solomon was the eldest of these four sons; but he is mentioned last, because the discourse was to return to his genealogy, (ver. 10.)

Ver. 6. Ibhar also, and Elishama, and Eliphelet.] There is a small difference in the name of the second of these, as he is mentioned 2 Sam. v. 15. where he is called Elishua.

Ver. 7. And Nogah, and Nepheg, and Japhia.

Ver. 8. And Elishama, and Eliada, and Eliphelet.] Two of these names are mentioned before; who, it is supposed, died in their infancy: and therefore he preserved their memory, by giving their names unto two others, who were born afterward, and lived longer. So Kimchi.

Nine.] Besides the four born of Bath-sheba; (ver. 5.) but there are only seven mentioned in 2 Sam. v. 16. those two who died early being there omitted. (See my notes on that place.)

Ver. 9. These were all the sons of David, besides the sons of the concubines.] Who are not mentioned, either here or in Samuel.

And Tamar their sister.] See 2 Sam. xiii. 1.

Ver. 10. And Solomon's son was Rehoboam, Abia his son, Asa his son, Jehoshaphat his son.

Ver. 11. Joram his son, Ahaziah his son, Joash his son.

Ver. 12. Amaziah his son, Azariah his son, Jotham his son.

Ver. 13. Ahaz his son, Hezekiah his son, Manasseh his son.

Ver. 14. Amon his son, Josiah his son.

Ver. 15. And the sons of Josiah were, the first-born Johanan.] There is nothing needs explaining in the foregoing genealogy down from Solomon to this time: but here is some difficulty: for this Johanan is thought by many to be the same with Jehoahaz, who succeeded Josiah in the throne. But he was not his first-born; being but twenty-three years old when the people made him king, and after three months' time, his brother, being put in his place, is said to be twenty-five years old, (2 Kings xxiii. 31. 36.) Petavius hath said a great deal about this in his annotations upon Epiphanius ad Hæres. Epicur. p. 18. But, after all, I take the truth to be, that Johanan was his eldest son, but died before his father: and therefore is not mentioned in the book of the Kings: as Jehoahaz is not mentioned here, being made king by the people of the land, and presently dethroned.

The second Jehoiakim.] Who was next to him, to whom by right of succession the kingdom belonged: he being the eldest now Johanan was dead. He was called by his father Eliakim: but had this other name imposed on him by the king of Egypt, (2 Kings xxiii. 34.)

The third Zedekiah.] Who was the youngest of all Josiah's sons, as appears by his age, when he was made king after Jehoiakim was carried captive. The same Petavius thinks there were two Zedekiahs: one the son of Josiah, who was their last king; the other the son of Jeconiah (mentioned in the next verse), who never came to be king.

The fourth Shallum.] This was the next son to Jehoiakim, and the same with Jehoahaz, as is plain from Jer. xxii. 11. (See my notes upon 2 Kings xxiii. 30, 31.) He is put last, because he was not at all considerable; being made king by a popular faction; and in three months' time thrust out of his throne by the king of Egypt, who carried him thither, and there he died.

Ver. 16. And the sons of Jehoiakim; Jeconiah his son, Zedekiah his son.] The posterity of Jeconiah is set down in the next verse; and therefore here by the word son we must understand his successor in the kingdom. Thus Seneca makes Atreus and Tantalus to be descendants of Inachus; because they succeeded him in the kingdom of Argos. And in like manner Jacobus Capellus here observes, (in his Histor. Sacra et Exotica, ad A. M. 3424.) that "Multi filii dicuntur, qui legaliter tantum erant filii, id est, hæredes;" many are called sons, who were only sons legally, that is, heirs. Of which he makes Zedekiah an example, who is here called the son of Jeconiah (who was his uncle, 2 Kings xxiv. 17.) because he succeeded him.

Ver. 17. And the sons of Jeconiah, Assir; Salathiel his son.] Some think Assir is not the name of his son, but signifies captive; to denote that his son Salathiel was born when he was a captive in Babylon, as St. Matthew notes, (chap. i. 12.) which doth not contradict the prophecy of Jeremiah, who said he should die childless; (Jer. xxii. 30.) for his meaning is no more, but that he should have no child sitting on the throne after him. But Jacobus Capellus, in the place forenamed, makes Salathiel another instance of an heir being called a son. For he thinks he succeeded Jeconiah in the dignity to which he was restored by Evil-Merodach; but was the son of Neri, who sprung from Nathan.

Ver. 18. Malchiram also, and Pedaiah, and Shenazar, Jecamiah, Hoshama, and Nedabiah.] These were not all the immediate sons of Jeconiah, but the sons of Salathiel; as may be gathered from hence: that in the next verse Zerubbabel is said to be the son of Pedaiah, and in St. Matthew (chap. i. 12.) to be the son of Salathiel; that is, his grandson. So there is something to be supplied, to make out the sense of this verse, viz. The sons also of Salathiel were Malchiram, and Pedaiah, &c. But Grotius (on Matt. i. 23.) thinks, that Zerubbabel here mentioned is not he, who was the leader of God's people when they returned from their captivity in Babylon; with whom Huetius also agrees. But others think, this may better be solved by supposing, that Salathiel dying without children, Pedaiah raised up seed to his brother, as the Scripture speaks, and begat Zerubbabel of Salathiel's wife. Who therefore was the son of Pedaiah, because begotten by him; and yet the son of Salathiel, because begotten of his wife; who had no son by Salathiel, but by Pedaiah; who begat him not to be his heir, but the heir of his brother who was dead.

Ver. 19. And the sons of Pedaiah were Zerubbabel, and Shimei: and the sons of Zerubbabel; Meshullam, and Hananiah, and Shelomith their sister.] That is, sister to the two sons beforenamed; she having the same father and mother that they had: which the other five mentioned in the next verse, it is supposed, had not; but were by another mother, though they had the same father.

Ver. 20. And Hashubah, and Ohel, and Berechiah, and Hasadiah, Jushab-hesed, five.] Upon this they ground their opinion, who think the Zerubbabel here mentioned is not he that was the governor of the people after the captivity; for his son's name was Rhesa, (Luke iii. 27.) who is not found among the eight children that are here reckoned up.

Ver. 21. And the sons of Hananiah; Pelatiah, and Jesaiah.] These are the sons of the second son of Zerubbabel, (ver. 19.)

The sons of Rephaiah, the sons of Arnan, the sons of Obadiah, the sons of Shecaniah.] These four (and their sons) seem to have been likewise the children of Hananiah.

Ver. 22. And the sons of Shecaniah; Shemaiah: and the sons of Shemaiah; Hattush, and Igeal, and Bariah, and Neariah, and Shaphat, six.] Here are but five sons of Shemaiah; and therefore the Hebrew word Shishah (which we translate six) is rather the name of his last son; who might possibly be so called, because he was his sixth son.

Ver. 23. And the sons of Neariah; Elioenai, and Hezekiah, and Azrikam, three.] The rest of Shemaiah's sons had no issue.

Ver. 24. And the sons of Elioenai were Hodaiah, and Eliashib, and Pelaiah, and Akkub, and Johanan, and Dalaiah, and Anani, seven.] The Targum here hath a very strange observation: for after the word Anani, he saith, "He is the king Messiah, who is to be revealed." The reason of which is given in the famous book Tanchuma (as Beckius here notes), because it is said in Dan. vii. 13. He saw in a vision, and, behold, one like the Son of Man, im anani (in the clouds); which certainly was a vision of the Messiah, as Saadis Gaon acknowledges. And this use is to be made of this passage, that their minds were always full of the thoughts of the Messiah, and that they expected he should be revealed (as they speak) so many generations after Zerubbabel: which is an argument he came long ago. St. Matthew, indeed, counts more generations from Zerubbabel to our Saviour's birth than are here mentioned, and hath quite different names in this succession: which is another argument that this Zerubbabel in the Chronicles is not the same with him in St. Matthew. And, indeed, though some persons in Scripture have two names, yet it is not likely that so many persons as are reckoned in this succession, should all have quite different names. Therefore St. Matthew's genealogy is not here recorded: but he had it out of the public tables, which were kept by the priests of all the great families of Judah: particularly that of David's, out of whose family they expected the Messiah should come, would not fail to keep a punctual account of his successors in every generation.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. THE sons of Judah; Pharez, Hezron, Carmi, Hur, and Shobal.] By the sons of Judah are meant his posterity: for here is only one of his sons mentioned in this place; viz. Pharez: whose son Hezron begat Carmi, (the same with Chelubai and Caleb, chap. ii. 9. 18.) whose sons were Hur and Shobab: who is the same, I suppose, with Shobal; of whose posterity he intends here to give an account.

Ver. 2. And Reaiah the son of Shobal begat Jahath, and Jahath begat Ahumai, and Lahad. These are the families of the Zorathites.] Zora is not the name of a man, but of a place in the tribe of Judah: where several families of that tribe settled themselves, who were descended from Jahath, Shumai, and Lahad, the sons and grandsons of Shobal, by whom this city was built and inhabited. Thus Kimchi explains this place.

Ver. 3. And these were of the father of Etam.] Descended from the lord of a place called Etam: which was in this tribe, (ver. 32.)

Jezreel, and Ishma, and Idbash.] These were the sons of the lord of Etam: whose name is not here recorded.

And the name of their sister was Hazelelponi.] Who, it is likely, was a very eminent woman: and therefore her name is remembered; though now we are ignorant of the particular reason there was then for it.

Ver. 4. And Penuel the father of Gedor.] In the eighteenth verse of this chapter, Jered is said to be the father, that is, the lord, of Gedor. But there might be then two lords of the same city; as there are now among us several lordships in the same town.

And Ezer the father of Hushah. These are the sons of Hur.] By some other wife than her, by whom he had the children mentioned chap. ii. ver. 20.

The first-born of Ephratah.] See there, ver. 19.

The father of Beth-lehem.] In the second chapter, ver. 52. Salma is said to be the father of Beth-lehem; but that doth not contradict this: for they might both be lords of the same place, especially one being the grandfather, the other the son.

Ver. 5. And Ashur the father of Tekoa had two wives, Helah and Naarah.] See chap. ii. ver. 24.

Ver. 6. And Naarah bare him Ahuzam, and Hepher, and Temeni, and Haahashtari. These were the sons of Naarah.] His first wife being barren for some time, it moved him to take another; who bare him these sons.

Ver. 7. And the sons of Helah were Zereth, and Jezoar, and Ethnan.] Afterward his first wife grew fruitful, and bare him as many sons as the other. For it is probable that Coz (mentioned in the next words) was her son.

Ver. 8. And Coz begat Anub, and Zobebah, and the families of Aharhel the son of Harum.] I suppose several families sprung from Aharhel, who was the son of Coz by his wife Harum.

Ver. 9. And Jabez.] It is very uncertain who Jabez was: perhaps the founder of one of the families of Aharhel. But the Targum both here and upon chap. ii. 55. saith, he was the same with Othniel. But this is a Jewish fancy, confuted by ver. 13.

Was more honourable than his brethren.] Wiser in the law, as the Targum expounds it: who had respect, it is likely, to his piety and devotion, expressed in the next verse. Others think he was a person of greater courage and valour, for which Othniel was famous.

And his mother called his name Jabez, saying, Because I bare him with sorrow.] She had a very hard labour, when she was in travail with him.

Ver. 10. And Jabez called on the God of Israel, saying, Oh that thou wouldest bless me indeed, and enlarge my coast.] He prayed for the help of God, to drive out the Canaanites, and make room for his family; that they might dwell more commodiously.

And that thy hand might be with me.] As it was with Othniel, to enable him to take Kirjath-sepher, as we read in the first chapter of Judges.

And that thou wouldest keep me from evil, that it may not grieve me!] Preserve him in health, and prosper him, when he had enlarged his border: that he might not live in such misery, as that wherewith his mother brought him forth. For in the word grieve, most think he alludes to the pains of his mother in her travail.

And God granted him that which he requested.] And the rather, because he had hereby greater leisure for the study of the law, and instructing others in piety, as many understand it. For the Jews think this Jabez was an eminent doctor of the law, and left behind him a great many disciples, who are mentioned, they suppose, in the last verse of the second chapter of this book; where we read of the family of the scribes that dwelt at Jabez.

Ver. 11. And Chelub, the brother of Shuah, begat Mehir, which was the father of Eshton.

Ver. 12. And Eshton begat Beth-rapha, and Paseah, and Tehinnah the father of Ir-nahash. These are the men of Rechah.] The persons whose posterity possessed the city of Rechah: of which we have no mention elsewhere.

Ver. 13. The sons of Kenaz.] It is not said whose son he was: it is likely of Chelub, mentioned ver. 11.

Othniel, and Seraiah: and the sons of Othniel; Hathath.] And likewise Meonothai, mentioned in the next verse: for after his sons follow the sons of Othniel's younger brother.

Ver. 14. And Meonothai begat Ophrah: and Seraiah begat Joab, the father of the valley of Charashim.] Or, of those that dwelt in Gecharashim: which was a city in the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned in Nehem. xi. 35.

For they were craftsmen.] The smiths that dwelt and wrought there gave it the name of Charashim: by which word some understand carpenters. For in this catalogue several such-like sort of persons are mentioned: such as potters, and weavers, and gardeners, (ver. 21. 23.) For societies cannot consist only of one sort of persons; but must be composed of men of different and various employments. As Strigelius observes out of Aristotle, "A city is not composed of physicians and physicians; but of physicians and ploughmen." So the son of Sirach discourses, that though such kind of men are not fit to be admitted to counsel, "yet they maintain the state of the world," (Ecclus. xxxviii. 34.) When Solomon, indeed, began to reign, there were not many craftsmen in Israel, but afterward they increased: and such honour was paid unto arts, that they took care to preserve the memory of such persons and families as applied themselves that way; as appears by this very verse, and ver. 21. 23. of this chapter. Whence the prophet Isaiah foretells this as a judgment God would send upon them, that he would take away their artificers, (chap. iii. 5.) And when Jerusalem was taken by the Babylonians, it is said, they carried away all the craftsmen, (2 Kings xxiv. 14.)

Ver. 15. And the sons of Caleb the son of Jephunneh; Iru, Elah, and Naam.] Some take this Jephunneh to be the same with Hezron, whose son Caleb was: and had this son by a different wife from her mentioned chap. ii. 18.

And the sons of Elah, even Kenaz.] Or rather Uknaz was the son of Elah: as some of the Jews understand it.

Ver. 16. And the sons of Jehaleleel.] Who was the son of Uknaz last mentioned.

Ziph, and Ziphah, Tiria, and Asareel.

Ver. 17. And the sons of Ezra.] Who was the son of Asareel last named.

Were Jether, and Mered, and Epher, and Jalon: and she bare.] That is, Bithiah the wife of Mered (mentioned in the next verse) bare the sons following.

Miriam, and Shammai.] Miriam was the name of a man, as well as of a woman: and there are several such instances in Scripture, as Kimchi observes on this place.

And Ishbah the father of Eshtemoa.] It is uncertain whether Eshtemoa be the name of a person, or of a place whereof he was lord.

Ver. 18. And his wife Jehudijah bare Jered.] Mered had this son by another wife called Jehudijah.

The father of Gedor, and Heber the father of Socho, and Jekuthiel the father of Zanoah.] The Targum, and Jarchi, with others, by father, in all these three instances, understand the lord or ruler of those cities, which were in the tribe of Judah. (See Josh. xv. 34, 35.)

And these are the sons of Bithiah.] Mentioned in the foregoing verse.

The daughter of Pharaoh, which Mered took.] That is, married. But it is not likely he married the daughter of the king of Egypt, unless some natural daughter: but rather of some other person, called by the name of Pharaoh; who might be an Israelite as well as an Egyptian: names being, upon several occasions, given from other countries.

Ver. 19. And the sons of his wife Hodiah.] This was his third wife.

The sister of Naham.] It seems to me more reasonable to translate it Achotnaam: who was his son by Hodiah.

The father of Keilah the Garmite, and Eshtemoa the Maachathite.] These were his grandsons, who are frequently in Scripture called sons.

Ver. 20. And the sons of Shimon.] Who is supposed to be another son of Mered by his last wife.

Were Amnon, and Rinnah, Ben-hanan, and Tilon.

And the sons of Ishi.] Who is thought to be the son of Tilon last mentioned.

Were Zoheth, and Ben-zoheth.

Ver. 21. The sons of Shelah the son of Judah were Er.] Having given an account of those descended from Pharez the eldest son of Judah, and Zerah, whom Judah had by Tamar, (chap. ii. 4, 5.) he now relates the posterity of Shelah, whom he had by his wife Shuah, (Gen. xxxviii. 5.)

The father of Lecah.] This was a city in the tribe of Judah, of which Er was the lord.

And Laadah, the father of Mareshah.] Another city in the same tribe.

And the families of the house of them that wrought fine linen.] From him came all those families that were famous for this sort of workmanship in fine linen: wherewith their kings and priests were clothed, as the Targum notes.

Of the house of Ashbea.] The principal of which, I suppose, were those of this man's posterity.

Ver. 22. And Jokim.] This was either a person or a family descended from Shelah.

And the men of Chozeba.] They were another family sprung from the same root: who settled in this place.

And Joash, and Saraph, who had the dominion in Moab.] Conquered several places there, in the time of David: or had the government of them given by him. The Targum takes the Hebrew word Baalu, as if it signified that they married wives in the country of Moab.

And Jashubi-lehem.] Or rather, the inhabitants of Lehem: a place where some of Shelah's posterity settled.

And these are ancient things.] That is, these things which have been related concerning Joash and Saraph (as Kimchi interprets it), who had dominion in Moab, shew that they were long ago: but now, as it follows, their condition was altered.

Ver. 23. These were the potters, and those that dwelt among plants and hedges.] Or rather, these now are potters, &c. being fallen from the glory and splendour wherein they formerly lived, to common and mean employments.

There they dwelt with the king for his work.] This is commonly understood, as if they stayed in Babylon (for there was no king now in Judea) to be vine-dressers, gardeners, and husbandmen, under that monarch: whose service they liked so well, that they chose to continue in it, rather than return to Jerusalem.

Ver. 24. The sons of Simeon were Nemuel, and Jamin, Jarib, Zerah, and Shaul.] This tribe is mentioned next to Judah, because they were neighbours to them: part of their possessions being taken out of the tribe of Judah, (Josh. xix. 1, &c.) But the names of some of Simeon's sons were much altered, by length of time, from what they were when they went down into Egypt, (Gen. xlvi. 10.) And Ohad, there mentioned, is not here remembered: because, it is likely, he had no issue.

Ver. 25. Shallum his son.] That is, he was the son of Shaul, last mentioned.

Mibsam his son, Mishma his son.

Ver. 26. And the sons of Mishma; Hamuel his son, Zacchur his son, Shimei his son.] It seems Mibsam had no son.

Ver. 27. And Shimei had sixteen sons and six daughters.] The posterity of his eldest sons are not taken notice of: but only, as it follows, that they had not many.

But his brethren had not many children, neither did all their family multiply like to the children of Judah.] Which evidently appears by the number that was taken of them at their first muster, Numb. i. 23. where we find that they were but fifty-nine thousand and three hundred: when the children of Judah were threescore and fourteen thousand and six hundred, (ver. 26.) And at the next muster there was a far greater inequality, (Numb. xxvi. 14. 22.)

Ver. 28. And they dwelt at Beer-sheba, and Moladah, and Hazar-Shual.] These places are mentioned in Josh. xix. 2, 3.

Ver. 29. And at Bilhah.] Called Balah, in the place abovenamed.

And at Ezem, and at Tolad.] These are called Azem, and Eltolad, the former part of names being often cut off; as Hermon for Baal-Hermon, (Judg. iii. 3.) Shittim, (Numb. xxv. 1.) for Abel-Shittim, (Numb. xxxiii. 49, &c.)

Ver. 30. And at Bethuel, and at Hormah, and at Ziklag.] See Josh. xix. 4, 5.

Ver. 31. And at Beth-marcaboth, and at Hazar-susim.] Called there, Josh. xix. 5. Hazar-susah.

And at Beth-birei, and at Shaaraim.] The names are different in Josh. xix. 6.

These were their cities unto the reign of David.] Who, the Jews fancy, took these cities from them, and gave them again to Judah. Which is not likely, nor doth the word unto denote that they held them no longer, than till the reign of David: but that when he came to the crown their families dwelt here; though Ziklag had been in the possession of the Philistines, who gave it to David, as his own town.

Ver. 32. And their villages were Etam, and Ain, Rimmon, and Tochen, and Ashan.] Here is one place mentioned, more than is in Josh. xix. 7. which they had some way acquired since his days.

Ver. 33. And all their villages that were round about the same cities, unto Baal.] Called Baalath-beer, Josh. xix. 8.

These were their habitations, and their genealogy.] Or, as it is in the margin, they divided themselves by nations among them; i. e. among these places.

Ver. 34. And Meshobab, and Jamlech, and Joshah, the son of Amaziah.] These, and the rest that follow, seem to have been very eminent persons in this tribe: by whose valour these great things were performed, which are mentioned ver. 38, 39, &c. There is so great a resemblance in the name, that some fancy the name Ἰάμβλιχος among the Greeks came from this name Jamlech.

Ver. 35. And Joel, and Jehu the son of Josibiah, the son of Seraiah, the son of Asiel.

Ver. 36. And Elioenai, and Jaakobah, and Jeshohaiah, and Asaiah, and Adiel, and Jesimiel, and Benaiah.

Ver. 37. And Ziza the son of Shiphi, the son of Allon, the son of Jedaiah, the son of Shimri, the son of Shemaiah.

Ver. 38. These mentioned by their names.] Whose names are mentioned in the four foregoing verses.

Were princes in their families.] Great persons of chief authority in their several families.

And the house of their fathers increased exceedingly.] By their valour they enlarged their habitations, which were too strait for them.

Ver. 39. And they went to the entrance of Gedor.] There was a place of this name belonging unto Judah, (Josh. xv. 58.) and another called Gederah, appertaining to the same tribe, (ver. 36.) out of which perhaps Judah had not driven the old inhabitants: and therefore the Simeonites wanting room, went thither, and by dispossessing them enlarged their border. But see the next verse, which places Gedor elsewhere.

Even unto the east side of the valley, to seek pasture for their flocks.] For their sheep and their goats: which are properly meant by flocks.

Ver. 40. And they found fat pasture and good, and the land was wide, and quiet, and peaceable.] So that they might feed their flocks securely.

For they of Ham had dwelt there of old.] This had inclined Bochart to think, that Gedor was some place in Arabia, where some of the posterity of Ham settled, as he hath demonstrated. And the Arabians being wholly addicted to pasturage, sought out the best ground they could find for the feeding their flocks. Whose country the Simeonites made no scruple to invade; the posterity of Ham being accursed by Noah. (See his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 1.)

Ver. 41. And these written by name came in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah.] Their names are set down before, ver. 34—37. now the time is recorded wherein they performed such memorable exploits, which was in the reign of Hezekiah king of Judah. That is, as some take it, a little before the ten tribes were carried captive: or rather, some time after it, when these Simeonites, who were mixed with Judah, finding themselves very much straitened, made this expedition.

And smote their tents, and the habitations that were found there.] If they smote their tents, then it was sufficiently evident they smote their habitations; for they dwelt in tents. Therefore the word Meunim, I have shewn upon Judg. x. 12. (see my notes there), doth not signify habitations, but a people in Arabia, who dwelt in tents: which the Simeonites smote, as it here follows, and settled themselves in their place.

And destroyed them utterly unto this day, and dwelt in their rooms.] There were none remained to attempt the recovery of their country any more: but the Simeonites possessed it when this book was written, after the captivity of Babylon.

Because there was pasture there for their flocks.] Which made them seek for no other settlement.

Ver. 42. And some of them, even of the sons of Simeon, five hundred men, went to Mount Seir, having for their captains Pelatiah, and Neariah, and Rephaiah, and Uzziel, the sons of Ishi.] Another body of them under these four great commanders, who were brethren, settled themselves in some part of the country of the Edomites: being forced to seek for subsistence abroad; either when the Assyrians invaded their country, or afterward, when it was destroyed, and there was not room enough for them among the Jews; whither many of them fled.

Ver. 43. And they smote the rest of the Amalekites that were escaped.] Who escaped the hands of Saul, and of David.

And dwelt there unto this day.] The king of Babylon did not disturb them in these new possessions: which were small, and not worth his regard.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. NOW the sons of Reuben, the first-born of Israel (for he was the first-born; but, forasmuch as he defiled his father's bed, his birthright was given unto Joseph the son of Israel.] The double portion, which was the right of the first-born, (Deut. xxi. 16, 17.) was given to Joseph: whose two sons had each of them a lot in the land of Canaan; as if they had been the sons of Israel. The Jewish doctors say there were two other prerogatives belonging to the first-born; viz. the principality, and the priesthood: the former of which was given to Judah, the latter to Levi. But I see no ground to think the priesthood was annexed to it: and as for the other, it is taken notice of in the following verse.

And the genealogy is not to be reckoned after the birthright.] This is the reason why neither Reuben's nor Joseph's genealogy is first set down: for though the double portion belonged to the first-born, yet he had not therefore the pre-eminence in other things, as it here follows.

Ver. 2. For Judah prevailed above his brethren.] That is, the tribe of Judah (not his person), which was the most powerful, and in all things, as I before shewed, preferred to the rest.

And of him came the chief ruler.] This is the principal reason why he prevailed, because the great prince of the people was to arise out of this tribe: first David, and at last the Messiah.

But the birthright was Joseph's).] Or, though the birthright was Joseph's; yet, for the reason beforementioned, Judah's genealogy is first set down.

Ver. 3. The sons of Reuben, the first-born of Israel, were Hanoch, and Pallu, and Hezron, and Carmi.] See Gen. xlvi. 19.

Ver. 4. The sons of Joel.] Who, it is likely, was the son of Hanoch the eldest son of Reuben: because it appears from ver. 6. that he here gives an account of the chief persons of this tribe; and consequently those who were descended from the first-born.

Shemaiah his son, Gog his son, Shimei his son.

Ver. 5. Micah his son, Reaia his son, Baal his son.

Ver. 6. Beerah his son.] Whom the Targum takes for a prophet, the father of Hosea, who is called Beeri, Hos. i. 1. But that is a mere fancy; for that prophet was of the tribe of Issachar, but this Beerah of the tribe of Reuben.

Whom Tilgath-pilneser king of Assyria carried away captive out of their own land.] He is called Tiglath-pileser, 2 Kings xv. 29.

He was prince of the Reubenites.] When the two tribes and half were carried away captive out of their own country beyond Jordan, by the king of Assyria; viz. Tiglath beforementioned. The rest were carried away by Shalmaneser.

Ver. 7. And his brethren by their families (when the genealogy of their generations was reckoned) were the chief, Jeiel, and Zechariah.] The genealogies of those descended from the rest of Reuben's sons were preserved: but he thought fit to mention only the chief of them, who were these two and those that follow.

Ver. 8. And Bela the son of Azaz, the son of Shema, the son of Joel.] This was another Joel, different from him mentioned ver. 4.

Who dwelt in Aroer, even unto Nebo, and Baal-meon.] All these were seated on the other side of Jordan. See Numb. xxxii. 37. Josh. xiii. 15, 16, &c. where we read of this city Baal-meon.

Ver. 9. And eastward he inhabited.] That is, the posterity of Reuben.

Unto the entering in of the wilderness.] This is the wilderness of Kedemoth, mentioned Deut. ii. 28. upon which the country of Sihon (which Reuben possessed) bordered.

From the river Euphrates.] Their territory did not reach so far as Euphrates: but only to the entrance of that wilderness, which extended itself to that river.

Because their cattle were multiplied in the land of Gilead.] When their stock very much increased, so that they had not pasturage enough for them, they enlarged their border, as far as they were able, eastward towards the river Euphrates.

Ver. 10. And in the days of Saul they made war.] With the assistance of other tribes that dwelt on that side Jordan, (ver. 18, 19.)

With the Hagarites.] That is, the Ishmaelites descended from Hagar; who were settled in Arabia Deserta. (See Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 11.)

Who fell by their hands.] Were conquered by them in that war: so that, as it here follows, they possessed their country.

And they dwelt in their tents.] This shews they were Arabians; or near neighbours to them.

Throughout all the east land of Gilead.] They possessed all that country which lay east of Gilead: which chiefly belonged to the Gadites and Manassites, though the Reubenites had some of it, (Deut. iii. 12, 13.) A very learned man of our own is of opinion, that those Hagarites inhabited the country called Petra-Nabatæa. See Dr. Fuller's Miscellanea Sacra, lib. ii. cap. 13. where he observes, that all the rest, who were called Ishmaelites, or Kedar, were afterward comprehended under the name of Saracens.

Ver. 11. And the children of Gad dwelt over against them, in the land of Bashan, unto Salcah.] See Josh. xiii. 24, 25, &c. He next mentions the Gadites, because they were neighbours to the Reubenites.

Ver. 12. Joel the chief, and Shapham the next, and Jaanai, and Shaphat in Bashan.] He doth not give us the genealogy of this whole tribe, but only the names of the principal persons; among whom these were the most eminent, when their genealogy was examined: which seems to have been in the reign of Josham, (ver. 17.) All these dwelt, I suppose, in the metropolis of the country called Bashan: where the chief city was called by the same name; and afterward called Batanæa.

Ver. 13. And their brethren, of the house of their fathers, were Michael, and Meshullam, and Sheba, and Jorai, and Jachan, and Zia, and Heber, seven.] These seven were eminent persons descended from other great men, of the same family with those beforenamed: and therefore are called their brethren.

Ver. 14. These are the children of Abihail the son of Huri.] That is, the seven beforementioned came from Abihail; whose pedigree here follows.

The son of Jaroah, the son of Gilead, the son of Michael, the son of Jeshishai, the son of Jahdo, the son of Buz.

Ver. 15. Ahi the son of Abdiel, the son of Guni, chief of the house of their fathers.] Besides the foregoing, there was another great person who was of chief authority in the family of Abdiel and Guni, and their fathers.

Ver. 16. And they dwelt in Gilead in Bashan.] In a part of it, the rest being given to the Reubenites and the half tribe of Manasseh. See Josh. xiii. 25. xvii. 1. Deut. iii. 13. where it is said Moses gave all Bashan to the Manassites: but the meaning is, all that was not given to the other two tribes, who had a share therein. (See what I have noted upon Deut. iii. 13.)

And in her towns.] That is, such towns as belonged to that portion of the country which they possessed.

And in all the suburbs of Sharan.] A country where there was excellent pasturage, and which produced the most generous wine. There were two Sharans; one in the east inhabited by the Gadites, (Deut. iii. 12, 13.) another in the west, (Josh. xii. 18.) not far from the famous port called Joppa, (Acts ix. 35.)

Upon their borders.] Unto the utmost bounds (as the Hebrew words signify) of that country.

Ver. 17. All these were reckoned by genealogies in the days of Jotham king of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam king of Israel.] This doth not imply that Jotham and Jeroboam reigned in the same time: but that in their several reigns this account was taken. Kimchi thinks that all these (i. e. the children of Reuben, the children of Gad, and half tribe of Manasseh) were reckoned, that were listed to undertake the war afterward mentioned with the Hagarites: so that it may not concern the genealogy.

Ver. 18. The sons of Reuben, and the Gadites, and half the tribe of Manasseh, of valiant men, men able to bear buckler and sword, and to shoot with bow, and skilful in war, were four-and-forty thousand seven hundred and threescore, that went out to the war.] These three tribes, or at least so many of them as made a great army, joined their forces together, consisting of their best soldiers, to invade the country of the Hagarites. This seems to be a distinct war from that in the days of Saul, ver. 10. (See 1 Sam. xiv. 47.)

Ver. 19. And they made war with the Hagarites, with Jetur, and Nephish, and Nodab.] There was mention of the Hagarites before, but now he shews how they were utterly expelled their country, though their neighbours came to their assistance; viz. those of Jetur, Nephish, and Nodab: who were all Ishmaelites; the two first being expressly mentioned as the sons of Ishmael, (Gen. xxv. 15.) from whom these people took their name. But, as Dr. Jackson observes, there are no people mentioned in Scripture, who took their name from Nebaioth his eldest son. Which makes it probable, that they who in heathen writers are called Nabathæi, were in Scripture called Ishmaelites, as sole heirs to their first progenitor's name. Their seat was in the best part of Arabia Petræa, near to the Midianites. See book i. on the Creed, chap. 25. sect. 3. where he notes, that the Greek writers call the Hagarites Ἀγραῖοι; which is more consonant to the Hebrew name than the Latin, Hagareni. Their chief city was called Atra, and the inhabitants Atræni, unless they mistook their name, which perhaps was Agreni.

Ver. 20. And they were helped against them.] It is likely the Hagarites fought stoutly, but God assisted the Israelites; enduing them with extraordinary courage, and daunted their enemies. For it is not likely any other help is here meant but that from God.

And the Hagarites were delivered into their hand, and all that were with them.] That is, those allies beforementioned, who came to their aid.

For they cried unto God in the battle, and he was entreated of them; because they put their trust in him.] I suppose their enemies were too hard for them in the first onset, which made them pray to God most earnestly in the midst of the fight: representing to him the pious confidence they placed in him and his almighty power, and not in their arms and warlike skill: which moved him to give them the success they desired. Here the Targum, instead of these words, They put their trust in him, hath these, They put their trust be Memra, in his Word.

Ver. 21. And they took away their cattle.] In the Hebrew, led captive; that is, drove as many of their cattle as they pleased into their own country. This place is, among others, alleged by Grotius, as a proof of the lawfulness of taking the spoil in a just war against an enemy: as God allowed the Israelites to do, when a city fell into their hands, which had refused their offers of peace, (Deut. xx. 14.) But this instance is the more to be minded, because the war here spoken of was not by Divine precept as that against the seven nations of Canaan: but from common right, which men had to defend themselves against injurious persons, or to invade those who had invaded them, and would make them no satisfaction. Such war was approved by God, it appears by this, that he aided them, when they called upon him for help, as we read in the foregoing verse. (See lib. iii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 6. sect. 1.)

Of their camels fifty thousand.] It is no wonder there were so many, for the Arabians abounded in camels, as Diodorus Siculus relates, lib. iii. cap. 12. which they used in war, as well as to carry burdens in the time of peace. (See Pliny, lib. viii. cap. 18. and Vegetius, lib. iii.) For they being creatures very patient of thirst, were the fitter for any service in that hot and dry country. (See Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 2.)

And of sheep two hundred and fifty thousand, and of asses two thousand.] The prodigious number of sheep that those countries produced, is at large shewed by the same author, lib. ii. cap. 46. and their breed of asses in the same book, cap. 13.

And of men.] In the Hebrew, souls of men; i. e. of men, women, and children.

A hundred thousand.] Whom they did not kill (it appears by this relation), but carried them out of their own country, and sold them for slaves (as the manner was in those days), or employed them as such in their own business.

Ver. 22. For there fell down many slain.] Besides these taken captive, a great number were slain in the fight, which could not be avoided.

Because the war was of God.] Perhaps they consulted him before they went upon this expedition; and he encouraged them to undertake it, as he powerfully assisted them in it. Here again the Targum saith, The war was from the Word of Jehovah.

And they dwelt in their steads.] Possibly all those valiant men who were engaged in this war, settled themselves in the country which they had conquered.

Until the captivity.] In the days of Pekah, 2 Kings xv. 29. when they were rooted out, as the rest of the ten tribes were in the days of Hoshea.

Ver. 23. And the children of the half tribe of Manasseh dwelt in the land.] In the same country, on the other side of Jordan, with the Reubenites and Gadites: of whom he having spoken, gives a short account of the Manassites.

They increased from Bashan unto Baal-Hermon and Senir, and unto Hermon.] They were first possessed of the kingdom of Og and Bashan; (Josh. xiii. 30.) from whence they extended their territories, when they were increased, unto the northern parts of the country beyond Jordan.

Ver. 24. And these were the heads of the house of their fathers, even Epher, and Ishi, and Eliel, and Azriel, and Jeremiah, and Hodaviah, and Jahdiel, mighty men of valour, famous men, and heads of the house of their fathers.] He reckons only the most remarkable men of this tribe: who were not only of chief authority in their several families, but by their valiant exploits had gotten great renown.

Ver. 25. And they transgressed against the God of their fathers, and went a whoring after the gods of the people of the land, whom God destroyed before them.] All Israel transgressed as well as they: but it seems they were the greatest transgressors, who began, perhaps, the apostacy from God, and were ring-leaders to idolatry. And, therefore, as it here follows, they were the first that were carried away captive.

Ver. 26. And the God of Israel.] The Targum saith, The Memra, or Word, of the God of Israel. From whence it appears they thought the Divine ΛΟΓΟΣ to be the God of Israel: for they are words of the same import.

Stirred up the spirit of Pul the king of Assyria.] When, perhaps, he intended to bend his forces another way, God inclined him to go against Israel: whom he distressed so much, that they were forced to make him a great present: whereby they moved him not to stay there, but return to his own country, (2 Kings xv. 19, 20.) We do not read that he carried any of the people captive, though perhaps he might, after some spoil in the skirts of the country, as he went home.

And the spirit of Tilgath-pilneser king of Assyria.] Who came in the next king's reign but one, and carried those tribes away captive, as we read in 2 Kings xv. 29.

And he carried them away (even the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh).] He carried these away entirely, together with some of the people of Galilee, particularly all Naphtali, as the forenamed place tells us. And the Jews say, they carried away the golden calf which was in Dan, as they gather from 2 Chron. xxviii. 21.

And brought them unto Halah, and Habor, and Hara.] These are the very places unto which Shalmaneser afterward carried the remainder of the ten tribes, 2 Kings xvii. 6. xviii. 11. where there is only this difference, that there it is said into the cities of the Medes, but here unto Hara, which is all one; for Media is the very same with Hara, and is by St. Jerome (without an aspiration) called Ara. And the Greeks commonly call it Aria, and the people of it Arii, as we read in Herodotus, Pausanias, and others. And Bochartus thinks, not without reason, that the mountainous part of the country of Media towards the north was properly called by this name of Hara, from the word har, which signifies a mountain. Here Strabo saith many foreigners inhabited: for it is likely this hilly country was most empty of people.

And to the river Gozan.] That is, to the banks of the river on both sides: for it is as much as τὴν περιχώραν, to the region about this river, as our very learned Mr. Nic. Fuller observes, in his Miscellanea, lib. ii. cap. 5. where he takes Gozan to be the ancient name for that river, which the Persians afterward called Cyrus: near to which stood the city Gauzania in Ptolemy, which retained that name from the river Gozan.

Unto this day.] Here they settled, as the same learned man observes; and did not range as far as Tartary, as some have thought. For how should they, being miserable captives, who had no power to go back, or to go forward? especially through strange countries, without any arms, or other accommodations.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. THE sons of Levi; Gershon, Kohath, and Merari.] The first of these is called Gershom, ver. 16. (See Gen. xlvi. 11. Exod. vi. 16.)

Ver. 2. And the sons of Kohath.] He begins with the genealogy of the second son, because from him sprung the family of the priests.

Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel.] The second of these sons is called Amminadab, ver. 22.

Ver. 3. And the children of Amram; Aaron, Moses, and Miriam.] See Exod. vi. 20.

The sons also of Aaron; Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar.] The two first perished for their sin, in offering with strange fire, (Lev. x. 1.)

Ver. 4. Eleazar begat Phinehas, and Phinehas begat Abishua.

Ver. 5. And Abishua begat Bukki, and Bukki begat Uzzi.] According to the manner of the Greeks and Latins, who are wont to deprave oriental names, Josephus calls these three Abiezer, Boceias, and Ozi: (lib. v. Archæol. cap. 41.) and the Chronicon Alexandrinum, as Mr. Selden observes, assigns the very time when they exercised the high-priesthood; Abishua (whom he calls Abiud) in the time of Ehud; Bukki in the time of Shamgar; and Uzzi in the time of Tola. In whose days, the Jews think, the priesthood was translated from the family of Eleazar to that of Ithamar: for some great sin which they had committed; as afterward for the sins of Eli's sons, it was translated back again to Eleazar's posterity. So they say in Juchasin, "In the days of Samson died Uzzi of the family of Eleazar, and the high-priesthood was translated to the family of Ithamar; the first of which was Eli." But, as the Alexandrian Chronicle is of no great authority, so there is no mention, as Mr. Selden observes, of the names of these three persons, as succeeding Phinehas, either in the Scripture, or the Hebrew Chronicles, or in Eusebius. But the only high-priest between Eleazar and Eli is Phinehas: who the Jews think was alive in the war with the Benjamites, Judg. xxi. 28. (See lib. i. de Success. ad Pontif. cap. 2.) But this cannot be justified.

Ver. 6. And Uzzi begat Zerahiah, and Zerahiah begat Meraioth.

Ver. 7. Meraioth begat Amariah, and Amariah begat Ahitub.] See Ezra vii. 3. where in this genealogy six generations are omitted by him, from Meraioth to Azariah the son of Johanan, which are here mentioned. This Kimchi thinks was done for brevity's sake.

Ver. 8. And Ahitub begat Zadok, and Zadok begat Ahimaaz.] See 2 Sam. viii. 17. xv. 27.

Ver. 9. And Ahimaaz begat Azariah, and Azariah begat Johanan.

Ver. 10. And Johanan begat Azariah (he it is that executed the priest's office in the temple that Solomon built in Jerusalem).] The Divine writer sets a mark of honour upon Azariah (which he doth not on any of the foregoing) for maintaining his office so resolutely, with the danger of his life, against the usurpation of one of Solomon's successors, who would have offered incense in that very temple which Solomon had built: of which see 2 Chron. xxvi. 17, 18, &c. The mention of Solomon's temple in this place, plainly denotes, that this was written after the second temple was built, or while it was building.

But Ludovicus Capellus is of opinion, that Azariah here spoken of is not he that resisted Uzziah. For such a noble fact as that was, he thinks, would not have been touched in such general words: but he takes him to have been the high-priest in the days of Solomon; and was the first that ministered only in his temple. For Zadok his grandfather, and Ahimaaz his father, ministered first in the tabernacle. Therefore to make this agree with that Azariah, he thinks, we ought to acknowledge a double metathesis in these verses, 9—12. which ought to be read thus: Ahimaaz begat Azariah (he is the first that executed the priest's office in the house which Solomon built in Jerusalem), Azariah begat Amariah, Amariah begat Johanan, Johanan begat Azariah, Azariah begat Ahitub, Ahitub begat Zadok. If this be admitted, all the difficulties that arise out of this genealogy are quite removed. (See his Chronologia Sacra Notæ in Tab. xiv. p. 286.)

Ver. 11. Azariah begat Amariah, and Amariah begat Ahitub.

Ver. 12. And Ahitub begat Zadok, and Zadok begat Shallum.] Who is called Meshullam in chap. ix. 11. These three are mentioned no where else, but in Nehem. xi. 11.

though they discharged the high-priest's office in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, Hezekiah, and Manasseh, as Ludovicus Capellus makes account in his Chronol. Sacra, p. 287.

Ver. 13. And Shallum begat Hilkiah, and Hilkiah begat Azariah.

Ver. 14. And Azariah begat Seraiah, and Seraiah begat Jehozadak.] When Jerusalem was taken by the king of Babylon's army, Seraiah was carried by the captain of the guard to Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah: where he commanded him to be put to death. So that in him ended the succession of high-priests under the first temple: which from Zadok unto him were twelve. The Jews, in Seder Olam Zula, make them to be eighteen; but they are not to be believed against the Scripture: there being also the very same succession mentioned Ezra vii. 1, 2, &c. which beginning from Aaron, the first four of these here mentioned, together with Ahitub the father of Zadok, are omitted for brevity's sake, as Kimchi thinks. (See Selden, de Success. ad Pontif. lib. i. cap. 5.) But some think it sufficient to say, that it was not the intention of the writer of this book to mention all the high-priests that were from Zadok to Seraiah: because Jehoiada, who was the high-priest in the time of Athaliah, is not here named. He is called indeed every where Jehoiada the priest: yet he took upon him such authority, as may well make us suppose him to have been high-priest. It is observed by Kimchi, that the line of the high-priests is drawn from Aaron down to the captivity, through the family of Eleazar his eldest son; none of Ithamar's being mentioned: because the perpetual priesthood was promised only to Phinehas the son of Eleazar, (Numb. xxv.)

Ver. 15. And Jehozadak went into captivity, when the Lord carried away Judah and Jerusalem by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar.] In the captivity he begat Jeshua, who came back in the time of Cyrus, (Ezra iii. 2.)

Ver. 16. The sons of Levi; Gershom, Kohath, and Merari.] He hath not yet done with the account he intends to give of Levi's posterity: and therefore repeats the names of his sons, from whom these Levites sprung, who were not priests.

Ver. 17. And these be the names of the sons of Gershom; Libni, and Shimei.] Who were not mentioned before.

Ver. 18. And the sons of Kohath were Amram, and Izhar, and Hebron, and Uzziel.] See ver. 2.

Ver. 19. And the sons of Merari; Mahli, and Mushi.] See Exod. vi. 19.

And these are the families of the Levites, according to their fathers.] That is, these were the heads of the families that sprung from them: as it is probable, they that follow in the next catalogue were the chief of their families which continued unto the days of David; who regulated their attendance in their several courses.

Ver. 20. Of Gershom: Libni his son, Jahath his son, Zimmah his son.] This last was his grandson by his son Shimei, as appears from ver. 42. But such are frequently called sons.

Ver. 21. Joah his son, Iddo his son, Zerah his son, Jeaterai his son.

Ver. 22. The sons of Kohath; Amminadab.] Called Izhar, ver. 2.

Korah his son, Assir his son.

Ver. 23. Elkanah his son, and Ebiasaph his son, and Assir his son.

Ver. 24. Tahath his son, Uriel his son.] Called also Zephaniah, ver. 36.

Uzziah his son.] Who went also by the name of Azariah, as that verse tells us.

And Shaul his son.

Ver. 25. And the sons of Elkanah.] He was the son of Korah, mentioned ver. 23. as appears from Exod. vi. 24.

Amasai, and Ahimoth.

Ver. 26. As for Elkanah: the sons of Elkanah; Zophai his son.] Or Zuph, as he is called ver. 35. This is another Elkanah; son it is likely of him last mentioned.

And Nahath his son.

Ver. 27. Eliab his son.] Who is called Eliel, ver. 34.

Jeroham his son, Elkanah his son.

Ver. 28. The sons of Samuel.] Who was the son of Elkanah, as we read 1 Sam. i. 1. which being a thing well known, this writer (giving only a breviate of these histories) omits the mention of it. But it appears by this account, that Samuel was only a Levite, not of the race of the priests (for he did not descend from Aaron, but from Izhar the uncle of Aaron), much less the high-priest, as some great men have fancied. (See Selden, de Success. ad Pontif. lib. i. cap. 14.)

The first-born Vashni, and Abiah.] The first of these is called Joel, 1 Sam. viii. 2. and here below, ver. 33.

Ver. 29. The sons of Merari: Mahli; Libni his son, Shimei his son, Uzza his son.

Ver. 30. Shimea his son, Haggiah his son, Asaiah his son.

Ver. 31. And these are they.] Having thus far deduced the genealogy of the Levites, he proceeds now to give an account how David ordered their attendance upon the service of God at the tabernacle: and sets down the names of the chief of them, which here follow.

Whom David set over the service of the song.] Appointed to minister unto God by singing of songs in his house.

After that the ark had rest.] After David had brought it from the house of Obed-Edom, and settled it at Jerusalem, (2 Sam. viii. 17.)

Ver. 32. And they ministered before the dwelling-place of the tabernacle of glory.] Which David had prepared for the ark, when it came to Jerusalem, (2 Sam. viii. 17.)

With singing.] The Psalms which David and other prophets composed.

Until Solomon had built the house of the Lord in Jerusalem.] Before the temple was built by Solomon they performed this service: which did not cease after it was built, but continued in great order, as it here follows.

And then they waited in their office according to their order.] Which David himself had constituted a little before his death: as we read in the latter end of this book.

Ver. 33. And these are they that waited with their children: of the sons of the Kohathites; Heman a singer, the son of Joel, the son of Shemuel.] That is, of Samuel the great prophet: whose name, it appears by this, was differently pronounced in different times and places. This place also still shews more clearly, that Samuel was only a Levite of the family of the Kohathites, not a priest of the family of Aaron, which is suggested by the Psalmist, (Psal. xcix.) "Moses and Aaron among his priests, and Samuel among them that call upon his name." Therefore, as Estius observes, when Samuel is said to have offered sacrifice (as he did often in Gilgal and other places), it must be understood that he did it by the ministry of the priests, not by himself. And thus David and Solomon sacrificed, but not by their own hands, but by those to whose office it properly belonged.

This Heman was so eminent for his skill in singing, that he is thought to have been a composer of hymns: which I have considered in my notes upon 1 Kings iv.

Ver. 34. The son of Elkanah, the son of Jeroham, the son of Eliel, the son of Toah.] Called Nahath, ver. 26.

Ver. 35. The son of Zuph.] Called Zophai, ver. 26.

The son of Elkanah, the son of Mahath, the son of Amasai.

Ver. 36. The son of Elkanah, the son of Joel, the son of Azariah, the son of Zephaniah.

Ver. 37. The son of Tahath, the son of Assir, the son of Ebiasaph, the son of Korah.

Ver. 38. The son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi, the son of Israel.] Thus, in honour of Samuel, the pedigree of Heman, who was his grandson, is derived from Israel the father of them all.

Ver. 39. And his brother Asaph (who stood on his right hand), even Asaph the son of Berachiah, the son of Shimea.] This depends upon ver. 33. where it is said, these are they that waited with their children, &c. viz. Heman and Asaph: who is called Heman's brother, according to the Hebrew phrase; in which all near kindred are called brothers. And these two were of the same tribe and family; and also of the same employment, upon which account, if there were no other, he might be called the brother of Heman.

Ver. 40. The son of Michael, the son of Baaseiah, the son of Melchiah.

Ver. 41. The son of Ethni, the son of Zerah, the son of Adaiah.

Ver. 42. The son of Ethan, the son of Zimmah, the son of Shimei.

Ver. 43. The son of Jahath, the son of Gershom, the son of Levi.] There was no need to add the son of Israel: for it is apparent they sprung from the same stock, by two brethren the sons of Levi.

Ver. 44. Their brethren, the sons of Merari, stood on the left hand.] In like manner the children of the next son of Levi are here mentioned; who had the lowest place assigned, because they were of the youngest family. So there were three principal singers, who were masters and governors of the whole choir; Heman, descended from Kohath, was the prime, who, together with his sons, stood in the middle: and then Asaph, descended from Gershom, with his sons, stood on his right hand: and Ethan from Merari on the left. Of these three families there were three principal persons, who bare rule over the rest of the singers here mentioned, and kept good order among them. And indeed there was an admirable order observed, in the whole ministry at the tabernacle: three great men, and their sons, were singers and musicians; the rest of the Levites prepared and made ready the sacrifices; the priests offered them; and the high-priest officiated in the most holy place, as it here follows.

Ethan the son of Kishi, the son of Abdi, the son of Malluch.] He who is here called Ethan, is called Jeduthun, chap. ix. 16. and in many other places.

Ver. 45. The son of Hashabiah, the son of Amaziah, the son of Hilkiah.

Ver. 46. The son of Amzi, the son of Bani, the son of Shamer.

Ver. 47. The son of Mahli, the son of Mushi, the son of Merari, the son of Levi.] It is observable, that, in all the genealogies of the Levites, there is not a word said of the sons of Moses and their posterity: he having no ambition to prefer them unto any office, either in church or state.

Ver. 48. Their brethren also the Levites.] The rest of that tribe, who were not fit to be singers.

Were appointed unto all manner of service of the tabernacle of the house of God.] They performed all the laborious work that was to be done in the tabernacle; being porters, keepers of the vessels of the sanctuary, as well as taking care to prepare the sacrifices, and such-like things. Of which an account is given below in chap. xxiii. and these following.

Ver. 49. But Aaron and his sons offered upon the altar of the burnt-offering, and on the altar of incense, and were appointed for all the work of the place most holy, and to make an atonement for Israel, according to all that Moses, the servant of God, had commanded.] The noblest part of the ministry was reserved for Aaron and his posterity: which is mentioned at large in the book of Leviticus. Which shews that Aaron alone, and his successors in the high-priesthood, ministered in the place most holy, and made the atonement: but his sons, the priests, offered on the altars of burnt-offering and of incense.

Ver. 50. And these are the sons of Aaron; Eleazar his son, Phinehas his son, Abishua his son.

Ver. 51. Bukki his son, Uzzi his son, Zerahiah his son.

Ver. 52. Meraioth his son, Amariah his son, Ahitub his son.

Ver. 53. Zadok his son, Ahimaaz his son.] Having mentioned the high-priest's office, he sets down the succession of it from Aaron to the time of David: which he had done before more largely to the time of the captivity, (ver. 3, 4, &c.) There was no age like to this of David's, as Victorinus Strigelius observes; which produced so many great men, that he calls it the prophetical age. Wherein God raised up Samuel, Nathan, Gad, Heman, Asaph, and Ethan: who made the word of God dwell plentifully in the church of Israel in all wisdom.

Ver. 54. Now these are their dwelling-places throughout their castles, in the coasts of the sons of Aaron, of the families of the Kohathites.] Now follows an account of the places where they inhabited: and first of the habitation of the sons of Aaron, who were the noblest of the Kohathites.

For theirs was the lot.] That is, the first lot fell to them. (See Josh. xxi. 4.)

Ver. 55. And they gave them Hebron in the land of Judah, and the suburbs thereof round about it.] See Josh. xxi. 10, 11.

Ver. 56. But the fields of the city, and the villages thereof, they gave to Caleb the son of Jephunneh.] See Josh. xxi. 12.

Ver. 57. And to the sons of Aaron they gave the cities of Judah, namely, Hebron, the city of refuge, and Libnah with her suburbs, and Jattir and Eshtemoa with their suburbs.] Besides the forenamed city of Hebron (which is mentioned again, because the most eminent) they gave them these following, which were in the same tribe of Judah.

Ver. 58. And Hilen with her suburbs.] Called Holon in the book of Joshua, (chap. xxi. 15.)

Ver. 59. And Ashan with her suburbs.] Called Ain, Josh. xxi. 16.

And Beth-shemesh with her suburbs.] Mentioned in the same place.

Ver. 60. And out of the tribe of Benjamin; Geba with her suburbs, and Alemeth with her suburbs.] Called Almon, Josh. xxi. 18.

And Anothoth with her suburbs. All their cities, throughout their families, were thirteen cities.] Whereof there are only eleven here mentioned: but there are two more added in the book of Joshua, viz. Juttah and Gibeon, which make thirteen, chap. xxi. 16, 17. Perhaps they were not yet rebuilt when this book was written.

Ver. 61. And unto the sons of Kohath, which were left of the family of that tribe.] Who were not of the sons of Aaron, but descended from Kohath.

Were cities given out of the half tribe, namely, out of the half tribe of Manasseh, by lot, ten cities.] Some of these cities were taken out of the tribe of Manasseh, and some out of others; as appears from Josh. xxi. But in all they made ten, (ver. 26.)

Ver. 62. And to the sons of Gershom, throughout their families, out of the tribe of Issachar, and out of the tribe of Asher, and out of the tribe of Naphtali, and out of the tribe of Manasseh, in Bashan, thirteen cities.] Their cities were assigned them in these several tribes, because they were too many to be contained in one.

Ver. 63. Unto the sons of Merari were given by lot, throughout their families, out of the tribe of Reuben, and out of the tribe of Gad, and out of the tribe of Zebulun, twelve cities.

Ver. 64. And the children of Israel gave to the Levites these cities with their suburbs.] To the tribe of Levi, consisting of priests and simple Levites, these cities were given, which are here mentioned in this chapter.

Ver. 65. And they gave by lot out of the tribe of the children of Judah, and out of the tribe of the children of Simeon, and out of the tribe of the children of Benjamin.] These three tribes were very near one to another; and in several places Simeon mixed together with the other two.

These cities which are called by their names.] Which are recited in the foregoing verses, (ver. 57, &c.) and given to the sons of Aaron.

Ver. 66. And the residue of the families of the sons of Kohath had cities of their coasts out of the tribe of Ephraim.] By coasts here is meant portions: which were assigned them, though they were not priests, for their support in a lower ministry. These things seem to be mentioned so often, and with such exactness, that it might appear what care was taken by God for the maintenance of his ministers of all sorts; and for the instruction of his people, among whom he dispersed the Levites, who were peculiarly devoted to his service.

Ver. 67. And they gave unto them, of the cities of refuge, Shechem in Mount Ephraim with her suburbs; they gave also Gezer with her suburbs.] These were places of great eminence, unto which there was great resort: which gave them the greater opportunity of doing good. They are both expressly mentioned Josh. xxi. 21.

Ver. 69. And Aijalon with her suburbs, and Gath-rimmon with her suburbs.

Ver. 70. And out of the half tribe of Manasseh; Aner with her suburbs, and Bileam with her suburbs, for the family of the remnant of the sons of Kohath.] The city here called Bileam is called Ibleam in the book of Joshua; length of time making greater alterations in the names both of persons and places than this is, as appears by several other places here mentioned. For, as Kimchi here well notes (which frivolous cavillers should observe), the Divine writers did not affect accuracy in such matters as these; but took names as they found them.

Ver. 71. Unto the sons of Gershom were given, out of the family of the half tribe of Manasseh, Golan in Bashan with her suburbs, and Ashtaroth with her suburbs.] From Golan came the Gaulonites.

Ver. 73. And Ramoth with her suburbs, and Anem with her suburbs.

Ver. 75. And Hukok with her suburbs, and Rehob with her suburbs.

Ver. 76. And out of the tribe of Naphtali; Kedesh in Galilee with her suburbs, and Hammon with her suburbs, and Kirjathaim with her suburbs.] That place which here is called Hammon, is in Josh. xxi. 32. called Hammoth: from whence some argue, that one of these places is corrupted; and they fancy this, because the LXX. here hath Χαμώθ. As though the name of some place and person (as I said before) may not be differently pronounced in different times and countries. As Achan and Achar, mentioned above.

Ver. 77. Unto the rest of the children of Merari were given, out of the tribe of Zebulun, Rimmon with her suburbs, Tabor with her suburbs.

Ver. 78. And on the other side Jordan by Jericho, on the east side of Jordan, were given them, out of the tribe of Reuben, Bezer in the wilderness with her suburbs, and Jahzah with her suburbs.

Ver. 79. Kedemoth also with her suburbs, and Mephaath with her suburbs.

Ver. 80. And out of the tribe of Gad; Ramoth in Gilead with her suburbs, and Mahanaim with her suburbs.

Ver. 81. And Heshbon with her suburbs, and Jazer with her suburbs.] The first of these, Heshbon, was reckoned to be in the tribe of Reuben as well as in Gad. Of which see Josh. xiii. 17.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. NOW the sons of Issachar were Tola, and Puah, Jashub, and Shimron, four.] There is some little difference in the names of two of these, as they are mentioned Gen. xlvi. And Jashub seems to have been called Job, for brevity's sake: just as Aram is called Ram, and among us Alexander is called Saunder. See Buxtorf's Anticritica, par. ii. cap. 8. where Rasi gives another account of it, but not so likely.

Ver. 2. And the sons of Tola; Uzzi, and Rephaiah, and Jeriel, and Jahmai, and Jibsam, and Shemuel, heads of their father's house, to wit, of Tola: they were valiant men of might in their generations; whose number was, in the days of David, two-and-twenty thousand and six hundred.] When David numbered the people, (2 Sam. xxiv.) there were found thus many descended from the first-born of Issachar; which was a very great increase.

Ver. 3. And the sons of Uzzi; Izrahiah.] He names but one son: therefore, all his posterity is comprehended in the name of sons.

And the sons of Izrahiah; Michael, and Obadiah, and Joel, Ishiah, five: all of them chief men.] Reckoning their father for one, they were five in all: and persons of great authority.

Ver. 4. And with them, by their generations, after the house of their fathers, were bands of soldiers for war, six-and-thirty thousand men.] As they were numerous, so they were of a warlike spirit; which made them very considerable.

For they had many wives and sons.] They were very fruitful, and propagated the more, because they had many wives, who bare them many sons: and those sons, it is likely, took many wives also, for the greater increase of their family. For this was the cause of polygamy among them, the desire of a numerous offspring (whereby God's promise to Abraham, of making them as the stars of heaven for multitude, might be fulfilled), and of a holy race of people to propagate piety, when the nations of the world were generally corrupted. (See chap. viii. 40.)

Ver. 5. And their brethren.] That is, their kindred.

Among all the families of Issachar, were valiant men of might, reckoned in all, by their genealogies, fourscore and seven thousand.] There was no such great increase of the rest of the families of Issachar, since in all they amounted but to this number: and from two of his sons sprung above fifty-eight thousand.

Ver. 6. The sons of Benjamin; Bela, and Becher, and Jediael, three.] He mentions no more in this place; but in the next chapter (ver. 1, 2.) he mentions five: they were ten in all, as we read in Gen. xlvi. 21. But either half of them died without issue, or their families were extinct, or their genealogies lost.

Ver. 7. And the sons of Bela; Ezbon, and Uzzi, and Uzziel, and Jerimoth, and Iri, five; heads of the house of their fathers, mighty men of valour; and were reckoned by their genealogies twenty and two thousand and thirty and four.] There are others mentioned as his sons, chap. viii. 8. therefore it is likely these were his grandsons: who, being more eminent than their fathers, were mentioned as the chief of their several families, from whence they sprung.

Ver. 8. And the sons of Becher; Zemira, and Joash, and Eliezer, and Elioenai, and Omri, and Jerimoth, and Abiah, and Anathoth, and Alameth. All these are the sons of Becher.

Ver. 9. And the number of them, after their genealogy by their generations, heads of the house of their fathers, mighty men of valour, was twenty thousand and two hundred.] They were not so many as those descended from the eldest son; and the youngest son had still fewer.

Ver. 10. The sons also of Jediael; Bilhan.] He mentions but one; who includes all descended from him, as it here follows.

And the sons of Bilhan; Jeush, and Benjamin, and Ehud, and Chenaanah, and Zethan, and Tharshish, and Ahishahar.

Ver. 11. All these the sons of Jediael, by the heads of their fathers, mighty men of valour, were seventeen thousand and two hundred soldiers, fit to go out for war and battle.

Ver. 12. Shuppim also, and Huppim, the children of Ir.] Or of Iri, as he is called, ver. 7. the youngest son of Bela; whose sons are called Huppim and Muppim, Gen. xlvi. 21. In which book there are other proper names of men, in the plural number, (Gen. x. 13, 14. xxv. 3.)

And Hushim, the sons of Aher.] If he still speak of the sons of Benjamin, this person was called Ahiram, Numb. xxvi. 39. But there being no mention of the tribe of Dan in this genealogy, unless it be here, many take Aher not to be a proper name, but a common word, signifying other; and so translate the words thus, another son: that is, the son of another tribe or family, viz. of Dan. For Hushim was his only son, Gen. xlvi. 23. where the word sons, though he speak of one man only, is used as it is in this place.

Ver. 13. The sons of Naphtali; Jahziel, and Guni, and Jezer, and Shallum, the sons of Bilhah.] The sons of Bilhah were Naphtali and Dan. Therefore these were her grandsons by the first of them.

Ver. 14. The sons of Manasseh; Ashriel.] His great-grandson; for both he and Zelophehad were the sons of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh. (See Numb. xxvi. 29. &c. xxvii. 1.)

Whom she bare.] That is, whom his wife bare; for his concubine is here opposed to her, in the next words.

(But his concubine the Aramitess bare Machir the father of Gilead.] He took a Syrian woman to wife, from whom his chief posterity descended.

Ver. 15. And Machir took to wife the sister of Huppim and Shuppim, whose sister's name was Maachah).] He married into the tribe of Benjamin, whose sons these were.

And the name of the second son was Zelophehad.] This relates to the beginning of ver. 14. where his first son Ashriel is mentioned.

And Zelophehad had daughters.] No sons, but only daughters; as we read in the book of Numbers, chap. xxvii.

Ver. 16. And Maachah, the wife of Machir, bare a son, and she called his name Peresh; and the name of his brother was Sheresh; and his sons were Ulam and Rakem.

Ver. 17. And the sons of Ulam; Bedan. These were the sons of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh.

Ver. 18. And his sister Hammoleketh bare Ishod, and Abiezer, and Mahalah.] That is, the sister of Gilead, as Kimchi understands it (though some take her to have been the sister of Bedan), who was an illustrious woman, and therefore here mentioned, and, as the Targum imagines, was a queen; that is, governess of a certain tract of land in the country of Gilead. For he takes Hammoleketh not for a proper name, but for an appellative: of which there is no mention neither in the law, nor in the prophets, as Kimchi confesses; but they have this by tradition. Which, though it be very groundless, the Vulgar Latin follows it, and translates this word regina. Which Estius ingenuously acknowledges to be a mistake.

Ver. 19. And the sons of Shemida were Ahian, and Shechem, and Likhi, and Aniam.] There is no mention of Shemida before. But he is supposed to be another son of Gilead's sister beforenamed.

Ver. 20. And the sons of Ephraim; Shuthelah, and Bered his son, and Tahath his son, and Eladah his son, and Tahath his son.] Some will have all these to be the sons of Ephraim: but the most natural sense seems to be, that Bered was the son of Shuthelah, and Tahath the son of Bered, &c. and so on to the following descendants of Ephraim, whose genealogy is now related.

Ver. 21. And Zabad his son, and Shuthelah his son, and Ezer, and Elead, whom the men of Gath that were born in that land slew, because they came down to take away their cattle.] This piece of history is no where else recorded: which in all likelihood fell out before the children of Israel came out of the land of Egypt. For Ephraim, it appears by the next verse, was alive when these children of his were slain. Who, as the Targum thinks, mistook in their computation of the end of the years, wherein they were to be slaves in Egypt, and imagining them to be expired, made an inroad into the land of Canaan to take possession of it, before the time they were to enjoy it. But others think it proceeded from their desire of prey and spoil, which they thought they might lawfully get from those whose country they were to possess: and they presumed the more to make this attempt, because they were valiant men, and proud, perhaps, of the great power and authority which their uncle Joseph had in Egypt. Though others think it more probable, that the Philistines having infested them in the land of Goshen, these sons of Zabad broke into their country to make reprisals upon their cattle. Dr. Lightfoot (in his conclusion of his Annotations on Genesis), quite contrary, thinks that the men of Gath went to plunder in Egypt, and there slew these Ephraimites, who only stood up in defence of their cattle. And those words, that were born in the land, he thinks, signify these men of Gath were born in Egypt, though they now dwelt in Gath. So the men of Gath were the plunderers, and not the Ephraimites. But they who take the Ephraimites to have been the invaders, think those words are added, to shew that the Philistines were the more incensed against them; because they seemed to come to dispossess them of their land.

Ver. 22. And Ephraim their father.] They were his grandchildren.

Mourned many days, and his brethren came to comfort him.] That is, his kindred (as the word brethren often signifies), they that were of his family came to condole with him. This shews Ephraim lived to be a very old man, if this happened near to the time of their going out of Egypt.

Ver. 23. And when he went in to his wife, she conceived and bare a son, and he called his name Beriah, because it went evil with his house.] For so the word Beriah imports: his family was in an ill condition.

Ver. 24. (And his daughter was Sherah, who built Beth-horon the nether, and the upper, and Uzzan-Sherah).] She was, it seems, a very great woman: who restored both these cities of Beth-horon, which were destroyed by the Israelites, when they conquered the land of Canaan, and rebuilt them in the same place, adding another city, which carried her own name in it.

Ver. 25. And Rephah was his son.] i. e. The son of Beriah.

Also Resheph, and Telah his son, and Tahan his son.] Beriah also had another son, whose name was Resheph, whose son was Telah, &c.

Ver. 26. Laadan his son, Ammihud his son, Elishama his son.] Who was the chief commander in the tribe of Ephraim when they were in the wilderness, (Numb. i. 10.)

Ver. 27. Non his son, Jehoshua his son.] For whose sake his pedigree seems to be thus largely deduced.

Ver. 28. And their possessions and habitations were Beth-el and the towns thereof.] See Josh. xvi. 1, &c.

And eastward Naaran, and westward Gezer with the towns thereof; Shechem also and the towns thereof, unto Gaza and the towns thereof.] Or rather Ad-azea, a place so called: for their border did not extend so far as Gaza in the land of the Philistines.

Ver. 29. And by the borders of the children of Manasseh, Beth-shean and her towns, Taanach and her towns, Megiddo and her towns, Dor and her towns. In these dwelt the children of Joseph, the son of Israel.] That is, the children of Manasseh. (See Josh. xvi. 11.)

Ver. 30. The sons of Asher; Imnah, and Isuah, and Ishuai, and Beriah, and Serah their sister.] See the same account of them in Gen. xlvi. 17.

Ver. 31. And the sons of Beriah; Heber, and Malchiel, who is the father of Birzavith.] The two first of these were born before they went into Egypt, as appears from Gen. xlvi. 18.

Ver. 32. And Heber begat Japhlet, and Shomer, and Hotham, and Shuah their sister.

Ver. 33. And the sons of Japhlet; Pasach, and Bimhal, and Ashvath: these are the children of Japhlet.

Ver. 34. And the sons of Shamer; Ahi, and Rohgah, Jehubbah, and Aram.] The father of these was the second brother of Japhlet, called Shomer, ver. 32.

Ver. 35. And the sons of his brother.] That is, of Hotham, who was next brother to Shamer.

Helem; Zophah, and Imna, and Shelesh, and Amal.

Ver. 36. The sons of Zophah; Suah, and Harnepher, and Shual, and Beri, and Imrah.

Ver. 37. Bezer, and Hod, and Shamma, and Shilshah, and Ithran, and Beera.

Ver. 38. And the sons of Jether; Jephunneh, and Pispah, and Ara.] This Jether is the same that is called in the verse foregoing Ithran; the youngest son but one of Zophah: the rest had no sons, or their genealogy was lost.

Ver. 39. And the sons of Ulla; Arah, and Hanniel, and Rezia.] We do not read whose son Ulla was; but it is probable of Jether; whereof there are many examples in the foregoing chapters.

Ver. 40. All these were the children of Asher, heads of their father's house, choice and mighty men of valour, chief of the princes.] Of these only he gives an account, and takes no notice of inferior families: though they are included, I suppose, in the following number.

And the number throughout the genealogy of them that were apt to the war and to battle was twenty and six thousand men.] Though they lived in a rich and delicious country, abounding with wine and oil, and other good things, in the best part of Galilee; yet they did not give themselves up to sloth and laziness, but were a warlike and valiant people.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. NOW Benjamin begat Bela his first-born.] He goes over the genealogy of this tribe again, (which he had begun before in the foregoing chapter, ver. 6.) and gives a larger account of it, because it was entirely joined to the tribe of Judah; and likewise, that he might make way for the following history, and touch upon the generations of Saul; and shew how this tribe was increased again, after that great calamity which befel them in the time of the judges.

Ashbel the second son, and Aharah the third.] His first-born, Bela, is expressly so called by Moses, Gen. xlvi. 21. but all the rest are called by very different names. Therefore, either these were his grand-children (who are frequently called sons), or they had two names, which I shewed before was not unusual. (See chap. iii. 1.)

Ver. 2. Noah the fourth, and Rapha the fifth.

Ver. 3. And the sons of Bela were Addar, and Gera, and Abihud.

Ver. 4. And Abishua, and Naaman, and Ahoah.

Ver. 5. And Gera.] It is likely this was the son of the forenamed, and so grandson to Bela.

And Shephuphan, and Huram.

Ver. 6. And these are the sons of Ehud.] Who is not named before; unless he be the third son of Bela, called Abihud, ver. 3. And some think the three persons last named to have been his sons.

These are the heads of the fathers of the inhabitants of Geba.] Where their first settlement was.

And they removed them to Manahath.] That is, Gera removed them, as it follows, ver. 7. to a place mentioned before in the second chapter of this book, ver. 52. 54. Geba being too narrow for them, when they were multiplied: or, this other place being a more commodious habitation.

Ver. 7. And Naaman, and Ahiah, and Gera, he removed them, and begat Uzza and Ahihud.] After his removal.

Ver. 8. And Shaharaim begat children in the country of Moab, after he had sent them away; Hushim and Baara were his wives.] After the removal beforementioned, this person took two wives of the country of Moab: whose names are here set down. To shew (say some of the Jews) that though a Moabite was excluded from the congregation of the Lord, yet a Moabitess was not; as appears by the example of Ruth.

Ver. 9. And he begat of Hodesh his wife.] The Jews think she is the same with Baara: who was called Hodesh, that is new, because he renewed the example of marrying a Moabitish woman: which was first practised in Ruth. But this is an odd fancy of theirs, who misplace the time of Ruth.

Jobab, and Zibia, and Mesha, and Malcham.

Ver. 10. And Jeuz, and Shachia, and Mirma. These were his sons, heads of the fathers.] Chief men in their families.

Ver. 11. And of Hushim he begat Ahitub and Elpaal.] On this verse the Jews ground what they say of Hodesh, that she was the same with Baara, mentioned ver. 8. with Hushim as his other wife.

Ver. 12. The sons of Elpaal; Eber, and Misham, and Shamed, who built Ono and Lod, with the towns thereof.] These two, Ono and Lod, are joined together in other places, being neighbouring cities. (See Ezra ii. 33. Nehem. vi. 37. xi. 33.) They were but three miles distant one from the other, as Dr. Lightfoot computes in his Chorographical Decats before St. Mark, chap. 9. sect. ult. where he shews the Talmudists say, that Ono was a walled city from the days of Joshua; but in the war against Gibeah it was burnt with fire, as other cities were; and rebuilt by this Elpaal: who also re-edified Lod, which is the same with Lydda in the New Testament, as the same Dr. Lightfoot observes in his Chorographical Century before St. Matthew. Where he observes, the author of the maps of the land of Canaan hath placed Lydda not far from Jordan, and Lod near the Mediterranean: whereas they are one and the same place, as he shews at large. And in the other place mentioned before, he shews it was also called Laodicea: for sometimes they speak of the martyrs in Lod, and in other places call them the martyrs in Laodicea.

Ver. 13. Beriah also, and Shema, who were heads of the fathers of the inhabitants of Aijalon.] That is, of the fields that lay about Aijalon: for the town itself belonged to the tribe of Dan, (Josh. xix. 42.)

Who drove away the inhabitants of Gath.] In revenge (as Pellicanus thinks) of the slaughter they made long ago of their brethren the Ephraimites: (chap. vii. 21.) or, finding the men of Gath had possessed themselves of this place, they drove them out after their return from the captivity of Babylon. But we read of no war after their return till the time of the Maccabees: and, therefore, this belongs (as a most judicious friend of mine, Dr. Alix, observes) to what was done in ancienter times, viz. after the division of the country by Joshua.

Ver. 14. And Ahio, Shashak, and Jeremoth.

Ver. 15. And Zebadiah, and Arad, and Ader.

Ver. 16. And Michael, and Ispah, and Joha, the sons of Beriah.] Mentioned before, ver. 13.

Ver. 17. And Zebadiah, and Meshullam, and Hezeki, and Heber.

Ver. 18. Ishmerai also, and Jezliah, and Jobab, the sons of Elpaal.] Of whom we had an account before, (ver. 11, 12.)

Ver. 19. And Jakim, and Zichri, and Zabdi.

Ver. 20. And Elienai, and Zilthai, and Eliel.

Ver. 21. And Adaiah, and Beraiah, and Shimrath, the sons of Shimhi.] It is likely that this Shimhi is the same with him who is called Shema, ver. 13.

Ver. 22. And Ishpan, and Heber, and Eliel.

Ver. 23. And Abdon, and Zichri, and Hanan,

Ver. 24. And Hananiah, and Elam, and Antothijah.

Ver. 25. And Iphedeiah, and Penuel, the sons of Shashak.] This Shashak was an eminent person, mentioned ver. 14.

Ver. 26. And Shamsherai, and Shehariah, and Athaliah.] Here is another instance of the same name, being common to men and women.

Ver. 27. And Jaresiah, and Eliah, and Zichri, the sons of Jeroham.] He is the same with Jeremoth, mentioned ver. 14. next to Shashak.

Ver. 28. These were heads of the fathers, by their generations, chief men. These dwelt in Jerusalem.] It is probable that all these mentioned from ver. 14. dwelt at Jerusalem (one part of which belonged to the tribe of Benjamin), as they that are forenamed did at Aijalon.

Ver. 29. And at Gibeon dwelt the father of Gibeon, whose wife's name was Maachah.] Perhaps Gibeon built this city, and gave his name to it, as Kimchi conjectures. But his proper name was Jehiel (as we read chap. ix. 35. where this genealogy is repeated); and he is called the father of Gibeon, because he was the chief ruler or governor of the Benjamites, who inhabited that place.

Ver. 30. And his first-born son Abdon, and Zur, and Kish, and Baal, and Nadab.] Between Baal and Nadab, there is mention of another son called Ner, chap. ix. 36.

Ver. 31. And Gedor, and Ahio, and Zacher.] Who is called Zechariah in chap. ix. 37. where another son is added, called Mikloth, whose posterity here follows.

Ver. 32. And Mikloth begat Shimeah.] Who is called Shimeam, chap. ix. 38.

And these also dwelt with their brethren in Jerusalem, over against them.] These families likewise were settled at Jerusalem, as well as the forenamed: and dwelt in a part of the city directly over against the other.

Ver. 33. And Ner begat Kish, and Kish begat Saul.] I observed before, ver. 30. that Ner was one of the sons of Gibeon (or Jehiel), who did not beget (in the common signification of the word) Kish; but educated him, and bred him up. For Kish was the son of Abiel: but different from him mentioned 1 Sam. xiv. 51. who was his brother. The Targum here saith, that Ner and Abiel were the same men, who had two names: Abiel was his proper name, but he was called Ner (which signifies a light), because he was illustrious upon some accounts which the Jews mention. See upon 1 Sam. ix. 1. where there is a large account of the ancestors of Abiel, none of which are here mentioned. Upon which Conradus Pellicanus makes this reflection: "That hence we may learn, it is an unnecessary labour scrupulously to inquire after these things, from which we can reap no fruit, and of which we may be ignorant without danger. Especially in the matter of these genealogies; the reason of which is long ago expired, together with the tribes to which they belong. As for the certainty of our belief, which depends upon the authority of the Holy Scriptures, that stands firm and constant, though some things by the length of time be so obscure, that they are not now exactly understood, especially in the difference we find in the proper names of persons and places, which without any prejudice to the faith may be neglected." Thus he.

And Saul begat Jonathan, and Malchi-shua, and Abinadab, and Esh-baal.] Who is called also Ish-bosheth. (See 2 Sam. ii. 8.

Ver. 34. And the son of Jonathan was Merib-baal; and Merib-baal begat Micah.] This son of Jonathan is called commonly Mephibosheth. (See in the forenamed place.)

Ver. 35. And the sons of Micah were Pithon, and Melech, and Tarea, and Ahaz.] The third of these is called Tahrea, chap. ix. 41.

Ver. 36. And Ahaz begat Jehoadah; and Jehoadah begat Alemeth, and Azmaveth, and Zimri; and Zimri begat Moza.

Ver. 37. And Moza begat Binea: Rapha was his son, Eleasah his son, Azel his son.

Ver. 38. And Azel had six sons, whose names are these, Azrikam, Bocheru, and Ishmael, and Shearíah, and Obadiah, and Hanan. All these were the sons of Azel.

Ver. 39. And the sons of Eshek his brother were Ulam his first-born, Jehush the second, and Eliphelet the third.] We read nothing of Eshek before, unless he be the same with Eleasah, ver. 37.

Thus the family of Saul, though he was rejected by God from being king of Israel, was blessed with a numerous progeny, which sprung from his great-grandchild Micah, whose posterity is here largely recorded in honour of Jonathan.

Ver. 40. And the sons of Ulam were mighty men of valour, archers.] In the Hebrew the word for archers is, those that tread the bow, because their steel bows (which were much in use among them) were so strong, that they could not bend them with their arms; but sat down, and pressing them with their feet, pulled the arrow with both hands, that it might fly with greater force.

And had many sons and sons' sons a hundred and fifty. All these are of the sons of Benjamin.] Who, it appears by Judg. xx. were a very valiant tribe: and this family, in particular, were noted to be very great, both in number and valour.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. So all Israel were reckoned by genealogies.] As much as to say, Thus I have summarily reckoned up the genealogies of all the tribes; as I found them in the public registers.

And, behold, they were written in the book of the Kings of Israel and of Judah.] For, let it be noted, they were so careful to preserve their genealogies, that they were kept in the public records, not only of the Jews, but of the Israelites: whose kings were not negligent in this matter.

Who were carried away to Babylon for their transgression.] These last mentioned, of the tribe of Judah, were carried thither; as the Israelites had been before into remote countries, upon the same account of their idolatry. In which captivity there was, no doubt, a great confusion made in their families: but Ezra, by the help of the prophets Haggai and Malachi (as the Jews think), undertook to set them right, by giving an account of what he found remaining in his time. Though there is a great difference of names in Nehem. xi. from those who are here mentioned: Malachi, also, and Ezra did not live in the same time.

Ver. 2. Now the first inhabitants, that dwelt in their possessions in their cities, were.] He speaks of those that came back to their own country with Zerubbabel.

The Israelites, the priests, Levites, and the Nethinims.] The first inhabitants that came and settled in their country, out of which they had been carried captive, he comprehends under four sorts of persons, Israelites, priests, Levites, and Nethinims. The first of these seems to comprehend not only all those of the ten tribes, who were carried captive with Judah and Benjamin, but those also who were carried into Assyria and Media by Tiglath-pileser and Shalmanaser. For the edict of Cyrus extended to them, as well as to Judah and Benjamin; and, as the prophets had foretold, (see Jer. v. 3, 4. 10. and xxi.) some of them did return, though too many (as the Jews also did) continued where they were settled in their captivity. But that the word Israelites is here a distinct name from the Jews, is apparent from what follows, ver. 3. The last of these, viz. the Nethinims, are generally thought by the Jewish interpreters to be the same with the Gibeonites, who performed the lower offices in the temple, being hewers of wood and drawers of water. (See Josh. ix. 27.) But Ezra hath given us a better account of them, chap. viii. 20. where he informs us they were given by David to minister to the Levites (which is the original of their name), as the Levites were given by God to help the priests. And therefore in all places they are mentioned with holy persons.

Ver. 3. And in Jerusalem dwelt of the children of Judah, and of the children of Benjamin, and of the children of Ephraim, and Manasseh.] This shews that some of the ten tribes returned with those of Judah and Benjamin. For the proclamation of Cyrus excepted none, but gave all the people of that nation liberty to return to their own country. And Josephus says expressly, that the edict of Cyrus was sent by Zerubbabel to those of Assyria and Media. Many, indeed, neglected that favour (as I said before), and continued where they were settled; but those that did return were united to the Jews without distinction. Insomuch, that at Jerusalem, which belonged to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, some of Ephraim and Manasseh were permitted to make their abode. For several of those tribes, being left in the land of Samaria, when the ten tribes were carried away, joined with Judah, (2 Chron. xxxi. 1. xxxii. 1. xxxiv. 9, &c.) and were carried with them to Babylon, and returned with them.

Ver. 4. Uthai the son of Ammihud, the son of Omri, the son of Imri, the son of Bani, of the children of Pharez the son of Judah.] Now he sets down their names; and first those of the tribe of Judah, in this and the two following verses. But their names are so different from those in Nehem. xi. that it is an argument they speak of quite different persons, who lived in different times.

Ver. 5. And of the Shilonites.] Who are called Shelanites in Numb. xxvi. 20.

Asaiah the first-born, and his sons.] The eldest of that family, and those descended from him.

Ver. 6. And of the sons of Zerah; Jeuel and his brethren.] By brethren are meant near relations, as ver. 9. 13. 21.

Six hundred and ninety.] This was the whole number of the children of Judah, who dwelt in Jerusalem, after they came out of their captivity.

Ver. 7. And of the sons of Benjamin; Sallu the son of Meshullam, the son of Hodaviah, the son of Hasenuah.] This Meshullam is said to be descended from quite different ancestors, than are mentioned Nehem. xi. 7. And therefore this is a quite different person from the other, though of the same name. Though some think that one of these authors gives an account of his remote ancestors, and the other of his more immediate: which is not probable.

Ver. 8. And Ibneiah the son of Jeroham, and Elah the son of Uzzi, the son of Michri, and Meshullam the son of Shephatiah, the son of Reuel, the son of Ibnijah.

Ver. 9. And their brethren, according to their generations, nine hundred and fifty and six.] By brethren, as I said before, are meant their near kindred.

All these men.] That is, the seven mentioned above, (ver. 4. 8.)

Were chief of the fathers in the house of their fathers.] They are called chief fathers, because they were principal governors in their families. Nehemiah mentions no more than nine hundred twenty and eight, who came with these; therefore gives an account of different persons; or some before his time were dead, or removed to some other place. The first is most likely.

Ver. 10. And of the priests; Jedaiah, and Jehoiarib, and Jachin.] These are the second sort of inhabitants that first settled in their possessions after the captivity, mentioned ver. 2.

Ver. 11. And Azariah the son of Hilkiah.] Not he in the days of Josiah, (2 Kings xxii. 8.) but another of the same name; whose son Seraiah lived in the time of Nehemiah, xi. 11.

The son of Meshullam, the son of Zadok, the son of Meraioth, the son of Ahitub, the ruler of the house of God.] This last person is thought by Pellicanus to have been the high-priest: but both Ezra and Haggai tell us, Jeshua (or Joshua) was high-priest, (Ezra iii. 2. Haggai i. 1.) This therefore was not the ruler, but a ruler in God's house (as the words should be translated); not the principal ruler, but one in great authority under him: perhaps he that was called the sagan (who was vicar to the high-priest; and performed his office when he was sick, or otherwise hindered), or he was the head of one of the courses of the priests, that attended in their turns, at the house of God. Here it is to be noted, that by the house of God in this place, we are taught by ver. 23. to understand the house of the tabernacle. For as, before the first temple was built, there was a tabernacle for Divine service; so, after the second was founded, they erected a tabernacle, till this temple could be finished: without which they could not have performed the several parts of the worship of God, which were annexed to the several parts of the holy places, according to the law.

Ver. 12. And Adaiah the son of Jeroham, the son of Pashur, the son of Malchijah, and Maasiai the son of Adiel, the son of Jahzerah, the son of Meshullam, the son of Meshillemith, the son of Immer.] There were three between that Jeroham and Pashur mentioned in Nehemiah: and therefore he was either his great-grandson, or they were different persons, though of the same name.

Ver. 13. And their brethren, heads of the house of their fathers, a thousand and seven hundred and threescore; very able men for the work of the service of the house of God.] In the Hebrew they are called mighty men of valour. For the service of the house of God required not only great strength of body, but great courage and resolution of mind; especially at that time when they were newly come out of captivity. There was a famous instance of this courage before the captivity, in Azariah: who resisted the king himself, when he would have profaned the holy place, (2 Chron. xxvi. 17, 18, &c.)

Ver. 14. And of the Levites; Shemaiah the son of Hasshub, the son of Azrikam, the son of Hashabiah, of the sons of Merari.] These are the third sort of persons, mentioned ver. 2.

Ver. 15. And Bakbakkar, Heresh, and Galal, and Mattaniah the son of Micah, the son of Zichri, the son of Asaph.] This last was descended, it is likely, from that Asaph who lived in David's time, (2 Chron. xx. 14.)

Ver. 16. And Obadiah the son of Shemaiah, the son of Galal, the son of Jeduthun, and Berechiah the son of Asa, the son of Elkanah, that dwelt in the villages of the Netophathites.] He speaks of Elkanah, not of Berechiah: for he dwelt at Jerusalem. But there was not room for them all there; therefore Elkanah, and those that belonged to him, dwelt in these villages, till their own cities were rebuilt. They were in the tribe of Judah, (chap. ii. 54.) and waited at Jerusalem in their courses, though they did not dwell there.

Ver. 17. And the porters.] Or rather the guards, as the Hebrew word signifies, and not porters.

Were Shallum, and Akkub, and Talmon, and Ahiman, and their brethren: Shallum was the chief.] The next verse tells us, at what places these guards exercised their office.

Ver. 18. (Who hitherto waited in the king's gate eastward).] That is, where the king's gate formerly was; which shews that the tabernacle they had erected was not on Mount Moriah, but in Zion, since their return from captivity.

They were porters.] That is, the four persons abovementioned.

In the companies of the children of Levi.] That were at the four sides of the tabernacle, Jerusalem being without walls.

Ver. 19. And Shallum.] Mentioned ver. 17.

The son of Kore, the son of Ebiasaph, the son of Korah, and his brethren (of the house of his father).] That is, the rest of that family.

The Korahites, were over the work of the service, keepers of the gates of the tabernacle.] Their service was to be keepers of the porches of the tabernacle: From which it appears again, that the Jews (as I said before) did pitch a tabernacle upon Mount Zion, till they had rebuilt the temple on Mount Moriah.

And their fathers, being over the host of the Lord.] Here the principal person among them attended, taking care of the tabernacle and all its appurtenances, which some think is meant by the host of the Lord.

Were keepers of the entry.] More especially they took care of the court, that none should enter into it but such as the law allowed.

Ver. 20. And Phinehas the son of Eleazar was the ruler over them in time past.] So we rightly translate the last word, lepanim; which, as R. David Gauz observes in his Tzemoth David, (ad A. M. 2892.) doth not signify that Phinehas was now living, but he was ruler of them in time past when he was living. And thus that Hebrew word is rendered, Ruth iv. 7. Psal. cii. 26. But that he should be ruler over this sort of officers seems unlikely, being the son of the high-priest, and after Eleazar high-priest himself: which raised him far above such a low employment. Besides, it is evident he is here speaking of the Levites, not of the priests, and therefore it is probable this Phinehas was only a Levite, called, as his father was, by the ancient name of a high-priest. (See Selden, de Success. in Pontificatum, lib. i. cap. 2. fol. 117. 119.)

And the Lord was with him.] In the Targum, the Word of the Lord was his helper. From which Beckius frames this argument against the present Jews, That if he who was with Phinehas was Jehovah the true God, and this Word was with Phinehas, then the Word, in the opinion of this paraphrast, was Jehovah the true God.

Ver. 21. And Zechariah the son of Meshelemiah was porter of the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] Here again the tabernacle is mentioned, which, as I said, the first inhabitants of the country, after their return from captivity, erected, till the temple could be built. For they would not be without the public worship of God, and a place was necessary for it. By the door of the tabernacle, I suppose, is meant the door which let into the court of the priests; for the Levites might not go into that court; and therefore this is not meant of the door of the sanctuary, as some have thought.

Ver. 22. All these which were chosen to be porters in the gates were two hundred and twelve.] Who came in their turns to discharge this office.

These were reckoned by their genealogy in their villages.] See ver. 16.

Whom David and Samuel the seer did ordain.] All things (that is, after their return from captivity), were put into that order at the house of God, which Samuel projected, and David, when he was settled in peace, put in execution. (See chap. xxiii. 5.) For there had been very great confusion, no doubt, in the service of God, in the days of the judges, as there had been in all other things. But when Samuel came to govern, he designed to put things in good order: and especially to make the attendance of God's ministers at his house more regular than it had been. For which end he contrived, in all likelihood, that method of the priests and Levites waiting in their courses; which (Saul being rejected by God) he imparted unto David, whom he anointed by God's appointment to be king over Israel. Who accordingly, in the latter end of his reign, disposed their services at the tabernacle.

In their set office.] Or rather (as it is in the margin) in their trust; for the Hebrew word signifies fidelity: importing, that their attendance at the house of God was no longer confused and disorderly (as it had been formerly, when there were sometimes too many, and sometimes too few waiting there; or, they had no certain work assigned them, or were negligent for want of overseers), but they every one in their course obediently went about their proper work, and faithfully discharged it.

Ver. 23. So they and their children had the oversight of the gates of the house of the Lord, namely, the house of the tabernacle.] This verse plainly instructs us that they built a tabernacle for the worship of God, (as I noted ver. 10.) after their return from Babylon, till the temple was finished: and here the priests and Levites attended; as in the house of the Lord.

By wards.] According to the courses that David appointed; as it is explained, ver. 25.

Ver. 24. In four quarters were the porters, towards the east, west, north, and south.] On the four sides of the tabernacle, as I observed on ver. 18. After the temple was built, these guards were kept, as Dr. Lightfoot notes, on the four quarters of the outward wall. For the wall that encompassed the courts had no gate on the west. (See Prospect of the Temple, chap. 4. sect. 3.)

Ver. 25. And their brethren, which were in the villages, were to come after seven days.] Every week a new course came to attend the service of the house of God, and to relieve their brethren.

From time to time with them.] They came to wait their week under the government of the chief porters: who seem to have constantly dwelt at Jerusalem, to see the courses disposed according as David had ordained. So it here follows.

Ver. 26. For these Levites, the four chief porters, were in their set office.] The principal porters were four, one at each gate, (ver. 24.) to whom was committed the care of the rest of their brethren to see that they did their duty.

And were over the chambers and treasuries of the house of God.] This I shall explain upon chap. xxvi. 20. where it is more distinctly mentioned.

Ver. 27. And they lodged round about the house of God, because the charge was upon them, and the opening thereof every morning pertained to them.] Round about the outward wall, beforementioned, ver. 24. For, as the same learned man observes, neither priests nor Levites had any lodgings in the gates of the courts: nor did the Levites open those doors, but the priests.

Ver. 28. And certain of them had the charge of ministering vessels, that they should bring them in and out by tale.] For the use of the priests when they ministered: who returned, when they had done their work, the same number to the Levites, which they had received from them. This was another duty of the Levites.

Ver. 29. Some of them also were appointed to oversee the vessels, and all the instruments of the sanctuary, and the fine flour, and the wine, and the oil, and the frankincense, and the spices.] See upon chap. xxvi. 20.

Ver. 30. And some of the sons of the priests made the ointment of the spices.] Or rather, but some of the sons of the priests, &c. For though the Levites had the custody of the spices of which the ointment was made, yet none but the priests could compound them and make the ointment.

Ver. 31. And Mattithiah, one of the Levites (who was the first-born of Shallum the Korahite), had the set office (or trust) over the things that were made in the pans.] To prepare fine flour and oil for the mincha, or meat-offering that was offered every morning and evening, as we read Lev. ii. 5, 6. The LXX. (who herein follow the Talmudists) will have this peculiarly refer to the mincha offered by the high-priest for himself and his family: which was the tenth part of an ephah; half in the morning, and half in the evening, (Lev. vi. 20, &c.)

Ver. 32. And other of their brethren, of the sons of the Kohathites, were over the shew-bread, to prepare it every sabbath.] When it was set new upon the table in the holy place, and the old taken away. (See upon Exod. xxv. 30.)

Ver. 33. And these are the singers, chief of the fathers of the Levites, who remaining in the chambers were free.] Others of the Levites, and principal persons among them, were appointed to be singers, and attended nothing else: but dwelt in some chambers about the temple, free from all other employment. And the reason why they dwelt there was, that they might not be defiled, and so made unfit at any time for that ministry: and that they might be ready at hand to attend upon it.

For they were employed in that work day and night.] In learning and teaching to sing, and to play upon instruments both wind and stringed: as appears from chap. xxvi. This was wholly a new thing, Moses having ordained nothing concerning singing and music in the house of God, and seems (as it is objected in the book of Cosri) to be contrary to what he commanded, Deut. xii. 32. Thou shalt not add unto it (that is, to the law), nor take from it: but they answer very well, that this command concerned the people only, who were forbidden out of their own heads, as we speak, to innovate any thing, and frame laws to themselves out of their own reasonings. But it did not oblige prophets and Divine men, such as Moses was: and therefore David had authority from God (who had not bound up himself to add nothing) to do what he did; as Solomon afterward had to set up another altar in the midst of the court, upon a special occasion, (2 Chron. vii. 7—9.) and Nehemiah to require but a third part of a shekel of the people, chap. x. 32. (Thus Sepher Cosri, par. iii. sect. 11, 12.)

Ver. 34. These chief fathers of the Levites were chief throughout their generations.] These were principal persons, among whose families had always been eminent men, who were chosen for this service.

These dwelt at Jerusalem.] They were settled there, for the greater convenience of attending the morning and evening service at the temple, without much trouble. But these words seem to comprehend a great deal more; viz. that not only these chief of the Levites, but all those whom he hath mentioned from ver. 3. unto this verse, lived at Jerusalem, and came back with Zerubbabel.

Ver. 35. And in Gibeon dwelt the father of Gibeon, Jehiel, whose wife's name was Maachah.] From hence to the end of the chapter the same genealogy is set down again, which we had in the foregoing chapter, (ver. 29, 30, &c.) and in the same words: and therefore I shall not here transcribe them. Of this I can give no account, but that this narrative of the descent and family of Saul is repeated, the better to join the following history to it, concerning the death of that king. But if we could give no account of it, Conradus Pellicanus thinks it is not irreligious to acknowledge that in these Jewish genealogies, which are very long and useless to us, some errors may have crept in by the negligence of transcribers. Who, in copying of them might not attend sometimes, but be drowsy, as we are apt to be, when we are about any tedious work and not very profitable, in which, if there be any error, the church suffers no damage by it. But there is no need of this.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. NOW the Philistines fought against Israel; and the men of Israel fled before the Philistines, and fell down slain in Mount Gilboa.] This verse, and those that follow to ver. 13. have been explained upon 1 Sam. xxxi. where the same history is related; in the same words, and with very little difference. And it is repeated here, to make way for the history of David (which is mainly intended in the rest of this book), who, by Saul's death, was advanced to the crown.

Ver. 2. And the Philistines followed hard after Saul, and after his sons; and the Philistines slew Jonathan, and Abinadab, and Malchi-shua, the sons of Saul.

Ver. 3. And the battle went sore against Saul, and the archers hit him, and he was wounded of the archers.

Ver. 4. Then said Saul to his armour-bearer, Draw thy sword, and thrust me through therewith, lest these uncircumcised come and abuse me. But his armour-bearer would not, for he was sore afraid. So Saul took a sword, and fell upon it.

Ver. 5. And when his armour-bearer saw that Saul was dead, he fell likewise on the sword, and died.

Ver. 6. So Saul died, and his three sons, and all his house died together.] That is, all that were present with him in the battle: and his family had such a blow by their fall, that it never recovered itself. For though Ish-bosheth reigned over a part of the country, yet it was not in any splendour: such a deadly wound being given to the house of Saul, that it did not long survive him in the kingly authority.

Ver. 7. And when all the men of Israel that were in the valley saw that they fled, and that Saul and his sons were dead, then they forsook their cities, and fled: and the Phi- listines came and dwelt in them.] By the valley is meant the towns in the open country, which were not fortified. (See 1 Sam. xxxi. 7.)

Ver. 8. And it came to pass on the morrow, when the Philistines came to strip the slain, that they found Saul and his sons fallen in Mount Gilboa.

Ver. 9. And when they had stripped him, they took his head.] Which they cut off from his body, as we read 1 Sam. xxxi. 9.

And his armour, and sent into the land of the Philistines round about, to carry tidings unto their idols, and to the people.] That public thanksgiving might be given by them to their gods for this victory.

Ver. 10. And they put his armour in the house of their gods.] In the temple of Ashtaroth, as the same book tells us, (1 Sam. xxxi. 10.)

And fastened his head in the temple of Dagon.] These two, Dagon and Ashtaroth, were the principal gods of the country of the Philistines; unto whom they sent these trophies of their victory. And the place forenamed informs us where they fastened his body, after they had separated his head from it, and stripped off the skin and the hair; for the Hebrew word signifies a skull.

Ver. 11. And when all Jabesh-Gilead heard all that the Philistines had done to Saul.] By Jabesh-Gilead, is meant the people of the city, and of the territory round about it.

Ver. 12. They arose, all the valiant men, and took away the body of Saul, and the bodies of his sons, and brought them to Jabesh, and buried their bones under the oak in Jabesh, and fasted seven days.] This was a noble instance of their courage, and of their love and gratitude to their prince: who had some excellent qualities in him, and had highly obliged this city in the beginning of his reign: as I have observed on the book of Samuel. If we may believe Josephus, there was a law among the Jews, that they who killed themselves should be denied burial: for this was all the punishment that could be inflicted on them after they were dead, for so great a sin. Yet David highly approved this fact of the men of Jabesh-Gilead, who buried Saul: and therefore the Jews make this exception to the rule, That if they killed themselves merely to avoid that reproach which might be cast upon them if they lived, they might be buried: and they instance in Samson and Saul. Who they fancy repented of his many sins, after Samuel had appeared to him, and told him of his sad fate. But the two following verses seem to contradict this. (See Grotius, in his book de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 19. sect. 5.)

Ver. 13. So Saul died for his transgression which he committed against the Lord, even against the word of the Lord, which he kept not, and also for asking counsel of one that had a familiar spirit, to inquire of it.] His two great transgressions (one against the express order and command of God by Samuel, and the other against a known law of Moses) were his sparing the Amalekites, and his consulting the witch of Endor: which were plain proofs that he did not mind God, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 14. And inquired not of the Lord.] He did not regard him as he ought to have done: for otherwise he did inquire of him, (1 Sam. xxviii. 6.) but not with a religious mind.

Therefore he slew him, and turned the kingdom unto David the son of Jesse.] Kingdoms are never translated from one family to another, but injustice and impiety go before, as Grotius here notes. Which the son of Sirach expresses admirably, Ecclus. x. 8. "Because of unrighteous dealings, injuries, and riches got by deceit, the kingdom is translated from one people to another."

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. THEN.] That is, after the death of Ish-bosheth: for many things passed after the death of Saul which are here omitted. As, the coming of the Amalekite to David with the news of it; his lamentation over Saul and Jonathan; his anointing at Hebron over the tribe of Judah; the death of Abner, and then of Ish-bosheth. After which this author relates the promotion of David to be king of all the tribes of Israel, by the full consent of all the people.

All Israel gathered themselves together to David unto Hebron, saying, Behold, we are thy bone and thy flesh.] By all Israel is meant the elders of all their tribes, 2 Sam. v. 1. where this verse is explained.

Ver. 2. And moreover, in time past, when Saul was king, thou wast he that leddest out and broughtest in Israel; and the Lord thy God said unto thee, Thou shalt feed my people Israel, and thou shalt be ruler over my people Israel.] See 2 Sam. v. 2. where there are the very same words.

Ver. 3. Therefore came all the elders of Israel to the king to Hebron; and David made a covenant with them in Hebron, before the Lord; and they anointed David king over Israel.] See there, 2 Sam. v. 3.

According to the word of the Lord by Samuel.] These words are added unto those in the book of Samuel, to shew how the people came to know that God told David (as they say in the foregoing verse) he should govern Israel. Samuel declared it to him, and published it, no doubt, among the people.

Ver. 4. And David and all Israel went to Jerusalem, which is Jebus.] See concerning this place, Judg. xix. 10.

Where the Jebusites were, the inhabitants of the land.] See 2 Sam. v. 6.

Ver. 5. And the inhabitants of Jebus said to David, Thou shalt not come hither. Nevertheless David took the castle of Zion, which is the city of David.] The insolent language of the Jebusites is recorded more largely in 2 Sam. v. 6. where see what I have noted.

Ver. 6. And David said, Whosoever smiteth the Jebusites first shall be chief and captain. So Joab the son of Zeruiah went up first, and was chief.] It is evident Joab was before this in a great station, commanding all the forces of Judah; as may be gathered from 2 Sam. ii. 13, 14. and iii. 22, 23. But now he was a commander-in-chief of all the forces both of Judah and Israel; which made him very powerful: or, perhaps, Abishai being his elder brother, was general of the forces before; and this place gives an account how Joab came to have the pre-eminence, by this great achievement.

Ver. 7. And David dwelt in the castle; therefore they called it The city of David.] Because here he chose to have his constant residence: in order to which he enlarged and adorned it with many buildings, as it here follows.

Ver. 8. And he built the city round about, even from Millo round about.] See 2 Sam. v. 9.

And Joab repaired the rest of the city.] He repaired, perhaps, the fortifications, which had been, in the time of the siege, much shattered. And, as Conradus Pellicanus thinks, built some houses, for the quartering of his soldiers.

Ver. 9. So David waxed greater and greater: for the Lord of hosts was with him.] The Word of the Lord was his help, as the Targum expresses it. (See 2 Sam. v. 10.)

Ver. 10. These also are the chief of the mighty men whom David had, who strengthened themselves with him in his kingdom.] Having touched upon David's promotion to the throne, and his settlement in Zion, he next thought fit to relate who those valiant men were that assisted him in his advancement, and helped to establish him in his authority. They were such, in all likelihood, as had accompanied him during his persecution, when they gave David many proofs of their valour and affection, as they also did afterward.

And with all Israel, to make him king.] A great many of the Israelites, as is related in the next chapter, came to David before the death of Saul, believing he was designed by God to be their king.

According to the word of the Lord concerning Israel.] That David should be king over all Israel: which word was delivered by Samuel, and known to all the people, as well as to Saul and Jonathan.

Ver. 11. And this is the number of the mighty men whom David had; Jashobeam, an Hachmonite, the chief of the captains: he lifted up his spear against three hundred, slain by him at one time.] I have explained this upon 2 Sam. xxiii. 8. where I observed, how Kimchi reconciles this place to that, which saith he slew eight hundred. But I now think it plainer to say, That he slew three hundred with his own hand, and thereby routed the enemy, and put them to flight, in which five hundred more were killed in the pursuit. All which might be said to be slain by him; because the slaughter he made was the cause the rest were slain. Or, as Mayerus (upon Seder Olam) interprets it; After he had slain three hundred, he was so little tired, that he slew as many more as made eight hundred.

Ver. 12. And after him was Eleazar the son of Dodo the Ahohite.] The son of Ahothi, as Kimchi understands it; for this is not the name of a country, but of a family.

Who was one of the three mighties.] See 2 Sam. xxiii. 9.

Ver. 13. He was with David at Pas-dammim.] The same with Ephes-dammin, 1 Sam. xvii. 1.

And there the Philistines were gathered together to battle, where was a parcel of ground full of barley; and the people fled from before the Philistines.

Ver. 14. And they set themselves in the midst of that parcel, and delivered it, and slew the Philistines; and the Lord saved them by a great deliverance.] All this is related, and hath been explained in 2 Sam. xxiii. 9—12.

Ver. 15. Now three of the thirty captains went down to the rock to David, into the cave of Adullam; and the host of the Philistines encamped in the valley of Rephaim.] See there, ver. 13.

Ver. 16. And David was then in the hold, and the Philistines' garrison was then at Beth-lehem.] See there, ver. 14.

Ver. 17. And David longed, and said, Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well of Beth-lehem, that is at the gate!] See ver. 15. He did not desire any one should venture to fetch him some of this water, but in a very hot day, said, as we sometimes do, What would I not give for a draught of those cool and refreshing waters! which he remembered he had drunk of freely in his youth.

Ver. 18. And the three brake through the host of the Philistines, and drew water out of the well of Beth-lehem, that was by the gate, and took it, and brought it to David: but David would not drink of it, but poured it out to the Lord.

Ver. 19. And said, My God forbid it me, that I should do this thing. Shall I drink the blood of these men that have put their lives in jeopardy? for with the jeopardy of their lives they brought it: therefore he would not drink it. These things did these three mighties.] See all this explained in that place, ver. 16, 17.

Ver. 20. And Abishai the brother of Joab, he was chief of the three: for lifting up his spear against three hundred, he slew them, and had a name among the three.] See 2 Sam. xxiii. 18. There are but two here mentioned; the third, Abarbinel thinks, was Adina the son of Shiza, mentioned ver. 42. who is said to be a captain of the Reubenites, and thirty with him.

Ver. 21. Of the three he was more honourable than the two, for he was their captain.] Perhaps he was the first, and led them on, in that bold exploit at Beth-lehem.

Howbeit he attained not unto the first three.] But came short of them in their great achievements.

Ver. 22. Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, the son of a valiant man of Kabziel, who had done many acts; he slew two lion-like men of Moab: also he went down and slew a lion in a pit in a snowy day.] See 2 Sam. xxiii. 20.

Ver. 23. And he slew an Egyptian, a man of great stature, five cubits high, &c.] The country of Egypt was famous for men of vast bigness, as we learn from Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 130. 143. 153. 175, 176. See Huetius, in his Quæstiones Alnetanæ, lib. ii. p. 180. where he observes, out of Pliny, that in Ethiopia there was a people that were eight cubits high, (lib. vi. cap. 30. lib. vii. cap. 2.)

Ver. 24. These things did Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, and had the name among the three mighties.] See all this explained in the forenamed book, 2 Sam. xxiii. 21, 22.

Ver. 25. Behold, he was honourable among the thirty, but attained not to the first three.] He sets a mark of honour upon him as a man of great reputation among the thirty, though he did not rise up to the pitch of the first three, nor of Abishai, though it is likely he excelled the third. (See there, ver. 23.)

And David set him over his guard.] The Cherethites and Pelethites. Or, as some take it, he made him president of his council, as the Hebrew word imports (so Kimchi), there being a rare conjunction in him of wisdom with valour.

Ver. 26. Also the valiant men of the armies were Asahel the brother of Joab, Elhanan the son of Dodo of Beth-lehem.] See there, ver. 24. These were chief commanders in the army, either colonels, as we speak, or captains; and they were under the command of the three foregoing great men, who were over them, as they were over the soldiers. But these great men were below the first three: who are said, in the tenth verse of this chapter, to be mighty men to David (as the words are in the Hebrew), because they attended upon him continually, as the keepers of his body, and had no other command.

Ver. 27. Shammoth the Harorite, Helez the Pelonite.] See 2 Sam. xxiii. 25.

Ver. 28. Ira the son of Ikkesh the Tekoite, Abi-ezer the Antothite.] See there, ver. 26. All the rest that follow are mentioned in that chapter of the second book of Samuel, with some difference in their names, as I have there noted. Some others also are added, being men of great note, though not equal to the abovenamed. Particularly he relates who were the chief commanders, in the borders of the kingdom beyond Jordan, (ver. 42, &c.) This appears by the names of their country, which was beyond that river.

There is a little difficulty in the thirty-eighth verse, where Joel, who is called Igal in 2 Sam. xxiii. 36. (there being nothing more common than such alterations in names), is said to be the brother of Nathan: which seems not to consist with what is said in the other place, that he was the son of Nathan. But the account of this is easy, for he might be both, if he was his adopted son, for want of children: the word son often signifying no more than a nephew, as the word brother doth one near of kin. As for the rest of the variations, Conradus Pellicanus resolves, that we need not trouble ourselves about the errors of transcribers, which we may acknowledge, in such matters as these, without any prejudice to faith, truth, or good manners. So he concludes this chapter.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. NOW these are they that came to David to Ziklag, while he yet kept himself close because of Saul the son of Kish; and they were among the mighty men, helpers of the war.] This author thought fit to do those the honour of being remembered (which is omitted in the book of Samuel), who came and joined themselves to David, when he was in exile: and were afterward very assistant to him in his wars. They are said to come to him, while he kept himself close because of Saul: because they pitying David's condition, who was forced to skulk in secret places to secure himself from Saul's fury, designed to help him, and it is likely left their habitations, and went to seek him: though they did not actually join him till he came to Ziklag.

Ver. 2. They were armed with bows, and could use both the right hand and the left.] Which gave them a great advantage in war: and made them more valuable soldiers. (See Judg. xx. 16.)

In hurling stones, and shooting arrows out of a bow.] They were excellent slingers as well as archers.

Even of Saul's brethren of Benjamin.] There was some extraordinary cause which moved some of Saul's kindred, as well as of his tribe, to desert him, and go over to David. Either the great virtue of David attracted them, or they abhorred to see an innocent person so violently persecuted; or, perhaps, they were pious persons, who had a great regard to the words of Samuel, concerning David's right to the kingdom.

Ver. 3. The chief was Ahiezer, then Joash, the sons of Shemaah the Gibeathite, and Jeziel and Pelet, the sons of Azmaveth, and Berachah, and Jehu the Antothite.] There is mention before of Azmaveth, (chap. viii. 36.) as descended from Micah the son of Mephibosheth, the grandson of Saul.

Ver. 4. And Ismaiah the Gibeonite, a mighty man among the thirty, and over the thirty.] I suppose there were thirty Benjamites came over to David at one time, and this was their leader.

And Jeremiah, and Jahaziel, and Johanan, and Jozabad the Gederathite.

Ver. 5. Eluzai, and Jerimoth, and Bealiah, and Shemariah, and Shephatiah the Haruphite.

Ver. 6. Elkanah, and Jesiah, and Azareel, and Joezer, and Jashobeam, the Korhites.

Ver. 7. And Joelah, and Zebadiah, the sons of Jeroham of Gedor.] These were the principal persons among the thirty, mentioned ver. 4. the rest, perhaps, were not of such note.

Ver. 8. And of the Gadites there separated themselves.] From their countrymen and families, which they left to follow David.

Unto David, into the hold of the wilderness.] There are several holds, or inaccessible places mentioned, where David secured himself from Saul's persecution. (See 1 Sam. xxii. 4. xxiii. 14. xxiv. 22.) But some think he still speaks of those that came to David at Ziklag: which may be called a hold, they think, as the city of David is, chap. xi. 7. because he fortified it.

Men of might, and men of war fit for the battle, that could handle shield and buckler.] Under these are comprehended all weapons of war, which they could manage skilfully; being bred to it, and wanting no courage to engage any enemy.

Whose faces were like the faces of lions, and were as swift as the roes upon the mountains.] They had a fierceness in their countenances, which terrified their enemies; who durst not look them in their face, but ran away as soon as they saw them. But they could not save themselves by flight, being pursued so swiftly by these men, that they overtook them and slew them. Bochart observes out of Aristotle, that lions have faces more like men than any other creatures, but very stern and terrible.

Ver. 9. Ezer the first, Obadiah the second, Eliab the third.] They are reckoned up thus distinctly, according to the dignity and precedence which they had in their own country; or according to the order wherein they came to David.

Ver. 10. Mishmannah the fourth, Jeremiah the fifth.

Ver. 11. Attai the sixth, Eliel the seventh.

Ver. 12. Johanan the eighth, Elzabad the ninth.

Ver. 13. Jeremiah the tenth, Machbanai the eleventh.

Ver. 14. These were of the sons of Gad, captains of the host: one of the least was over a hundred, and the greatest over a thousand.] They did not bring a host of men with them, but they had been commanders of the army in their own country. Or, when David came to the crown, he thought them worthy to be preferred, and the lowest of them was made a centurion.

Ver. 15. These are they that went over Jordan in the first month, when it had overflown all his banks.] This is an instance of their fearless valour, that they ventured over Jordan in the most dangerous season: and perhaps swam over, when the stream was most rapid and violent, to help their brethren. (See Josh. iii. 15.)

And they put to flight all them of the valleys, both towards the east and towards the west.] When Saul was engaged to attend the motions of the Philistines, it is likely some people both of the eastern and western countries, which bordered upon Jordan, laid hold of this opportunity to invade and spoil the land thereabout; which moved these men to go to their relief, and God gave them a great victory over them. Where these valleys lay, and what enemies these men encountered, is no where recorded.

Ver. 16. And there came of the children of Benjamin and Judah to the hold unto David.] Besides those of Saul's kindred beforementioned, there were others of that tribe, together with some of Judah, who came to him when he was in the hold, mentioned ver. 8. which I conjectured might be Ziklag; but I rather think it was some of the holds he was in, when he lay in the wilderness.

Ver. 17. And David went out to meet them.] They were so considerable, either for their number, or quality, that David went out (attended, no doubt, with some of his men) to meet them, before they came to the hold.

And answered and said unto them.] After the first salutation which they made him, he replied in the following words.

If ye be come peaceably unto me to help me, my heart shall be knit unto you.] As much as to say, If you be really friends, you are welcome, and I will make a league with you.

But if ye be come to betray me to mine enemies, seeing there is no wrong in my hands, the God of our fathers look thereon, and rebuke it.] He knew himself to be so innocent, both with respect to Saul and all other men, whom he had no way injured, that he doubted not God would protect him, and do him right against these men, if they came with bad intentions to him. What should make him suspect there might possibly be some treachery designed, is not now to be known. Perhaps some had before this come with pretences of great kindness to him, whom he had found to be false: which made him now more cautious whom he entertained.

Ver. 18. Then the spirit came upon Amasai, who was chief of the captains.] The spirit of power, saith the Targum: that is, God powerfully moved him with an heroical boldness, and resolution, in the name of them all, to profess their fidelity to David, in such pathetical words, as convinced him they were friends. Rasi compares with this those words in Judg. vi. 34. But none hath discoursed so well upon these words as Maimonides, who observes, that by the spirit in such places as this, is not to be understood a power to speak or declare any thing; but only to excite those who felt it, to do some excellent thing either for particular persons, or the whole church. With this power Moses was endued, when he came to man's estate, and was moved to smite the Egyptian, who injured one of his brethren. Which power did not leave him, but remained still with him when he fled into Midian. (See Exod. ii. 17.) This power exerted itself in David after he was anointed, 1 Sam. xv. 13. xvii. 34. (See More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 45.)

And he said, Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse.] He seems to have broken out into this speech with a sudden violence, being unable to hear with patience their fidelity questioned. For the words and he said, are not in the Hebrew text; nor those are we: but only, thine David, &c. Which is a broken speech, expressing great passion.

Peace, peace be unto thee, and peace be to thine helpers.] He most affectionately wishes all happiness to him, and to all that came to his assistance: which implies a desire they might not prosper, if they did not now sincerely come to his help.

For thy God helpeth thee.] God they saw was on his side, who, by his marvellous deliverances of him, had shewn he had a special affection to him, and care of him: and therefore they believed would bless those that came to his help.

Then David received them, and made them captains of the band.] He preferred them to considerable commands in his army, when he came to be king: for it is not likely he would set them above those, who had served him all the time of his exile; they being but new comers.

Ver. 19. And there fell some of Manasseh to David, when he came with the Philistines against Saul to battle; but they helped them not.] It seems they offered their service to David, when he was going with the Philistines to help them against Saul, in the last battle which he fought. This shews a strange zeal for David, and abhorrence of Saul's enmity to him, that they should then join their forces with him, when he took part with the Philistines. But neither they, nor the rest of David's men were admitted to fight in that battle.

For the lords of the Philistines, upon advertisement, sent him away, saying, He will fall to his master Saul to the jeopardy of our heads.] First kill them, and then flee to Saul and make his peace with him, at the cost of their heads. (See 1 Sam. xxix. 3, &c.)

Ver. 20. As he went to Ziklag, there fell to him of Manasseh, Adnah, and Jozabad, and Jediael, and Michael, and Jozabad, and Elihu, and Zilthai, captains of the thousands that were of Manasseh.] These came to him, in that nick of time, when he went from the Philistines, in his return to Ziklag. Which fell out very opportunely, for they being valiant men, assisted him against that band of robbers, the Amalekites, who had burnt Ziklag, and carried captive their wives and children. He had indeed only six hundred men with him in that expedition, but these were of the number, who, as it follows, did him great service in recovery of his losses.

Ver. 21. And they helped David against the band of the rovers; for they were all mighty men of valour.] They were not at all disheartened, when they found David in such exceeding great distress; but being most valiant captains, offered their service to him in the pursuit of his enemies.

And were captains in the host.] In their own country they had been commanders of a company of men; many of which, it is likely, they brought over to David with them: or, they followed after them, as is intimated in the following words.

Ver. 22. For at that time, day by day, there came to David to help him.] After the battle wherein Saul was slain, so many resorted to him every day, that his forces grew very considerable.

Until it was a great host, like the host of God.] A very formidable host. Which he compares to the host of heaven (the stars or the angels), because they were numerous, and many of them illustrious persons.

Ver. 23. And these are the numbers of the bands that were ready armed to the war, and came to David to Hebron.] The great resort to him at Ziklag, mentioned in the foregoing verse, made greater numbers flock to him, when by God's direction he went to Hebron: and they brought their arms with them, that they might be ready to fight for him.

To turn the kingdom of Saul to him, according to the word of the Lord.] They remembered what Samuel had said, and resolved to anoint him king, (2 Sam. ii. 4.)

Ver. 24. The children of Judah, that bare shield and spear, were six thousand and eight hundred ready armed to the war.] In the place beforenamed we read, the men of Judah came and anointed him king: which signifies the whole tribe consented to it. Therefore these six thousand and eight hundred men were only the first that came, and perhaps appeared in the name of the rest.

Ver. 25. Of the children of Simeon, mighty men of valour for the war, seven thousand and one hundred.] Though David was anointed king only over the tribe of Judah (one of Saul's posterity reigning over Israel), yet some of other tribes came and owned David for their king; particularly a great number of the tribe of Simeon, who were near neighbours to Judah.

Ver. 26. Of the children of Levi, four thousand and six hundred.] Those came out of several tribes, into which they were dispersed; yet all agreed to shew their affection to David.

Ver. 27. And Jehoiada was the leader of the Aaronites.] He was not the high-priest, for Abiathar held that place: but he was chief, as Jarchi thinks, of one of the courses of the priests; and now the chief commander of those of the family of Aaron, who came to invite David to take the government upon him. He was a man of war also, and brought these priests armed with him: for it is said, of all that came to David to Hebron, (ver. 23.) that they were ready armed for the war, in case any should oppose their design. (See Selden, de Succession. ad Pontificatum, lib. i. cap. 3.)

And with him were three thousand and seven hundred.] Besides those of the Levites beforenamed.

Ver. 28. And Zadok, a young man mighty of valour, and of his father's house twenty-and-two captains.] It is likely, he is the same person who was made high-priest in Solomon's time, who was now very young, but had a great deal of courage; whom two-and-twenty of his family followed, who were commanders of so many companies.

Ver. 29. And of the children of Benjamin, the kindred of Saul, three thousand.] We read of several of this tribe, and of Saul's kindred, that came to David before this, (ver. 1, 2. 16.) but now a greater number came over to him; which shews his interest to be considerably grown among them.

For hitherto the greatest part of them had kept the ward of the house of Saul.] But still a multitude of them (as it is in the Hebrew) adhered to the house of Saul, and endeavoured to keep the crown in that family. And, as Solomon Jarchi, and D. Kimchi, and others, understand it, the three thousand beforementioned, being of Saul's kindred, were of that mind, looking upon his grandson as the lawful heir of the kingdom, who ought to succeed in it. But now they altered their opinion, and came to David.

Ver. 30. And of the children of Ephraim twenty thousand and eight hundred, mighty men of valour, famous throughout the house of their fathers.] This was so great a number, that by their defection from the house of Saul, it must needs be extremely weakened; especially since they were men of such great account in that tribe.

Ver. 31. And of the half tribe of Manasseh eighteen thousand.] He speaks of those on this side Jordan, for of those beyond it on the other side he speaks afterward, (ver. 37.)

Which were expressed by name, to come and make David king.] These were appointed to go in the name of the rest of their brethren, and assure David of their affection to him; being picked (as we speak) out of the whole tribe, for this purpose. And some think the names of these men were set down in the public register of the kings of Judah: from which this author transcribed it.

Ver. 32. And of the children of Issachar, which were men that had understanding of the times.] The Targum, and many of the Jews (particularly Maimonides in Rosch Hashanah), take this to signify their skill, in computing the beginning of their years, and months, and intercalations, that it might be certainly known when their feasts were to be celebrated. Others think they were great astronomers; whence the Hebrew doctors say, that the name of this tribe was engraven in the sapphire in the high-priest's breastplate, and that their banner was of a sky colour, having the figures of the sun, moon, and stars, wrought in it, because of their skill in the motions of the heavenly bodies. Others take it to signify their skill in the weather, whereby they knew the proper season for sowing, planting, reaping, and navigation. Many such-like fancies there are, which seem impertinent to the present business, which required men of great abilities in political affairs, who could discern what was fit to be done in the various cases of human life, and particularly what was good for the commonwealth in all turns of affairs. Thus Solomon Jarchi himself: "They knew how to advise and give counsel, according to the nature and circumstances of all cases: which sort of men David stood in great need of at this time, to consult the best means to confirm him in his kingdom."

To know what Israel ought to do.] These words shew they were men skilful in secular affairs: and now, I suppose, told the Israelites it was the proper time to think of David, and make him their king; after the Philistines had gained so great a victory over Saul, and destroyed his family. For none was so likely to quell the Philistines as he, who had so often beaten them.

The heads of them were two hundred; and all their brethren were at their commandment.] These two hundred were eminent persons among them; and were of such known wisdom and judgment, that they had all the rest of their tribe at their beck.

Ver. 33. Of Zebulun, such as went forth to battle, expert in war, with all instruments of war, fifty thousand.] This is the greatest number of any tribe that went over to David; that is, gave him assurance of their readiness to assist him to make him king of Israel. For it is not likely, that so many as are here mentioned went to Hebron, as soon as David came thither.

Which could keep rank.] Men well disciplined; or, as some understand it, men that would stand their ground, and not flinch when they were assaulted by their enemies.

They were not of double heart.] But all sincerely affected to David, though there were so many of them. Thus some understand it; but others think, it rather relates to the foregoing words, that they had not a counterfeit courage, but would stand to it (as we speak) with a firm resolution, to die rather than stagger in their undertaking. For this is affirmed of them all, that they came with a perfect heart unto David, (ver. 38.) and therefore needs not to be said of these in particular, there being no reason to suspect their loyalty.

Ver. 34. And of Naphtali a thousand captains, and with them, with shield and spear, thirty and seven thousand.

Ver. 35. And of the Danites, expert in war, twenty and eight thousand and six hundred.

Ver. 36. And of Asher, such as went forth to battle, expert in war, forty thousand.

Ver. 37. And on the other side of Jordan, of the Reubenites, and of the Gadites, and of the half tribe of Manasseh, with all manner of instruments of war for the battle, a hundred and twenty thousand.] Here were so many thousands of valiant men, expert in war, reckoned up in the several tribes of Israel; that Saul could not well have been overthrown in battle by the Philistines, if God had not forsaken him, and the hearts of his people had not been alienated from him.

Ver. 38. All these men of war, that could keep rank, came with a perfect heart to Hebron, to make David king over all Israel: and all the rest of Israel were of one heart to make David king.] After the death of Ish-hosheth (see 2 Sam. v.) all Israel, " communi consilio," with one consent, (as Maimonides explains this phrase, with one heart, More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 39.) came and joined with their brethren, who were gone over to him. And they were such a number, men of such undaunted spirits and expert in war, who crowded in to him, that the like is not to be found in any history. For, as Herodotus saith, in his Polyhymnia, in the army of Xerxes there were πολλοὶ μὲν ἄνθρωποι, ὀλίγοι δὲ ἄνδρες, a world of people, but few men; that is, men of courage and conduct; with which David's army so abounded, that every one of this vast number seems to have been fit to command in an army.

Ver. 39. And there they were with David three days, eating and drinking.] The famous historian Dion (as Victorinus Strigelius here observes) saith, he never saw a more splendid and pompous show than that was, when the emperor Severus entered Rome. But here was a far more noble feast, which lasted three days, for three hundred forty-eight thousand and eight hundred brave men.

For their brethren had prepared for them.] They who were before actually gone over to David, and others about Hebron, hearing of such a great concourse of people, had made a preparation for their entertainment.

Ver. 40. Moreover, they that were nigh them, even unto Issachar, and Zebulun, and Naphtali.] All the neighbouring countries brought in provisions for those who dwelt more remote: their common concernments begetting great love and kindness (as there ought always to be, especially on such occasions) for all their brethren, though never so distant from them.

Brought bread on asses, and on camels, and on mules, and on oxen.] Whom they employed, in that country, in carrying burdens; for horses were very scarce among them. So Bochart observes, that they did not only ride upon mules, but some of them were ἀχθοφόροι, employed in carrying burdens, as these were. Others were ζευγῖται, yoked to draw chariots, (lib. ii. Hieroz. par. i. cap. 19.) The same he observes of oxen, that though they seem made rather for the plough, yet they made them serve for the other purpose also, of bearing burdens.

And meat, meal, cakes of figs, and bunches of raisins, and wine, and oil, and oxen, and sheep abundantly.] All sort of provisions for a great feast.

For there was joy in Israel.] Their hearts were enlarged with joy to see an end of their division, by their union under such a king; as they might reasonably hope would procure great happiness to them.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. AND David consulted with the captains of thousands and hundreds, and with every leader.] With all the principal persons in authority, who had any command over others. For it is a dangerous thing for a prince, especially in the beginning of his reign, to rely wholly upon himself alone, and not advise with others.

Ver. 2. And David said unto all the congregation of Israel.] Who were represented by those great men, whom he had called together for their advice.

If it seem good unto you, and that it be of the Lord our God.] Whom, I suppose, he intended to consult, as well as them.

Let us send abroad unto our brethren every where, that are left in the land of Israel.] Who were not there present.

And with them also the priests and Levites which are in the cities and suburbs, that they may gather themselves unto us.] Whose assistance was very necessary, in the sacred work which he intended.

Ver. 3. And let us bring again the ark of our God to us.] In the book of Samuel this is said to have been done after that which here follows, in the next chapter, concerning Hiram and David's wars with the Philistines; and so it was. Only David (as became a good king, whose first care is about religion) took advice with the elders of the people, as soon as he came to the crown, concerning the bringing up the ark of God. Which was put in execution afterward, when they had gone to their several countries, and spoken with the people about it; and a time was appointed for their meeting to do it. In the mean time Hiram sent his ambassadors to him, and the Philistines came twice to disturb him, and were beaten by him; and then all the people met in a vast number (it is probable at some solemn festival) to bring the ark to its place.

For we inquired not at it in the days of Saul.] They were not solicitous in his days to find a fit place for the residence of the ark of God, where they might conveniently attend upon his worship and service. For they were hindered by perpetual wars, and contented themselves with going to Gibeon, where the tabernacle was; though without the presence of God in it. But it is probable, that Saul, after David fled from him, and he was haunted by that evil spirit, that oft came upon him, grew so profane that he was not concerned about religion. So the words are in the Hebrew, We inquired not of it, or about it.

Ver. 4. And all the congregation said that they would do so: for the thing was right in the eyes of all the people.]

They were convinced of their negligence, and piously disposed to comply with the king's desire.

Ver. 5. So David gathered all Israel together.] Some chosen persons out of all the tribes, with their attendants (who represented all the rest): which were thirty thousand, (2 Sam. vi. 1.)

From Shihor of Egypt even to the entering of Hemath.] The former of these, Shihor, was the southern bounds, as Hemath was the northern of the land of Canaan. And by Sihor (called in other places the river of Egypt) the Targum, and most of the Jews, even Abarbinel himself, understand the river Nile. But there is great reason to take it for a little branch of that river, as I have shewn upon Gen. xv. 18. and see upon Numb. xxxiv. 5. Josh. xiii. 3.

To bring the ark of God from Kirjath-jearim.] Where it had been a long time, ever since it returned out of the land of the Philistines. (See 1 Sam. vi. ult. vii. 1.)

Ver. 6. And David went up, and all Israel, to Baalah, that is, to Kirjath-jearim, which belonged to Judah, to bring up thence the ark of the Lord, that dwelleth between the cherubims, whose name is called on it.] See 2 Sam. vi. 1.

Ver. 7. And they carried the ark of God in a new cart out of the house of Abinadab: and Uzza and Ahio drave the cart.] They had so long been without it, that they had forgot how it ought to be carried. (See 2 Sam. vi. 3.)

Ver. 8. And David and all Israel played before God with all their might, and with singing, and with harps, and with psalteries, and with timbrels, and with cymbals, and with trumpets.] See there, ver. 5.

Ver. 9. And when they came to the threshing-floor of Chidon, Uzza put forth his hand to hold the ark; for the oxen stumbled.

Ver. 10. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzza, and he smote him, because he put forth his hand to the ark: and there he died before God.

Ver. 11. And David was displeased, because the Lord had made a breach upon Uzza: wherefore that place is called Perez-uzza to this day.] All this hath been explained in the forenamed place, ver. 6—8.

Ver. 12. And David was afraid of God that day, saying, How shall I bring the ark of God home to me?] See there, ver. 9. It is an old observation, that "pœna ad unum, metus ad plures pervenit;" punishment falls upon one, the fear of it falls upon all: which justifies the severity of God, as not contrary to his mercy, in such cases.

Ver. 13. So David brought not the ark home to himself to the city of David, but carried it aside into the house of Obed-Edom the Gittite.] See there also, ver. 10.

Ver. 14. And the ark of God remained with the family of Obed-Edom in his house three months. And the Lord blessed the house of Obed-Edom, and all that he had.] See there, ver. 11. The Targum here pretends to give us an account how God blessed this family, by increasing it prodigiously with a numerous issue; of which the Jews were so desirous, that they could think of no greater blessing. For his wife and eight daughters (says that paraphrast), the wives of his sons, brought each of them at one birth eight sons: so that fathers and sons made up fourscore and one. But though history acquaints us with wondrous births of many children at a time, yet there is no ground to believe this of so many in one family.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. NOW Hiram king of Tyre sent messengers to David, and timber of cedars, with masons and carpenters, to build him a house.

Ver. 2. And David perceived that the Lord had confirmed him king over Israel; for his kingdom was lifted up on high, because of his people Israel.] See both these verses explained in 2 Sam. v. 11, 12. where the same thing is related, almost in the same words.

Ver. 3. And David took more wives at Jerusalem; and David begat more sons and daughters.] After he came from Hebron, and had possessed himself of Jerusalem, he took more wives and concubines also, as we read 2 Sam. v. 13. But they are all here called wives, for so they were: though not principal wives (as Pellicanus notes); that is, not such as governed the family, for that the concubines did not.

Ver. 4. Now these are the names of his children which he had in Jerusalem: Shammua, and Shobab, Nathan, and Solomon.

Ver. 5. And Ibhar, and Elishua, and Elpalet.

Ver. 6. And Nogah, and Nepheg, and Japhia.

Ver. 7. And Elishama, and Beeliada, and Eliphalet.] In 2 Sam. v. 14—16. there are but eleven mentioned, whereas here are thirteen; of which I gave some account in that place. To which I shall here add, that some of them died in their childhood, which are reckoned here, but not in the other place. For here are two Eliphalets, the first of which dying young, the last was so called to preserve his memory. So Kimchi writes very judiciously; perhaps neither the first Eliphalet, nor Nogah, are mentioned in the book of Samuel, because they were not then living, but they are recorded here: because the author of this book proposed to himself to give an account of all David's sons born at Jerusalem, as he saith ver. 4. As for the difference between Elpalet ver. 5. and Eliphalet in this verse, Simeon de Muis hath well observed, it ought not to make any one think there is an error either here or in any other place: for that king of France who is commonly called Clodovæus, is called, by Cassiodore Luduinus, Ludovicus, and, in Hincmar, Hludovicus: such differences there are in the pronunciation of the same name, the examples of which are infinite, as he speaks in his Varia Sacra.

Ver. 8. And when the Philistines heard that David was anointed king over Israel, all the Philistines went up to seek David: and David heard of it, and went out against them.] See 2 Sam. v. 17.

Ver. 9. And the Philistines came and spread themselves in the valley of Rephaim.] This phrase spread themselves, seems to import that they were very numerous, and assured themselves of victory. (See there, ver. 18.)

Ver. 10. And David inquired of God, saying, Shall I go up against the Philistines? and wilt thou deliver them into mine hand? And the Lord said unto him, Go up; for I will deliver them into thine hand.

Ver. 11. So they came up to Baal-perazim, and David smote them there. Then said David, God hath broken in upon mine enemies by mine hand, like the breaking forth of waters: therefore they called the name of that place Baal-perazim.] See these verses explained in 2 Sam. v. 19, 20.

Ver. 12. And when they had left their gods there, David gave a commandment, and they were burnt with fire.] No wonder they could not preserve such gods as could not preserve them. Which David would not honour, as they had done the ark when they took it, but burnt them. (See there, ver. 21.)

Ver. 13. And the Philistines yet again spread themselves abroad in the valley.

Ver. 14. Therefore David inquired again of God; and God said unto him, Go not up after them; turn away from them, and come upon them over against the mulberry-trees.

Ver. 15. And it shall be, when thou shalt hear a sound of going in the tops of the mulberry-trees, that then thou shalt go out to battle: for God is gone forth before thee, to smite the host of the Philistines.

Ver. 16. David therefore did as the Lord commanded him: and they smote the host of the Philistines from Gibeon even to Gazer.] See there, 2 Sam. v. 22—25.

Ver. 17. And the fame of David went out into all lands; and the Lord brought the fear of him upon all nations.] Upon all those upon whom the fame of him came: that is, all the neighbouring countries.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. AND David made him houses in the city of David.] He had need of many houses, because he had many wives and children, as we read before: who could not all well live in one house, unless we suppose it to be very large, and to contain many apartments, which may be called houses.

And prepared a place for the ark of God, and pitched for it a tent.] As we read in 2 Sam. vi. 17. For he did not think fit to bring the tabernacle from Gibeon, because he intended shortly to build a house for the ark. Or, as Conradus Pellicanus thinks, the tabernacle of Moses, having been long neglected, was grown ruinous: and he thought it better to prepare a new tabernacle than repair the old.

Ver. 2. Then David said, None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites: for them hath the Lord chosen to carry the ark of God, and to minister unto him for ever.] The former miscarriage, when they brought up the ark from Kirjath-jearim, had taught him to use it with greater reverence, according to the prescription of the law; which ordered the Levites to carry it upon their shoulders. (See Numb. vi. 15. vii. 9.)

Ver. 3. And David gathered all Israel together to Jerusalem, to bring up the ark of the Lord unto his place which he had prepared for it.] See 2 Sam. vi. 15.

Ver. 4. And David assembled the children of Aaron, and the Levites.] Whom he ordered should be sent for before, when he first attempted to bring up the ark, but we do not read that they came, (chap. xiii. 2. 5.) therefore now he actually got them together.

Ver. 5. Of the sons of Kohath; Uriel the chief, and his brethren a hundred and twenty.] The sons of Kohath are mentioned in Exod. vi. 17, 18. and Uriel is none of them: therefore he was his grandson, who proved so famous, that his descendants are reckoned in the first place.

Ver. 6. Of the sons of Merari; Asaiah the chief, and his brethren two hundred and twenty.

Ver. 7. Of the sons of Gershom; Joel the chief, and his brethren a hundred and thirty.

Ver. 8. Of the sons of Elizaphan; Shemaiah the chief, and his brethren two hundred.] He was the son of Uzziel, the youngest son of Kohath. (See Exod. vi. 18. 23. Numb. iv. 3.)

Ver. 9. Of the sons of Hebron; Eliel the chief, and his brethren fourscore.

Ver. 10. Of the sons of Uzziel; Amminadab the chief, and his brethren a hundred and twelve.] These two last named were the sons of Kohath.

Ver. 11. And David called for Zadok and Abiathar the priests.] I have observed here before, that Zadok was in the greatest favour with David: and therefore is mentioned first, though Abiathar was the high-priest, and Zadok only the second priest. (See upon 2 Sam. xv. 27. 29.)

And for the Levites, for Uriel, Asaiah, and Joel, Shemaiah, and Eliel, and Amminadab.] The six persons mentioned in the foregoing verses.

Ver. 12. And said unto them, Ye are the chief of the fathers of the Levites: sanctify yourselves, both ye and your brethren, that you may bring up the ark of the Lord God of Israel unto the place that I have prepared for it.] This sanctification was by washing their bodies and garments, abstaining from their wives, and other purifications. (See Exod. xix. 10. 15.)

Ver. 13. For because ye did it not at the first, the Lord our God made a breach upon us.] It seems the priests and Levites were not well acquainted with the law; or, the ark having been very long in one place, they had forgot how it ought to be removed: and did not sanctify themselves, and seriously consider their duty. At least, they that were then present (for the chief were not then assembled, as I said ver. 4.) were ignorant, or careless.

For that we sought him not after the due order.] This good king doth not wholly excuse himself, and lay all the blame on them: but puts himself into the number of those who were negligent in this matter. For it was his duty as well as theirs to look into the law, and pray to God for his direction. There were four faults committed: First, in putting the ark into the cart, which should have been carried by the Levites on their shoulders. Secondly, the Levites were not permitted to touch the ark, as Uzza did. Thirdly, he was no Levite, and therefore more grievously offended. (Numb. xvi. 28.) Lastly, he wanted faith, that God would take care of the ark. This last David could not help: but the three first he might have prevented.

Ver. 14. So the priests and the Levites sanctified themselves to bring up the ark of the Lord God of Israel.] From this place, and some others, (as Josh. iii. 3.) Buxtorf truly infers, I think, that all the tribe of Levi had a right to carry the ark, the priests as well as the others. But while they were in the wilderness, they that were bare Levites commonly did it, because the priests were few, and had other employment. But the priests, being Levites, might do it when they pleased, or were appointed to it. (See Histor. Arcæ, cap. 8. sect. 2.)

Ver. 15. And the children of the Levites bare the ark of God upon their shoulders, with the staves thereon, as Moses commanded, according to the word of the Lord.] The children of Kohath had this peculiar privilege: who are the Levites here mentioned, (Numb. iv. 4.)

Ver. 16. And David spake to the chief of the Levites.] To those six persons beforementioned, ver. 5, 6, &c.

To appoint their brethren to be the singers with instruments of music, psalteries, and harps, and cymbals.] They that were chief among them knew who could sing well, and play upon such instruments as are here mentioned: the best of which were to be ordered to perform this service.

Sounding, by lifting up the voice with joy.] Singing so loud that all might hear, and have their hearts lifted up with joy in God. (See 2 Chron. xx. 19.) Here it may be observed, that though David did not build the temple, yet he ordered how the service of God should be performed there, in a more solemn manner than it had been hitherto, with singing and musical instruments. Which began now when the ark was brought to the place prepared for it; and was ordered afterward to be constantly performed every day, (chap. xvi. 4. 42.) And indeed there was scarce any solemn service performed to their gods, either by Greeks or barbarians, without both vocal and instrumental music, as the illustrious Ezekiel Spanhemius hath observed out of Strabo, lib. x. p. 467. See him upon Callimachus's hymn to Diana, ver. 245. where he notes out of Plutarch, that their musical instruments were three (as they were here); and that music was thought to be a thing so heavenly, that their gods were accounted the inventors of the principal instruments of it. (See upon ver. 295.) Certain it is that the Greeks were not the inventors of them, but they had them out of the east, as he shews upon ver. 249. Which appears by the names of some of them, which are plainly extant in the Bible, as Bochartus hath observed.

Ver. 17. So the Levites appointed Heman the son of Joel; and of his brethren, Asaph the son of Berechiah; and of the sons of Merari their brethren, Ethan the son of Kushaiah.] These three were the principal, who were appointed to govern the rest.

Ver. 18. And with them their brethren of the second degree, Zechariah, Ben, and Jaaziel.] The LXX. take Ben for an appellative, and join it with the next, as if he had said, Zechariah the son of Jaaziel. But the Jews take it for a proper name of one of the singers (as we do), and David Kimchi thinks this is the person to whom David directed the ninth psalm, to be sung by him, upon the occasion of the death of Saul; for it is said to be Laben, which he understands to be to Ben the singer.

And Shemiramoth, and Jehiel, and Uni, Eliab, and Benaiah, and Maaseiah, and Mattithiah, and Elipheleh, and Mikneiah, and Obed-Edom, and Jeiel, the porters.] This was the office of these of the second degree; who were also, when their attendance was over, instructed in music, and assisted in it when they were not in the other employment.

Ver. 19. So the singers, Heman, Asaph, and Ethan, were appointed to sound with cymbals of brass.

Ver. 20. And Zechariah, and Aziel, and Shemiramoth, and Jehiel, and Unni, and Eliab, and Maaseiah, and Benaiah.] Here is no mention made of Ben; which some imagine is, because, before they came to execute their office, he fell sick, or died: and Azaziah, who was not mentioned before, came in his room: but was not so eminent as he, and therefore put in the last place.

With psalteries on Alamoth.] Or, with Alamoth. Which being joined with psalteries, is thought by some to be a musical instrument. But Strigelius, from the derivation of the word, thinks that Alamoth signifies that these men sung the bass, as those in the next verse did the treble.

Ver. 21. And Mattithiah, and Elipheleh, and Mikneiah, and Obed-Edom, and Jeiel, and Azaziah, with harps on the Sheminith.] Some take Sheminith to signify a harp with eight strings.

To excel.] The Hebrew word lenatzeach, coming from natzach, to overcome, is thought by Strigelius to signify a voice higher than all the rest.

Ver. 22. And Chenaniah, chief of the Levites.] A principal person among them, but not before mentioned: so that it doth not appear of what family he was.

Was for song.] Or, as it is translated in the margin, was for carriage; that is, for managing of the voice. He taught them how to sing, as the following words tell us, he instructed about the song, because he was skilful. Being a great artist in singing, he was the precentor: for, ver. 27. he is called master of the song. Which Lud. Capellus thinks signifies as much, as that he guided them to keep time, by the elevation of his hand, or of a wand. So the LXX. ἄρχων τῶν ᾠδῶν, who is properly called the precentor among us: who among the ancient Salii was called vates: he being the prime singer while they were dancing; as Gutberletius observes in his book De Saliis, cap. 11.

Ver. 23. And Berechiah and Elkanah were door-keepers for the ark.] Their office at present was to guard the ark as it passed along, that none might touch it.

Ver. 24. And Shebaniah, and Jehoshaphat, and Nethaneel, and Amasai, and Zechariah, and Benaiah, and Eliezer, the priests, did blow with the trumpets before the ark of God.] For this was the office of the priests, as we read in Numb. x. the beginning.

And Obed-Edom and Jehiah were door-keepers for the ark.] When it was settled at Jerusalem, they kept the door of the tent prepared for it; that none might approach it but the high-priest at proper seasons.

Ver. 25. So David, and the elders of Israel, and the captains over thousands, went to bring up the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of the house of Obed-Edom with joy.] With music and dancing. (See 2 Sam. vi. 5. 12. 15.)

Ver. 26. And it came to pass, when God helped the Levites that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, that they offered seven bullocks and seven rams.] Some understand this of the strength that God gave them to carry the ark without fainting, though they went up a steep hill, to settle it in the place where it was to rest. But it is not likely God imposed such great burdens on them in his service, that it was hard to bear them, without an extraordinary assistance. I think the meaning rather is, that he preserved them from committing any error, so that they carried it without offence. Or, as Junius takes it, God gave them ease, and others were ordered to take their place, when they had gone some part of the way. For, though it was not a heavy burden, yet they could not but proceed with fear and trembling, lest they should incur God's displeasure, as Uzzah did. Then they, that is, the Levites, offered upon their own account the sacrifices here mentioned; besides those which the king offered, as we read 2 Sam. vi. 13. And seven bullocks, and as many rams, being offered, some think, that every time the ark rested, for the Levites to rest themselves, a bullock was offered with a ram: which was seven times between the house of Obed-Edom and the city of David.

Ver. 27. And David was clothed with a robe of fine linen.] Pure white garments were proper (as Grotius here notes) in Divine ministrations. And Kimchi thinks, that the Levites, who bare the ark, and the singers, being thus clothed upon this solemn occasion, David being musical, and bearing his part among them, chose to appear in the very same habit. Just, saith he, as, among Christians, their kings and princes, when they go in procession with the clergy, are clothed like them. And by this, perhaps, may be understood what Michal meant when she found fault with David for uncovering himself: which does not signify that he appeared naked, but put off his royal robes, and put on those that did not belong to him. But it must be confessed, that fine linen was the apparel of kings and great men.

And all the Levites that bare the ark, and Chenaniah the master of the song, with the singers.] These were all clothed in fine linen.

David also had upon him an ephod of linen.] Which was an honorary vestment allowed to those who were not Levites, as I have shewn upon 1 Sam. ii. 18. (See my notes there, and upon 2 Sam. vi. 14.)

Ver. 28. Thus all Israel brought up the ark of the covenant of the Lord with shouting, and with sound of the cornet, and with trumpets, and with cymbals, making a noise with psalteries and harps.] See upon 2 Sam. vi. 15.

Ver. 29. And it came to pass, as the ark of the covenant of the Lord came to the city of David, that Michal, the daughter of Saul, looking out at a window, saw king David dancing and playing; and she despised him in her heart.] And expressed as much, when he came to his house, in words of great contempt. (See 2 Sam. vi. 16. 20.) She was a proud woman, and it is likely had no great sense of religion, which in the reign of Saul (as we read before, xiii. 3.) was much neglected.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. So they brought the ark of God, and set it in the midst of the tent that David had pitched for it: and they offered burnt-sacrifices and peace-offerings before God.

Ver. 2. And when David had made an end of offering the burnt-offerings and the peace-offerings, he blessed the people in the name of the Lord.] The Targum translates it, in the name of the Word of the Lord. Which shews that interpreter took the Word to be Jehovah.

Ver. 3. And he dealt to every one of Israel, both man and woman, to every one a loaf of bread, and a good piece of flesh, and a flagon of wine.] These three verses have been explained upon 2 Sam. vi. 17—19. (See there.)

Ver. 4. And he appointed certain of the Levites.] In their courses.

To minister before the ark of the Lord, and to record, and to thank and praise the Lord God of Israel.] To declare unto the people the wonderful works God had done for Israel (for that is to record), and to give him thanks, and to extol his almighty goodness, and all his glorious perfections. As none could sacrifice but the priests of the seed of Aaron; so none could minister in the temple but the Levites: which was unalterably established by the law of God. But it was in the power of their king to assign the priests or Levites several functions in the service of God, as Grotius observes from this place. They were appointed to be singers, with instruments of music, by the prophets, as we are told in 2 Chron. xxix. 25. and David, as a prophet, not as a king, appointed this Divine service, xxiii. 2. But the application of persons to their several places is every where ascribed to king David, and afterward to Solomon; and Jehoshaphat, who was no prophet, ordered the priests and Levites to go and teach the people. So David here appointed who should sing, who should be porters, and discharge other duties. (See De Imper. Sum. Potest. circa Sacra, cap. 10. p. 270. edit. Paris.)]

Ver. 5. Asaph the chief.] Some of whose Divine composures we have in the book of Psalms.

And next to him Zechariah, Jeiel, and Shemiramoth, and Jehiel, and Mattithiah, and Eliab, and Benaiah, and Obed-Edom: and Jeiel with psalteries and with harps: but Asaph made a sound with cymbals.] By whom all the rest were directed to take their several parts in this service.

Ver. 6. Benaiah also and Jahaziel the priests with trumpets continually before the ark of the covenant of God.] At the morning and evening service these priests attended with trumpets, as the Levites did with other musical instruments.

Ver. 7. Then on that day David delivered first this psalm.] Or, as it may be plainly translated out of the Hebrew, This David appointed (or ordained) in the first place at that time; viz. that God should be praised by Asaph and his colleagues in the manner following. Which solemn service began on the day when he brought up the ark, and ever after was continued.

To thank the Lord, into the hand of Asaph and his brethren.] To give him thanks (as Conradus Pellicanus well glosses) for all his benefits he had bestowed on his people Israel, and which he intended to bestow upon all the people of this world by his son Christ.

Ver. 8. Give thanks unto the Lord, call upon his name, make known his deeds among the people.] Out of Psal. xcvi. and cv. which, I suppose, David had made before this time, he now composed one hymn to be daily used in the Divine service: wherein the Divine perfections are admirably set forth, that the people might be excited to his fear, love, and obedience. I have sufficiently explained the sense of every verse in my paraphrase upon the Psalms: but shall here touch upon them again, out of that good and truly great man now mentioned, who thus glosses upon this verse: O ye ministers and worshippers of the Most High, celebrate with heart and voice all the benefits you have received from him the fountain of all good; and if you suffer any evil, or want any thing, pray to him for relief; and being taught by happy experience how good he is, proclaim it to all the world, and teach them, that all things depend upon his pleasure and order.

Ver. 9. Sing unto him, sing psalms unto him, talk you of all his wondrous works.] Praise him with heart and voice: declare his wonderful works, wherein he hath testified his omnipotence, and his wisdom to be faithful.

Ver. 10. Glory ye in his holy name: let the heart of them rejoice that seek the Lord.] Look upon this as your highest happiness, and make your boast of it, that he is your God:

and let their heart rejoice who seek his favour as their chiefest good.

Ver. 11. Seek the Lord and his strength, seek his face continually.] Being sensible of your own weakness, depend upon his power for help: and seek his clemency and mercy with humble prayer on all occasions. The ark is called God's strength in other places, 2 Chron. vi. 41. Psal. lxxviii. 61. and therefore here they are exhorted to fall down before it and implore his mercy.

Ver. 12. Remember his marvellous works that he hath done.] For the preservation of his people, and the punishment of their enemies.

His wonders, and the judgments of his mouth.] He would have them reflect upon the plagues of Egypt, which came upon them in a wonderful manner, at the command of Moses. Or, perhaps, he means by judgments the laws he gave them at Mount Sinai, (Exod. xxi. 1.)

Ver. 13. O ye seed of Israel his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen ones.] This is your duty, as you are the offspring of a most faithful servant of his: O ye posterity of Jacob, whom God hath chosen for his people; not for your merits, but out of his free love to one that loved him.

Ver. 14. He is the Lord our God; his judgments are in all the earth.] The great Lord of all things, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is our God: who rules the whole world by his providence.

Ver. 15. Be ye mindful always of his covenant, the word that he commanded to a thousand generations.] Never forget his most gracious covenant, wherein he promises to be ever propitious to you, if you keep his law.

Ver. 16. Even of the covenant which he made with Abraham, and of his oath unto Isaac.] This covenant he made with your fathers, and confirmed it with an oath, that it should never fail.

Ver. 17. And hath confirmed the same to Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant.] And what he first promised to Abraham, and confirmed to Isaac by a solemn oath, he established to Jacob by an inviolable law, to endure for ever. (See Gen. xvii. 1, 2. xxii. 16, &c. xxvi. 3. xxviii. 13.)

Ver. 18. Saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance.] He gave him an undoubted title to that good land; and afterward put his posterity into actual possession of it.

Ver. 19. When ye were but few, even a few, and strangers in it.] Remember your former condition, when you were the smallest of all nations, poor and little esteemed; were strangers in the land, which now you enjoy.

Ver. 20. And when they went from nation to nation, and from one kingdom to another people.] When you wandered up and down, from one country to another: having no settled dwelling-place.

Ver. 21. He suffered no man to do them wrong.] Though they were in danger to be oppressed by those who had not the fear of God before their eyes, yet they were safe every where under the Divine protection.

Yea, he reproved kings for their sakes.] When great princes did but attempt to offer any violence to them, he presently made them feel his hand against them.

In Seder Olam Rabba they say, that thus far they sung in the morning.

Ver. 22. Saying, Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.] So that they durst not so much as touch them, but used them as if they had been kings and lords of the land. "So precious were you in his eyes, as if to do them the least harm had been the crime of treason against the Divine Majesty."

Grotius thinks they are called God's anointed, because they had in their family jus regium; and therefore Nicolaus Damascenus and Justin call them kings. Kimchi more plainly translates the word anointed, my great men, or princes: for Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were honoured by kings, Abimelech and Pharaoh, as if they had been anointed kings. Whence the children of Heth say to Abraham, Thou art a prince of God, that is, a great prince, in the midst of us, (Gen. xxiii. 6.) St. Jerome thinks, that all the Israelites when they came out of Egypt were called God's anointed, because they were under his special protection, by the cloud that covered them; as Cyrus was called his anointed, because he was chosen by him to a special office, to be the deliverer of his people, and restore them to their own land.

Ver. 23. Sing unto the Lord, all the earth; shew forth from day to day his salvation.] Let not only the Israelites praise him, but all the people of the earth acknowledge their great Creator; proclaim his promised salvation by Christ, without intermission.

Here began the song between the two evenings (if we may believe the Jews in Seder Olam Rabba) unto those words, (ver. 36.) Let all the people say, Amen.

Ver. 24. Declare his glory among the heathen; his marvellous works among all nations.] Let them spread his fame among all nations, and celebrate every where his astonishing works.

Ver. 25. For great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised: he also is to be feared above all gods.] He is the great Creator of all things, and the Donor of all good, who therefore cannot be sufficiently magnified and praised: and none ought to share with him in his worship and service.

Ver. 26. For all the gods of the people are idols: but the Lord made the heavens.] For all the gods which the heathen worship are empty names, who can do nothing: it is the Lord God of Israel who made the sun, moon, and stars (which the gentiles worship), and therefore only is to be adored.

Ver. 27. Glory and honour are in his presence; strength and gladness are in his place.] To him only we ought to ascribe glory, honour, and power: in him alone we ought to confide, to him we ought to cleave, and in his clemency and favour perpetually rejoice.

Ver. 28. Give unto the Lord, ye kindreds of the people, give unto the Lord glory and strength.] Let not his worship be confined to the people of Israel, but let all sorts of people, from one end of the world to the other, acknowledge him to be the great God, who governs the whole world.

Ver. 29. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name: bring an offering, and come before him; worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness.] Acknowledge all his glorious attributes, wherein he excels all beings: offer unto him the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving; prostrate yourselves before him in the humblest manner, and adore his most holy and gracious majesty.

Ver. 30. Fear before him, all the earth.] Let all the inhabitants of the earth tremble before him, and humble themselves unto him.

The world also shall be stable, that it be not moved.] For if they humbly submit themselves to his gospel, and implore his grace, he will amend the world, and confirm them in all that is good; and not suffer so many nations to wander in such labyrinths of error.

Ver. 31. Let the heavens be glad, and let the earth rejoice; and let men say among the nations, The Lord reigneth.] Let all the inhabitants in heaven and earth be glad and rejoice: for the Lord will not only be known in Judea, but most gloriously reign in all nations.

Ver. 32. Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof.] By the fulness of it, is meant its swelling to the very top of the banks, as Bochartus observes.

Let the fields rejoice, and all that is therein.

Ver. 33. Then shall the trees of the wood sing out at the presence of the Lord, because he cometh to judge the earth.] These two verses he thus paraphrases, "Let the vast sea, and all that live in the waters triumph; let the dry land, and all the living creatures therein exult for joy: let the trees, and all the fruit that grows on them, sing to the Lord for his benefits." For the Creator of all comes to restore mankind, and resume them into his favour; for whom all these things acknowledge they were created.

Ver. 34. O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.] Whatsoever we are or can do, we owe it to his Divine bounty: unto whom we ought to give perpetual thanks, and hope in his mercy for ever.

Ver. 35. And say ye, Save us, O God of our salvation, and gather us together, and deliver us from the heathen, that we may give thanks to thy holy name, and glory in thy praise.] Let all, both Jews and gentiles, say, Save us, O Lord our God, most just, merciful, and powerful: and gather those who now are distant from, and opposite to one another, by variance and hatred, into the unity of faith and charity: that all nations may unanimously give thanks unto thee, and glory in this, that they are always praising thee.

Some have imagined that Ezra added these words after they came out of captivity: but David rather uttered them by the spirit of prophecy, concerning the happy union of Jews and gentiles.

Ver. 36. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel for ever and ever.] Unto the great Creator and Sovereign of the world, God most blessed for ever, let all men every where never cease to give blessing and praise.

And all the people said, Amen, and praised the Lord.] At the end of this hymn (the two last verses of which are the conclusion of Psal. cvi. 47, 48.) all the people expressed their desire that God might be for ever praised in this manner, by saying, Amen. From whence Vitringa observes the great antiquity of this sacred rite of saying Amen at the conclusion of all our prayers and benedictions: which was continued after the captivity, as we find Nehem. viii. 6. And he notes there rules which the Jewish doctors give concerning the pronunciation of this word by the people; first, that it be not pronounced too hastily and swiftly, but with a grave and distinct voice: and then, not louder than the tone of him that blessed: and lastly, it was to be expressed in faith; with a certain persuasion, that God would bless them and hear their prayers. (De Synag. Veteri, lib. iii. par. ii. cap. 18.)

Ver. 37. So he left there, before the ark of the covenant of the Lord, Asaph and his brethren, to minister before the ark continually, as every day's work required.] To sing hymns proper to the season.

Ver. 38. And Obed-Edom with their brethren, threescore and eight.] He was one of the principal singers under Asaph, (ver. 5.)

Obed-Edom also the son of Jeduthun, and Hosah, to be porters.] This is another Obed-Edom: who is joined with Jehiah as door-keeper for the ark, xv. 24. But Jehiah, I suppose, was also called Hosah.

Ver. 39. And Zadok the priest.] He was the second priest, as I have often noted, deputy to the high-priest.

And his brethren the priests, before the tabernacle of the Lord, in the high place that was in Gibeon.] As Asaph and his brethren ministered at Jerusalem; so others were appointed to minister at Gibeon: where the tabernacle of Moses was, and the altar of burnt-offering, ever since the slaughter of the priests by Saul. (See 2 Chron. i. 3.) Here the ordinary worship of God was performed, and therefore the priests attended at this place to offer sacrifice, which the Levites could not do, (ver. 40.) But the extraordinary worship was where the ark was placed, at Jerusalem; where Abiathar the high-priest attended upon David: that if he had any occasion to consult the Divine Majesty (which could be done only before the ark), he might be ready to do it for him. But Zadok, the chief of the secondary priests, always attended at Gibeon.

Ver. 40. To offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord upon the altar of the burnt-offering continually morning and evening, and to do according to all that is written in the law of the Lord, which he commanded Israel.] For this part of the Divine service could be performed no where but there where the altar was, nor by any body but by the priests: and therefore David took care it should be constantly performed here, though he was not present every day at those sacrifices, which were offered for all the people of Israel, wheresoever they were. The priests also took care to trim the lamps, and set the shew-bread on the table, and to do all other things which the law required.

Ver. 41. And with them Heman and Jeduthun, and the rest that were chosen, who were expressed by name, to give thanks to the Lord, because his mercy endureth for ever.] As Asaph and his brethren took care of the music at Jerusalem, where no sacrifices were offered, but only hymns sung and prayers made; so did Heman and Jeduthun (who were with Zadok) at Gibeon, where they sung and played on instruments when the morning and evening sacrifices were offered.

Ver. 42. And with them Heman and Jeduthun, with trumpets and cymbals.] It should be translated, with them (Heman and Jeduthun) there were trumpets and cymbals.

For those that should make a sound, and with musical instruments of God.] All the utensils of the tabernacle and temple were sacred and set apart for that use: not only those of the altar, but even these instruments of music, which David ordained to praise the Lord withal. They were not common, but consecrated to God to be used in his service alone: and therefore called musical instruments of God, both here and in 2 Chron. vii. 6. that is, sacred ones: whence those that sung the song of victory over the beast, Rev. xv. 2. are said to have in their hands the harps of God: that is, not profane or common, but sacred harps, the harps of the temple, for there they sung their anthem, as Mr. Mede observes, book i. discourse 2.

And the sons of Jeduthun were porters.] To the tabernacle, as others of them were to the ark, (ver. 38.)

Ver. 43. And all the people departed, every man to his house; and David returned to bless his house.] See 2 Sam. vi. 19, 20.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass, as David sat in his house, that David said to Nathan the prophet, Lo, I dwell in a house of cedars, but the ark of the covenant of the Lord remaineth under curtains.

Ver. 2. Then Nathan said unto David, Do all that is in thine heart; for God is with thee.

Ver. 3. And it came to pass the same night, that the word of God came to Nathan, saying,

Ver. 4. Go and tell David my servant, Thus saith the Lord, Thou shalt not build me a house to dwell in.] These four verses have been explained before, 2 Sam. vii. in the five first verses.

Ver. 5. For I have not dwelt in a house since the day that I brought up Israel unto this day; but I have gone from tent to tent, and from one tabernacle to another.] This verse is the very same with the sixth verse of that chapter in Samuel: only there it is said, I have walked in a tent and in a tabernacle; and here, I have gone from tent to tent, and from one tabernacle to another. Both which signify, that he had no settled place wherein to dwell, but walked or went, where the tent, or tabernacle, was pitched for him. For the words may be translated, I went out of the tent into the tent: that is, when they marched in the wilderness, the ark was taken out of the tent, and when they rested it was put into the tent again: and not into a house built of cedar. Or, this may refer to the translation of the ark from the tabernacle made by Moses, unto the tent made for it by David.

Ver. 6. Wheresoever I have walked with all Israel, spake I a word to any of the judges of Israel (whom I commanded to feed my people), saying, Why have ye not built me a house of cedars?] See 2 Sam. vii. 7.

Ver. 7. Now therefore thus shalt thou say unto my servant David, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I took thee from the sheep-cote, even from following the sheep, that thou shouldest be ruler over my people Israel.

Ver. 8. And I have been with thee whithersoever thou hast walked, and have cut off all thine enemies from before thee, and have made thee a name like the name of the great men that are in the earth.

Ver. 9. Also I will ordain a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, and they shall dwell in their place, and shall be moved no more; neither shall the children of wickedness waste them any more, as at the beginning.] He speaks here, as if now, and not before, they were possessed of the land of Canaan: for under David's government they were settled and flourished; whereas under the judges they had no rest.

Ver. 10. And since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel: moreover, I will subdue all thine enemies. Furthermore I tell thee, that the Lord will build thee a house.

Ver. 11. And it shall come to pass, when thy days be expired, that thou must go to be with thy fathers, that I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons; and I will establish his kingdom.

Ver. 12. He shall build me a house, and I will establish his throne for ever.

Ver. 13. I will be his father, and he shall be my son; and I will not take my mercy away from him, as I took it from him that was before thee.] All these verses, which are set down almost in the same words in 2 Sam. vii. from ver. 7. to ver. 16. are there explained.

Ver. 14. But I will settle him in mine house and in my kingdom for ever; and his throne shall be established for evermore.] That is, in my church, which is the house of God, wherein he dwelt; and which he governed, ruled, and protected as his peculiar people. It is very observable, that in 2 Sam. vii. 16. speaking to David, he calls them, thine house, and thy kingdom: but here, mine house, and my kingdom. Which confirms, what I noted upon the former place, that this principally belongs to the Messiah, of whom David was but a figure.

Ver. 15. According to all these words, and according to all this vision, so did Nathan speak unto David.] See there, 2 Sam. vii. 17.

Ver. 16. And David the king came and sat before the Lord, and said, Who am I, O Lord God, and what is mine house, that thou hast brought me hitherto?] He came and took his place before the ark, and then stood up, and made the following prayer to God, as I have explained it 2 Sam. vii. 18.

Ver. 17. And yet this was a small thing in thine eyes, O God; for thou hast also spoken of thy servant's house for a great while to come, and hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree, O Lord God.] This is likewise explained there, ver. 19. but the latter part of that verse is expressed in different words, for there he saith, Is this the manner of men, O Lord; but here, thou hast regarded me according to the estate of a man of high degree, O Lord God. This was not after the manner of men, to treat a poor shepherd, as if he were a great prince: but so he had dealt with David. But Victorinus Strigelius thinks, the Hebrew words will bear this translation, which in his opinion is better than our own, Thou hast looked upon me in the form of a man, who art in the highest the Lord God. Which he looks upon as a prophecy of the Messiah, who was really the Lord God, but appeared in the form of a man. The LXX. come near this sense in the former part of the words, ἐπεῖδές με ὡς ὄρασις ἀνθρώπου, Thou hast looked upon me as the aspect of a man. So Christophorus Helvicus interprets it in his Elenchus Judæorum.

Ver. 18. What can David speak more to thee for the honour of thy servant? for thou knowest thy servant.] He could desire no more for the increase of his honour: which is an explication of what is said 2 Sam. vii. 20. (See there.)

Ver. 19. O Lord, for thy servant's sake, and according to thine own heart, hast thou done all this greatness, in making known all these great things.] In 2 Sam. vii. 21. it is said for thy word's sake, that is, for the sake of thy promise to thy servant, as this place explains it. He had passed his word to David by his prophets, out of his own mere goodness, without any other motive. (See there.) It may be also thought to signify, for the sake of the Messiah, who is the Word of God: and by way of eminence is called his servant, Isa. xlii. 1. xlix. 5.

Ver. 20. O Lord, there is noue like thee, neither is there any God besides thee, according to all that we have heard with our ears.] This is more fully expressed in 2 Sam. vii. 22.

Ver. 21. And what one nation in the earth is like thy people Israel, whom God went to redeem to be his own people, to make thee a name of greatness and terribleness, by driving out nations from before thy people, whom thou hast redeemed out of Egypt?] See 2 Sam. vii. 23. As in the former verse he acknowledges his happiness, in being beloved of God; so in this, the great honour God had done him, in making him king of such a people.

Ver. 22. For thy people Israel didst thou make thine own people for ever; and thou, Lord, becamest their God.] See there, ver. 24.

Ver. 23. Therefore now, Lord, let the thing that thou hast spoken concerning thy servant, and concerning his house, be established for ever, and do as thou hast said.] See ver. 25.

Ver. 24. Let it even be established, that thy name may be magnified for ever, saying, The Lord of hosts is the God of Israel, even a God to Israel; and let the house of David thy servant be established before thee.] See ver. 20. where the same thing is said, only the title of God is a little here enlarged. For there it is only said, The Lord of hosts is the God of Israel; but here, The Lord of hosts is the God of Israel, even a God to Israel. Or, as it may be translated, The Lord of hosts the God of Israel, is a God to Israel; that is, most gracious and merciful, as appeared in many things, particularly in bestowing such a king upon them.

Ver. 25. For thou, O my God, hast told thy servant, that thou wilt build him a house: therefore thy servant hath found in his heart to pray before thee.] See there, ver. 27.

Ver. 26. And now, Lord, thou art God, and hast promised this goodness unto thy servant.] See ver. 28.

Ver. 27. Now therefore let it please thee to bless the house of thy servant, that it may be before thee for ever: for thou blessest, O Lord, and it shall be blessed for ever.] This is delivered a little more largely in 2 Sam. vii. 29. (See there.)

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. NOW after this it came to pass, that David smote the Philistines, and subdued them, and took Gath and her towns out of the hand of the Philistines.] This chapter hath been fully explained in 2 Sam. viii. What differences there are in any expression is there noted, and an account given of them, to which I refer the reader. Only it may be observed upon this verse, that in the book of Samuel it is said, he took Metheg-ammah out of their hand; but here Gath and her towns: which are all one in Abarbinel's account, who takes Metheg-ammah for a region or province, which comprehended Gath and her towns. We may observe also in ver. 11. the great piety of David, who had in his heart to build a splendid house for God's habitation: and when he was prohibited by God to do it (because he had been engaged in so many wars, and shed a great deal of blood), he could not satisfy himself without doing something towards it: by preparing materials for it, and consecrating a great deal of treasure to be employed in the building, and to no other use. For that is the meaning of what is here said, That he dedicated unto the Lord the gold and silver which he brought from several nations: that is, he consecrated, or solemnly deputed them to this holy use, that it might not be lawful hereafter to employ them to any other.

Ver. 16. It is observed by Drusius, that there were two Ahimelechs; one the grandson of Ahitub, the other the son of Abiathar: who, by the change of a letter, is here called Abimelech. (Miscel. Cent. i. cap. 46.)

CHAP. XIX.

THIS chapter also hath been so fully explained in 2 Sam. x. that there is no need of adding any thing. Unless I observe, that the country which there is called simply Maacah, is here called, ver. 6. Aram-Maachah. Which is the foundation of their opinion who think this was in Syria, as I there observed: but it is plain the Scripture makes Maachah a city of Canaan, (see Deut. iii. 14. Josh. xii. 4, 5. and other places.) But it lying beyond Jordan on the borders of Syria, it had the name of Aram added to it: because the people were in their manners more Syrians than Canaanites, as Bochartus conjectures. In like manner, Aram-Bethrehob he thinks belonged to Canaan, in the north part of it, not far from Emath, that is, Epiphania. (See Numb. xiii. 41.) And Maachah was in the tribe of Manasseh, as Rehob in the tribe of Asher, (Josh. xiii. 11. xix. 28.) As for what is said here, that they hired thirty-two thousand chariots, the meaning must be, so many men, who fought in chariots, when they saw cause. For in the book of Samuel, it is said expressly that they hired twenty thousand footmen from Zoba, and twelve thousand men of Ish-tob: which make up the thirty-two thousand here mentioned. Which if it should be understood of such a number of chariots, there would have been no footmen in their whole army, which is incredible: as it is that they should have so many chariots. (See 1 Sam. xiii. 5.)

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, after the year was expired, at the time that kings go out to battle, Joab led forth the power of the army, and wasted the country of the children of Ammon, and came and besieged Rabbah (but David tarried at Jerusalem); and Joab smote Rabbah, and destroyed it.] See 2 Sam. xi. 1. where the history of David's adultery with Bath-sheba, and the murder of Uriah follows: which is here omitted, it being there so largely related, that nothing could be added to it.

Ver. 2. And David took the crown of their king from off his head, and found it to weigh a talent of gold, and there were precious stones in it; and it was set upon David's head: and he brought also exceeding much spoil out of the city.

Ver. 3. And he brought out the people that were in it, and cut them with saws, and with harrows of iron, and with axes: even so dealt David with all the cities of the children of Ammon. And David and all the people returned to Jerusalem.] See 2 Sam. xii. 30, 31. where these two verses are explained.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass after this, that there arose war at Gezer with the Philistines; at which time Sibbechai the Hushathite slew Sippai, that was of the children of the giant; and they were subdued.] An account is given of this in 2 Sam. xxi. 18. where this giant is called Saph; who was, as I observed there, of the race of the Anakims. (See Deut. ix. 2.)

Ver. 5. And there was war again with the Philistines; and Elhanan the son of Jair slew Lahmi, the brother of Goliah the Gittite, whose spear's staff was like a weaver's beam.] See there, 2 Sam. xxi. 19.

Ver. 6. And yet again there was war at Gath, where was a man of great stature, whose fingers and toes were four-and-twenty, six on each hand, and six on each foot; and he also was the son of the giant.

Ver. 7. But when he defied Israel, Jonathan the son of Shimea, David's brother, slew him.

Ver. 8. These were born unto the giant in Gath; and they fell by the hand of David, and by the hand of his servants.] These three verses are explained in the forenamed place, 2 Sam. xxi. 20—22. After which follows the hymn which David composed in commemoration of his many deliverances from these and other enemies, especially from Saul: which is here omitted, because not only there largely recorded, but also in the book of Psalms.

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. AND Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel.] It is said in 2 Sam. xxiv. 1. that God, being angry with Israel, moved David: that is, suffered Satan to move him. This is sufficiently explained there: only here the phrase stood up is to be observed. Which was the posture of those who charged and accused any person of a crime in a court of justice. (See 1 Kings xxii. 21.) Thus Satan is represented as the accuser of the brethren, in the book of the Revelation: and here to lay some sin to the charge of the Israelites, which he represented to God as a reason to punish them: for it is the way of the Holy Scripture thus to bring down these things, and accommodate them to the lowest capacities.

Ver. 2. And David said to Joab, and to the rulers of the people.] Who, it is plain by 2 Sam. xxiv. 4. were with Joab when the king gave this command.

Go, number Israel, from Beer-sheba even unto Dan; and bring the number of them to me, that I may know it.

Ver. 3. And Joab answered, The Lord make his people a hundred times so many as they be: but, my lord the king, are they not all my lord's servants? why then doth my lord require this thing? why will he be a cause of trespass to Israel?] See what I have noted upon 2 Sam. xxiv. 3. It is something strange that Joab should see the danger of this, and David not think of it; no, not when it was so plainly represented to him. But the best men are sometimes very drowsy, and apprehend not those things which plainly appear to those who are not so good.

Ver. 4. Nevertheless, the king's word prevailed against Joab: wherefore Joab departed, and went through all Israel, and came to Jerusalem.] Unto which they came at the end of nine months and twenty days, as is more largely related in 2 Sam. xxiv. from ver. 4. to 9.

Ver. 5. And Joab gave the sum of the number of the people unto David. And all they of Israel were a thousand thousand and a hundred thousand men that drew sword; and Judah were four hundred threescore and ten thousand men that drew sword.] This account of their number differs much from that given in 2 Sam. xxiv. 9. concerning which see what I have there noted.

Ver. 6. But Levi and Benjamin counted he not among them.] Some think he took no account of Levi because they were not warriors, and such only as were fit for war, David desired to be satisfied how many they were. And Benjamin they think was so diminished in the time of the judges, that they were to be spared. But these, it were easy to shew, are not good reasons; and no other reason is to be sought for, than that given here in the very next words.

For the king's word was abominable to Joab.] He did all this against his will, and at last the work was so odious to him, that he was quite tired with it: and therefore broke off before he took the number of these two tribes.

Ver. 7. And God was displeased with this thing; therefore he smote Israel.] He resolved to punish them, because it was for their sins that God permitted David to indulge himself in this vanity.

Ver. 8. And David said unto God, I have sinned greatly, because I have done this thing: but now, I beseech thee, do away the iniquity of thy servant; for I have done very foolishly.] See 2 Sam. xxiv. 10. where I have explained this, and given the best account I could of the nature of this sin.

Ver. 9. And the Lord spake unto Gad, David's seer, saying.] This is expressed a little more largely in 2 Sam. xxiv. 11. (See there.)

Ver. 10. Go and tell David, saying, Thus saith the Lord, I offer thee three things, choose thee one of them, that I may do it unto thee.] He speaks to him so solemnly in the name of the Lord, that he might attend the more seriously to what he said, and look upon it as peremptorily resolved.

Ver. 11. So Gad came to David, and said unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Choose thee.

Ver. 12. Either three years' famine; or three months to be destroyed before thy foes (while that the sword of thine enemies overtaketh thee); or else three days the sword of the Lord, even the pestilence, in the land, and the angel of the Lord destroying throughout all the coasts of Israel. Now therefore advise thyself what word I shall bring again to him that sent me.] In the book of Samuel it is said, the prophet propounded seven years of famine, and here but three. Of which difference I have given an account in 2 Sam. xxiv. 13.

Ver. 13. And David said unto Gad, I am in a great strait: let me fall now into the hand of the Lord (for very great are his mercies); but let me not fall into the hand of man.] See there, upon ver. 14. I only add here, that the pestilence is more properly called the hand of the Lord, than other common calamities: for they have visible causes, but none know whence this sudden destruction comes, but immediately from the hand of God; when there is no alteration that we can see in the air, or other elements (as we call them). And therefore the angel of the Lord is said to have smote the army of Sennacherib with such a pestilence, as Josephus reasonably conjectures.

Ver. 14. So the Lord sent a pestilence upon Israel: and there fell of Israel seventy thousand men.] This is more largely expressed in 2 Sam. xxiv. 15. (See my annotations there.)

Ver. 15. And God sent an angel unto Jerusalem to destroy it; and, as he was destroying, the Lord beheld.] This seems to import that there were more angels than one employed to destroy in several places of the country: and that the angel sent to Jerusalem had begun to slay some of the inhabitants: but God took pity of them; beholding, perhaps, their serious repentance.

And he repented him of the evil, and said to the angel that destroyed, It is enough, stay now thine hand. And the angel of the Lord stood by the thrashing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite.] See there upon ver. 16.

Ver. 16. And David lifted up his eyes, and saw the angel of the Lord stand between the earth and the heaven, having a drawn sword in his hand.] Whence the pestilence is called, (ver. 12.) the sword of the Lord.

Stretched out over Jerusalem.] As ready to do execution upon the people there.

Then David and the elders of Israel, who were clothed in sackcloth, fell upon their faces.] It appears by their habit, that they (and the people of Jerusalem with them, ver. 15.) were humbling themselves before God for their sins, and deprecating his displeasure: for mourners were wont to clothe themselves in sackcloth.

Ver. 17. And David said unto God, Is it not I that commanded the people to be numbered? even I it is that have sinned, and done evil indeed; but as for these sheep, what have they done? let thine hand, I pray thee, O Lord my God, be on me, and on my father's house; but not on thy people, that they should be plagued.] See 2 Sam. xxiv. 17.

Ver. 18. Then the angel of the Lord commanded Gad to say to David.] This seems to signify that Gad was sent upon his former message (ver. 9.) by an angel, who came with that command from God.

That David should go, and set up an altar unto the Lord in the thrashing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite.] See there, ver. 18.

Ver. 19. And David went up at the saying of Gad, which he spake in the name of the Lord.] See there, ver. 19.

Ver. 20. And Ornan turned back, and saw the angel; and his four sons with him hid themselves.] Or, when he saw the angel, he turned his face from him (as did his four sons, who likewise saw him); being afraid at so glorious an appearance.

This book, as I observed in the beginning, supplies some things omitted in the book of Samuel, among which this is one. For nothing is said there of Araunah's seeing the angel, but only of David's seeing him.

Now Ornan was thrashing wheat.] For the greatest persons did not, in those days, disdain such employments.

Ver. 21. And as David came to Ornan, Ornan looked, and saw David, and went out of the thrashing-floor, and bowed himself to David with his face to the ground.] See 2 Sam. xxiv. 20.

Ver. 22. Then David said to Ornan, Grant me the place of this thrashing-floor, that I may build an altar therein unto the Lord.] This he said, after Ornan had first desired, to know the cause of his coming to him.

Thou shalt grant it me for the full price, that the plague may be stayed from the people.] By offering a sacrifice to appease the Divine anger. (See ver. 21.)

Ver. 23. And Ornan said unto David, Take it to thee, and let my lord the king do that which is good in his eyes: lo, I give thee the oxen also for burnt-offerings, and the thrashing-instruments for wood, and the wheat for the meat-offering; I give it all.] He offered the ground to the king, as a free gift; with every thing that was necessary for sacrifice. (See 2 Sam. xxiv. 22, 23.)

Ver. 24. And king David said to Ornan, Nay; but I will verily buy it for the full price: for I will not take that which is thine for the Lord, nor offer burnt-offerings without cost.

Ver. 25. So David gave to Ornan for the place six hundred shekels of gold by weight.] This confutes their opinion, who think there were no shekels but of silver. See 2 Sam. xxiv. 24. where I have shewn that this account of the sum of money which he paid, doth not disagree with that which is given there in that place.

Ver. 26. And David built there an altar unto the Lord, and offered burnt-offerings and peace-offerings.] See there, ver. 25.

And called upon the Lord.] By thanksgivings for his mercy, beseeching the continuance of it.

And he answered him from heaven by fire upon the altar of burnt-offering.] This was the highest token of God's gracious acceptance of any sacrifice. (See Lev. ix. 24.) The Jews say thus God consumed the sacrifices of Abel, and of Noah, and of Abraham, when they first dedicated altars to him. It is certain from the Holy Scriptures, thus God testified his acceptance of the sacrifices of Gideon and Elijah in ancient times: which Julian himself had not the hardiness to deny. (See St. Cyril, contra Julianum, lib. x.) And indeed this was known by the heathens: for Servius upon Virg. Æneid. xii. ver. 200. saith, that in the old temples sacrifices were no other ways consumed, "quam igne divino precibus impetrato," than by Divine fire obtained by prayers. (See other testimonies out of heathen antiquity, in Huetius's Quæst. Alnetanæ, p. 216, &c.)

Ver. 27. And the Lord commanded the angel, and he put up his sword into the sheath thereof.] Which, it seems, was brandished over Jerusalem, till this sacrifice was offered.

Ver. 28. At that time, when David saw that the Lord had answered him in the thrashing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite, then he sacrificed there.] That is, he continued to offer his sacrifices in that place, where there was such a manifest appearance of God, and a testimony of his acceptance of his sacrifices. So that from this time he did not go to Gibeon, where sacrifices were wont to be offered upon the brazen altar: which, as it follows, was then there, together with the table, the candlestick, and the fire that came down from heaven in the days of Moses: (as Seder Olam Rabba saith, cap. 14.) and here Zadok and his brethren ministered, while the ark was in Zion, and with them Heman and others, (xvi. 39—41.)

Ver. 29. For the tabernacle of the Lord, which Moses made in the wilderness, and the altar of the burnt-offering, were at that time in the high place at Gibeon.] The Targum calls this high place the sanctuary in Gibeon: for this word comprehended the whole sacred house, as in 1 Sam. ix. 13.

Ver. 30. But David could not go before it to inquire of God.] He thought it not fit to go thither at this time, though that was the place to which they always resorted to beg mercy of God by sacrifice.

For he was afraid, because of the sword of the angel of the Lord.] As he thought God had consecrated this place for his service, and that he ought immediately to sacrifice here, and not stay till he could go to Gibeon; so perhaps he thought there might still be danger, that the angel might smite Jerusalem, if he did not continue to worship God here: where he knew, by some means or other, God intended his temple should be built for his perpetual honour in this place. The altar also now erected here was set up by the command of God, as well as that of Moses: so that he thought he might most acceptably serve God here.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. THEN David said, This is the house of the Lord God.] He seems to have been inspired by God with this thought, that here he would have his temple to be built. At least, he concluded this, because the angel bade him build an altar here, which was for sacrifice: and here God testified his presence, as he did at the erection of the first altar, Lev. ix. 24. He seems to have respect to the words of Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 16, 17.

And this is the altar of burnt-offering for Israel.] That is, here all their sacrifices shall be offered, when the temple is built. From which words Maimonides concludes, it was utterly unlawful to build God a house any where else, or to offer sacrifice in any other place but this.

Ver. 2. And David commanded to gather together the strangers that were in the land of Israel.] That is, those they called proselytes, who perhaps were better skilled in such works, as here follow, than the children of Israel. Or, as R. Solomon Jarchi thinks, these being servile works, he would not employ the free people of Israel therein: which example Solomon afterward followed, (1 Kings v. 15. ix. 22. 2 Chron. ii. 1. viii. 7.) But we must not from hence infer, as some have done, that proselytes were not as free as other subjects: for they did not settle among the Jews upon any condition of being under any kind of servitude.

And he set masons to hew wrought stones to build the house of God.] Though God had forbidden him to build him a house, yet he thought he might prepare materials for the building: which God so much approved, that he was pleased to shew him a model of such a house as he would have, as we read chap. xxviii. 19.

Ver. 3. And David prepared iron in abundance for the nails for the doors of the gates, and for the joinings; and brass in abundance without weight.] The word which we translate joinings, the Targum translates hinges.

Ver. 4. Also cedar-trees in abundance: for the Zidonians, and they of Tyre, brought much cedar-wood to David.] There being great friendship between them and David.

Ver. 5. And David said, Solomon my son is young and tender, and the house that is to be builded for the Lord must be exceeding magnifical, of fame and of glory throughout all countries: I will therefore now make preparation for it. So David prepared abundantly before his death.] He considered with himself these two things, the youth of Solomon, (of which see 1 Kings iii. 7.) and then the magnificence of the structure that was to be built; both which he thought required his care, to make what preparation he could for such an undertaking. For young men are wont to be careless, and are rarely capable of great designs. Learned men have observed, that this temple was so stately and rich, that it exceeded all others in the world: the famous temple of Diana at Ephesus, being not to be compared with it. (See Dr. Spencer, lib. iii. de Leg. Hebr. cap. 2. dissert. 6.)

Ver. 6. Then he called for Solomon his son, and charged him to build an altar for the Lord God of Israel.] By this it was apparent, and, I suppose, well known, that he intended him for his successor: which made the crime of Adonijah the greater, who endeavoured to put him by.

Ver. 7. And David said to Solomon, My son, as for me, it was in my mind to build a house unto the name of the Lord my God.] See in 2 Sam. vii. 1, 2.

Ver. 8. But the word of the Lord came to me, saying, Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars: thou shalt not build a house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight.] This reason is not mentioned in the book of Samuel, but here is recorded to shew, that though David's wars were warranted, and succeeded by God in an extraordinary manner, yet it did not suit so well with the Divine Majesty, to have a house built him by one who had shed so much blood, as by one that reigned in peace and quietness: that he might be an emblem of the King of peace, the Lord of the church, who was prefigured in all such great transactions. There may be respect also here to the blood of Uriah, and those worthy men slain together with him, by the contrivance of David: which made him unworthy to be honoured with such an undertaking as this. David himself takes notice of this blood-guiltiness, as a thing which was always in God's eye, Psal. li. 4. where he saith, I have done this evil in thy sight: as God here saith, Thou hast shed blood in my sight. (See more below, chap. xxviii. 3.)

Ver. 9. Behold, a son shall be born to thee, who shall be a man of rest; and I will give him rest from all his enemies round about: for his name shall be Solomon, and I will give peace and quietness unto Israel in his days.] Here are two reasons, why his son should have this honour: because God would give him rest from all his enemies, and Israel should live in peace and quietness in his days. Which made his reign a proper season for this great work.

Ver. 10. He shall build a house for my name; and he shall be my son, and I will be his father; and I will establish the throne of his kingdom over Israel for ever.] This can belong to none, in the proper and full sense of the word, but Christ alone. For Solomon reigned but forty years, and after that his kingdom was torn in pieces: therefore to Christ the author to the Hebrews applies them, (Heb. i. 5.)

Ver. 11. Now, my son, the Lord be with thee; and prosper thou, and build the house of the Lord thy God, as he hath said of thee.] He would not have him doubt, but be as confident as he was, that God would prosper him in this work; because he ordered him to undertake it.

Ver. 12. Only the Lord give thee wisdom and understanding, and give thee charge concerning Israel, that thou mayest keep the law of the Lord thy God.] When he committed Israel to his care.

Ver. 13. Then shalt thou prosper, if thou takest heed to fulfil the statutes and judgments which the Lord charged Moses with concerning Israel: be strong, and of good courage; dread not, nor be dismayed.] Nothing gives a man such an undaunted courage as a conscience of well-doing; in exact obedience to God's commands.

Ver. 14. Now, behold, in my trouble.] In a tumultuous reign, full of various troubles.

I have prepared for the house of the Lord a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver; and of brass and iron without weight (for it is in abundance); timber also and stone have I prepared; and thou mayest add thereto.] His heart was so bent to shew his gratitude to God, that he would have done a great deal more for him, if he had been able. Though this was such a vast treasure which he amassed (not out of covetousness, but purely for the honour and service of God), that it hath seemed to some incredible. For if we take this to be meant of the greater talent, it makes such an immense sum, that it exceeds the riches of any of the Roman emperors, or other former monarchs. For in the time of Trajan, when that empire was largest, the money that was in his treasury did not exceed seventy-three thousand talents, as Bodinus observes in his book de Republ. lib. vi. cap. 2. But a better man than he, our Brerewood, hath computed these talents to make so many millions, that he thinks the word kikkar should not be translated talent in this place; but only a mass, or cake of gold and silver. And so Guil. Budæus observes in his book De Asse, that there was in Homer's time a talent of lesser value: for he speaks of two talents, which were given, with other things, as a reward of a victory obtained in some exercises. Such talents, he thinks, we are to understand in this place: for David reigned about the time of the kingdom of the Assyrians, which was near the time of Homer. (See Beckius upon the Targum in this place.) Of the same opinion is Jacobus Capellus, and Junius, and Tremellius, as appears by the sum to which they make these talents to amount, viz. five hundred thousand dollars of gold, and as much of silver. And more lately Hermannus Witsius hath computed, that half so many talents of the sanctuary (as some call them) amounts to twenty thousand five hundred eighty-five tons of gold: which he shews David had opportunity to heap together, in his Miscell. Sacra, tom. ii. exerc. x. sect. 17, 18.

Ver. 15. Moreover, there are workmen with thee in abundance, hewers and workers of stone and timber, and all manner of cunning men for every manner of work.] Who were all to be paid, as well as the labourers, and carriers of burdens, out of this money; which required a very great sum.

Ver. 16. Of the gold, the silver, and the brass, and the iron, there is no number.] The meaning is, the quantity of brass and iron was not numbered, as that of the gold and silver was.

Arise therefore, and be doing, and the Lord be with thee.] He would not have him now go about the work, but begin it when he was settled on his throne: nothing doubting the Lord would prosper it.

Ver. 17. David also commanded all the princes of Israel to help Solomon his son, saying.] By advising him, and encouraging the people in their labours.

Ver. 18. Is not the Lord your God with you? and hath he not given you rest on every side?] What God had already done for them, was a ground of hope he would further them in this work; which was for his service.

For he hath given the inhabitants of the land into mine hand; and the land is subdued before the Lord, and before his people.] For God was the author of all those wars, and gave them all their victories.

Ver. 19. Now, set your heart and your soul to seek the Lord your God: arise therefore, and build ye the sanctuary of the Lord your God, to bring the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and the holy vessels of God, into the house that is to be built to the name of the Lord.] He beseeches them not to neglect this opportunity, which he spake of in the foregoing verse; viz. the time of peace which God had given them, which was fit for such a work. Strigelius compares these words with those of Christ, "While ye have the light, walk in the light." And, indeed, the ark and the tabernacle had been too long separated, and therefore such preparation being made for it, it was time to bring the ark, with all the holy vessels, in the tabernacle, together into a settled place, by building the sanctuary for them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. So when David was old and full of days, he made Solomon his son king over Israel.] Declared him his successor, but did not resign his throne to him, nor make him his coadjutor.

Ver. 2. And he gathered together all the princes of Israel, with the priests and the Levites.] It is likely he took this opportunity to declare before them all, that Solomon should be king after his decease. But the principal end of this assembly was, that he might acquaint them with a new regulation of the priests and Levites in their ministration: which he intended to establish by a Divine direction, as we read xxviii. 12, 13. This was a work becoming his elder years, after he had long observed and weighed the inconveniences of their present method, and the necessity of putting things into a better order. For nothing is more useful or more beautiful than good order, as Strigelius observes out of Xenophon in his Œconomics. And therefore the church of God was highly obliged to David, for distinguishing the degrees and offices of the Levites: appointing some to take care of the Divine rites and ceremonies (as his words are); others to govern the public judgments; others to watch and guard the temple; others to celebrate the praises of God with singing and instruments of music.

Ver. 3. Now the Levites were numbered from the age of thirty years and upward.] So Moses appointed, Numb. iv. 3. for then they were come to their full strength, and fit for service: which lasted till they were fifty years old, and no longer. For then they generally began to decay, and grew less able to bear burdens: which was their work then, to carry the tabernacle when it was to be removed, and all the utensils belonging to it. Which work being now at an end, they seem to have continued till their death to discharge their business at the temple; which was more easy, after that was built, and required less labour.

And their number by their polls, man by man, was thirty and eight thousand:] The priests are not included in this number: which is so great, that it may very well incline us to think, that many of them served rather for state and ornament, than for necessity. Abarbinel here cries out, "See whether in all the countries there were so many singers and musicians, and other officers employed in their temples, as there were in the house of the sanctuary. Who ever saw the like? Who ever beheld such sanctity, such ornaments, and such praising of God?"

Ver. 4. Of which twenty and four thousand were to set forward the work of the house of the Lord.] These were employed about the sacrifices and offerings, which they killed, and flayed, and washed: and served the priests in all other parts of their ministry about them. Which being very numerous, there were the greater number of Levites to attend this work; viz. a thousand every week: for they took their courses, which being twenty and four, in so many weeks they came about again. (See their business, ver. 28, 29.)

And six thousand were officers and judges.] God appointed judges and officers to be settled in all their gates; (Deut. xvi. 18.) but many think, there had been a long neglect in this matter: and that David himself could not restore their judicatures to their ancient order and dignity, till the latter end of his reign. For being hindered by perpetual wars, he was forced to be content with such judicatures as had been wont to be executed (which in many things was very defective), only reserving appeals to himself, in causes of great moment, (2 Sam. xv. 2.) But now he takes care of this so necessary a part of government, and having numbered the Levites, appointed them their certain business, which had been before unsettled and undetermined: employing them both in ecclesiastical and civil affairs, as Bertram discourses in his book de Republ. Jud. p. 124. But a late writer makes a doubt, whether the Israelites observed that command of Moses at all, when they came into the land of Canaan; the heads of their tribes taking upon them, for a long time, to determine all controverted matters. But now the Levites were constituted, in the cities where they dwelt, to be both officers and judges. All agree, that shoterim commonly signify such officers as execute the sentence of the judges. (See my notes upon Deut. xvi. 18. and other places.) But here, being placed before judges, we are not to take them for such inferior persons, but for men of greater authority; whom the Targum calls governors, such as our justices of the peace are, who saw good order kept according to the law: as the judges were such as decided causes in their several courts. (See Campegius Vitringa, in his book de Synag. Veteri, lib. i. par. ii. cap. 8.)

Ver. 5. Moreover, four thousand were porters.] Who were to take care that no unclean person entered into the temple; or any thing brought into it which ought not to be there; or any thing carried out of it which belonged only to that place: and that nothing was done about the door of the court which might disturb the people at their prayers.

And four thousand praised the Lord with the instruments which I made (said David) to praise therewith.] Thus he hath given an account how the whole thirty-eight thousand (mentioned ver. 3.) were disposed of to their offices. And this last four thousand had some among them that were more eminent than the rest; being their instructors, both in singing and playing upon instruments: and perhaps some of them, being very skilful in music, contrived instruments, and commanded them to be made.

Ver. 6. And David divided them into courses among the sons of Levi, namely, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari.] They took their turns of waiting, some going off, and others coming on, to perform all the forementioned duties, which David, the man of God, ordered, (as he speaks, 2 Chron. viii. 14.) by the direction of Gad and of Nathan the prophets, who had a command for it from God, as we read in this book, xxix. 25.

Ver. 7. Of the Gershonites were Laadan and Shimei.] Who were their immediate ancestors is not said, nor is it material to be known.

Ver. 8. The sons of Laadan; the chief was Jehiel, and Zetham, and Joel, three.] It is likely they were not his sons, but some of his posterity: for so the word sons signifies in the verses following.

Ver. 9. The sons of Shimei; Shelomith, and Haziel, and Haran, three. These were the chief of the fathers of Laadan.] This Shimei was descended from one of the three sons of Laadan.

Ver. 10. And the sons of Shimei were Jahath, Zina, and Jeush, and Beriah. These four were the sons of Shimei.] That is, the sons of that Shimei, brother of Laadan, mentioned ver. 7.

Ver. 11. And Jahath was the chief, and Zizah the second.] He is called Zina in the foregoing verse.

But Jeush and Beriah had not many sons.] As their two elder brothers had.

Therefore they were in one reckoning, according to their father's house.] They were accounted but as one family, and not called by the name of their fathers, Jeush and Beriah, but by the name of Shimei their grandfather.

Ver. 12. The sons of Kohath; Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel, four.] See Exod. vi. 18.

Ver. 13. The sons of Amram; Aaron and Moses.] See Exod. vi. 18.

And Aaron was separated, that he should sanctify the most holy things, he and his sons for ever, to burn incense before the Lord, to minister unto him, and to bless in his name for ever.] The business of Aaron and his sons was very different from the rest of the Levites: for they were set apart for the special services of the priesthood; to sanctify, that is, to minister in a holy manner the most holy things. His sons burnt incense every day; and the high-priest went into the most holy place on the great day of expiation, with the blood of expiation: and when he came out, blessed the people, as the priest who offered incense did every day, at the conclusion of the sacrifice.

Ver. 14. Now, concerning Moses, the man of God, his sons were named of the tribe of Levi.] Though Moses was so great a man, the supreme governor of the people while he lived, and had such familiarity with the Divine Majesty, yet his sons were not advanced to any dignity, but he left them simple Levites, not so much as priests. Such was the wonderful humility and modesty of this holy man, that he did not aim at great things for his posterity. Which perhaps is here noted, that none might presume, because of their noble descent, to meddle with the priesthood, which was settled in the family of Aaron; as the civil government of the people was left to Joshua, a man of another tribe, and Moses's servant.

Ver. 15. The sons of Moses were Gershom and Eliezer.] See Exod. xviii. 3, 4.

Ver. 16. Of the sons of Gershom, Shebuel was the chief.] Who is called Shohael, xxiv. 20.

Ver. 17. The sons of Eliezer were Rehabiah the chief. And Eliezer had none other sons.] The word for chief in the Hebrew is, the first: that is, the first-born, after whom he had no other son; but a great many grandsons, who are frequently called sons.

But the sons of Rehabiah were very many.] Which in the Hebrew is thus expressed, were highly multiplied. From whence the Targum took a conceit (as several Jewish doctors have done) that they were multiplied to above six hundred thousand: merely, because the same phrase is used of the children of Israel in Exod. i. 7. that they multiplied exceedingly in Egypt; that is, to this number, Exod. xii. 17. Whereby they imagine God fulfilled his intentions to Moses, if he would not intercede for the Israelites, that he would make him a great nation. But these are idle speculations; wherein they abound, since they were abandoned by God.

Ver. 18. Of the sons of Izhar; Shelomith the chief.] Who is called Shelomoth, xxiv. 22.

Ver. 19. Of the sons of Hebron; Jeriah the first, Amariah the second, Jehaziel the third, and Jekameam the fourth.

Ver. 20. Of the sons of Uzziel; Micah the first, and Jesiah the second.

Ver. 21. The sons of Merari; Mahli and Mushi. The sons of Mahli; Eleazar and Kish.

Ver. 22. And Eleazar died, and had no sons, but daughters; and their brethren the sons of Kish took them.] Their cousins married them, as the Targum expounds it.

Ver. 23. The sons of Mushi; Mahli, and Eder, and Jeremoth, three.

Ver. 24. These are the sons of Levi, after the house of their fathers; even the chief of the fathers, as they were counted by number of names by their polls, that did the work for the service of the house of the Lord, from the age of twenty years and upwards.] They were numbered twice, as they were in the time of Moses: the first time all from thirty, the second time from twenty. And these here mentioned were of the last sort; who were fit to minister in some things belonging to the service of the Levites, at twenty years old: though they were not employed in the rest till thirty. See upon Numb. viii. 24. where they are ordered to begin at five-and-twenty; though they did not completely minister till thirty.

Ver. 25. For David said, The Lord God of Israel hath given rest unto his people, that they may dwell in Jerusalem for ever.] That is, constantly attend upon the service of God there settled. Which was the reason for this new order, that the Levites should begin their ministry at twenty years of age: because Israel having rest was very much multiplied, and there being greater resort to Jerusalem, the Levites had more work to do at the temple. But it must here be noted, that those words, for ever, suppose their obedience to God, (as in chap. xxviii. 4.) in which if they failed, they were not to continue in Jerusalem, but be expelled out of it.

Ver. 26. And also unto the Levites; they shall no more carry the tabernacle, nor any vessels of it for the service thereof.] It should rather be translated, As concerning the Levites: they were no longer to have that burdensome work of carrying the tabernacle and its vessels when they were removed: but had a much easier service; which they might begin sooner than formerly: it requiring not so much strength of body, as readiness of mind.

Ver. 27. For, by the last words of David, the Levites were numbered from twenty years old and above.] This was his last will about this matter; after he had well considered what they had to do, and what number was necessary to perform every part of this duty. For some of which they were able enough at twenty years of age: when they might be called probationers till they were thirty. And there would not have been a sufficient number for all the work, unless they had come to it at the age of twenty.

Ver. 28. Because their office was to wait on the sons of Aaron.] Which the Levites were able to do at the age of twenty years. To attend, for instance, at the tabernacle; but not to carry the ark or the tabernacle.

For the service of the house of the Lord.] This is a general expression of what they were to do; the particulars of which follow: to assist in the courts, and in the chambers, in making clean the holy vessels, and cleansing the courts, and taking care nothing was wanting for the service of the sanctuary.

Ver. 29. Both for the shew-bread, and for the fine flour, for the meat-offering, and the unleavened cakes, and for that which is baked in the pan, and for that which is fried.] They were to prepare the shew-bread, to be set on the table every week by the priests; and to see that there was a just quantity of fine flour for the meat-offering morning and evening; and that the unleavened cakes were rightly made: with every thing that was to be baked or fried. Of which in the second chapter of Leviticus.

And for all manner of measure and size.] They were to see also that the just measure for things liquid, and the just size for things dry, were exactly kept, and not altered. For all measures and weights (by which all that were used in the country were to be made) were kept in the sanctuary, in the custody of the Levites. Hence it is, that we read often of the shekel of the sanctuary: not that there were two sorts of shekels, one sacred, and another civil; but because weights and measures were reckoned inter sacra, among holy things: the examples, as I said, of them all being kept in the sanctuary. And so they were in the temples of the pagans, and afterward in Christian churches: as appears by Justinian's Novels, cxxviii. cap. 15. So Villalpandus and our bishop Walton have observed. Unto which may be added, that Constantine the Great had gone before him in this: for he commanded the cubit whereby the Egyptians measured the increase of Nilus, and was kept in the temple of Serapis, to be translated into one of the Christian churches, that there it might be preserved the safer by true religion; as both Socrates and Sozomen testify in their Ecclesiastical History, lib. i. cap. 18. lib. v. cap. 3. Julian, indeed, caused it to be restored to Serapis: but that temple being burnt, Ruffinus tells us the church had it again in its possession. All which shews, that this ancient piece of religion, to preserve weights and measures as sacred things, continued after the time of David; and perhaps was before it.

Ver. 30. And to stand every morning to thank and praise the Lord, and likewise at even.] At the time when the priests offered the morning and even sacrifice.

Ver. 31. And to offer all burnt-sacrifices unto the Lord in the sabbaths, in the new moons, and on the set feasts, by number.] It was no part of their business to offer burnt-sacrifices, which belonged to the priests alone. Therefore the meaning is, to praise and give thanks to God at the offering of sacrifices at those solemnities, as well as every morning and even; and to see there were a just number of sacrifices then offered as the law prescribed.

According to the order commanded unto them, continually before the Lord.] That is, in their courses, wherein they were commanded to wait continually when their turn came.

Ver. 32. And that they should keep the charge of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the charge of the holy place, and the charge of the sons of Aaron their brethren, in the service of the house of the Lord.] These words belong to those that went just before; signifying, that in their order, when their course came to attend, they served either about the tabernacle, or preparing the shew-bread in the holy place, or in any other things, wherein the priests had occasion to employ them: and the rest of their time they spent at home, in their several cities; where they studied, and taught the law.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. NOW these are the divisions of the sons of Aaron. The sons of Aaron; Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar.] To avoid all confusion, now that they were much increased, David distributed the priests, as he had done the Levites, into several courses: which, no doubt, was by a Divine direction, as well as the other; or rather, there was greater reason he should have God's order for it: they being higher ministers of his than the Levites were.

Ver. 2. But Nadab and Abihu died before their father, and had no children; therefore Eleazar and Ithamar executed the priest's office.] From these two all the families of the priests descended, who were now to be disposed into a regular performance of their duty.

Ver. 3. And David distributed them both, Zadok, of the sons of Eleazar, and Ahimelech, of the sons of Ithamar.] These two (Zadok and Ahimelech) were the chief persons, in David's days, of the posterity of those sons of Aaron, Eleazar and Ithamar.

According to their offices in their service.] He determined, when they and those priests who depended on them should perform their office in the temple-service.

Ver. 4. And there were more chief men found of the sons of Eleazar than of the sons of Ithamar; and thus were they divided.] Accordingly David divided them into certain classes and courses, as the Targum expounds it.

Among the sons of Eleazar there were sixteen chief men of the house of their fathers, and eight among the sons of Ithamar, according to the house of their fathers.] He appointed therefore sixteen courses of the sons of Eleazar, under as many heads of their families: and half as many of the posterity of Ithamar. Which Kimchi, and other Hebrew doctors, explain in this manner: In the days of Moses there were but eight courses in the whole: four of Eleazar's family, and four of Ithamar's. But in Samuel's days they were grown to sixteen: eight of the one, and as many of the other. But in the end of David's reign they were enlarged to twenty-four courses; two-thirds of which were assigned to the sons of Eleazar, because they were more numerous than the other: and the sons of Ithamar continued as they were before; having eight courses. But the Holy Scriptures never mention any settled courses till this time, (as Dr. Lightfoot observes in his Temple Service, chap. 6.) though their doctors assert it to explain that precept, Deut. xxviii. 6.

Ver. 5. Thus were they divided by lot.] That there might be no occasion for complaint: when all was ordered by a Divine disposition, according to very ancient custom. For the choice of persons by lot, into sacred offices, was used from the beginning of the world, as Grotius observes, in his book De Imper. Sum. Potest. circa Sacra, cap. 10. sect. 5.

One sort with another.] Both the sons of Eleazar and of Ithamar were thus chosen, who should wait together.

For the governors of the sanctuary.] The words in the Hebrew are, share kodesh: which signify the principal ministers about holy things.

And governors of the house of God.] There is no word for house in the Hebrew; where we only read share Elohim: which seem to signify the chief judges.

Were of the sons of Eleazar, and of the sons of Ithamar.] These two families had obtained the chief functions both in the temple, and in the civil government: wherein they could not be distributed so well any way as by lot; without danger of envy among themselves.

Ver. 6. And Shemaiah the son of Nethaneel the scribe, one of the Levites, wrote them before the king, and the princes, and Zadok the priest, and Ahimelech the son of Abiathar, and before the chief of the fathers of the priests and Levites.] In perpetual memory of the thing (as Conradus Pellicanus thinks), this Divine writer sets down the name of the public notary, by whom their names were written, and put into the urn, out of which the lots were to be drawn. Which, that there might be no suspicion of fraud, were drawn before the king, the princes, both the chief priests (the high-priest and the sagan), and before the chief persons of the several families of priests and Levites. Whence it is reasonable to conclude, that David did not make this regulation by his mere royal power, but by a Divine direction. Which he had in this, as in the order he gave about the temple; (chap. xxviii.) and he seems here not to have acted by an absolute authority, but to have advised with the high-priest, and other persons of great note, how to proceed.

One principal household being taken for Eleazar, and one taken for Ithamar.] These words are something obscure: but the meaning is, that one of the principal families of Eleazar was first taken, and then one of Ithamar's; and after that, one of Eleazar's again, and so by turns till all was done: that is, till there were eight of each. After which, those of Eleazar alone were distributed under their several heads.

Ver. 7. Now the first lot came forth to Jehoiarib, the second to Jedaiah.] The first lot that was drawn out of the urn had the name of Jehoiarib upon it: so that his family had the precedence, and waited in the first place. This was esteemed a great honour; for Josephus reckons himself noble, not only because he was descended ἐξ ἱερέων, from the priests, but ἐκ τῆς πρώτης ἐφημερίδος τῶν εἰκοσιτεσσάρων, from the first course of the four-and-twenty. For this made a great difference: Mattathias also, the father of the Maccabees, descended from Jehoiarib, as we read 1 Mac. ii. 54.

Ver. 8. The third to Harim, the fourth to Seorim.] I have nothing to observe concerning these, and the rest that follow to ver. 19. but only that Zachariah, the father of John the Baptist, was of the eighth course of these priests; viz. that of Abijah, mentioned ver. 10. as we read in the first of St.

Luke. For, as Josephus testifies, this order of the courses continued till his time; that is, till the destruction of the second temple.

Ver. 19. These were the orderings of them in their service, to come into the house of the Lord, according to their manner, under Aaron their father.] Under the inspection of the high-priest, who, being the successor of Aaron, is called by his name. He took care that this order should be observed in such manner, as is here prescribed: none of them anticipating their course, nor thrusting in themselves to attend before their time, but waiting till their time came. And then every course served a week, coming in on the sabbath; and going out the next before the burning of the incense at the morning sacrifice, when the shew-bread was set on the table, as Scaliger observes out of the Jewish writers, in his notes upon the Fragments at the end of his book De Emend. Temporum, p. 54. Upon the three great festivals, indeed, when all priests, as well as others, were bound to appear before God, they came out of their course, and, that they might not be idle, officiated in such things as properly belonged to those solemnities. But the ordinary business, for the daily burnt-sacrifice, and the free-will-offerings, was managed by those only whose course it was to wait. And thus the Jews understand those words, Deut. xviii. 6, 7. The Levite (i. e. the priests who were of that tribe) that shall come to the place which the Lord his God shall choose (that is, at the three solemn feasts), then he shall minister in the house of the Lord his God, as all his brethren the Levites do (which is meant of the priests, for they only ministered before God, not the Levites); they shall have like portions to eat; that is, of the sacrifices which were then offered at those solemn times they were to have their share, with the rest of the priests then in attendance, but the Levites did not eat of them: beside that which cometh by the sale of his patrimony; or, as it is in the Hebrew, by the sale of his fathers. That is, say they, except the portion of the daily sacrifices, and free-will-offerings, which by the ordinance of their fathers, Moses and Aaron, belonged only to those priests, who were in their ordinary attendance in their week.

As the Lord God of Israel had commanded him.] By his servant David.

Ver. 20. And the rest of the sons of Levi were these: Of the sons of Amram; Shubael: of the sons of Shubael; Jehdeiah.] Now he speaks of the rest of the Levites, who were not priests, who are mentioned in the foregoing chap. xxiii. 16, 17, &c. and here named again to distinguish them from the priests, and to shew that they also had their places assigned them by lot, ver. 31. I have nothing to note concerning those that follow between this verse and that, but only this: that several are mentioned as descended from Merari, who are not mentioned in the foregoing chapters, nor any where else. For which, no question, the author of this book had good authority, though we cannot, without the help of such records as he perused, give an account of it. (See Buxtorf's Anticritica, p. 1014.)

Ver. 31. These likewise cast lots over against their brethren the sons of Aaron, in the presence of David the king, and Zadok and Ahimelech, and the chief of the fathers of the priests and Levites.] There was the like solemnity used in their distribution, as there was in that of the priests, by casting lots: whereby they knew what Levites should wait, in every course with the sons of Aaron.

Even the principal fathers over against their younger brethren.] This is expressed very obscurely; but the meaning is, that the elder and younger had their places by lots, not by seniority of houses. They that were of greater dignity drew lots against those that were of less: and they were to take their courses, as they fell; either to the elder or the younger family.

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. MOREOVER David, and the captains of the host.] It is absurd to think, that the commanders in war meddled with ordering the tribe of Levi, and the service of the temple. Therefore by the host we are to understand (as our Mr. Thorndike well observes) the companies of priests, that waited upon the service of God at the temple: the captains of whom (i. e. the chief leaders), together with David, divided the singers, as they had done the priests, (chap. xxiv. 3. 6, 7.) Though elsewhere, (chap. xxiii. 6.) David alone is mentioned to have done it. (Rites of the Church, p. 230.)

Separated to the service.] Of God in the temple.

Of the sons of Asaph, and of Heman, and of Jeduthun.] These were the chief persons among the Levites, whose families were separated to the following service.

Who should prophesy.] Sing psalms, which David and other prophets composed. For these young men were not prophets, as their fathers were; but are said to prophesy, because they sung in the service of God those Divine prophetical hymns, which were composed by their fathers, who were men divinely inspired. Thus the Talmudists say, in Bava-Bathra, cap. 1. that all the hymns we find in the Bible were made by Adam, Melchisedec, Abraham, Moses, Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun, and David: who collected them into one volume. But this is a foolish tradition, and very new.

With harps, and psalteries, and with cymbals.] There were also pipes, or hautboys, used upon several occasions, together with the trumpets. The difference between these three here mentioned is better described by Dr. Lightfoot out of Josephus, than by any I have met withal; who observes, that the other Israelites, if allied to the priests by marriage, might, if they had skill, join in this instrumental music; but none besides the Levites in the vocal. See his Temple Service, chap. 7. sect. 2. where he likewise notes what psalms were to be sung every day of the week.

And this was the first office of the Levites; the two other are explained in the two following chapters.

And the number of the workmen, according to the service, was.] It had better be translated, the number of the men of the ministry (i. e. of those who ministered in singing and playing on instruments), according to their service, was, as follows.

Ver. 2. Of the sons of Asaph; Zaccur, and Joseph, and Nethaniah, and Asarelah, the sons of Asaph, under the hands of Asaph.] Under his government, as their precentor: or, who taught and instructed them in singing and music.

Which prophesied according to the order of the king.] The Targum understand this, as if Asaph prophesied by the Holy Ghost, and was constituted the head of these by the king. But the word prophecy is of very large extent; signifying sometimes, as I said before, nothing more, but singing divinely-inspired hymns. Thus Miriam is called a prophetess, (Exod. xv. 20.) because she led up the women to praise God, with timbrels and dances. And, indeed, music and singing were in ancient times had in such esteem and veneration, that they who excelled in this faculty were looked upon as persons divinely moved. So Quintilian observes, as a known truth, lib. i. Instit. cap. 10. "Quis ignorat, musicen tantum jam illis antiquis temporibus non studii modo, verum etiam venerationis habuisse, ut iidem musici, et vates judicarentur." Who is so ignorant as not to know that music, in those ancient times, was not only so much studied, but had in such veneration, that the same men, who were musicians, were accounted prophets and wise men?

Ver. 3. Of Jeduthun: the sons of Jeduthun, Gedaliah, and Zeri, and Jeshaiah, Hashabiah, and Mattithiah, six, under the hands of their father Jeduthun.] Here are but five named: but it appears afterward (ver. 17. when the lots were cast) there was another, whose name was Shimei: who being now very young, and not yet able either to sing or to play, is not named in this verse. But, that he might be instructed and learn both, he is chosen to be the head of a course, when he should be fit for it. Thus D. Kimchi explains this matter.

Who prophesied with a harp, to give thanks and to praise the Lord.] The harp was a most noble instrument, in which Jeduthun seems to be peculiarly skilled, and therewith praised God; which is called prophesying.

Ver. 4. Of Heman: the sons of Heman; Bukkiah, Mattaniah, Uzziel, Shebuel, and Jerimoth, Hananiah, Hanani, Eliathah, Giddalti, and Romamti-ezer, Joshbekashah, Mallothi, Hothir, and Mahazioth.] He had the most numerous issue of these three; and they all had families who were employed in this service.

Ver. 5. All these were the sons of Heman the king's seer.] He was a prophet, in whose company the king delighted: and with whom he advised in difficult affairs.

In the words of God.] Especially in Divine matters.

To lift up the horn.] In the temple they used also wind music: which many think to have been trumpets made of horn: but the priests only blew with trumpets in the temple, while the Levites sung to those other instruments. Therefore others understand this, of the hymns they sung to magnify the power, greatness, and exaltation of David's kingdom: or rather, of the kingdom of the Messiah, whom Zachary in his song (Luke i. 69.) calls the horn of salvation. For the power of any thing in Scripture is expressed by a horn; in which lies the strength of some creatures. And from these words Victorinus Strigelius gathers, that Heman was David's seer in politic affairs, which belonged to the confirmation and settlement of his kingdom: "Cornu enim significat regimen et regnum;" for a horn signifies government and kingdom. But the first sense seems to me to be most natural, that at stated times they blew aloud with trumpets made of horns: for such, I suppose, they might use, though the priests only could blow with the silver trumpets. And thus the famous Bochartus interprets these words, at set times to blow aloud with trumpets made of horns; in his preface to his Hierozoicon.

And God gave to Heman fourteen sons and three daughters.] Some have fancied there are fifteen mentioned in the foregoing verse: but the Jews look upon Romamti-ezer as one name; and so we take it: which is justified by ver. 31.

Ver. 6. All these were under the hands of their father for song in the house of the Lord, with cymbals, psalteries, and harps, for the service of the house of God.] The whole number of these was four-and-twenty, who, under their several fathers, Asaph, Jeduthun, and Heman, regulated the choir in their singing and music: being the instructors and governors of those who were under them. It is likely they set the psalms to music which David composed: or, if he himself modulated them, they sung them in the tunes he directed, with the musical instruments here mentioned.

According to the king's order to Asaph, Jeduthun, and Heman.] These were prophets, who composed many of the songs, which their sons sung by their direction: as appears from 2 Chron. xxix. 10. where it is said they sung praises, "in the words of David and Asaph the seer."

Ver. 7. So the number of them, with their brethren that were instructed in the songs of the Lord, even all that were cunning, was two hundred fourscore and eight.] This was the whole number of those who were skilful in singing, who, under the persons beforementioned, were distributed (as it here follows) into several courses, after the same manner that the priests had been: with whom they were to attend in their order. For twelve of these singers, with their governor, came and waited every week; at the end of which they were succeeded by other twelve, till the course was finished: and then it began again, where it did at first. Now twelve times twenty-four amount to two hundred fourscore and eight.

It is no wonder that there were so many of them found very skilful in singing and music: for David himself was a great musician and poet, and every one knows how much the inclination of the supreme governor serves to the promoting of arts among the people.

Ver. 8. And they cast lots, ward against ward.] Being thus distributed into twenty-four courses, they cast lots, one course against another, which should wait first, and in order succeed one another.

As well the small as the great, the teacher as the scholar.] So that they did not begin and succeed one another, according to the order of age, or of learning, but as God disposed them by their lot. The last words [the teacher as the scholar] the LXX. translate τελείων καὶ μανθανόντων, those that were perfect, and those that were learners. They were called perfect who were masters of their art, able to instruct others, who learnt of them.

Ver. 9. Now, the first lot came forth for Asaph to Joseph.] Who was not his eldest son; (see ver. 2.) After the word Joseph, we are to supply the words that follow in the rest of these classes, who, with his brethren and sons, were twelve: otherwise the number of two hundred fourscore and eight (ver. 7.) will not be complete.

The second to Gedaliah.] Who was the eldest son to Jeduthun, (ver. 3.)

Who, with his brethren and sons, were twelve.] These words, as Rasi observes, are to be referred to Joseph as well as Gedaliah: for he mentions them both, in one and the same verse; and therefore he only saith once with respect to both, he and his sons and brethren: where by brethren is meant their kindred.

Ver. 10. The third to Zaccur, he, his sons and his brethren, were twelve.] He was the eldest son of Asaph, (ver. 2.)

Ver. 11. The fourth to Izri, &c.] Called Zeri, ver. 3. who was the second son of Jeduthun.

Ver. 12. The fifth to Nethaniah, &c.] This lot fell upon the third son of Asaph, (ver. 2.)

Ver. 13. The sixth to Bukkiah, &c.] Who was the eldest son of Heman, (ver. 4.)

Ver. 14. The seventh to Jesharelah, &c.] Called Asarelah, ver. 2. the youngest son of Asaph.

Ver. 15. The eighth to Jeshaiah, &c.] Who was the third son of Jeduthun, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 16. The ninth to Mattaniah, &c.] Who was the second son of Heman, (ver. 4.)

Ver. 17. The tenth to Shimei, &c.] The youngest son of Jeduthun, as I have noted upon ver. 3.

Ver. 18. The eleventh to Azareel, &c.] The third son of Heman, who is called Uzziel in the same verse.

Ver. 19. The twelfth to Hashabiah, &c.] The fourth son of Jeduthun, (ver. 4.)

Ver. 20. The thirteenth to Shubael, &c.] The fourth son of Heman, called Shebuel, ver. 4.

Ver. 21. The fourteenth to Mattithiah, &c.] Who was the fifth son of Jeduthun, (ver. 3.)

Ver. 22. The fifteenth to Jeremoth, &c.] The fifth son of Heman, (ver. 4.)

Ver. 23. The sixteenth to Hananiah, &c.] The next son of Heman.

Ver. 24. The seventeenth is Joshbekashah, &c.] Who was the eleventh son of Heman.

Ver. 25. The eighteenth to Hanani.] Who was the seventh son of Heman.

Ver. 26. The nineteenth to Mallothi, &c.] Who was the twelfth son of Heman.

Ver. 27. The twentieth to Eliathah, &c.] Who was the eighth son of Heman.

Ver. 28. The one-and-twentieth to Hothir, &c.] Who was the thirteenth son of Heman.

Ver. 29. The two-and-twentieth to Giddalti, &c.] Who was the ninth son of Heman.

Ver. 30. The three-and-twentieth to Mahazioth, &c.] Who was the youngest son of Heman.

Ver. 31. The four-and-twentieth to Romamti-ezer, &c.] The tenth son of Heman.

Thus all things were disposed, for the preserving order, and avoiding all disputes about precedence: there being no respect had in this Divine distribution to their birth, but the younger in course preceded the elder.

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1. CONCERNING the divisions of the porters.] As some of the Levites were chosen to be singers (of which an account is given in the foregoing chapter), so others were appointed to be porters. Which were fixed offices (as Dr. Lightfoot observes) which they might not change: none of them being permitted to intrude into the office of the other; and neither of them into the priesthood. It was an office of great dignity, and men of the best quality were put into it: they having the charge of the holy things, (ver. 20. 22. 24. 26.)

Of the Korhites was Meshelemiah.] Called Shelemiah, ver. 14.

The son of Kore, of the sons of Asaph.] Not of Asaph the musician, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, for he was of the family of Gershon, (ver. 41.) but of another Asaph, called Eliasaph, and sometimes Jasaph, of the line of Kohath, (chap. vi. 23. ix. 19.)

Ver. 2. And the sons of Meshelemiah were Zechariah the first-born, Jediael the second, Zebadiah the third, Jathniel the fourth.

Ver. 3. Elam the fifth, Jehohanan the sixth, Elioenai the seventh.

Ver. 4. Moreover, the sons of Obed-Edom were Shemaiah the first-born, Jehozabad the second, Joah the third, and Sacar the fourth, and Nethaneel the fifth.

Ver. 5. Ammiel the sixth, Issachar the seventh, Peulthai the eighth; for God blessed him.] With a numerous offspring, as the Targum glosses upon the last words: because he entertained the ark in his house with great reverence. Upon which account God did him the honour to let him see of his sons and grandsons fourscore and two: who were chief men among the Levites. This the Targum had said before, one only being wanting of this number. (See upon chap. xiii. 14.) But what the Scripture saith is sufficient to shew how God blessed him with a numerous posterity, without the help of such monstrous stories as some of the Jews relate.

Ver. 6. Also unto Shemaiah his son were sons born, that ruled throughout the house of their father.] Being men of great authority in that family.

For they were mighty men of valour.] Which was requisite in men who had this office: for they were to watch and guard the house of God, night and day. And not only to open and shut the doors of the mountain of the house, and of the court of the women (for the priests opened and shut the gates of the other courts), but to attend there to prevent any thing that might be done to the prejudice of the peace, safety, and purity of the place. And likewise, as appears by what follows, they had the guard of some treasures, which required men of courage to defend them.

Ver. 7. The sons of Shemaiah; Othni, and Rephael, and Obed, Elzabad (whose brethren were strong men), Elihu, and Semachiah.] Their names are recorded, with two of their brethren, or cousins: who are likewise noted to be strong men. That is, not only men of great bodily strength, but of great courage and resolution. So it is translated in the margin, out of the Hebrew, sons of valour. But strength of body was a principal requisite in this service; for the doors of the temple were so massy and weighty, that the hands of many men (as Josephus saith) were needful to open and shut them.

Ver. 8. All these of the sons of Obed-Edom; they, and their sons, and their brethren, able men for strength for the service, were threescore and two of Obed-Edom.] This was a great number, which he lived to see descended from him, and from his sons.

Ver. 9. And Meshelemiah had sons and brethren, strong men, eighteen.] Still their strength is mentioned, as a qualification for this service.

Ver. 10. Also Hosah, of the sons of Merari, had sons; Simri the chief (for though he was not the first-born, yet his father made him the chief).] Because his elder brother was feeble, or some other way unfit for the service. For, as Jacob gave the kingdom to Judah, and the priesthood to Levi, and put Reuben his first-born from his right, because of his crime; so there was some weighty cause, no doubt, why this man had the right of primogeniture given him, which was not to be altered upon the account of affection, (Deut. xxi. 16, 17.)

Ver. 11. Hilkiah the second, Tebaliah the third, Zechariah the fourth: all the sons and brethren of Hosah were thirteen.] Who are not all named, but these who are the principal.

Ver. 12. Among these were the divisions of the porters, even among the chief men.] They were distributed into courses, as the priests and Levites were: and these were principal commanders over them: being the most illustrious among their brethren, and therefore particularly named.

Having wards one against another.] Having charges or custodies answerable to their brethren: that is, to the Levites, who attended as these did.

To minister in the house of the Lord.] This was not a vile ministry (as the word porter sounds among us), but they were like the standing guard of a king in his palace: and so the word, I observed before, had better be rendered. (See ix. 17.) Who kept the treasures of the temple, as it follows, (ver. 20. 26.) and officers and judges also were chosen out of them, (ver. 29, 30. 32.) which shews they were eminent persons: some of them being very learned and wise; (ver. 14.) though, I suppose, they were not judges of the law, but of other matters.

Ver. 13. And they cast lots, as well the small as the great.] Without respect to their age or dignity.

According to the house of their fathers.] Every family having a distinct lot drawn for it.

For every gate.] That it might be determined at what gate of the temple they were to wait.

Ver. 14. And the lot eastward fell to Shelemiah.] Who is called Meshelemiah, ver. 1.

Then for Zechariah his son (a wise counsellor) they cast lots, and his lot came out northward.] He was as much reputed for prudence, as others were for strength or valour: and it was as necessary in the management of many of their affairs.

Ver. 15. To Obed-Edom southward; and to his sons the house of Asuppim.] Many learned men take Asuppim to signify the treasury of the temple, or the place where things dedicated were laid up. This they ground, first, upon the import of the word, which betokens collections, or gatherings, as we translate it in the margin: and, secondly, because Obed-Edom (whose sons are here said to be placed at Asuppim) is said in 2 Chron. xxv. 24. to have the custody of the treasures. But, though this be granted, it still remains a very difficult matter to find where Asuppim was. After a long discussion of it, Dr. Lightfoot concludes, that Asuppim were two gates in the western wall, which stood most south, or nearest to Jerusalem; and that the house of Asuppim was a large building which run between them, and was a treasury of divers rooms for laying up things that served the use of the temple. (See Temple Service, chap. 5. sect. 3.)

Ver. 16. To Shuppim and Hosah the lot came forth westward, with the gate Shallecheth, by the causey of the going up.] This gate which in Solomon's time was called Shallecheth, in the time of Herod's temple was called the gate of Coponius. Which is said here to be by the causey of the going up: because it was by that ascent which Solomon made for his own passage up from his own house to the temple, (1 Kings x. 5. 2 Chron. ix. 4.) Which Josephus thus expresses (as Dr. Lightfoot observes), A gate led to the king's house from the temple, the valley between them being filled up for the passage. From whence the gate was called by the name of Shallecheth, which signifies casting up; because of the causey that was cast up to lead to it from the king's palace: this being the ordinary way to the house of God.

Ward against ward.] I suppose the meaning is, that they guarded each of these gates of Asuppim: or, as others take it, they guarded by turns; when one went off, another coming on. But the most learned Dr. Alix (whom I consulted about it) thinks these words signify, that their stations were at the four points of heaven, opposite one to the other.

Ver. 17. Eastward were six Levites, northward four a day, southward four a day, and towards Asuppim two and two.] That is, two at each gate of Asuppim beforementioned. The distribution of the porters into four-and-twenty courses, is not so plainly and distinctly set down in Scripture, as is the distribution of the priests and singers. Yet (as Dr. Lightfoot observes) it may be fairly concluded from two places: whereof this is one, in these two verses, 16, 17. where the fathers of the porters are summed up to the very same number that the first fathers of the other courses were, viz. to four-and-twenty. Among all the porters (saith Kimchi on this place) there were four-and-twenty, according to the rest of the courses; six on the east side, four on the north, four on the south, at Asuppim two and two (four in all), four on the west, and two at Parbar: behold, four-and-twenty. The other place is 2 Chron. viii. 14. where the porters go in the very same equipage (as he speaks), as to the matter of division into courses, with the priests and the singers. (See Temple Service, chap. 7.)

Ver. 18. At Parbar westward, four at the causey, and two at Parbar.] This gate, it appears from this place, was in the west quarter, and the west gate to the causey, or Shallecheth. It signifies, some think, the same with Parvar, which betokens suburbs: for it led to the suburbs, that is, that part of the city which was called Millo. Which was the valley at the west end of Mount Moriah, in which Jerusalem and Zion met; replenished with buildings in David's and Solomon's time, 2 Sam. v. 9. 1 Kings xi. 27. (See Dr. Lightfoot, in his Survey of the Temple, chap. 5. sect. 2.)

Ver. 19. These are the divisions of the porters among the sons of Kore, and among the sons of Merari.] These courses were made up of the Levites of these two great families.

Ver. 20. And of the Levites, Ahijah was over the treasures of the house of God, and over the treasures of the dedicated things.] By the treasures of the house of God, are meant such things as were of ordinary use and employment in the temple; such as the vessels, vestments, tithes, wine, oil, and other things that were commonly used; together with such as were offered to the treasury, either as a due (as was the half shekel), or voluntarily, as money or vessels, for the repair of the house of God, and advancement of the service there. By the treasures of the dedicated things, are meant whatsoever their kings or great commanders had consecrated and dedicated for Divine uses; which lay as a stock for the temple, and monuments of their devotion.

Ver. 21. As concerning the sons of Laadan; the son of the Gershonite Laadan, chief fathers, even of Laadan the Gershonite, were Jehieli.] This was an eminent man of that family. (See xxiii. 7.)

Ver. 22. The son of Jehieli; Zetham, and Joel his brother.] See xxiii. 8. where he is called Jehiel.

Which were over the treasures of the house of the Lord.] From hence Dr. Lightfoot gathers, that as some of the treasures of the house of God were under the care and charge of the porters, (see ix. 26.) so the rest, and the treasures of dedicated things, were committed to the care and charge of other Levites, who were neither porters nor singers.

Ver. 23. Of the Amramites, and the Izharites, the Hebronites, and the Uzzielites.] Several persons of these families were employed as they that are mentioned in the foregoing verse.

Ver. 24. And Shebuel the son of Gershom, the son of Moses, was ruler of the treasures.] This is the sole honour, that we read of hitherto, conferred upon any of the posterity of Moses; one of which was advanced to a great authority, being the overseer of all the treasures, and their officers. By treasures, I suppose, is here meant those of the house of the Lord; for another was over the dedicated things, (ver. 26.)

Ver. 25. And his brethren by Eliezer; Rehabiah his son, and Jeshaiah his son, and Joram his son, and Zichri his son, and Shelomith his son.] These, I suppose, were under Shebuel, as their chief ruler.

Ver. 26. Which Shelomith and his brethren were over all the treasures of the dedicated things.] Here is another of Moses's posterity (by his younger son) preferred to a great office: to have the charge of those things which were dedicated for the service of God, in which his brethren were to assist him.

Which David the king.] Out of his great piety, had dedicated in abundance, to the building of the temple, (xxii. 14.)

And the chief fathers, the captains over thousands and hundreds.] Such as by the counsel of Jethro (Exod. xviii.) were constituted to assist in the government of the people.

And the captains of the host, had dedicated.] The great military men imitated the rulers in the civil government in this piety: or such as are called captains of the host, xxv. 1.

Ver. 27. Out of the spoils won in battles did they dedicate to maintain the house of the Lord.] As David gave a vast treasure to the building of the house, so these men dedicated a part of their spoil to the support and repair of it, as there should be occasion, after it was built.

Ver. 28. And all that Samuel the seer, and Saul the son of Kish, and Abner the son of Ner, and Joab the son of Zeruiah, had dedicated.] He mentions particularly some great benefactors, to honour their memory, and to be examples to posterity. And Samuel seems to have begun, and led the way to the rest that followed. For he, I suppose, by the spirit of prophecy, foresaw the nation would be so well settled in the land, that a house would be built for the service of God: and therefore he dedicated part of the spoils, which he got in the battles he fought, while he was judge of the people of Israel. Which example Saul, Abner, and Joab, imitated. And they all took it from the ancient piety of the great patriarch Abraham, who gave the tenth of the spoils which he won to Melchisedec, God's high-priest. The like did the princes of the people of Israel, after their victory over the Midianites; as we read Numb. xxxi.

And whosoever had dedicated any thing.] There were many, no doubt, who were disposed to the same piety besides these named.

It was under the hand of Shelomith, and of his brethren.] He was a man of eminent probity and prudence; otherwise so great a trust would not have been reposed in him.

Ver. 29. Of the Izharites, Chenaniah and his sons were for the outward business.] That is, the business without the city of Jerusalem; which neither belonged to the singers, nor the porters, whose business was within the city: but what this outward business was, is not easily resolved. Kimchi and other Hebrew doctors think, it was to cut down trees in the woods, and to hew stones, and to see the fields ploughed, and the vineyards and gardens planted and dressed, which by devout persons had been dedicated to the service of God: but there doth not seem to be any thing belonging to such matters in these words. For though shoterim, or officers, might possibly have something to do in such matters, yet, what business there was in these things for the judges (on whom these officers attended) none can imagine. And this outward business being over Israel, as it here follows, it does not denote their care of the fruits consecrated by the Israelites, nor the government of those who gathered those fruits; but some authority over the Israelites themselves; such as is described in the following verse. See Bertram, de Repub. Jud. p. 126. whose opinion is approved by Conringius; which is, that they were assessors with the ordinary judges.

Over Israel.] Not over all the people of Israel, but over a part of them: for those about Jordan were under another jurisdiction, as appears by the next verse.

For officers and judges.] For such employments as are mentioned in the following verse.

Ver. 30. And of the Hebronites, Hashabiah and his brethren, men of valour, a thousand and seven hundred, were officers among them of Israel on this side Jordan westward.] This was a vast number: therefore their officers were of several sorts (as it follows), not only in Divine, but in civil affairs.

In all business of the Lord, and in the service of the king.] The work or business of the Lord, was to take care of all things belonging to religion: among which Divine employments, no doubt, this was the chief, to judge the people according to the law of God; and to see their sentence put in execution. For their judges judged for the Lord, as Jehoshaphat tells them, 2 Chron. xix. 6. and they had officers, called shoterim, to see their judgment take effect. But the word shoterim doth not signify merely the ministers of the judges: but also such persons who had some ministry committed to them; to correct offenders, and to punish them; or to bring them before the judges to be punished by them. For they are not only joined with judges (as I have often before observed), but frequently put before them in this book: and, therefore, it is hard to find one word to comprehend the whole work of these officers; who were employed both in peace and in war, as our learned Nic. Fuller observes, in his Miscellanies, lib. ii. cap. 20.

As for the business of the king, some think, it was the gathering his tribute, or perhaps publishing his orders and commands, and the like. (See Grotius, de Jure Sum. Pot. circa Sacra, p. 390.)

Ver. 31. Among the Hebronites was Jerijah the chief, even among the Hebronites, according to the generations of their fathers.] He was the principal person among the sons of Hebron, as we find before, xxiii. 19.

In the fortieth year of the reign of king David, they were sought for, and there were found among them mighty men of valour at Jazer of Gilead.] In the last year of king David's reign, not only these things mentioned in this chapter were established, but all the other ordinances which we read of in the foregoing, as the Hebrew commentators observe. And his care extended itself to the utmost parts of his dominion, where he sought for men fit to be put into these offices, on the other side of Jordan: and found many persons of great courage at Jazer in Gilead, and the territory belonging to it; among whom Jerijah was the chief: Jazer was a city given to the children of Merari, (Josh. xxi. 39.)

Ver. 32. And his brethren, men of valour, were two thousand seven hundred chief fathers, whom David made rulers over the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh.] This was a great number to be employed in so small a country; when on the other side of Jordan (besides those under Chenaniah) there were but one thousand and seven hundred. But the reason was, that they lived a great way from Jerusalem, and therefore needed more to inspect, and admonish them of their duty, lest they should forget their relation to the temple, or grow sluggish in the worship of God, or embrace the religion of their neighbours, as Pellicanus observes.

For every matter pertaining to God, and affairs of the king.] It was the more necessary, there should be such a number of officers among them, to keep them in their obedience to the king, as well as in their duty to God. For there was danger of their desertion from their sovereign, who lived at a great distance, and was separated from them by the river Jordan. And nothing could be more pernicious, as he likewise observes, than the rending of the kingdom, and neglect of the Divine service.

From these words it appears very plainly, as Johannes Vorstius notes, (in his dissertation de Synedriis Hebræorum, sect. 36.) that the same persons took care of the things or causes pertaining to God, and those concerning the king. For nothing hindered that one and the same college of judges might judge both kind of things, whether spiritual, as we distinguish, or civil. And he thinks, no interpretation of the things of God, and the things of the king, is so probable, as that which I have given before: that by the things of God, are meant such things as might be judged by the Divine law; and the things of the king, such as could not be determined by the law, but were left to the judgment of the king. Who could not abrogate the ancient laws, being bound to study the book of the law all the days of his life, (Deut. xvii.) and judge according to it. But all things being not there defined, or not so clearly and plainly that they could be determined by those laws, the king, or those whom he entrusted in his stead, gave sentence in such matters, and could make new laws, provided they did not contradict the old.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. NOW the children of Israel after their number, to wit, the chief fathers and captains of thousands and hundreds, and their officers, that served the king in any matter of the courses, which came in and went out month by month throughout all the months of the year, of every course were twenty and four thousand.] After the settlement of ecclesiastical affairs, here is an account given how the militia, as we may call it, of the kingdom was settled in such order, that it might be serviceable. They were distributed into twelve legions, consisting each of twenty-four thousand men; who were commanded by one of the chief of the fathers: under whom there were captains of thousands, such as we now call colonels, which were twenty-four in every legion, commanding a thousand men. And then centurions under them, or captains of hundreds; and under them inferior officers. Each of these generals attended, with the legions, one month, for the security of the king and kingdom: at the end of which they marched off, and another legion, with their general, succeeded. So that their course came but once in a year, for one month, which made it no considerable burden to them: there being so many valiant men then in the nation, that without much damage such a number might be in arms, for so short a season. Pellicanus thinks, this order was instituted in the beginning of David's reign, but was interrupted by many wars he had abroad; and not renewed till his last years, when he established it again, and left his kingdom to Solomon thus governed. See Bertram, de Repub. Jud. p. 133. who observes, that after this we never read of the Cherethites and Pelethites; these troops being settled in their room.

Ver. 2. Over the first course, for the first month, was Jashobeam the son of Zabdiel: and in his course were twenty and four thousand.] Now he sets down the names of the chief commander of every legion: and Jashobeam seems to have been the first of his mighty men, mentioned xi. 11. 2 Sam. xxiii. 8.

Ver. 3. Of the children of Perez was the chief of all the captains of the host for the first month.] The forenamed Jashobeam was of the children of Pharez, the son of Judah: which tribe had the honour to have the first chief commander chosen out of it.

Ver. 4. And over the course of the second month was Dodai an Ahohite, and of his course was Mikloth also the ruler: in his course likewise were twenty and four thousand.] This Dodo (as he is called in 2 Sam. xxiii. 9.) was another of David's mighty men: who had for his lieutenant (when he was absent) Mikloth; who, we may suppose, is therefore here mentioned, because he was a person of great eminence, and had some considerable command in this course.

Ver. 5. The third captain of the host, for the third month, was Benaiah the son of Jehoiada, a chief priest.] Or rather, a chief prince, as the Hebrew word cohen often signifies: (See upon 2 Sam. viii. 18. xx. 26.) for it is certain, neither Benaiah nor his father was high-priest, or second priest; but Abiathar and Zadok were in those offices.

And in his course were twenty and four thousand.

Ver. 6. This is that Benaiah, who was mighty among the thirty, and above the thirty.] He was one of David's worthies, who had done such mighty acts, that this Divine writer did not think fit here to mention him, without a mark of honour set upon him. (See 2 Sam. xxiii. 20. 23.)

And in his course was Ammizabad his son.] He was his deputy, when his father could not attend this duty himself; having another office of great dignity, wherein he served as captain of the Cherethites and Pelethites, (2 Sam. viii. 18.) Of whom, I observed before, we never read after the time of David: but it is likely were kept up while they lived, though there was no need of them, after these courses were settled.

Ver. 7. The fourth captain, for the fourth month, was Asahel the brother of Joab.] This confirms Pellicanus's opinion, that David instituted these courses in the beginning of his reign: for Asahel was killed while David reigned in Hebron, before he was king over all Israel, and settled at Jerusalem. He also was one of David's worthies, (2 Sam. xxiii. 24.)

And Zebadiah his son after him.] He had the honour to succeed his father in this great command, when he was slain.

Ver. 8. The fifth captain, for the fifth month, was Shamhuth the Izrahite, &c.] It is very probable, that this was that valiant man called Shammah, 2 Sam. xxiii. 11. and Shammath in this book, xi. 27.

Ver. 9. The sixth captain, for the sixth month, was Ira the son of Ikkesh the Tekoite, &c.] He is mentioned among the thirty mighty men in 2 Sam. xxiii. 26. and in this book, xi. 28.

Ver. 10. The seventh captain, for the seventh month, was Helez the Pelonite, of the children of Ephraim, &c.] He is called the Paltite in 2 Sam. xxiii. 26. and, for the honour of that tribe, he is said here to be of the children of Ephraim.

Ver. 11. The eighth captain, for the eighth month, was Sibbecai the Hushathite of the Zarhites, &c.] One of that family that was eminent in the tribe of Judah descended from Caleb, (ii. 53.) He slew one of the sons of the giant, in a battle with the Philistines, (2 Sam. xxi. 18.)

Ver. 12. The ninth captain, for the ninth month, was Abiezer the Anetothite, of the Benjamites.] He also is mentioned among the thirty mighty men in 2 Sam. xxiii. 27.

Ver. 13. The tenth captain, for the tenth month, was Maharai the Netophathite, of the Zarhites, &c.] One of the same mighty men, (2 Sam. xxiii. 28.)

Ver. 14. The eleventh captain, for the eleventh month, was Benaiah the Pirathonite, of the children of Ephraim.] Who is also there mentioned, ver. 30. but here it is added of what tribe he was.

Ver. 15. The twelfth captain, for the twelfth month, was Heldai the Netophathite, of Othniel, &c.] He is called Heled in this book, chap. xi. 30. and Heleb in 2 Sam. xxiii. 29.

Ver. 16. Furthermore, over the tribes of Israel.] Besides the twelve great captains beforementioned, who commanded, each of them, twenty and four thousand men; every tribe had a ruler, (who are called the princes of the tribes of Israel, ver. 22.) who had the chief authority among them, under the king.

The ruler of the Reubenites was Eliezer the son of Zichri: of the Simeonites; Shephatiah the son of Maachah.] He reckons up the tribes in order according to their birthright, by Leah.

Ver. 17. Of the Levites; Hashabiah the son of Kemuel.] He is mentioned before, (xxvi. 30.)

Of the Aaronites; Zadok.] They were not a distinct tribe, but of a distinct order, from the rest of the Levites: and therefore had a peculiar chief to preside over them, viz. Zadok. Who (as Bertram thinks) had the chief authority at the tabernacle in Gibeon, as Abiathar had at Jerusalem, where the ark was.

Ver. 18. Of Judah; Elihu, one of the brethren of David.] Called Eliab in 1 Sam. xvi. 6.

Of Issachar; Omri the son of Michael.] He was the fifth son of Leah, and therefore is reckoned next to Judah, who was the fourth, (Gen. xxx. 17, 18.)

Ver. 19. Of Zebulun; Ishmaiah the son of Obadiah.] He was the next son of Leah, (Gen xxx. 20.)

Of Naphtali; Jerimoth the son of Azriel.] Though Dan was the first-born of Bilhah, (Gen. xxx. 6.) yet that tribe is put last, and Naphtali, who was the next son, put before him. For what reason we cannot tell.

Ver. 20. Of the children of Ephraim; Hoshea the son of Azaziah: of the half tribe of Manasseh; Joel the son of Pedaiah.] This is meant of that half tribe, which had its portion on this side Jordan, near to Ephraim.

Ver. 21. Of the half tribe of Manasseh in Gilead.] On the other side Jordan, where the Reubenites and Gadites were.

Iddo the son of Zechariah.] It doth not appear of what family he was, but it is likely one of that tribe.

Of Benjamin; Jaasiel the son of Abner.] It seems the family of Abner, who was the greatest man in the kingdom of Israel, continued in high authority after his death.

Ver. 22. Of Dan; Azareel the son of Jeroham. These were the princes of the tribes of Israel.] That is, of those tribes beforementioned. But Gad and Asher are omitted, of which we can give no certain account: perhaps they were under the government of the ruler of some neighbouring tribe. For Asher, dwelling in very narrow bounds between Naphtali and Zebulun, might be under the command of him that governed either of them: and Gad, some think, was comprehended under the Reubenites.

Ver. 23. But David took not the number of them.] That is, of Israel, whom he had spoken of before.

From twenty years old and under.] But only of those who were above the age of twenty years.

Because the Lord had said he would increase Israel like to the stars of the heavens.] This was the reason, Pellicanus thinks, that God was so angry with David for numbering the people: which he had promised should be so many, that they should not be numbered. Which promise God would have to be believed, without attempting to prove the truth of it. But these words seem to me to confute that opinion: for they rather signify, that David forbore to number all the people, because he would not question that promise, and contented himself with an account of those that were fit to go to war, xxi. 4. (See my notes upon 2 Sam. xxiv. 10.)

Ver. 24. Joab the son of Zeruiah began to number, but he finished not.] For he did not number those of Levi and Benjamin; as we read before in this book, chap. xxi. 6.

Because there fell wrath for it against Israel.] This seems to import, that before Joab had finished his account the plague began; which put a stop to his proceedings.

Neither was the number put in the account of the Chronicles of king David.] An account of the number as far as he went, was given by Joab to the king: but the king being sensible of his error, would not have it recorded in the public registers of the kingdom, as other things of daily occurrence were. Yet the memory of it is preserved in these holy books, to teach all posterity not to put their trust in the arm of flesh.

Ver. 25. And over the king's treasures was Azmaveth the son of Adiel: and over the storehouses in the fields, in the cities, and in the villages, and in the castles, was Jehonathan the son of Uzziah.] The former of these was the principal officer in the exchequer, as we now speak, who received the king's money from the under-officers, and was accountable for it; and lived at Jerusalem, where he issued it out, according to the king's orders. But there was another in the country out of Jerusalem, who received the tribute of all kinds, which the people were to pay him: which he laid up in storehouses, that were built in several places for that purpose.

Ver. 26. And over them that did the work of the field, for tillage of the ground, was Ezri the son of Chelub.] Besides the tribute paid by the people of corn, wine, oil, &c. the king had land of his own; where he kept servants to till the ground. And this person was set over them, to see they were not idle, and that they were honest in gathering the fruits of the earth, and sending them to the storehouses.

Ver. 27. And over the vineyards was Shimei the Ramathite.] He looked after the vine-dressers.

Over the increase of the vineyards for the wine-cellars was Zabdi the Shiphmite.] His office was to see the wine pressed out of the grapes, and carried into the cellars; where it was laid up.

Ver. 28. And over the olive-trees, and the sycamore-trees that were in the low plains, was Baal-hanan the Gederite.] This shews that David was a great husband, as we speak, and had ground proper for all sort of fruits; which was managed by his own servants. For, as I have often observed, the greatest men in those times studied the improvement of their ground, of what sort soever it was.

And over the cellars of oil was Joash.] It appears, from many places, that a great part of their revenue lay in oil: which required great care, as wine did, in the looking after it.

Ver. 29. And over the herds that fed in Sharon was Shitrai the Sharonite: and over the herds that were in the valleys was Shaphat the son of Adlai.] He had great store of cattle also in his pastures, particularly in Sharon, which was a place noted for its fruitfulness, as we read in the prophet Isaiah, chap. xxxiii. 9. xxxv. 2. And so St. Jerome testifies, "Omnis regio Saron," &c. all the region of Saron, about Lydda, Joppa, and Jamnia, was apt for feeding of flocks. (See Isa. lxv. 10.) There was another Sharon besides this near the Mediterranean, which was in the east beyond Jordan (as I observed upon chap. v. 16. of this book), where the Gadites inhabited, who abounded in cattle: and therefore were planted by Moses in this region, and in Bashan, which was another rich country for pasture. (See L'Empereur, upon Bava-kama.) And therefore here David, it is likely, bred a great many cattle, both in the mountains and in the valleys; and had particular officers to look after them, they being very many. For here, as he observes out of Maimonides, there were great numbers of calves bred, which women had the care of, and were brought from hence to other places to be sold.

Ver. 30. Over the camels also was Obil the Ishmaelite.] An Ishmaelite was the fittest person to look after the breed of camels, because that country abounded with them, and they best understood their nature. And this person seems to have had his name from his office. For as ibil, in Arabic, signifies a camel, so abal, and abil, a keeper of camels: as Bochart notes in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 2.

And over the asses was Jehdeiah the Meronothite.] This was a great part of men's riches in old times; for we find Ana feeding his father's asses in Gen. xxxvi. 24. In which book we find them reckoned among the wealth of the ancient patriarchs: and the Israelites took no less than threescore and one thousand of them from the Midianites, Numb. xxxi. 34. And in this book we read of two thousand taken from the Hagarites, (chap. v. 21.) And when the Jews returned out of the captivity of Babylon, they were become so rich, that they brought away with them six thousand seven hundred and twenty asses; as Nehemiah relates, chap. vii. 69.

Ver. 31. And over the flocks was Jaziz the Hagarite. All these were the rulers of the substance which was king David's.] The flocks of sheep, no doubt, were very numerous; but among all the flocks and herds there is no mention made of swine, as Bochartus observes. Nor had the patriarchs any that we read of, when mention is made of their possessions. Nor had Job any in Arabia, though he had a vast number of other cattle. Nor did the Israelites ever take any of these as spoil from their enemies. And therefore Gadara, where swine were kept in Judea (as we read in the gospel), was a Greek city, not a Jewish, as Josephus tells us. (See Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. i. cap. 51.)

Ver. 32. Also Jonathan, David's uncle, was a counsellor, a wise man, and a scribe.] He was one of the privy-council; being a man of great wisdom, and also skilful in the law: for so the word sopher (which we render scribe) signifies. A very learned author thinks it signifies a secretary of state, or rather a chancellor.

And Jehiel the son of Hachmoni was with the king's sons.] He also, no doubt, was a man of great understanding, being a tutor, as we speak, or governor to the king's sons.

Ver. 33. And Ahithophel was the king's counsellor: and Hushai the Archite was the king's companion.] Ahithophel seems to have been president of the council: but Hushai was his favourite (being called David's friend), in whose company he most delighted, and whom he trusted with his greatest secrets.

Ver. 34. And after Ahithophel was Jehoiada the son of Benaiah, and Abiathar.] After Ahithophel had made away himself, these two were the principal counsellors; as Kimchi and other Jewish doctors understand these words. But others think the meaning is, that next to him these two were accounted the ablest men that David advised withal: but after him, for he was esteemed the man of greatest prudence.

And the general of the king's army was Joab.] The Targum hath a strange exposition of this verse, which is this: When there was war to be made, they consulted Ahitho-phel, and after that they asked counsel of urim and thummim by Jehoiada, the head of the Sanhedrin; and by Abiathar the high-priest: and so the Cherethites and Pelethites, by the authority of urim and thummim, went to fight under the command of Joab, the general of the army. In the exposition of which there are a great many foolish descants, which I shall not mention.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1. AND David assembled all the princes of Israel, the princes of the tribes.] These seem to be the same, one being the explication of the other: and they are those persons mentioned ver. 16, 17, &c. of the foregoing chapter.

And the captains of the companies that ministered to the king by course.] That is, those great commanders, over four-and-twenty thousand apiece, mentioned in the beginning of the foregoing chapter.

And the captains over the thousands, and captains over the hundreds.] The commanders of every one of those thousands, with the centurions who commanded the several companies, consisting of a hundred.

And the stewards over all the substance and possession of the king, and of his sons.] Who are mentioned also in ver. 25, 26, &c. of the foregoing chapter: and appear by this to have been considerable persons.

With the officers.] Who were about his person.

And with the mighty men, and with all the valiant men.] Those who were eminent for their services in war, of whom he had spoken in chap. xi. xii.

Unto Jerusalem.] All these he called to attend him in the chief city of the kingdom, that he might commend Solomon to them as his successor, and this government which he had settled. (See Bertram, de Repub. Jud. p. 150.) This seems to have been a distinct assembly from that mentioned chap. xxiii. 2. being more general, and consisting of many persons, who were not then in such offices as are here named.

Ver. 2. Then David the king stood upon his feet, and said.] He was sitting in his throne, I suppose, when they came in, but then stood up in respect to so great an assembly, and that he might be the better heard. When he first declared Solomon to be his successor, and caused him to be anointed, he lay upon his bed, being very palsic and decrepit, as we read 1 Kings i. But intending now to have him anointed again, in the midst of his princes and great commanders, (chap. xxix. 22.) whom he could not assemble, when on a sudden he commanded him to be anointed before; he roused up himself, and rose from his couch, and came out of his chamber, and made orations, and gave advice for things to come, as Dr. Lightfoot observes.

Hear me, my brethren, and my people.] He calls the great men his brethren, both because they had a share in the government with him, and to express his affection to them. It is likely they were attended by some other persons, whom he calls my people.

I had in mine heart to build a house of rest for the ark of the covenant of the Lord.] A fixed place, where the ark might be settled, and not carried about, as it had been hitherto, (2 Sam. vii. 1.)

And for the footstool of our God.] Here the conjunction and, as our Mr. Mede observes, is exegetical, and the same with that is: according to which expression, the prophet Jeremiah saith, (Lam. ii. 1.) that the Lord had cast down the beauty of Israel, and remembered not his footstool (that is, the ark of the covenant, which was their glory), in the day of his anger, book i. p. 500. For the Divine Glory sitting upon the wings of the cherubims, over the mercy-seat, (Psal. lxxx. 2.) his feet, as we speak after the manner of men, rested upon the ark: and therefore the Targum thus paraphrases it, The footstool of the throne of glory. And thence it is sometimes called, The ark of the covenant of the Lord of hosts, who sitteth upon the cherubims, (1 Sam. iv. 4.)

And had made ready for the building.] Laid up great treasures, which he designed to defray the charges of the building. (See chap. xxii.)

Ver. 3. But God said unto me.] In the Targum, The Memra, Word of the Lord.

Thou shalt not build a house for my name, because thou hast been a man of war, and hast shed blood.] See my notes upon chap. xxii. 8. To which I shall here add, that bloodshed was accounted a thing so heinous, that though one had killed another only accidentally, yet he was bound to flee for it to a city of refuge, or else he might have been killed himself. And among the ancient Greeks, (as Petitus shews, in his book of the Attic Laws, lib. vii. p. 512.) he that killed another involuntarily, was banished from his country for a year. But David is here forbidden to build God a temple, merely because he had been engaged in war and bloodshed, though it was on a pious account. And thus also among the ancient Greeks (as Grotius observes), they stood in need of an expiation, who, without any blame, had defiled their hands in blood. And, accordingly, among the Greek Christians there was a canon, long observed in that church, which kept men from the holy communion for a time, who had killed an enemy in any war. (See lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 25. sect. 9.) But Osiander, considering this passage in Grotius, thinks, that in these words, David's warring and bloodshed are not alleged, "ratione alicujus vitii," &c. upon the account of any blemish, which hindered him from building a house for God, but merely upon the account of the vast business wherein he was engaged: for, being employed continually in warlike actions, he was not at leisure for such a building; which was to be the work of peace and quietness. David also is expressly said to have managed the wars of the Lord, being but his instrument to punish the enemies of his people Israel: and therefore could not be blemished by being thus employed to God, nor made incapable thereby to build his temple. For he gloried and triumphed in these wars, and in the victories he got: for which he sung praise to God, Psal. lx. Add to all this, that the account which Solomon gives to Hiram, why his father did not build God a house, was, that he was otherwise employed, (1 Kings v. 3.) But I leave this to better judgments.

Ver. 4. Howbeit the Lord God of Israel chose me before all the house of my father to be king over Israel for ever.] See 1 Sam. xvi. 13. Psal. lxxviii. 68.

For he hath chosen Judah to be the ruler.] See Gen. xlix. 10.

And of the house of Judah the house of my father; and among the sons of my father he liked me, to make me king over all Israel.] For till his days it was not known out of what family of Judah a king should be chosen, from whom the Messiah should come.

Ver. 5. And of all my sons (for the Lord hath given me many sons) he hath chosen Solomon my son to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel.] For he was beloved of God from his birth, (2 Sam. xii. 25.) and plainly designed by God to be his successor, (2 Sam. vii. 13. and here in this book, chap. xxii. 9.) So that David sware he should reign after him, and accordingly performed it, (1 Kings i. 17. 35.) This he declares now to them all, when he was going out of the world: that they might reverence Solomon as a person placed upon the throne by Divine appointment; and not out of any partial and fond affection of his to him, preferred before his elder brethren.

Ver. 6. And he said unto me, Solomon thy son, he shall build my house and my courts: for I have chosen him to be my son, and I will be his father.] See 2 Sam. vii. 13. and this book, chap. xxii. 9.

Ver. 7. Moreover, I will establish his kingdom for ever, if he be constant to do my commandments, and my judgments, as at this day.] The last words import, that hitherto Solomon was very towardly (as we speak), and gave great hopes he would continue steadfast in his obedience to God, as his father David had done.

Ver. 8. Now therefore, in the sight of all Israel, the congregation of the Lord.] Who were here present by their representatives: to whom he now addresses his speech, that they might give the same exhortation to their neighbours.

And in the audience of our God.] Who was present in all their public assemblies, as I have noted upon Judg. xx. 1. (See there.)

Keep and seek for all the commandments of the Lord your God.] It is not enough to know the will of God, if we do not keep it; that is, observe his commands, and live in the practice of our duty. But that we may know it, it is necessary to seek it; that is, to inquire after it, and study the laws of God. For no man (as Grotius here observes) shall be excused by a supine ignorance.

That ye may possess this good land, and leave it for an inheritance for your children after you for ever.] It was in vain to expect the continuance of God's favour to them, who had brought them into this good land, unless they continued steadfast in his obedience. This was the only way to settlement in their possessions.

Ver. 9. And thou, Solomon my son, know thou the God of thy father.] To know God is, in Scripture language, to acknowledge and love him. As God is said to know the way of the righteous; that is, to approve and love it, (Psal. i. ult.) Solomon had the greater reason to do this, because God had been so very gracious to his father David, and chosen him, before all his brethren, to be his successor.

And serve him with a perfect heart, and a willing mind.] His love was to be expressed by obedience to God, and that entirely and cheerfully: out of choice, not by constraint; not to gain the good opinion of men, but the favour of God. For hearty piety, and not merely the outward appearance of it, is the surest support of a prince's power and authority: and will dispose his subjects to love and reverence him as sincerely as he doth God.

For the Lord searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thoughts.] He presses him with two arguments unto sincerity in his obedience. The first is in these words; because God cannot be deceived with external services; for he looks into the hearts, and discerns the most secret motions there: which cannot be hid from him, but he is privy to every thought, and to the very beginning of them.

If thou seek him, he will be found of thee; but if thou forsake him, he will cast thee off for ever.] This is the other argument; God is not tied to any man, but upon condition of his hearty obedience. As he behaves himself towards God, so God will deal with him.

Ver. 10. Take heed now; for the Lord hath chosen thee to build a house for the sanctuary.] That is, for the ark to dwell in, for that was the principal furniture of the sanctuary. The Targum thus expresses it, The Memra, Word of the Lord, hath chosen thee, &c.

Be strong and do it.] Being a young man, he might be discouraged from undertaking so great work: but he bids him go about it strenuously, because God had chosen him to do it.

Ver. 11. Then David gave to Solomon his son the pattern of the porch, and of the houses thereof.] Abarbinel is very confident that the word ulam, which we translate porch, is a general word used in this place for the whole house. The description of which David gave Solomon, with all the apartments belonging to it: especially of the houses thereof, which were two: the outward, called the holy place, and the inward, called the holy of holies, which were distinct houses, being separated by a partition: and accordingly the former is called the greater house, (2 Chron. iii. 5.) being much larger in its dimensions than the other. At the entrance of which there was a porch, the model of which David gave him, as well as of the houses.

And of the treasuries thereof, and of the upper chambers thereof, and of the inner parlours thereof.] There were several rooms against the walls of the house round about, as we read 1 Kings vi. 5. which are here called by several names, according to the use wherein they were employed. And the forenamed Abarbinel here observes, out of Middoth, and Tamid, and other books, that the temple was built like a high tower, reaching up to heaven, there being three upper stories one above another, and the first story three times higher than that of Moses, viz. thirty cubits.

And of the place of the mercy-seat.] Where that should be placed, in the holy of holies.

Ver. 12. And the pattern of all that he had by the Spirit.] In the Hebrew, of all that he had in the Spirit with him; that is, inspired into him. It being a house for God to dwell in, it was fit that it should not be of a mere human, but of a Divine contrivance, as the tabernacle built by Moses was. Therefore God suggested to David by his Spirit, how he would have it made in all the parts beforementioned, and in those that follow: for those words refer to both. (See ver. 19.)

Of the courts of the house of the Lord, and of all the chambers round about.] How large the courts should be, and how many, and what rooms adjoining to them, was all ordered by a special direction from God.

Of the treasuries of the house of God, and of the treasuries of the dedicated things.] From the last words most.

are of opinion, it may be concluded, that in these places all the utensils belonging to the tabernacle which Moses made, and the tabernacle itself (which was no longer used after Solomon's temple was built), were laid up and preserved. By which, perhaps, was signified, as Constantine L'Empereur conjectures, (upon Middoth, p. 87.) that all the ceremonies of Moses should one day be decently laid aside, and something better come in their room.

Ver. 13. Also for the courses of the priests and the Levites, and for all the work of the service of the house of the Lord, and for all the vessels of service in the house of the Lord.] He disposed of the courses of the priests and Levites (beforementioned) by the same Spirit, and how they should be employed, and what vessels they should use in God's service.

Ver. 14. He gave of gold by weight for things of gold, for all instruments of all manner of service; silver also for all instruments of silver by weight, for all instruments of every kind of service.] He gave materials also, in a just proportion to the instruments that were to be made, either of gold or silver.

Ver. 15. Even the weight for the candlesticks of gold, and for the lamps of gold, by weight for every candlestick, and for the lamps thereof; and for the candlesticks of silver by weight, both for the candlestick, and also for the lamps thereof, according to the use of every candlestick.] By this we learn that there were candlesticks of silver, as well as of gold. The former of which were lesser, to be carried in their hands from place to place, as there was occasion. But the latter were fixed in the sanctuary, and in Solomon's house were ten in number, (1 Kings vi. 49.)

Ver. 16. And by weight he gave gold for the tables of shew-bread, for every table; and likewise silver for the tables of silver.] There was but one table for the shew-bread: but there were several others attending upon it, whereon were set such vessels as belonged to it. For, as he made more candlesticks than were in the tabernacle; so, it appears by this, he also augmented the tables, which were no less than ten, (2 Chron. iv. 8.)

Ver. 17. Also pure gold for the flesh-hooks, and the bowls, and the cups: and for the golden basons he gave gold by weight for every bason; and likewise silver by weight for every bason of silver.] Assigning such a portion of gold or silver to every bason, as would make it as large as he proposed. Many of the Jews, by the Hebrew word kepuri (which we translate basons), understand spoons, which had the figure of oxen and lions on the head of them; which they imagine was the beginning of Solomon's offence. But the word rather imports some vessel, wherein they received the blood of the sacrifice of expiation.

Ver. 18. And for the altar of incense refined gold by weight.] It was covered with gold, as the cherubims were, 1 Kings vii. 49.

And gold for the pattern of the chariot of the cherubims, that spread out their wings, and covered the ark of the covenant of the Lord.] It seems David contrived these two cherubims, besides those which Moses had made. Of which see what I have noted upon 1 Kings vi. 23. 28. They are called the chariot, because God is said not only to sit, but to ride upon the cherubims, (Psal. xviii. 10.) as the Lord of hosts: and therefore they are described in Ezekiel, as having wheels on which they ran. The other made by Moses were most properly his seat, but these represented him as filling the whole house.

Ver. 19. All this, said David, the Lord made me to understand in writing by his hand upon me, even all the works of this pattern.] God made him understand all this so plainly and distinctly, as if it had been written on his mind as the ten commandments were upon the tables of stone in the mount. But some of the Jews think the meaning is, that God revealed these things first to some of the prophets, Samuel, (iv. 22.) or Nathan, or Gad, who delivered all to David in writing, as the mind of God. However it was, God was pleased thus himself to give instructions about the structure of the temple, and all belonging to it; that it might breed in the people's mind a greater reverence, when they came to worship him there: and, as Joseph de Voysin observes, the Jews in Beracoth say, that their minds might be lifted up when they came to the temple, from earthly things, to things spiritual and celestial.

Ver. 20. And David said to Solomon his son, Be strong, and of good courage, and do it.] He repeats what he had said before, (ver. 10.) the more to excite and encourage him to this work, which was to do the work of God.

Fear not, neither be dismayed; for the Lord God, even my God, will be with thee; he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee, until thou hast finished all the work for the service of the house of the Lord.] He thought that he might possibly fear disturbance from enemies abroad, of which David had a great many: but he bids him be confident, he should not be disquieted in his work; which should go on prosperously, by the blessing of God, till it was finished. Of which he might be the more assured, if he reflected how God had blessed David himself all his life long.

Ver. 21. And, behold, the courses of the priests and the Levites, even they shall be with thee for all the service of the house of God: and there shall be with thee, for all manner of workmanship, every willing skilful man for any manner of service; also the princes and all the people will be wholly at thy commandment.] It is a probable conjecture of Conradus Pellicanus, that he now presented Solomon with a list of all the courses of God's ministers, as God had directed him to establish them; assuring him, that God would dispose them to be serviceable unto him in all that he had to do for the carrying on of the work. Which should have the help and assistance of all other skilful persons, whom he would make willing to further it: and that he would make all the princes and the people obedient to him in all things. This was one reason, no doubt, of calling this assembly together, that they might be engaged to be aiding to Solomon in promoting so pious a work.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. FURTHERMORE, David the king said unto all the congregation, Solomon my son, whom alone God hath chosen, is yet young and tender, and the work is great: for the palace is not for man, but for the Lord God.] He stirs them up to the assistance of his son, by these considerations, that he was a person chosen by God, not by him, for this work: and yet he needed their help, because he was but a youth, (see 1 Kings iii. 7.) and the work itself was to be very magnificent, suitable to the majesty that was to dwell therein, viz. the Lord himself; who dwells not (as the apostle speaks) in temples made with hands: but was present there by a glorious light, which represented his majesty.

Ver. 2. Now, I have prepared with all my might for the house of my God, the gold for things to be made of gold, and the silver for things of silver, and the brass for things of brass, the iron for things of iron, and wood for things of wood; onyx stones, and stones to be set, glistering stones, and of divers colours, and all manner of precious stones, and marble stones in abundance.] We read of his great preparation for this building before, (chap. xxii. 14, &c.) only nothing is said there concerning precious stones; the use of which, in the ornament of any part of the temple, is not known. Ludolphus, speaking of the word phuc, which we translate glistering, saith, that as David provided all things for the fabric of the temple, so he provided for the clothing of the priests with rich garments, and also with such things as were good for bodily health, as this was, which was not only κοσμητικὸν, for ornament, but θεραπευτικὸν, for medicine and preservation of health. But perhaps phuc being famous among those things which women used for setting off their beauty, it may possibly here be a metaphorical word, for all such stones as may set off the building. (See his Commentary upon the Ethiopic History, lib. i. cap. 7. n. 51.)

Ver. 3. Moreover, because I have set my affection to the house of my God, I have of mine own proper good, of gold and silver, which I have given to the house of my God, over and above all that I have prepared for the holy house.] Besides what he had devoted and dedicated to this use, he gave, out of what remained for his own occasions, a further sum for the building of the house, which is mentioned in the next verse.

Ver. 4. Even three thousand talents of gold, of the gold of Ophir.] The gold of Ophir, here mentioned, was that which came out of Arabia, where, Bochartus hath proved, there was a country of that name abounding with gold. For in David's time the Ophir of India was not known, Solomon being the first that attempted a long voyage thither. So are we to understand the word Ophir in the book of Job, (xxii. 24. xxviii. 16.) For in his time they had not learned to traffic into those far-distant countries, where the other Ophir in India was. (See my notes on 1 Kings ix. 18.) This gold here mentioned, was of a purer sort than that in chap. xxii. 11. which was coarser than the gold of Ophir.

And seven thousand talents of refined silver, to overlay the walls of the houses withal.] There are two things, which Dr. Lightfoot hath remarked in these two verses. One is, that it is said, this preparation was above what he had prepared for the holy house, and yet he saith he had prepared it for the house of God. The other is, that mention is made here of silver to overlay the house withal; whereas it is evident, that within the house itself all the overlaying was of gold. Therefore it is thus to be understood, that besides the store of gold that David had provided for the gilding of the house, both in the holy and most holy place; he had also laid by a stock, both of gold and silver, to gild the chambers over the porch (for there were divers upper-chambers, the height of it being a hundred and twenty cubits), and to beautify the side-chambers, and the other rooms that were about the courts. All this gold and silver amounted to such a vast sum of our money, that it is not easy to give an account of it. (See Calvisius, ad Annum Mundi 2933.)

Ver. 5. The gold for things of gold, and the silver for things of silver, and for all manner of work to be made by the hands of artificers.] That there might be enough to pay all sort of workmen their wages, as well as to provide them materials to work withal.

And who then is willing to consecrate his service this day unto the Lord?] The Hebrew phrase to fill his hand (as it is in the margin) signifies to make an offering; unto which he excites them by his example, as a thing which would be very grateful unto God.

Ver. 6. Then the chief of the fathers and princes of the tribes of Israel, and the captains of thousands and of hundreds, with the rulers over the king's work, offered willingly.] All those great men, mentioned chap. xxvii. made their cheerful contributions.

Ver. 7. And gave, for the service of the house of God, of gold, five thousand talents and ten thousand drams; and of silver, ten thousand talents; and of brass, eighteen thousand talents; and one hundred thousand talents of iron.] What every particular person gave is not here recorded; but the whole amounted to these sums, which was very great.

Ver. 8. And they with whom precious stones were found gave them to the treasure of the house of the Lord, by the hand of Jehiel the Gershonite.] For he and his sons were keepers of the treasure of God's house, (chap. xxvi. 21, 22.) and were appointed to receive such offerings.

Ver. 9. Then the people rejoiced, for that they offered willingly.] They that made the offering rejoiced; for they did it with a good will, and not by constraint.

Because with perfect heart they offered willingly to the Lord.] This is the virtue which St. Paul calls ἁπλότης, singleness of heart: which hath respect purely to the service of God, the honour of religion, and the good of his church, (2 Cor. viii. 2. ix. 11, 13.)

And David the king also rejoiced with great joy.] It was a singular comfort to him in his old age, to see the people so well disposed, and his exhortation so effectual upon their hearts; which gave him a good hope this work would not fail to be speedily accomplished.

Ver. 10. Wherefore David blessed the Lord before all the congregation: and David said, Blessed be thou, Lord God of Israel our father, for ever and ever.] All this he ascribed to the grace of God, whom he therefore blessed and praised, for giving them such a heart.

Ver. 11. Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty: for all that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine; thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all.] This is a most noble declaration of the sense he had of the Divine excellences and perfections, with a thankful acknowledgment of his immensity, power, goodness, eternity, and majesty, which are the properties or attributes of God. The Targum, and the Talmudists, apply these to the wonderful works of God, in this manner:—Thine, O Lord, is the greatness, for thou createdst the world; and the power, for thou broughtest our fathers out of Egypt, and carriedst them through the Red Sea; and revealedst thyself in glory upon Mount Sinai, to give the law to thy people; and obtainedst victory over Amalek, Sihon, Og, and the Canaanites; and madest the sun and the moon stand still, by the spirit of thy glory, till thy people were vindicated of their enemies. For all things, both in heaven and in earth, are the work of thy hands; thou supportest and rulest all things; and thou art exalted above all the angels in heaven, as well as all the kings upon earth.

Ver. 12. Both riches and honour come of thee, and thou reignest over all: and in thine hand is power and might; and in thine hand it is to make great, and to give strength unto all.] The Targum thus paraphrases it: The riches of the wealthy, and the glory of kings and dominions, are given them by thee; thou rulest over all, and they are in thy power: who art able to multiply, and strengthen all things; that is, to increase those to great numbers who are diminished, and to strengthen those who are feeble and weak.

Ver. 13. Now therefore, our God, we thank thee, and praise thy glorious name.

Ver. 14. But who am I, and what is my people, that we should be able to offer so willingly after this sort?] In the Targum it is thus paraphrased: Who hast given such plenty, that we are able to offer these gifts. He should have added, and also given us a heart to part with them for thy service.

For all things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee.] We only return to thee what thine own hand hath blessed us withal, as the Targum expresses it. And so the ancient Christians were wont to say at their offertory, τὰ σὰ ἀπὸ τῶν σῶν, thine from thine: that is, thy own goods, from thy own people. In like manner we ought to acknowledge God in all spiritual things; referring every good thought, good purpose, good work, to his Divine grace, from whom we receive it; beseeching him, as David doth here in this prayer, (ver. 18.) to preserve it in us.

Ver. 15. For we are strangers before thee, and sojourners, as were all our fathers: our days on the earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding.] He acknowledges that they were not proprietors of that good land wherein they dwelt, but only his tenants; who held all they had of him; and that but a very short term; after which they must leave all, as their fathers had done. The words may be thus paraphrased, in short: We have but the use of these things for a little while, and so have parted with no great matter unto thee. Those words, as a shadow, the Targum thus paraphrases: As the shadow of a bird which flieth through the air, so are our days upon the earth: that is, soon gone, as the Psalmist speaks.

Ver. 16. O Lord our God, all this store that we have prepared, to build thee a house for thine holy name, cometh of thine hand, and is all thine own.] He could not often enough repeat his sense of this, that they had given him nothing but what was his own; which he had most bountifully bestowed on them.

Ver. 17. I know also, my God, that thou triest the heart, and hast pleasure in uprightness. As for me, in the uprightness of mine heart I have willingly offered all these things.] But the highest satisfaction was, that God had bestowed upon him a heart, to do what he had done willingly, with a sincere respect to the service of God, and not out of vainglory. For the truth of which he appeals to God himself, who could not be deceived with false shows and pretences.

And now have I seen with joy thy people, which are present here, to offer willingly unto thee.] It was a great additional comfort to him, that God had given such a heart unto his people.

Ver. 18. O Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel, our fathers, keep this for ever in the imagination of the thoughts of the heart of thy people, and prepare their heart unto thee.] He could not desire a greater blessing for them, than that he who had given them such a pious heart, would preserve them in the same good disposition: and confirm and establish them therein. So the last words are better translated in the margin, establish their heart unto thee. Which the Targum paraphrases, dispose their heart to fear thee.

Ver. 19. And give unto Solomon my son a perfect heart, to keep thy commandments, thy testimonies, and thy statutes, and to do all these things, and to build the palace, for the which I have made provision.] To have a due respect to all God's precepts (in the observation of every one of which, perfectness of heart consists) he knew would be the best security for the performing what David designed. For then he would not be disobedient to his father's dying words.

Ver. 20. And David said to all the congregation, Now bless the Lord your God. And all the congregation blessed the Lord God of their fathers, and bowed down their heads, and worshipped the Lord and the king.] They worshipped both with the same gesture, but with a different mind; God with religious worship, the king with civil: giving God thanks for all his benefits, and thanking the king for all the care he had taken, during his reign, for their prosperity. But some think, this worship was not paid to David, but to Solomon; it being the manner thus to acknowledge the king, when he was enthroned. So they bowed their knees to our Saviour, in mockery of him, as a pretended king.

Ver. 21. And they sacrificed sacrifices unto the Lord, and offered burnt-offerings unto the Lord, on the morrow after that day.] For the ark was now at Jerusalem, where this great congregation was assembled, (chap. xxviii. 1.) and therefore they offered peace-offerings and burnt-offerings to God in that place, on the morrow after their meeting: for there was not time to do it on that day, when the foregoing things were done.

Even a thousand bullocks, a thousand rams, and a thousand lambs, with their drink-offerings, and sacrifices in abundance for all Israel.] That is, together with the numerous burnt-offerings, a great many peace-offerings (which are here meant by sacrifices), sufficient for the entertainment of all the Israelites, who were there present, to feast upon; as the manner was, and as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 22. And did eat and drink before the Lord on that day with great gladness.] For the greatest part of peace-offerings was given to the persons that offered them, to entertain their friends withal, as hath been often observed. And they are said to eat and drink before the Lord, because it was a sacred feast, kept before the ark at Jerusalem, the place which God had chosen, according to the law, Deut. xii. 11, &c.

And they made Solomon the son of David king the second time.] This is supposed to have been done after David's death, when Solomon was anointed for himself, as reigning pleno jure, in subjection to none: as he was anointed the first time by David's command. But there are great men of another opinion; that he was twice anointed while David lived: first, in the presence of a few of David's servants, as we read 1 Kings i. and now, in the presence of all the great men of Israel, the princes of the tribes, captains of thousands and hundreds. (See Bertram, de Repub. Jud. p. 130, 131.) And, indeed, we are led to this by the connexion with the foregoing words: for the persons who now made him king the second time, were those beforementioned, who sacrificed and feasted thereupon with great joy: after David's long speech to them. Dr. Lightfoot, indeed, observes, that there is mention three times of Solomon's being made king: twice in this book, chap. xxiii. 1. and here in this place; and in 1 Kings i. So that there may be a question made, whether he was made king three times, or only twice. But this place seems to settle the doubt; for when, upon the aspiring of Adonijah, he was anointed, it was the first time that David shewed who should succeed him: see 1 Kings i. 21. 27. and that must be concurrent, or the same, with that making him king mentioned in this book, chap. xxiii. 1. and this anointing in the midst of the princes and great commanders, was the second time. Abarbinel is of the same opinion, that he was anointed at first before a few; and now more publicly before the whole nation.

And anointed him unto the Lord to be the chief governor.] After the death of David, who, perhaps, now resigned the government of the kingdom to him, finding he had not long to live.

And Zadok to be priest.] This hath inclined many to think the anointing forementioned was after the death of David: because Abiathar was not put out of his office till the beginning of Solomon's reign. But I see no reason why we may not think he was anointed to be priest, as Solomon was to be king, in David's lifetime: though he was not actually put into the office till after he was dead, when Abiathar was thrust out. It was necessary he should be anointed, because the succession to the high-priesthood, in the line of Eleazar, had been long interrupted; and Abiathar, of the line of Ithamar, was still alive. This reason the Jews give why he was anointed; which was not necessary, they say, but in this case: it being sufficient otherwise, only to clothe him with the priestly vestments. But see Selden, de Success. in Pontif. lib. ii. cap. 9. who will incline one to be of another opinion.

Ver. 23. Then Solomon sat on the throne of the Lord.] So the throne of this kingdom is called, because this was God's land, and Israel his people, over whom he still remained their king: and Solomon reigned over them, not by inheritance, but by his special appointment. The Targum thus expresses it, He sat upon the royal throne, according to the word of the Memra, Word of the Lord.

As king instead of David his father, and prospered; and all Israel obeyed him.] From the beginning of his reign, his people were all obedient to him: whereas, it was a long time before Saul could be settled on his throne; and it was longer before all Israel submitted to David.

Ver. 24. And all the princes, and the mighty men.] All the soldiery, as well as the heads of the tribes, and the great commanders.

And all the sons likewise of king David.] Who were then alive.

Submitted themselves unto Solomon the king.] Sware allegiance to him. For so the Hebrew phrase signifies, they gave the hand under Solomon. For putting the hand under the knee or the thigh of a person, was a token of subjection to him: and was anciently used, when they solemnly promised any thing to a superior, by an oath; (Gen. xxiv. 2. xlvii. 29.) which custom, if it did not continue in use in Solomon's days, yet that which was signified by it, was expressed in the ancient phrase.

Ver. 25. And the Lord magnified Solomon exceedingly in the sight of all Israel, and bestowed upon him such royal majesty as had not been on any king before him in Israel.] Which appears from the foregoing books, which shew, that neither David, nor Saul, nor any of the judges (who governed before them), lived in such splendour, as was in the court of Solomon.

Ver. 26. Thus David the son of Jesse reigned over all Israel.] That is, this is a brief account of what David did, during his reign, especially in the latter end of it.

Ver. 27. And the time that he reigned over Israel was forty years; seven years reigned he in Hebron, and thirty and three years reigned he in Jerusalem.] See 2 Sam. v. 5.

Ver. 28. And he died in a good old age, full of days, riches, and honour.] Abundantly satisfied, that he had lived long enough, in as great plenty and glory as he could desire.

And Solomon his son reigned in his stead.] Having this particular satisfaction, to see his son sit on his throne, likely to reign in greater glory than he had done. This was the Lord's doing, who disposed the hearts of all the great men, and his elder brethren, and the whole kingdom, to submit to him, who was but a young man.

Ver. 29. Now the acts of David the king, first and last.] A larger account of all that he did, from the beginning to the end of his reign.

Behold, they are written in the book of Samuel the seer, and in the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the book of Gad the seer.] Here are three distinct titles given to those three persons: Samuel being called roeh, and Nathan is called nabi, and Gad is called choseh. But whether they have distinct significations, denoting several ways of receiving Divine inspirations, or several degrees of it, I am not able to determine. But this we may certainly affirm, with Theodoret (in his preface to the book of the Kings), that the prophets, besides the edition of their prophecies, published also very frequently the history of their own times. And Samuel began to write the life of David, which Nathan and Gad finished: out of which these things here recorded were extracted.

Ver. 30. With all his reign and his might.] That is, how he governed his people, and how he warred with their enemies; and got glorious victories over them: with all the rest that he did, both as a prophet and as a king.

And the times that went over him, and over Israel.] All the troubles which he endured, and which befel the people of Israel; (which are called times in Psal. xxx. 16.) or, more simply, the meaning may be, all the revolutions that were in public affairs, in his days.

And over all the kingdoms of the countries.] That is, the neighbouring countries, such as the Philistines, Moab, Amalek, Syria, Damascus, the Ammonites, &c. The loss of which history is very much bewailed; but God knows better than we, what was fit to be preserved for the use and benefit of his church.

SECOND BOOK OF THE CHRONICLES.

As there are some things here omitted, which are recorded in the first book of the Kings; so there are several things contained in this book, of which no mention is made there; particularly in the history of Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah. And many other things there mentioned, are here more fully and clearly explained; as will be observed in the acts of Abijah, Asa, Joash, and other kings of Judah: upon which account St. Jerome saith of this book, It is such, and of so great use, that he who, without it, will pretend to the understanding of the prophets, will expose himself to scorn.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. AND Solomon the son of David was strengthened in his kingdom.] After the death of Adonijah and Joab, he was confirmed in his authority and government.

And the Lord his God was with him, and magnified him exceedingly.] In the Targum it is paraphrased, The Word of the Lord was his helper, and raised him to a great height of glory.

Ver. 2. Then Solomon spake unto all Israel, to the captains of thousands and of hundreds, and to the judges, and to every governor in all Israel, the chief of the fathers.] Before that great assembly, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, in the midst of which he was anointed, went home, Solomon discoursed with them about his intentions of going to Gibeon to worship God, by offering a great sacrifice, and desired them to accompany him.

Ver. 3. So Solomon, and all the congregation with him, went to the high place that was at Gibeon.] This verse shews, that this was the thing about which he spake unto them. (See 1 Kings iii. 4.)

For there was the tabernacle of the congregation of God, which Moses, the servant of the Lord, had made in the wilderness.] But it was there without the ark, which was in the city of David, while the tabernacle was in Gibeon. How these came to be separated, so that the ark was without the tabernacle and its vessels; and the vessels, and the altar with the tabernacle, without the seat of the glory of God, is not easy to be resolved. Conradus Pellicanus supposes, that even then, in those days, God would have them to know, he did not regard the ceremonious worship, when the people were under the government and instruction of such men as Samuel and David: and they were free from idolatry. Then the Lord did not exact so strictly the legal services, as he did in times of peace and tranquillity, when they were most necessary for the people; lest, after their custom, when they lived in ease and prosperity, they should fall into superstition, and admire the rites of the gentiles. And with such questions as these he thinks the Jews may be very strongly urged: How came it to pass that, in the days of Samuel and David, the legal worship was not observed more precisely? How came the ark to be separated from the altars, which were made for the ark, and not the contrary? Who dispensed with David to build another tabernacle for the ark, and neglect that built by Moses? And how came Solomon to sacrifice in another place, than that which the Lord had chosen?

Ver. 4. But the ark of God had David brought up from Kirjath-jearim to the place which David had prepared for it: for he had pitched a tent for it at Jerusalem.] See 2 Sam. vi. 2. 17.

Ver. 5. Moreover, the brazen altar that Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, had made, he put before the tabernacle of the Lord.] One would think that this altar did not stand in its right place, till Solomon set it where it used to stand: but the words may be translated as in the margin, was there before the tabernacle.

And Solomon and the congregation sought unto it.] I think this is better translated by Victorinus Strigelius, Solomon and the congregation were wont to frequent it; with sacrifices by which they sought the favour of God.

Ver. 6. And Solomon went up thither to the brazen altar before the Lord, which was at the tabernacle of the congregation.] This is said to be before the Lord, though the ark was not there, because God was pleased graciously to accept the sacrifices offered before the place, where he was wont to dwell, though wanting the token of his glorious presence.

And offered a thousand burnt-offerings upon it.] He offered them by the ministry of the priests. And burnt-offerings here signify (as Pellicanus with great reason thinks) the sacrifice of peace-offerings, the general name being put for the special. For it is not reasonable to think, a thousand offerings were wholly burnt upon the altar: but, in all probability, he made a feast for all that were there present, as had been done when this great assembly offered so freely at his inaugnration, (1 Chron. xxix. 22.)

Ver. 7. In that night did God appear to Solomon.] Immediately after the offering of these sacrifices.

And said unto him, Ask what I shall give thee.] See 1 Kings iii. 5. This was a declaration that he accepted his prayers which accompanied those sacrifices, and would grant whatsoever he desired.

Ver. 8. And Solomon said unto God, Thou hast shewed great mercy unto David my father, and hast made me to reign in his stead.] An admirable example unto those who make petitions unto God, that they should in the first place thank him for the great benefits they have received, (1 Kings iii. 6.)

Ver. 9. Now, O Lord God, let thy promise unto David my father be established, viz.] That God would be a father to him, and make him his son, (2 Sam. vii. 14.)

For thou hast made me king over a people like the dust of the earth in multitude.] See 1 Kings iii. 8.

Ver. 10. Give me now wisdom and knowledge, that I may go out and come in before this people.] This is a proverbial speech, for governing the people, both at home and abroad, in peace and in war. (See Numb. xxvii. 17. Deut. xxxi. 2.)

For who can judge this thy people, that is so great?] Among such a numerous people, he knew there would be so many, and so various, and many times difficult causes brought before him, that it would be impossible to hear them and judge aright, without a Divine spirit. (See upon 1 Kings iii. 9.)

Ver. 11. And God said to Solomon, Because this was in thine heart, and thou hast not asked riches, wealth, or honour, nor the life of thine enemies, neither yet hast asked long life; but hast asked wisdom and knowledge for thyself, that thou mayest judge my people, over whom I have made thee king;

Ver. 12. Wisdom and knowledge is granted unto thee; and I will give thee riches, and wealth, and honour, such as none of the kings have had that have been before thee, neither shall there any after thee have the like.] These two verses have been sufficiently explained in the same chapter; (1 Kings iii. 11—13.) only it may be observed, he doth not say he would give him the life of his enemies, because he was to be a peaceable king.

Ver. 13. Then Solomon came from his journey to the high place that was at Gibeon to Jerusalem, from before the tabernacle of the congregation, and reigned over Israel.] We put in these words, from his journey, which was not needful, for the words may be translated exactly, Solomon came from the high place, &c. and so it follows, from before the tabernacle. For the particle lamed signifies not only to but from. So R. Jonas, whom Kimchi calls a famous grammarian, saith that it is here put for mem, i. e. from. But Kimchi himself is author of our translation, who is followed by Junius, and Tremellius, and others, but comes to the same purpose.

Ver. 14. And Solomon gathered chariots and horsemen: and he had a thousand and four hundred chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen.] See upon 1 Kings x. 26.

Which he placed in the chariot-cities, and with the king at Jerusalem.] The chariot-cities were such wherein there was good pasturage for the horses.

Ver. 15. And the king made silver and gold at Jerusalem as plenteous as stones; and cedar-trees made he as the sycamore-trees that are in the vale for abundance.] See there, ver. 27.

Ver. 16. And Solomon had horses brought out of Egypt, and linen-yarn: the king's merchants received the linen-yarn at a price.

Ver. 17. And they fetched up, and brought forth out of Egypt, a chariot for six hundred shekels of silver, and a horse for a hundred and fifty: and so brought they out horses for all the kings of the Hittites, and for the kings of Syria, by their means.] These two verses are there also explained. (See 1 Kings x. 28, 29.) From this place the famous Bochartus gathers, that the chariots of Egypt in Solomon's time were drawn by four horses: for the tribute which was exacted for a chariot, was four times as much as was paid for a single horse. (See his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 9.)

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND Solomon determined to build a house for the name of the Lord.] Wherein the Lord should be worshipped: as his father David had designed and directed.

And a house for his kingdom.] A royal palace for himself, and those who should succeed him. But he finished God's house before he began his own.

Ver. 2. And Solomon told out threescore and ten thousand men to bear burdens, and fourscore thousand to hew in the mountain, and three thousand and six hundred to oversee them.] Here are three hundred more than are mentioned in the book of the Kings: concerning which difference, see what I have noted there, (v. 16.) and need not be repeated here.

Ver. 3. And Solomon sent to Huram the king of Tyre, saying, As thou didst deal with David my father, and didst send him cedars to build him a house to dwell therein, even so deal with me.] Hiram (as he is called in the book of the Kings) first sent to him, to congratulate his succession to the throne, and then Solomon sent to him: as I have noted there. (See 1 Kings v. 1.)

Ver. 4. Behold, I build a house to the name of the Lord my God.] That is, he purposed to build, as it is expressed 1 Kings v. 5. and he had also disposed things so, that he was ready to go about it.

To dedicate it to him.] For his worship and service.

And to burn before him sweet incense, and for the continual shew-bread.] So this bread is called in Numb. iv. 7. because it stood before the Lord continually, being renewed every week, as we read Exod. xxv. 30. and other places.

And for the burnt-offerings morning and evening, on the sabbaths, and on the new moons, and on the solemn feasts of the Lord our God.] He reckons up several parts of the Divine service, which was there to be performed: Hiram, as I have elsewhere observed, being no stranger to the God of Israel.

This is an ordinance for ever to Israel.] Which God himself had appointed.

Ver. 5. And the house which I build is great: for great is our God above all gods.] It was no large structure which he built, but very magnificent, suitable to the glorious majesty of him that dwelt therein.

Ver. 6. But who is able to build him a house, seeing the heaven, and heaven of heavens, cannot contain him?] He would not have Hiram imagine that he had such low notions of God, as to think he could be confined and comprehended in any house, though ever so large, being immense beyond all conception.

Who am I then that I should build him a house, save only to burn sacrifice before him?] It would have been a high presumption then for him, or any man else, to build him a house, for any other end, but only for his worshippers to assemble there; he being pleased in a special manner to be present in that place. The Targum thus paraphrases this, "The heavens are the throne of his glory, the earth is his footstool, the abyss, and all people are supported by the Spirit of his Word." Which carries in it a notion which the author had of the ever-blessed Trinity.

Ver. 7. Send me now therefore a man cunning to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in iron, and in purple, and crimson, and blue, and that can skill to grave with the cunning men that are with me in Judah and in Jerusalem, whom David my father did provide.] There were admirable artists in all these works at Tyre: whom he desired to be sent to him; that they might assist those whom David had provided, but were not so skilful as those of Tyre.

Ver. 8. Send me also cedar-trees, fir-trees, and algum-trees, out of Lebanon.] Or almug-trees; concerning which, see what I have noted upon 1 Kings x. 11. To which may be added, that Beckius hath lately conjectured, This was a tree brought originally out of Arabia, as the prefix al notes. And then it was brought out of that Ophir which was in Arabia, and planted in Lebanon. For there, this place tells us, these trees grew; as well as cedars and firs.

(For I know that thy servants can skill to cut timber in Lebanon); and, behold, my servants shall be with thy servants.] The Tyrians were more expert in cutting down and hewing timber (they dealing much in it), and therefore he desires to entertain them as his principal workmen, with whom he should join.

Ver. 9. Even to prepare me timber in abundance: for the house which I am about to build shall be wonderful great.] In the Hebrew, great and wonderful. This relates not so much to the bigness of it (though, taking in all the courts belonging to it, it was of large extent), but to the admirable contrivance and riches of it.

Ver. 10. And, behold, I will give to thy servants, the hewers that cut timber, twenty thousand measures of beaten wheat.] That is, of wheat ground, or fine flour, as R. Jonas, a famous grammarian, expounds it; whom many Christians follow.

And twenty thousand measures of barley, and twenty thousand baths of wine, and twenty thousand baths of oil.] All this was provision for the workmen; for whose subsistence Solomon took care, during their labour: besides what he gave to Hiram every year for his household. (See upon 1 Kings v. 11.) What this measure, called corus, was, is uncertain: but many learned men think it the same with an omer, which was the most ancient word. For we never find the other used in the books of Moses, nor in the prophets; but only in Ezekiel, (xlv. 14.) and in the books of the Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra. But Josephus and the LXX. often have the word corus instead of omer, which was the largest measure of dry things, containing, as Epiphanius saith, thirty bushels.

Ver. 11. Then Huram the king of Tyre answered in writing, which he sent to Solomon, Because the Lord hath loved his people, he hath made thee king over them.

Ver. 12. Huram said moreover, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, that made heaven and earth, who hath given to David the king a wise son, endued with prudence and understanding, that he might build a house for the Lord, and a house for his kingdom.] From these two verses, Victorinus Strigelius thought it certain, that Huram was a proselyte to the true religion: because he first of all owns the God of Israel to be Jehovah, the maker of heaven and earth; for none but the Israelites called God by that name, and when they would distinguish him from idols and all creatures, they confess him to be the Creator of the world, as Huram here doth. And, secondly, he congratulates the Israelites the happiness they enjoyed under such a king, which was the effect of his love to God and his church. And, lastly, he declared his love to the church, not only in embassies and letters, but in real acts of kindness, sending to Solomon materials to build the house of God, and artificers the best in the world. But the first of these reasons is not good; for, as my most learned friend, Dr. Alix, hath observed to me, the name of Jehovah was known to the Tyrians from the time of Gideon, as we learn from the words of Sanchoniathon.

Ver. 13. And now I have sent a cunning man (endued with understanding) of Huram my father's.] A man of great skill and long experience, being the principal workman employed by his father. So the Targum seems to understand the word Abi to signify a master or chief workman. But Beckius upon this place thinks it most probable that Abi was his surname, as we call it: and translates this verse, He sent him a man of great skill; viz. Huram Abi. For it was very common among the eastern people, to call men by the name of Ab, and Abi, or Aba, and Abu, as he observes. And thus Luther translates these words, Huram Abi; to whom may be added Emanuel Sa, a person very skilful in this language.

Ver. 14. The son of a woman of the daughters of Dan, and his father was a man of Tyre.] The Targum saith she was a woman of the tribe of Naphtali; because it is said so in 1 Kings vii. 14. and therefore he reconciles these two places; by a daughter of Dan, he means of a man called Dan, who was of the tribe of Naphtali: which being near to Tyre, she married one of that nation. Or, as Jarchi and Kimchi will have it, he was a Jew, but dwelt to Tyre: as Obed-Edom was called the Gittite, because he dwelt in Gath, but was a Levite. (See my notes upon 1 Kings vii. 14.)

Skilful to work in gold, and in silver, in brass, in iron, in stone, and in timber, in purple, in blue, and in fine linen, and in crimson; also to grave any manner of graving, and to find out every device which shall be put to him.] These last words argue this man to have been a great artist, who could contrive any thing that was propounded to him, though never wrought before.

With thy cunning men, and with the cunning men of my lord David thy father.] This seems another argument, that Huram was of the true religion, because he honoured David with the name of his lord; as he doth Solomon in the next verse. Or, as others think, he was become tributary to them; his country very much depending upon them for corn.

Ver. 15. Now therefore the wheat, and the barley, and the oil, and the wine, which my lord hath spoken of, let him send unto his servants.] For their support in their labour.

Ver. 16. And we will cut wood out of Lebanon, as much as thou shalt need; and we will bring it to thee in floats by sea to Joppa, and thou shalt carry it up to Jerusalem.] The Hebrew word rapsodoth (which we translate floats) is of the same signification with daberoth, (1 Kings v. 9.) as a learned Jew notes. By which is meant, timber bound together, which was drawn through the sea, and through rivers. Such floats were used, especially in the river Tigris (as Beckius here notes out of a Hebrew author), which was so swift, that vessels were wont to be overturned by the stream: and therefore they employed these floats alone, made of reeds tied close together; upon which both men and burdens went down the river. (See my notes upon 1 Kings v. 9.)

Ver. 17. And Solomon numbered all the strangers that were in the land of Israel, after the numbering wherewith David his father had numbered them; and they were found a hundred and fifty thousand, and three thousand and six hundred.] These were the relics (as Kimchi thinks) of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, mentioned afterward, chap. viii. 7. But they were not idolaters; for then David would not have suffered them to dwell in the land: but they worshipped God alone, though they did not embrace the Jewish religion wholly, by being circumcised. Those David had numbered, that he might know their strength and their condition. Which did not proceed from such vanity, as moved him to number his own people, but out of a prudent care, that they might be distinguished from Jews, and be employed in such work as he did not think fit to put upon the Israelites. (See 1 Chron. xxii. 2.)

Ver. 18. And he set threescore and ten thousand of them to be bearers of burdens, and fourscore thousand to be hewers in the mountain, and three thousand and six hundred overseers to set the people a-work.] This he had said before, ver. 2. but now relates of what condition they were, who were put to these servile employments. They that were the overseers (whom the LXX. call ἐργοδιώκται) were, I suppose, of the children of Israel.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. THEN Solomon began to build the house of the Lord at Jerusalem in Mount Moriah.] See what I have noted concerning Moriah upon Gen. xxii. 2. To which may be here added, that part of this mountain was in the tribe of Judah, and part of it in the tribe of Benjamin: so that the temple is ascribed to them both. To Judah, in Psal. lxxviii. 68, 69. to Benjamin, Deut. xxxiii. 12. For the greatest part of the courts was in the tribe of Judah: but the altar, the porch, the most holy part of the temple, where the ark and the cherubims were, in the tribe of Benjamin.

Where the Lord appeared unto David his father, in the place that David had prepared in the thrashing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite.] The Targum here derives the sanctity of this place from many noble things that were done there in ancient times. For in this place, saith he, Abraham worshipped the name of the Lord, and here he offered up his son Isaac, but he was delivered by the Memra, the Word of the Lord, and a ram substituted in his place. Here Jacob prayed when he fled from his brother Esau; and here the angel appeared to David, and ordered him to offer sacrifice in the thrashing-floor of Ornan. By which appearance and sacrifice this mountain was consecrated to be a place where the temple should be built. (See 1 Chron. xxi. 26.) But Maimonides (in his treatise of the building of the temple) carries this a great deal higher. For here, saith he, Noah built an altar when he came out of the ark (as Abraham did when he offered his son); yea, here Cain and Abel offered their sacrifices, as Adam the first man had done before them. And more than that, he will have it, that he was created in this place; whence the saying of their wise men, Man was made in the very place of his expiation. But this is unworthy of Maimonides, who is not wont to follow such conceits as this, which is borrowed from a foolish book called Pirke Eliezer.

Ver. 2. And he began to build in the second day of the second month, in the fourth year of his reign.] See 1 Kings vi. 1. In the preceding winter it was not fit to build, and in the first month the paschal feast hindered, as Jarchi here observes: and Dr. Alix takes to have been a sabbatic year, in which the people were free from the tillage of their ground.

Ver. 3. Now these are the things wherein Solomon was instructed for the building of the house of God.] He had been instructed by David his father, who gave him a model, according to which he built it. (See 1 Chron. xxviii. 11, &c.) The Targum translates these words very clearly, which in the Hebrew are a little obscure, These are the dimensions of the foundation of the temple, which Solomon began to build. So in our margin we translate the word, not instructed, but founded. And thus, Beckius thinks, it is most properly to be understood; because Solomon did not receive from his father a delineation of the whole fabric of the temple, but only of the porch, and of the courts, and some other things: as the forenamed place tells us.

The length by cubits after the first measure was threescore cubits, and the breadth twenty cubits.] He projected the sanctuary and the oracle both together; and in their first description they were to be in length sixty cubits: that is, forty for the sanctuary, and twenty for the most holy place. Or, as some think, by the first measure, is here meant that measure which Moses followed in building of the tabernacle: for, in process of time, the cubits altered, and were larger. (See 1 Kings vi. 2.) But this is doubtful.

Ver. 4. And the porch that was in the front of the house, the length of it was according to the breadth of the house, twenty cubits.] So we read expressly, 1 Kings vi. 2. that the breadth was twenty cubits.

And the height was a hundred and twenty.] This is a very different account from that in the book of the Kings, where it is said to be thirty cubits. But Abendana hath briefly summed up what their authors say to reconcile these two places. Some think it probable, that the porch was but thirty cubits high, but the whole temple higher. Thus Kimchi. Others, that the porch and all were of the same height: but from the foundation to the roof was but thirty cubits: though above the roof there were ὑπερῶα, upper-rooms, which were ninety cubits high. (See upon 1 Kings vi. 3.) And, indeed, it is not likely, that this house was lower than the second temple, which, by the command of Cyrus, was to be threescore cubits. (Ezra vi. 3. and see Josephus, lib. vii. cap. 8.)

And he overlaid it within with pure gold.] As he did the rest of the house.

Ver. 5. And the greater house he ceiled with fir-tree, which he overlaid with fine gold, and set thereon palm-trees and chains.] By the greater house he means the sanctuary, or holy place: which was larger than the most holy, as was before noted.

Ver. 6. And he garnished the house with precious stones for beauty.] This shews the use to which the precious stones, that were dedicated by David, and by his princes, were employed; (1 Chron. xxix. 2. 8.) which served not merely for the garments of the high-priest, but for the house itself, which was garnished with them. Though I do not know, but the observation of Bochartus may be true, that these stones are called precious stones, though they were common, because they excelled the rest in greatness, fineness, and in their polishing. (Hieroz. par. ii. lib. v. cap. 7.)

And the gold was gold of Parvaim.] It is a great mistake of Abraham Mylius, and others, who take this place to have been Peru: which the great man now mentioned hath proved to be Taprobana, (see upon 1 Kings ix. 28.) which was called Parvaim, and, with a small change, Parvam, and Provan: from whence he conjectures came the name of Taprobana; which is compounded of Taph (which in Arabic signifies a shore or coast) and Parvan, (lib. ii. Phaleg. cap. 28.) The Jews, after their manner, say the gold was called the gold of Parvaim, because it was of a deep red colour, like the blood of parim, that is, bullocks, and signifies the most excellent gold; as L'Empereur notes upon Middoth: though others of them say it was a place.

Ver. 7. He overlaid also the house, the beams, the posts, and the walls thereof, and the doors thereof, with gold; and graved cherubims on the walls.] See 1 Kings vi. 21, 22. 29.

Ver. 8. And he made the most holy house, the length whereof was according to the breadth of the house, twenty cubits, and the breadth thereof twenty cubits: and he overlaid it with fine gold, amounting to six hundred talents.] The very same is said 1 Kings vi. 20. only here is added the quantity of gold, which he expended upon this place, which was very great.

Ver. 9. And the weight of the nails was fifty shekels of gold.] Each nail, I suppose, whereby the plates of gold were fastened to the boards, cost fifty shekels.

And he overlaid the upper chambers with gold.] These seem to be the chambers mentioned 1 Chron. xxviii. 11. of which David gave him a model. But Dr. Lightfoot thinks, that over the holy place there were no chambers at all in the temple of Solomon, but it was all open to the roof. Over the most holy place, indeed, there was an upper room of ten cubits high; but why that should be called chambers, in the plural number, and why it should be overlaid with gold, since there was none came into it, nor any way to come there, is not easy to apprehend. And as for the side chambers that were on the outside of the house, there was no reason they should be overlaid with gold, since they were places wherein their corn, and wine, and tithes, and first-fruits, and such-like things, were laid up. Therefore, by the Hebrew word eljoth, we are not to understand upper chambers, but the upper floor, or the roof, of the holy and most holy places; which were overlaid with gold every where; both the floor on which they trod, and the walls round about, and the roof over-head. (See his Temple Service, chap. 15. sect. 3.)

Ver. 10. And in the most holy house he made two cherubims of image-work.] I do not know why we thus translate the last words, for the Hebrew, which we translate image, hath nothing of that signification in it: unless we take the word zaazum to be the same with zeeazim, which some of the Jews say, signifies their faces were like to boys'. And accordingly many understand these words, They had the figure of youths, or boys. But Beckius, upon the Targum, in this place, seems to me to have given a more rational account of the word, which he derives from the root zaa, and translates it the work of motions, or moveable work, for they stood upon their feet, (ver. 13.) as ready to move. In which he follows Forsterus and Buxtorfius.

And overlaid them with gold.] For they were made of olive-wood, and were not like those of Moses, of beaten gold. (See upon 1 Kings vi. 23. 28.)

Ver. 11. And the wings of the cherubims were twenty cubits long; one wing of the one cherub was five cubits, reaching to the wall of the house; and the other wing was likewise five cubits, reaching to the wing of the other cherub.

Ver. 12. And one wing of the other cherub was five cubits, reaching to the wall of the house; and the other wing was five cubits also, joining to the wing of the other cherub.

Ver. 13. And the wings of these cherubims spread forth themselves twenty cubits.] See these three verses explained, 1 Kings vi. 24—26. where the height of these cherubims is also set down.

And they stood on their feet.] See 1 Kings vi. 26.

And their faces were inward.] In the Hebrew, towards the house: that is, towards the inner house, or holy place, as Jarchi expounds it: whose words are, Their heads were not erect, that they should look outwards; but they bended down, that they might look one upon another.

Ver. 14. And he made a veil of blue, and purple, and crimson, and fine linen, and wrought cherubims thereon.] That is, the veil before the most holy place; which is the partition mentioned in 1 Kings vii. 21.

Ver. 15. Also he made before the house.] Before the entrance into the sanctuary.

Two pillars of thirty and five cubits high.] They were not each of them thus high, but both of them together, as it is explained 1 Kings vii. 15.

And the chapiter that was on the top of each of them was five cubits.] In the form of a crown, as the Targum expresses it. (See 1 Kings vii. 16.)

Ver. 16. And he made chains, as in the oracle.] See 1 Kings vi. 21.

And put them on the heads of the pillars; and made a hundred pomegranates, and put them on the chains.] There were a hundred in two rows, two hundred in all. (See 1 Kings vii. 20.)

Ver. 17. And he reared up the pillars before the temple, one on the right hand, and the other on the left; and called the name of that on the right hand Jachin, and the name of that on the left Boaz.] See 1 Kings vii. 21. The Targum on these words makes this commentary; He called the one Jachin, because Nachon, the kingdom of the house of David, was established; and the other Boaz, from the name of the patriarch of that royal house of Judah, from whom all their kings were derived.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. MOREOVER, he made an altar of brass, twenty cubits the length thereof, and twenty cubits the breadth thereof, and ten cubits the height thereof.] The making this altar so many cubits high, may seem to contradict God's command, Exod. xx. 26. But see what I have noted there, to shew how the ascent might be so contrived, that the priest's nakedness should not be discovered. The making it of brass also was, no doubt, by the direction of God, who told David how such things should be made, (1 Chron. xxviii.) as L'Empereur very well observes.

Ver. 2. Also he made a molten sea of ten cubits from brim to brim, round in compass, and five cubits the height thereof; and a line of thirty cubits did compass it round about.] This and the following verses are explained 1 Kings vii. 23.

Ver. 3. And under it was the similitude of oxen, which did compass it round about; ten in a cubit, compassing the sea round about.] These oxen are called knops in 1 Kings vii. 24. which were little protuberances, or bunches, round about the lips of the laver, in the figure of oxen. There were ten of them in every cubit, and the circumference being thirty cubits, there were three hundred of them in one row; and they being cast in two rows, one under another, were six hundred in all.

Two rows of oxen were cast, when it was cast.] They were not fastened on afterward, but cast together with the vessel itself. So Kimchi and Jarchi; the latter of which thus explains it: They were not joined to it by nails or solder, but all cast together with the sea.

Ver. 4. It stood upon twelve oxen, three looking towards the north, and three looking towards the west, and three looking towards the south, and three looking towards the east: and the sea was set above upon them, and all their hinder parts were inward.] See upon 1 Kings vii. 25.

Ver. 5. And the thickness of it was a hand-breadth, and the brim of it like the work of the brim of a cup, with flowers of lilies; and it received and held three thousand baths.] See this account reconciled with that in 1 Kings vii. 26. The Targum here thus paraphrases: Three thousand baths of things dry, and two thousand of things liquid. But others better explain it, that the quantity of water which was commonly in it was two thousand baths; but if it were filled up to the top it would hold three thousand.

Ver. 6. He made also ten lavers, and put five on the right hand, and five on the left, to wash in them: such things as they offered for the burnt-offering they washed in them; but the sea was for the priests to wash in.] See there, 1 Kings vii. 38, 39.

Ver. 7. And he made ten candlesticks of gold.] See upon 1 Kings vii. 49.

According to their form, and set them in the temple, five on the right hand, and five on the left.] Those words, according to their form, are thus translated by the Targum, as was convenient or agreeable to them. Or the meaning may be, according to the pattern which David gave him.

Ver. 8. He made also ten tables, and placed them in the temple, five on the right side, and five on the left; and he made a hundred basons of gold.] See upon 1 Kings vii. 48. Some have observed, that there was the very same furniture made by Solomon for the most holy place that was made by Moses; but in the holy place there was an augmentation made of ten candlesticks and ten tables. But they should have remembered, that Solomon also added two cherubims, and of a larger size, to the most holy place, which were not there before.

Ver. 9. Furthermore, he made the court of the priests, and the great court, and doors for the court, and overlaid the doors of them with brass.] See 1 Kings vi. 36. where the court of the priests is called the inner court, it being next the sanctuary: and by the great court here is meant the court of the people, to which he made doors.

Ver. 10. And he set the sea on the right side of the east end, over against the south.] See my notes upon 1 Kings vii. 39.

Ver. 11. And Huram made the pots, and the shovels, and the basons. And Huram finished the work that he was to make for king Solomon for the house of God.] See there, 1 Kings vii. 40. He did not stir from the work, but finished it all before he left Solomon's service.

Ver. 12. To wit, the two pillars, and the pommels.] Or, the globes, as we now speak, and as the Targum translates it.

And the chapiters which were on the top of the two pillars; and the two wreaths to cover the two pommels of the chapiters which were on the top of the pillars.] This is there explained, 1 Kings vii. 41.

Ver. 13. And four hundred pomegranates on the two wreaths, &c.] See ver. 42.

Ver. 14. And he made bases, &c.] See ver. 43.

Ver. 15. One sea, and twelve oxen under it.] See ver. 44.

Ver. 16. The pots also, and the shovels, and the flesh-hooks, and all their instruments, did Huram his father make to king Solomon, for the house of the Lord, of bright brass.] In 1 Kings vii. 45. it is said, which Hiram made: and that is the meaning here; for the words are best translated Hiram Abi, or Abif, did make. See upon chap. ii. 13. which seems more easy than other expositions which may be given of the words. For some think Solomon calls him his father, out of great respect to him; or, because he was the inventor of all this excellent work, (as in Gen. iv. 20, 21.) or it is a short speech, for Hiram and his father.

Ver. 17. In the plain of Jordan did the king cast them, in the clay-ground between Succoth and Zeredathah.] See 1 Kings vii. 46.

Ver. 18. Thus Solomon made all these vessels in great abundance.] More for ornament and grandeur, than for necessary use.

For the weight of the brass could not be found out.] See 1 Kings vii. 47.

Ver. 19. And Solomon made all the vessels that were for the house of God.] That is, for the sanctuary.

The golden altar also, and the tables whereon the shew-bread was set.] One table only was made by Moses, but Solomon made ten, (ver. 8.) for the greater convenience of the priests in their ministration: that they might have a table at hand, whereon to set the bread which they took off, when they set on new upon the table of shew-bread. But it is not improbable, that tables in the plural are put for table in the singular, and that he speaks of that on which the bread stood before the Lord. Which, I suppose, was of gold, as the other were of silver.

Ver. 20. Moreover, the candlesticks with their lamps, that they should burn after the manner.] Which God had appointed in the law of Moses.

Before the oracle, of pure gold.] Here the Targum calls the oracle, the house of expiations: because into this most holy place the high-priest went with the blood, to make atonement on the great day of expiation.

Ver. 21. And the flowers, and the lamps, and the tongs, made he of gold, and that perfect gold.] The Hebrew word miklot, which signifies perfection, denotes gold most purified, as Kimchi saith their doctors expound it. But he thinks it signifies simply, all these vessels were of gold.

Ver. 22. And the snuffers, and the basons, and the spoons, and the censers, of pure gold.] See upon 1 Kings vii. 50.

And the entry of the house, the inner doors thereof for the most holy place, and the doors of the house of the temple, were of gold.] They were not entirely of massy gold, but of wood, (as we read 1 Kings vi. 31, &c.) covered with plates of gold, (ver. 35. and see 1 Kings xviii. 16.)

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. THUS all the work that Solomon made for the house of the Lord was finished: and Solomon brought in all the things that David his father had dedicated; and the silver, and the gold, and all the instruments, put he among the treasures of the house of God.] See 1 Kings vii. 51. David, we read 1 Chron. xxii. 14. made such vast preparations for building of this house, that there was more than could be spent in the work. What remained, therefore, Solomon would not employ to his own use, but laid it up in the treasures of God's house.

Ver. 2. Then Solomon assembled the elders of Israel, and all the heads of the tribes, the chief of the fathers of the children of Israel, unto Jerusalem, to bring up the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of the city of David, which is in Zion.] See 1 Kings viii. 1.

Ver. 3. Wherefore all the men of Israel assembled themselves unto the king.] That is, all the persons forementioned.

In the feast which was in the seventh month.] See 1 Kings viii. 2. The feast of tabernacles, which they kept seven days; and the feast of dedication, which lasted as many, (chap. vii. 9.)

Ver. 4. And all the elders of Israel came; and the Levites took up the ark.] That is, they whose office it was to carry it.

Ver. 5. And they brought up the ark, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and all the holy vessels that were in the tabernacle; these did the priests and the Levites bring up.] See 1 Kings viii. 3.

Ver. 6. Also king Solomon, and all the congregation of Israel that were assembled unto him before the ark, sacrificed sheep and oxen, which could not be told nor numbered for multitude.] See 1 Kings viii. 5. The observation of Victorinus Strigelius upon this history is very pious: That nothing is more lovely in human things, than such concord as here appeared among all orders of men; both of teachers and learners, magistrates, soldiers, and people, who were all combined to promote the service and honour of God. Such unity ought to be studied by Christian people, that we may be all one, as our Saviour prayed.

Ver. 7. And the priests brought in the ark of the covenant of the Lord unto his place, to the oracle of the house, in the most holy place, even under the wings of the cherubims.] The very same words are in 1 Kings viii. 6. (See there.)

Ver. 8. For the cherubims spread forth their wings over the place of the ark, and the cherubims covered the ark and the staves thereof above.] And this verse also is the same with 1 Kings viii. 7.

Ver. 9. And they drew out the staves of the ark, that the ends of the staves were seen from the ark before the oracle, but they were not seen without. And there it is unto this day.] Or, they are there, as the margin hath it, out of 1 Kings viii. 8. where there are the same words. And when that book was written, they were exactly true; but when this author transcribed them into this book, after the captivity, there were then neither staves nor ark remaining: therefore he only relates how Solomon settled things. (See my notes there.)

Ver. 10. There was nothing in the ark save the two tables which Moses put therein at Horeb, when the Lord made a covenant with the children of Israel, when they came out of Egypt.] These words also are there explained. (See 1 Kings viii. 10.)

Ver. 11. And it came to pass, when the priests were come out of the holy place.] Whither they carried the ark, and set it in its place.

For all the priests that were present were sanctified, and did not then wait by course.] As David had appointed in the ordinary service at the temple. But upon this extraordinary occasion they all attended (though it was not their course), at least as many as could, and were sanctified to do all the duties of this great day. For, as Kimchi observes, there were such a multitude of sacrifices offered, that the service of them all was necessary.

Ver. 12. Also the Levites which were the singers, all of them of Asaph, of Heman, of Jeduthun, with their sons and their brethren, being arrayed in white linen, having cymbals, and psalteries, and harps.] According to their several families, as the Targum well explains it; viz. those of the family of Asaph, &c.

Stood at the east end of the altar.] Where the Talmudists say there were two desks for them to stand in and sing. One of which had fifteen steps, on which they sung those songs called the Songs of Degrees, or Steps. For there is no better account, L'Empereur thinks, can be given of that name.

And with them a hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets.] Who joined with the Levites, it appears by the next verse, in praising God.

Ver. 13. It came even to pass, as the trumpeters and singers were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord.] When they were all ready, as one man, to make with one voice a loud sound.

And when they lifted up their voice with the trumpets, and cymbals, and instruments of music, and praised the Lord, saying.] As soon as they began to sound, and play on the instruments, and sing the following words.

For he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever.] Many think they sung the whole psalm, which thus begins, O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, &c. And so the LXX. in this place, ἐξομολογεῖσθε τῷ Κυρίῳ, &c. and the Vulgar in like manner.

That then the house was filled with a cloud, even the house of the Lord.] In the Hebrew there is nothing answering to the word even: but the whole may be thus plainly rendered, The house was filled with the cloud of the house of the Lord. That is, with the cloud that was wont to be in the most holy place, and was the token of the gracious presence and favour of the Divine Majesty among them.

Ver. 14. So that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud: for the glory of the Lord had filled the house of God.] See 1 Kings viii. 19. It is a pious reflection which Victorinus Strigelius makes upon this place: Which admonisheth us, saith he, first, of the presence of God in his church; and, secondly, of the abrogation of the Levitical worship. It is a most sweet promise of our Saviour, Where two or three are gathered in my name, I will be there present in the midst of them. Thus when the Levites here sung his praises, the house of God was filled with a cloud, which was the token of his presence: and when the auditors of the apostles prayed, (Acts iv. 31.) the whole house where they were assembled was shaken, and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost: but the Levitical priests being unable to discharge their office, after the majesty of the Lord filled the house; it was a plain signification that their ministry and way of worship should cease, when the Messiah came, in whom the fulness of the Godhead dwelt bodily.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. THEN said Solomon, The Lord hath said that he would dwell in the thick darkness.] When Solomon saw that token of the Divine presence, he made this speech to the priests. See 1 Kings viii. 12. and the following verses; for there is little in this chapter but what is there explained: the sense, and commonly the very words, being the same. The paraphrase of the Targum upon these words is very remarkable, which is this: "The Lord would have his Schechinah, or glorious presence, to reside in his city Jerusalem, in his sanctuary, which I have built to the name of his Word; and, behold, a thick cloud covereth it." This notion of God's dwelling in darkness was among the heathen (who hence learned it), for Justin Martyr observes, that Orpheus, and another ancient writer, call God Πάγκρυφον, altogether hidden. And the Lacedemonians, who pretend to be of kin to the Jews, had a temple dedicated to Ζεὺς Σκοτεινὸς, Jupiter the dark, as Strabo relates out of Pausanias. (See Meurs. Miscell. Lacon. lib. i. cap. 1.)

Ver. 2. But I have built a house of habitation for thee, and a place for thy dwelling for ever.] See there, 1 Kings viii. 13.

Ver. 3. And the king turned his face, and blessed the whole congregation of Israel (and all the congregation of Israel stood).] Who were in the great court before the house. (See there, ver. 14.)

Ver. 4. And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, who hath with his hands fulfilled that which he spake with his mouth to my father David, saying.] The same with what is there said, ver. 15.

Ver. 5. Since the day that I brought forth my people out of the land of Egypt, I chose no city among all the tribes of Israel to build a house in, that my name might be there; neither chose I any man to be a ruler over my people Israel.] The last words of this verse are very different from those 1 Kings viii. 16. where it is said, but I chose David to be over my people Israel. Till whose time there was no settled succession of a ruler, that he and his posterity should reign over them; but God raised up judges out of what tribe and family he pleased: and when he made Saul king, did not continue that dignity in his family, as he did to David.

Ver. 6. But I have chosen Jerusalem, that my name might be there; and have chosen David to be over my people Israel.] But now he declared both the city wherein he would dwell, and also the person and family whom he would have to govern Israel.

Ver. 7. Now, it was in the heart of David my father to build a house for the name of the Lord God of Israel.

Ver. 8. But the Lord said to David my father, Forasmuch as it was in thine heart to build a house for my name, thou didst well in that it was in thine heart.

Ver. 9. Notwithstanding thou shalt not build the house; but thy son, which shall come forth out of thy loins, he shall build the house for my name.

Ver. 10. The Lord therefore hath performed his word that he hath spoken; for I am risen up in the room of David my father, and am set on the throne of Israel, as the Lord promised, and have built the house for the name of the Lord God of Israel.] All these four verses are in the same words, 1 Kings viii. 17—20. (See there.) I shall only therefore observe here, how the Targum translates the last words of this verse; built a house to the name of the Word of the Lord God of Israel. In which he makes the Word a distinct person from the Lord God of Israel, but Lord God also; else he would not have built a house for his name, that he might be there worshipped and served.

Ver. 11. And in it have I put the ark, wherein is the covenant of the Lord, that he made with the children of Israel.] There is no difference between these words and those 1 Kings viii. 21. but that there he saith, I have set there the place of the ark; which is the same in effect with these words, which signify he had put the ark in the most holy place.

Ver. 12. And he stood before the altar of the Lord, in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, and spread forth his hands.] See upon 1 Kings viii. 22.

Ver. 13. For Solomon had made a brazen scaffold of five cubits long, and five cubits broad, and three cubits high, and had set it in the midst of the court; and upon it he stood, and kneeled down upon his knees before all the congregation of Israel, and spread forth his hands towards heaven.] This verse is added to what we read in the book of the Kings: and, as Solomon Jarchi observes, hath relation to what goes before, in the presence of all Israel. For he was advanced higher than they, that he might be seen and heard of all.

Ver. 14. And said, O Lord God of Israel, there is no God like thee in the heaven, nor in the earth; which keepest covenant, and shewest mercy unto thy servants that walk before thee with all their hearts.] See 1 Kings viii. 23. where there are the same words.

Ver. 15. Thou which hast kept with thy servant David my father that which thou hast promised him; and spakest with thy mouth, and hast fulfilled it with thine hand, as it is this day.

Ver. 16. Now therefore, O Lord God of Israel, keep with thy servant David my father that which thou hast promised him, saying, There shall not fail thee a man in my sight to sit upon the throne of Israel; yet so that thy children take heed to their way to walk in my law, as thou hast walked before me.] These two verses, with very little difference, are in 1 Kings viii. 24, 25.

Ver. 17. Now then, O Lord God of Israel, let thy word be verified, which thou hast spoken unto thy servant David.

Ver. 18. (But will God in very deed dwell with men on the earth? Behold, heaven, and the heaven of heavens, cannot contain thee; how much less this house which I have built!)] See there, ver. 26, 27. I shall only add the gloss of Kim-chi upon the last words, "Thou art rather the place of this world, and comprehendest all things, than the world the place of thee, which cannot comprehend thee. Wherefore then have I built this temple? it was only that thy gracious presence might dwell there, hearing the prayers which shall be made in this place." So the next words import.

Ver. 19. Have respect therefore to the prayer of thy servant, and to his supplication, O Lord my God, to hearken unto the cry and the prayer which thy servant prayeth before thee.] See there, ver. 28.

Ver. 20. That thine eyes may be open upon this house day and night, upon the place whereof thou hast said that thou wouldest put thy name there; to hearken unto the prayer which thy servant prayeth towards this place.] Those words, that thine eyes may be open, the Targum expounds, By his Divine providence and protection, in this place of the residence of his gracious presence, as the words there are.

Ver. 21. Hearken therefore unto the supplications of thy servant, and of thy people Israel, which they shall make towards this place: hear thou from thy dwelling-place even from heaven; and when thou hearest, forgive.] See 1 Kings viii. 30.

Ver. 22. If a man sin against his neighbour, and an oath be laid upon him to make him swear, and the oath come before thine altar in this house.] See there, ver. 31. Whereby it appears, that a man who was to purge himself of any trespass, whereof he was accused against his neighbour, by an oath, was to do it at the temple, before the altar of God, from whom he expected remission of sin.

Ver. 23. Then hear thou from heaven, and do, and judge thy servants, by requiting the wicked, by recompensing his way upon his own head; and by justifying the righteous, by giving him according to his righteousness.] See there, 1 Kings viii. 32.

Ver. 24. And if thy people Israel be put to the worse before the enemy, because they have sinned against thee, and shall return and confess thy name, and pray and make supplication before thee in this house:

Ver. 25. Then hear thou from the heavens, and forgive the sin of thy people Israel, and bring them again unto the land which thou gavest to them, and to their fathers.] These two verses are, in a manner, the very same with those 1 Kings viii. 33, 34.

Ver. 26. When the heaven is shut up, and there is no rain, because they have sinned against thee; yet if they pray towards this place, and confess thy name, and turn from their sin, when thou dost afflict them.] This and all the rest to ver. 32. are the same, in a manner, with 1 Kings viii. 35, 36, &c. And therefore see the explication of them there: and in ver. 29. he desires, that all prayers, whether for private or public concerns that were made here, might be heard.

Ver. 27. Then hear thou from heaven, and forgive the sin of thy servants, and of thy people Israel, when thou hast taught them the good way wherein they should walk; and send rain upon thy land, which thou hast given unto thy people for an inheritance.

Ver. 28. If there be dearth in the land, if there be pestilence, if there be blasting, or mildew, locusts, or caterpillars; if their enemies besiege them in the cities of their land; whatsoever sore, or whatsoever sickness there be:

Ver. 29. Then what prayer, or what supplication soever shall be made of any man, or of all thy people Israel, when every one shall know his own sore, and his own grief, and shall spread forth his hands in this house:

Ver. 30. Then hear thou from heaven thy dwelling-place, and forgive, and render unto every man according unto all his ways, whose heart thou knowest (for thou only knowest the hearts of the children of men);

Ver. 31. That they may fear thee, to walk in thy ways so long as they live in the land which thou gavest unto our fathers.

Ver. 32. Moreover, concerning the stranger, which is not of thy people Israel, but is come from a far country for thy great name's sake, and thy mighty hand, and thy stretched-out arm; if they come and pray in this house:

Ver. 33. Then hear thou from the heavens, even from thy dwelling-place, and do according to all that the stranger calleth to thee for; that all people of the earth may know thy name, and fear thee, as doth thy people Israel, and may know that this house, which I have built, is called by thy name.] These two verses are there also explained, in ver. 41—43. Unto which I shall here add this pious reflection which Dr. Jackson makes upon them: "Solomon knew the goodness of God to be so great, that it could not be a whit lessened towards Israel, how far soever it was extended towards other people. Happy had it been for that nation, if their charity had been like this of their heavenly Father. But it was their seeking to engross God's promised blessings to mankind, which brought that grievous curse upon them, under which they groan at this day."

Ver. 34. If thy people go out to war against their enemies by the way that thou shalt send them, and they pray unto thee towards this city which thou hast chosen, and the house which I have built for thy name:

Ver. 35. Then hear thou from the heavens their prayer and their supplication, and maintain their cause.

Ver. 36. If they sin against thee (for there is no man that sinneth not), and thou be angry with them, and deliver them over before their enemies, and they carry them away captives unto a land far off or near;

Ver. 37. Yet if they bethink themselves in the land whither they are carried captives, and turn and pray unto thee in the land of their captivity, saying, We have sinned, we have done amiss, and have dealt wickedly;

Ver. 38. If they return to thee with all their heart, and with all their soul, in the land of their captivity, whither they have carried them captives, and pray towards their land, which thou gavest unto their fathers, and towards the city which thou hast chosen, and towards the house which I have built for thy name:

Ver. 39. Then hear thou from the heavens, even from thy dwelling-place, their prayer and their supplications, and maintain their cause, and forgive thy people which have sinned against thee.] All these verses are, with some small variation in a few words, and a large addition to the last verses, in 1 Kings viii. 44—50.

Ver. 40. Now, my God, let (I beseech thee) thine eyes be open, and let thine ears be attent unto the prayer that is made in this place.] He sums up all these words, beseeching him, that the prayer which was presented to him here, for any blessing, of what sort soever it was, might be graciously accepted by him.

Ver. 41. Now therefore arise, O Lord God, into thy rest- ing-place, thou, and the ark of thy strength: let thy priests, O Lord God, be clothed with salvation, and let thy saints rejoice in goodness.] These words are part of Psal. cxxxii. 8, 9. with a little alteration. Wherein he beseeches God to take up his habitation here, together with his ark (whereby such wonders and miracles had been wrought), and stir from hence no more. And, then, that he would defend his priests, who ministered to him here; that they might obtain his blessings for others: so that all the people might rejoice in his great bounty to them. The Targum here translates the first words after a remarkable manner: Now therefore, before the Lord God, rest in thy glory, thou, and the ark of thy strength. Upon which words an unanswerable question is made by Beckius to the Jews; Who is this thou, who, according to their paraphrase, rests before Jehovah? Their mouths are stopped, unless they acknowledge another Jehovah, that is, the Word of God (as he is commonly called in the Targum), the second person in the ever-blessed Trinity.

Ver. 42. O Lord God, turn not away the face of thine anointed.] Since he had appointed Solomon to be king of his people, he hoped God would have a regard to his humble petition. For as to look upon one, or lift up the countenance upon him, is to have a kind respect to him; so to turn away the face, is to reject and refuse him.

Remember the mercies of David thy servant.] This is another argument for hope, that his prayer would be granted: because God had such a great kindness for David, that he had made very large and most gracious promises unto him, and his seed after him.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. NOW, when Solomon had made an end of praying, the fire came down from heaven, and consumed the burnt-offering and the sacrifices; and the glory of the Lord filled the house.] See 1 Kings viii. 11. This is added to what is recorded in that book, to shew God's gracious acceptance of Solomon's prayer and sacrifices; to give him assurance he would be present in this place, and grant all their petitions. Of which he gave two demonstrations: one by fire sent down from heaven to consume the sacrifices; the other by the glorious cloud filling the whole house. By the former of these, the first sacrifice that we read of in Scripture (that of Abel), it is generally thought was declared to be acceptable unto God, (Gen. iv. 4.) And when the tabernacle was erected, and Aaron consecrated, there was the same testimony given of God's presence there, as here at the consecration of the temple, Lev. ix. 24. (See what I have there noted, and in other places.) I shall only farther add, that the like miraculous token of God's acceptance was shewn, when Elijah contested with the priests of Baal, (1 Kings xviii.) and when David offered sacrifice in the thrashing-floor of Araunah, (1 Chron. xxi. 26.) which had relation to what was now done: for David sacrificed in the very place where the temple was built; and therefore by both these miracles God declared he would be worshipped in this place. They differ only in this, that by the first God admonished David where the temple should be built: and by this he approved and consecrated it when it was built. Dr. Jackson most judiciously adds, that thus was the consecration of the Son of God to his eternal priesthood confirmed by the apparition of the Holy Ghost in a flame of fire; which was the accomplishment of the appearance of Aaron's consecration, and of this at the consecration of the temple.

Ver. 2. And the priests could not enter into the house of the Lord, because the glory of the Lord had filled the Lord's house.] See Exod. xl. 35. 1 Kings viii. 11. But another great man (Dr. Alix) thinks it pertinent here to observe, that there was no such thing in the second temple: though the Lord Christ was to appear in it, and make the glory of the last house greater than the first. For the appearance of the flames of fire on the day of Pentecost was not in the temple, but in Jerusalem: when the Messiah was exalted to his heavenly sanctuary, and the temple devoted to destruction by the Romans.

Ver. 3. And when all the children of Israel saw how the fire came down, and the glory of the Lord upon the house.] Here was a great assurance that God would be present in this place, in that the glory of the Lord not only filled the house, but appeared upon the house: so that all the people might see it, and not only have the word of the priests for it. By this they were satisfied that it was God's house, where he would accept their sacrifices, hear their prayers, and bestow his blessing upon them. There is no mention here made of the cloud, as in the book of the Kings; but that is comprehended, as Abarbinel observes, in the glory and the fire, which were in the cloud. It came down at the first like a cloud, and then broke out in such a light and splendour, as they were not able to behold: and a flame came out upon the altar, and consumed the sacrifices that lay upon it.

They bowed themselves with their faces to the ground upon the pavement, and worshipped.] They bowed down to the middle of their body, and fell prostrate upon the floor, which was the most profound adoration. These were two distinct acts of worship (bowing and falling flat on the face), but here are joined together upon this great occasion. As Dr. Hyde observes in his Relig. Vet. Persarum, cap. 1. where he notes out of Maimonides, that the pavement was kept very clean: it being unlawful for any one to come into the court with their shoes on their feet, or so much as to spit there.

And praised the Lord, saying, For he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever.] They praised and gave thanks to God (as they had great reason to do, the fire from heaven and the cloud of glory being manifest tokens of God's presence among them) in the same words which the priests had used, who sung the eighty-sixth psalm. (See ver. 13.)

Ver. 4. Then the king and all the people offered sacrifices before the Lord.] They had offered sacrifices before; but now they renew them, and offer more in acknowledgment of this new assurance of God's love unto them.

Ver. 5. And king Solomon offered a sacrifice of twenty and two thousand oxen, and a hundred and twenty thousand sheep.] See 1 Kings viii. 63. where it is said, he offered only twenty thousand oxen; which was a vast number, but not incredible: nor are these two places inconsistent, as I have there shewn.

So the king and all the people dedicated the house of God.] Thus the dedication of the temple ended.

Ver. 6. And the priests waited on their offices; the Levites also with instruments of music of the Lord.] They are called musical instruments of the Lord, because David had made them, as it here follows, to praise the Lord withal, because his mercy endureth for ever. (See 1 Chron. xv. 16.)

When David praised by their ministry.] For they sung the psalm of praise which he composed 1 Chron. xvi. 7, &c. In the Hebrew the words are behallil Dabid bejatham, with the hallel (that is, the hymn of praise) which David had put into their hands for that purpose.

And the priests sounded trumpets before them, and all Israel stood.] For that was the common posture of worship, whether in prayer or praises.

Ver. 7. Moreover Solomon hallowed the middle of the court that was before the house of the Lord: for there he offered burnt-offerings, and the fat of the peace-offerings, because the brazen altar which Solomon had made was not able to receive the burnt-offerings, and the meat-offerings, and the fat.

Ver. 8. Also at the same time Solomon kept the feast seven days, and all Israel with him, a very great congregation, from the entering in of Hamath unto the river of Egypt.

Ver. 9. And in the eighth day they made a solemn assembly; for they kept the dedication of the altar seven days, and the feast seven days.] These verses, and the next, are explained in 1 Kings viii. 64—66.

Ver. 10. And on the three-and-twentieth day of the seventh month he sent the people away into their tents, glad and merry in heart for the goodness that the Lord had shewed unto David, and to Solomon, and to Israel his people.] The Targum thus glosses upon the last words of this verse, which express the joy of the people: For the goodness of the Lord, shewn unto David in the opening of the doors of the sanctuary; and unto Solomon, whose prayer God had accepted, and vouchsafed his glorious presence, in the house he had built; and unto his people Israel, in his gracious acceptance of their sacrifices, and sending down fire from heaven to consume them.

Ver. 11. Thus Solomon finished the house of the Lord, and the king's house: and all that came into Solomon's heart to make in the house of the Lord, and in his own house, he prosperously effected.] See 1 Kings ix. 1.

Ver. 12. And the Lord appeared to Solomon by night.] See 1 Kings ix. 2.

And said unto him, I have heard thy prayer, and have chosen this place to myself for a house of sacrifice.] As appeared by the fire which came down from heaven, and consumed the sacrifice at the consecration of this house.

Ver. 13. If I shut up heaven that there be no rain, or if I command the locusts to devour the land, or if I send pestilence among my people.] Famine and pestilence were two sore punishments, wherewith God afflicted them for their sins: and the former of them was caused sometimes by want of rain, and sometimes by locusts, who ate up what the earth produced for their sustenance.

Ver. 14. If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land.] He had petitioned for the Divine favour and clemency upon no other condition.

Ver. 15. Now mine eyes shall be open, and mine ears attent unto the prayer that is made in this place.] Some take these phrases to signify, that he will always discern, whether they were such as they ought to be; but they rather have the same sense with the next verse, that he would have a gracious respect to them, and testify it by hearing their prayers, as he desired, chap. vi. 40.

Ver. 16. For now have I chosen and sanctified this house, that my name may be there for ever; and mine eyes and mine heart shall be there perpetually.] See this explained 1 Kings ix. 3.

Ver. 17. And as for thee, if thou wilt walk before me, as David thy father walked, and do according to all that I have commanded thee, and shalt observe my statutes and my judgments.] See there, ver. 4.

Ver. 18. Then will I stablish the throne of thy kingdom, according as I have covenanted with David thy father, saying, There shall not fail thee a man to be ruler in Israel.

Ver. 19. But if ye turn away, and forsake my statutes and commandments, which I have set before you, and shall go and serve other gods, and worship them;

Ver. 20. Then will I pluck them up by the roots out of my land which I have given them; and this house, which I have sanctified for my name, will I cast out of my sight, and will make it to be a proverb and a by-word among all nations.

Ver. 21. And this house, which is high, shall be an astonishment to every one that passeth by it; so that he shall say, Why hath the Lord done thus unto this land, and unto this house?

Ver. 22. And it shall be answered, Because they forsook the Lord God of their fathers, which brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, and laid hold on other gods, and worshipped them, and served them: therefore hath he brought all this evil upon them.] This and the foregoing verses are the same with those 1 Kings ix. 6—9. and there have been explained.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass (at the end of twenty years, wherein Solomon had built the house of the Lord, and his own house).] See 1 Kings ix. 10.

Ver. 2. That the cities which Huram had restored to Solomon, Solomon built them, and caused the children of Israel to dwell there.] This is a short relation of what is more largely told in the book of the Kings, chap. ix. 12, 13. only here we are further informed, that these cities being restored to Solomon, who had given them to Huram (who disliked them), Solomon built them so, that his own subjects became the inhabiters of them.

Ver. 3. And Solomon went to Hamath-zobah, and prevailed against it.] This country lay between Euphrates, which was the eastern bounds of it; and Damascus, which was the western, as Bochartus hath demonstrated in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 7.

Ver. 4. And he built Tadmor in the wilderness.] See an account of this in 1 Kings ix. 18.

And all the store-cities which he built in Hamath.] All the cities wherein he laid up provision for war, were in this country of Hamath-zobah, as well as Tadmor.

Ver. 5. Also he built Beth-horon the upper, and Beth-horon the nether, fenced cities, with walls, gates, and bars.]

Only one of these cities is mentioned in the book of the Kings, viz. the nether. But both of them were built before, and he now only repaired, enlarged, beautified, and made them strong places. (See 1 Kings ix. 17.)

Ver. 6. And Baalath, and all the store-cities that Solomon had.] That is, elsewhere as well as in the land of Hamath.

And all the chariot-cities, and the cities of the horsemen, and all that Solomon desired to build in Jerusalem, and in Lebanon, and throughout all the land of his dominion.] See 1 Kings ix. 19.

Ver. 7. As for all the people that were left of the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, which were not of Israel,

Ver. 8. But of their children, who were left after them in the land, whom the children of Israel consumed not, them did Solomon make to pay tribute until this day.

Ver. 9. But of the children of Israel did Solomon make no servants for his work; but they were men of war, and chief of his captains, and captains of his chariots and horsemen.] These three verses are the same with 1 Kings ix. 20—22.

Ver. 10. And these were the chief of king Solomon's officers, even two hundred and fifty, that bare rule over the people.] How this agrees with the book of the Kings, where it is said they were five hundred and fifty, see upon 1 Kings ix. 23.

Ver. 11. And Solomon brought up the daughter of Pharaoh out of the city of David.] Where she first dwelt, (1 Kings iii. 1.)

Unto the house that he had built for her.] See 1 Kings vii. 8.

For he said, My wife shall not dwell in the house of David king of Israel, because the places are holy, whereunto the ark of the Lord hath come.] All houses into which the ark had come, were not thereby made holy, for then the house of Obed-Edom would have been so. But where it had been settled so long, as it had been in David's house, and had a tabernacle made for it, there was a special regard to the place, where it had made its abode: and Solomon would not suffer a stranger (for so his wife was, though proselyted) to keep her court there. For it is not likely, she, and all her servants, had embraced the law of Moses, though they had renounced idolatry; and so might many ways defile a place, which had been made sacred by a Divine presence in it: many other reasons are given by interpreters, to which I refer the reader: and only add, that Abarbinel thought it sufficient to say, that it would have sounded very ill, to hear the people say, that Pharaoh's daughter dwelt where the ark of God had inhabited. And he looks upon this as an argument, that the heart of Solomon continued hitherto right with God, and had no intentions to commit those sins he afterward did: and therefore God at this time vouchsafed him the gift of prophecy.

Ver. 12. Then Solomon offered burnt-offerings unto the Lord on the altar of the Lord, which he had built before the porch.] That is, he settled the daily sacrifice at the temple.

Ver. 13. Even after a certain rate every day, offering according to the commandment of Moses, on the sabbaths, and on the new moons, and on the solemn feasts, three times in the year; even in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles.] He took care the law of Moses should be strictly observed, which prescribed what offerings should be offered every day, (Exod. xxix. 38, 39.) and at several other solemn times, here mentioned, (Exod. xxiii. 14. and other places.)

Ver. 14. And he appointed, according to the order of David his father, the courses of the priests to their service, and the Levites to their charges, to praise and minister before the priests, as the duty of every day required.] Next of all he took care to confirm and establish the orders which David had made, for the regular attendance of the priests and Levites upon the service of God. Who were but few in the days of Moses, in comparison of what they were now; and therefore David disposed them so, that all confusion might be avoided: and also assigned them new employments, in singing the hymns which he composed, and playing upon musical instruments, whereby he made the service of God more beautiful and cheerful. (See 1 Chron. xxiv. xxv.)

The porters also by their courses at every gate.] These words shew that the porters were distributed into twenty-four courses, as well as the priests and Levites: though this order of David's be not there expressly mentioned. (See what I have noted upon 1 Chron. xxvi. 27, 28.)

For so David the man of God commanded.] He is called by the name of the man of God, as Moses was; because after Moses there was none like him, so divinely inspired, to raise the public worship of God to a higher pitch, by his heavenly hymns; and to direct the manner of its performance in such order, that God was served (if I may use here those words of his) in the beauty of holiness. For though Solomon, as Strigelius observes, was a very wise man in natural knowledge, and in political affairs, and in moral and Divine things; yet he was much inferior to David in piety, and in the gift of prophecy; as the book of Psalms alone is sufficient to testify: in which there are so many glorious predictions of the Messiah.

Ver. 15. And they departed not from the commandment of the king unto the priests and Levites, concerning any matter, or concerning the treasures.] Whatsoever had been ordered by David in all other matters, Solomon settled them, and the priests and Levites obeyed him.

Ver. 16. Now, all the work of Solomon was prepared unto the day of the foundation of the house of the Lord, and until it was finished: so the house of the Lord was perfected.] Care was taken, that there should be no stop to the building of God's house: because all materials were prepared before he began it; and every thing projected how it should be done, in every part of it.

Ver. 17. Then went Solomon to Ezion-geber, and to Eloth, at the sea-side in the land of Edom.] After he had finished all those great works of the house of the Lord, and his own house, and built many cities, as before recited; he designed to improve navigation, which the Jews did not much understand. And for that end he went to these places, on the Red Sea. (See 1 Kings ix. 26.) Eloth (as is observed by the learned Nic. Fuller in his Miscellanies, lib. iv. cap. 20.) lay nearest to him, which appears from Deut. ii. 8. where we read that the Israelites passing by the country of Edom, came first to Eloth and then to Ezion. But Solomon went first to Ezion, though further off, because there was Ναυπήγιον, the place where ships were built and fitted up: which Solomon made haste, with the greatest diligence and speed, to inspect, and see in what forwardness they were.

Ver. 18. And Huram sent him, by the hands of his servants, ships, and servants that had knowledge of the sea; and they went with the servants of Solomon to Ophir, and took thence four hundred and fifty talents of gold, and brought them to king Solomon.] Besides those ships which Solomon had built, Huram sent more, who brought able seamen with them to manage the whole fleet. See there, ver. 27, 28. where only four hundred and twenty talents are said to be brought: of which I have there given an account, and shewn it doth not disagree with this place.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. AND when the queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon, she came to prove Solomon with hard questions at Jerusalem, with a very great company, and camels that bare spices, and gold in abundance, and precious stones: and when she was come to Solomon, she communed with him of all that was in her heart.

Ver. 2. And Solomon told her all her questions: and there was nothing hid from Solomon which he told her not.] There is little in this chapter, but what is related in 1 Kings x. where see concerning these two verses, ver. 1—3. I shall only add, that the hard questions she came to ask, were not the curious inquiries into the secrets of natural things, or new political matters, but about things pertaining to piety, and the service of God. For our Saviour saith, she came to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and should therefore rise up in judgment against that generation, who would not learn of him: and in 1 Kings x. 1. it is said, the fame she heard of Solomon was concerning the name of the Lord: which moved her to this journey.

Ver. 3. And when the queen of Sheba had seen the wisdom of Solomon, and the house that he had built,

Ver. 4. And the meat of his table, and the sitting of his servants, and the attendance of his ministers, and their apparel; his cup-bearers also, and their apparel; and his ascent by which he went up into the house of the Lord; there was no more spirit in her.

Ver. 5. And she said to the king, It was a true report which I heard in mine own land of thine acts, and of thy wisdom.

Ver. 6. Howbeit, I believed not their words until I came, and mine eyes had seen it; and, behold, the one-half of the greatness of thy wisdom was not told me: for thou exceedest the fame that I heard.

Ver. 7. Happy are thy men, and happy are these thy servants, which stand continually before thee, and hear thy wisdom.] All that is contained in the foregoing verses, is related in the same words (with very little difference) in 1 Kings x. 4—8. where see what I have noted.

Ver. 8. Blessed be the Lord thy God, which delighted in thee, to set thee on his throne, to be king for the Lord thy God.] In these words she says a great deal more than is there related ver. 9. for she here calls the throne of Israel the throne of the Lord: and acknowledges Solomon to be made king for the Lord his God; that is, not only to rule by his authority, and as his viceroy, but for his glory, and to promote his religion.

Because thy God loved Israel, to establish them for ever, therefore made he thee king over them, to do judgment and justice.] See upon 1 Kings x. 9.

Ver. 9. And she gave the king a hundred and twenty talents of gold, and of spices great abundance, and precious stones: neither was there any such spice as the queen of Sheba gave king Solomon.

Ver. 10. And the servants also of Huram, and the servants of Solomon, which brought gold from Ophir, brought algum-trees and precious stones.

Ver. 11. And the king made of the algum-trees terraces to the house of the Lord, and to the king's palace, and harps and psalteries for singers: and there were none such seen before in the land of Judah.] This and the two foregoing verses are explained in 1 Kings x. 10—12.

Ver. 12. And king Solomon gave to the queen of Sheba all her desire, whatsoever she asked, besides that which she had brought unto the king. So she turned, and went away to her own land, she and her servants.] The last clause, concerning his presents (viz. besides that which she had brought unto the king), is expressed much otherwise in 1 Kings x. 13. where the words are, besides that which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty. What is here explained to have been done, to requite her for the great presents she had made the king.

Ver. 13. Now, the weight of gold that came to Solomon in one year was six hundred and threescore and six talents of gold.] See there, ver. 14.

Ver. 14. Besides that which chapmen and merchants brought: and all the kings of Arabia, and governors of the country, brought gold and silver unto Solomon.] See there, ver. 15.

Ver. 15. And king Solomon made two hundred targets of beaten gold: six hundred shekels of beaten gold went to one target.

Ver. 16. And three hundred shields made he of beaten gold; three hundred shekels of beaten gold went to one shield: and the king put them in the house of the forest of Lebanon.] See both this and the foregoing verse there explained, ver. 16, 17.

Ver. 17. Moreover, the king made a great throne of ivory, and overlaid it with pure gold.

Ver. 18. And there were six steps to the throne, with a footstool of gold, which were fastened to the throne, and stays on each side of the sitting-place, and two lions standing by the stays.] These and the following verses are explained in 1 Kings x. 18—21. where there are the same words; only here is mention made of a footstool of gold, which is not taken notice of there.

Ver. 19. And twelve lions stood there on the one side and on the other upon the six steps: there was not the like made in any kingdom.

Ver. 20. And all the drinking-vessels of king Solomon were of gold, and all the vessels of the house of the forest of Lebanon were of pure gold; none were of silver: it was not any thing accounted of in the days of Solomon.

Ver. 21. For the king's ships went to Tarshish with the servants of Huram: every three years once came the ships of Tarshish, bringing gold, and silver, ivory, and apes, and peacocks.] See 1 Kings x. 22.

Ver. 22. And king Solomon passed all the kings of the earth in riches and wisdom.

Ver. 23. And all the kings of the earth sought the presence of Solomon, to hear his wisdom, that God had put in his heart.

Ver. 24. And they brought every man his present; vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and raiment, harness, and spices, horses, and mules, a rate year by year.] See of these verses 1 Kings x. 23—25.

Ver. 25. And Solomon had four thousand stalls for horses and chariots.] See 1 Kings x. 26. and what I have noted there to make this place and that agree together.

And twelve thousand horsemen, whom he bestowed in the chariot-cities, and with the king at Jerusalem.] See there. It is evident that in David's time they had no horses: for Absalom, when he had lost the battle wherein he perished, rode upon a mule to make his escape; and David ordered his own mule to carry Solomon to be anointed. And indeed the country did not produce them: but Solomon being able to make great expenses, had them brought out of Egypt, and maintained this number of chariots; which resembled those of the Grecians; that is, they were small, with two wheels a-piece, carrying a man or two, standing or leaning forward. The following kings could not be at this charge; but upon occasion sent for succour from Egypt, and then mention is always made of their horses.

Ver. 26. And he reigned over all the kings, from the river even unto the land of the Philistines, and to the border of Egypt.] That is, they were tributaries to him. (See 1 Kings iv. 26.)

Ver. 27. And the king made silver in Jerusalem as stones.] This is an hyperbolical expression, signifying such abundance of it, as exceeded all belief.

And cedar-trees made he as the sycamore-trees that are in the low plains in abundance.] This is a wild fig-tree, with which those countries abound; bearing fruit not unlike to figs, but much sweeter, and have no little seeds in them. And being not so good as others are little esteemed, but commonly sold only to the poorer sort of people, as Leon Rawholf informs us in his Travels, par. i. chap. 4.

Ver. 28. And they brought unto Solomon horses out of Egypt, and out of all lands.] Such as Cappadocia, which was famous for a noble breed of horses. (See 1 Kings x. 28.) But Egypt is here especially mentioned, because it was nearer, and no place afforded more. From whence, even till the captivity, they sought for supplies, as appears by Zedekiah's sending ambassadors to Egypt, requesting horses from thence, (Ezek. xvii. 15.)

Ver. 29. Now, the rest of the acts of Solomon, first and last, are they not written in the book of Nathan the prophet, and in the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, and in the visions of Iddo the seer, against Jeroboam the son of Nebat?] In the first book of the Kings it is only said, that his acts were written in the book of the Acts of Solomon. (See chap. xi. 41.) But here we are told the particular books wherein they were recorded. And the last of these authors (viz. Iddo) wrote also the acts of Rehoboam, chap. xii. 15. of this book: and some suppose he lived till the time of Asa, chap. xv. 1. where he is called Obed. Howsoever that be, it appears by this, that the prophets, as I noted before, were also historians, who gave an account of what passed in their times: out of whose work this short history was extracted. And Abarbinel is of opinion, that there were two books or catalogues written of the acts of Solomon; one, De Rebus Prioribus, of what passed in the beginning of his reign, giving an account of his great buildings, and of the splendour wherein he lived, and the prosperity he enjoyed; and these were written by Nathan: the other, De Rebus Posterioribus, giving an account of what passed in the latter end of his life; how he doated upon women, and fell into idolatry, and was threatened with terrible punishments, and had several adversaries raised against him, &c. which were all written by Ahijah the Shilonite. And some of these things were also recorded by another author, Iddo; who wrote concerning the acts of Jeroboam, which could not be related without touching upon some part of Solomon's reign. These three did not join to make one book, but severally and distinctly gave an account of such things as occurred to their knowledge; out of which, it is probable, Ezra took many things, which he hath supplied in this book.

Ver. 30. And Solomon reigned in Jerusalem over all Israel forty years.

Ver. 31. And Solomon slept with his fathers; and he was buried in the city of David his father: and Rehoboam his son reigned in his stead.] These two verses are the last words of 1 Kings xi. 42, 43.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. AND Rehoboam went to Shechem: for to Shechem were all Israel come to make him king.

Ver. 2. And it came to pass, when Jeroboam the son of Nebat (who was in Egypt, whither he had fled from the presence of Solomon the king) heard it, that Jeroboam returned out of Egypt.] See 1 Kings xii. where this chapter is so fully explained, that little is to be added here.

Ver. 3. And they sent and called him.] The Targum well translates it, for they sent, giving a reason why he returned from Egypt.

So Jeroboam and all Israel came, and spake to Rehoboam, saying,

Ver. 4. Thy father made our yoke grievous: now therefore ease thou somewhat the grievous servitude of thy father, and his heavy yoke that he put upon us, and we will serve thee.] This verse is the same in sense with 1 Kings xii. 4. and so are those that follow, with those that follow there; where see them explained. I shall only add, that if this complaint of Solomon's hard usage of them was true, it is probable that when he was corrupted by the love of money and strange women, and fell into idolatry, he also oppressed his subjects; being unable to maintain such great expenses, as so many wives and concubines, and building them places for religious worship (besides other things beforementioned) put him unto, without greater treasures than he had heaped up to support them. At least they began to be exhausted, which tempted him to these ill courses to keep them full.

Ver. 5. And he said unto them, Come again unto me after three days. And the people departed.] The rest of this chapter is so much the very same, not only in sense, but also in words, with what we had before in the book of the Kings, that I shall not transcribe it.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. AND when Rehoboam was come to Jerusalem, he gathered of the house of Judah and Benjamin a hundred and fourscore thousand chosen men, which were warriors, to fight against Israel, that he might bring the kingdom again to Rehoboam.

Ver. 2. But the word of the Lord came to Shemaiah the man of God, saying,

Ver. 3. Speak unto Rehoboam the son of Solomon king of Judah, and to all Israel in Judah and Benjamin, saying,

Ver. 4. Thus saith the Lord, Ye shall not go up, nor fight against your brethren: return every man to his house; for this thing is done of me. And they obeyed the words of the Lord, and returned from going against Jeroboam.] These four verses I have explained in my notes upon 1 Kings xii. 21—24.

Ver. 5. And Rehoboam dwelt in Jerusalem, and built cities for defence in Judah.] That is, he strengthened his frontiers against the ten tribes that were revolted from him.

Ver. 6. He built even Beth-lehem, and Etam, and Tekoa.

Ver. 7. And Beth-zur, and Shoco, and Adullam.] We are told in 1 Chron. iv. 32. that Etam was a town in the tribe of Simeon: therefore this shews that some portion of that tribe adhered to the house of David, after Jeroboam made this rent in the kingdom.

Ver. 8. And Gath, and Mareshah, and Ziph.

Ver. 9. And Adoraim, and Lachish, and Azekah.

Ver. 10. And Zorah, and Aijalon, and Hebron, which are in Judah and in Benjamin fenced cities.] It is apparent from hence, that by building cities of defence, (ver. 5.) is meant only repairing and fortifying them: for they were built before, but perhaps he now enlarged some of them, and made them more capacious.

Ver. 11. And he fortified the strong holds, and put captains in them, and store of victual, and of oil and wine.] These strong holds, I suppose, were in the heart of his country: which he furnished with good garrisons and provisions; that they might be able to maintain a siege, in case their enemies should make an irruption into his country.

Ver. 12. And in every several city he put shields and spears, and made them exceeding strong, having Judah and Benjamin on his side.] Who were two warlike and valiant tribes, by whose assistance he made every one of these cities a magazine; out of which, upon occasion, soldiers might be furnished with arms. Which was a necessary precaution in doubtful times, for the preservation of his kingdom.

Ver. 13. And the priests and the Levites that were in all Israel resorted to him out of all their coasts.] So the tribe of Levi was added to the tribe of Judah; though not all the cities wherein they dwelt: which they were forced to leave, when they would not conform to the idolatrous worship which Jeroboam had set up. The tribe of Simeon likewise was so intermixed with Judah, that, in all probability, more cities of it besides that beforementioned, if not all, became one body with it; which made Judah a very powerful kingdom.

Ver. 14. For the Levites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Judah and Jerusalem; for Jeroboam and his sons had cast them off from executing the priest's office unto the Lord.] After the right manner, according to the law of Moses. For they refused to offer sacrifices before his calves in Dan and Beth-el: and he would not let them go to do their duty at Jerusalem, the place which the Lord had chosen; and therefore they left their dwellings and possessions, and went to live there. He mentions Jeroboam's sons as well as himself; because they were his principal counsellors, and assistants in the change he made in religion.

Ver. 15. And he ordained him priests for the high places, and for the devils, and for the calves which he had made.] See 1 Kings xii. 28, 29, &c. A new religion being set up by Jeroboam, devised out of his own head, wherein he ordained a solemnity in the eighth month, which was not of God's institution, all that he did was profane. The priests profane, the feasts profane: and so were the sacrifices and the whole worship. And therefore he calls (as Bochartus well observes) the objects of their worship devils and not gods: and the ministers of this religion he calls not cohen, priests, but chemarim: (Hos. x. 5.) and their solemnities, instead of the feast of God, he calls the day of their king (Hos. vii. 5. because instituted by their king, and not by God); and the place of worship, instead of Beth-el, he calls Beth-aven, (Hos. x. 5. 8.) that is, not the house of God, but the house of wickedness, or of idolatry. For the ointment (as he speaks) being turned into deadly poison, the inscription ought not to remain upon the pot or box, wherein it was contained. (See his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34. p. 357.) There is a late writer, indeed (Antonius van Dale), who labours to persuade us, that the word seirim (which we translate devils) signifies no more than goats; which were worshipped in Egypt: from whence Jeroboam lately coming brought this worship along with him. But who can think the Israelites would have been drawn to adore so filthy a creature? which was worshipped by the Egyptians, as several other hairy creatures were, and the image of them held in great veneration (Pan being represented below in that form), as Bochartus hath observed: yet signified also demons, which appeared in that shape. Thus the ancient interpreters, the Chaldee, the Syriac, the Arabic, and all the Jews, understand it, as the same learned man hath largely shewn, in the same book, lib. ii. cap. 53. p. 643.

Ver. 16. And after them, out of all the tribes of Israel, such as set their hearts to seek the Lord God of Israel, came to Jerusalem, to sacrifice unto the Lord God of their fathers.] The good example of the priests and Levites moved many pious people to quit their habitations and estates, rather than forsake, or not have the exercise of their religion.

Ver. 17. So they strengthened the kingdom of Judah, and made Rehoboam the son of Solomon strong, three years: for three years they walked in the way of David and Solomon.] Though the number of people that came to him out of all the tribes, added great strength to Rehoboam's kingdom; yet his power was chiefly owing unto God: who protected and assisted them, as long as he and his people continued in the way of his predecessors, David and Solomon. From which last words some conclude Solomon was a penitent, because he is mentioned here as an example of true piety, as well as David. But it cannot be certainly inferred hence, because this may relate only to the greatest part of his reign, before he lapsed in his old age, and forsook the law of Moses. The book of Ecclesiastes is a better proof of it, which the Jews generally think was written when he was old: wherein he sensibly expresses the vanity of all earthly things; and particularly speaks with great detestation of bad women, by whom he had been seduced, (Eccles. vii. 26.) Here it is to be observed, that the corruption of Judah and Israel began in the fourth year of Rehoboam; (see xii. 1.) and from thence begin the three hundred and ninety years of their iniquity, mentioned by Ezekiel, iv. 5. which lasted to the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.

Ver. 18. And Rehoboam took him Mahalath, the daughter of Jeremoth the son of David, to wife.] We never read of Jeremoth among the sons of David, but only here. Some think he was by a concubine, who is not named.

And Abihail, the daughter of Eliab the son of Jesse.] His grand-daughter; for he was David's eldest brother.

Ver. 19. Which bare him children; Jeush, and Shamariah, and Zaham.] He speaks, I suppose, of the latter of these wives, who bare him these children.

Ver. 20. And after her he took Maachah, the daughter of Absalom, which bare him Abijah, and Attai, and Ziza, and Shelomith.] This wife was his first cousin (as we call such persons), being the daughter of his uncle: if this be meant of Absalom the son of David. But it is evident this was another person of the same name of Gibeah, which was in the tribe of Benjamin, (xiii. 2.) whereas Absalom the son of David was of Judah.

Ver. 21. And Rehoboam loved Maachah the daughter of Absalom above all his wives and his concubines (for he took eighteen wives, and threescore concubines; and begat twenty and eight sons, and threescore daughters).] So great was their desire of having abundance of children in those days, that they entrenched upon the law of God, who commanded their kings should not multiply wives. But David indulged himself in it, and Solomon a great deal more: and so did Rehoboam and Abijah, who had both of them a numerous issue. For virginity in those days was not accounted a virtue: and the greatest unhappiness in a married estate was barrenness.

Ver. 22. And Rehoboam made Abijah the son of Maachah the chief, to be ruler among his brethren.] He was his eldest son by his beloved wife, whom he put in authority over all the rest, which he had by her, and by his former wives.

For he thought to make him king.] Such power, I have observed before, they then challenged: and in order to it, he seems to have committed unto Abijah the management of all affairs under himself.

Ver. 23. And he dealt wisely, and dispersed all his children throughout all the countries of Judah and Benjamin.] Upon which words Kimchi glosses very well: He thought seriously of this thing, and, fearing a rebellion, broke all his sons (that is, did not suffer them to live together), and dispersed them into all parts of the country under his government, that he might confirm the kingdom in the hand of his son Abijah. Thus Abraham anciently sent his sons which he had by Keturah into other countries, that they might not be troublesome to Isaac, who he intended should be his heir: and thus Jehoshaphat did in following times after this, (xxi. 3.)

Unto every fenced city.] Of which, I suppose, he made them governors-in-chief, and committed a great care to them: these cities being frontier places, as I observed ver. 5. where, it is probable, he had trusted persons to watch and observe them, that they entered not into any combinations to defeat his design.

And he gave them victual in abundance.] He provided for them amply, that they might not be discontented, but live at their ease.

And he desired many wives.] This might possibly be for his children, that they might in their several governments live very pleasantly. But, considering his temper, most interpreters think it was for himself: being not satisfied with those wives he had already, but still desiring more.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass, when Rehoboam had established the kingdom, and had strengthened himself.] When he thought himself safe, and out of all danger.

He forsook the law of the Lord.] His evil inclinations began to appear; which he derived, it is likely, from his mother, who was an Ammonitess. (See 1 Kings xiv. 21.)

And all Israel with him.] See 1 Kings xiv. 22—24.

Ver. 2. And it came to pass, that, in the fifth year of king Rehoboam, Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem (because they had transgressed against the Lord).] See 1 Kings xiv. 25. Their apostacy was in the fourth year of his reign; (after they had been three years obedient, xi. 17.) therefore God speedily corrected them, that he might reduce them to his service, before they were settled in their impiety.

Ver. 3. With twelve hundred chariots, and threescore thousand horsemen: and the people were without number.] That is, the footmen in his army.

That came with him out of Egypt; the Lubims, the Sukkiims, and the Ethiopians.] There is no doubt the Lubims were the people of Lybia, a famous country in Africa, adjoining to Egypt. And the Sukkiims are the people called Troglodytes, who lived near the Red Sea: and had that name Troglodytes, because they dwelt ἐν τρώγλαις, in caves and dens of the earth: which is the very signification of the Hebrew word Succha; which in that language imports not only tabernacles, but also caves or dens, as in Psal. x. 9. Job xxxviii. 40. From this people there was a town, upon the coast of the Red Sea, called Succhæ: and at this day, with a little alteration, Suachen, as Bochartus observes in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 29. As for the people called Cush (which we translate Ethiopians), they were either those to the south of Egypt, or the Scenitæ in Arabia: for I have observed elsewhere it was a name common to both. (See the same most learned author in the same book, cap. 33.)

Ver. 4. And he took the fenced cities which pertained to Judah.] Where the sons of Rehoboam were governors: who, perhaps, there perished.

And came to Jerusalem.] The frontier towns being taken, nothing hindered his coming hither. For, trusting to his fenced cities, he had raised no army to oppose Shishak: or, if he had, they durst not oppose his progress.

Ver. 5. Then came Shemaiah the prophet to Rehoboam, and to the princes of Judah that were gathered together to Jerusalem because of Shishak.] As to a place of more safety than the country; or, perhaps, to consult what to do, in a time of so great danger.

And said unto them, Thus saith the Lord, Ye have forsaken me, and therefore have I also left you in the hand of Shishak.] The Chaldee translates this, Ye have forsaken my fear; that is, his worship, and turned to idols: therefore God gave them up into the power of an idolater.

Ver. 6. Whereupon the princes of Israel.] They are called the princes of Israel, because there were many Israelites among them; and they had all lately been comprehended under this name.

And the king humbled themselves; and they said, The Lord is righteous.] Sorrowfully confessed that the Lord had most justly punished them for their sins.

Ver. 7. And when the Lord saw that they humbled themselves, the word of the Lord came to Shemaiah, saying, They have humbled themselves, therefore I will not destroy them, but I will grant them some deliverance; and my wrath shall not be poured out upon Jerusalem by the hand of Shishak.] Their humiliation prevailed with God so far, that he moderated his anger, and respited the destruction which was coming upon them: promising he would not suffer Shishak to do so much mischief as he designed. Yet he seems to intimate, that if they went on to provoke him, he would use some other hand to ruin them.

Ver. 8. Nevertheless they shall be his servants; that they may know my service, and the service of the kingdoms of the countries.] He resolved to let them feel the difference between him and all other lords and masters: and how much more happy they were while they continued to worship and serve him, than when they fell under a foreign yoke.

Ver. 9. So Shishak king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem.] Which was basely yielded up to him, ἀμαχητὶ, without striking a stroke, as Dionysius Halicarnassus speaks. Who is thought by learned men to have respect to this place, when he saith, that Sesostris made an expedition into Palestine, Λαβὼν ἀμαχητὶ τοὺς ἀνθρώπους ἐν αὐτῷ, taking all the men there without fighting. And it was to be ascribed only to the great goodness of God, that he did not possess himself absolutely of the whole country, and make it a province subject and tributary to the king of Egypt. For unless God had diverted him, he might have done what he pleased: it being in his power to extirpate the Jewish nation.

And took away the treasures of the house of the Lord, and the treasures of the king's house; he took all; he carried away also the shields of gold which Solomon had made.

Ver. 10. Instead of which king Rehoboam made shields of brass, and committed them to the hands of the chief of the guard, that kept the entrance of the king's house.

Ver. 11. And when the king entered into the house of the Lord, the guard came and fetched them, and brought them again into the guard-chamber.] These three verses have been explained in 1 Kings xiv. 25—28. Only from hence may be gathered, that the golden shields were made for state, to be used by his guard when they attended him to the house of the Lord: this being the use of the brazen shields which were made in their stead.

Ver. 12. And when he humbled himself, the wrath of the Lord turned from him, that he would not destroy him altogether.] When he saw his danger he humbled himself, before Shishak came to Jerusalem: and after he had taken and ransacked it, he humbled himself still more. And thereby diverted that utter destruction, which such an army might have brought upon him, and which their sins deserved. For it appears, by the language of the prophet, God was most highly provoked by the defection of Judah so suddenly from him, to pour out his wrath upon them.

And also in Judah things went well.] They began again to prosper. But the words in the Hebrew being, there were good things in Judah, they may be understood of the reformation made in the whole kingdom; many good things being found among them, in the midst of their corruption. For the priests, I suppose, kept up the worship of God in its purity, and many good people joined in it; especially such as had fled from the idolatry of Jeroboam.

Ver. 13. So king Rehoboam strengthened himself in Jerusalem, and reigned.] He repaired the fenced cities which Shishak had taken; and recovered so much strength, that he reigned with some authority.

For Rehoboam was one-and-forty years old when he began to reign, and he reigned seventeen years in Jerusalem, the city which the Lord had chosen out of all the tribes of Israel, to put his name there: and his mother's name was Naamah an Ammonitess.] See 1 Kings xiv. 21.

Ver. 14. And he did evil, because he prepared not his heart to seek the Lord.] This seems to signify, that after his humiliation for his sins, he relapsed again into them (though it may relate to his first provocation); and the reason is here given, because his heart was not intent (as the Targum expounds it) to seek instruction from the Lord.

Ver. 15. Now the acts of Rehoboam, first and last, are they not written in the book of Shemaiah the prophet?] Which was extant when Ezra made this short abstract out of it. For prophets, as I observed before, wrote the history of their own times; as Jarchi says, they did their own prophecies.

And of Iddo the seer, concerning genealogies.] The Targum hath it, Genealogies of the house of David: which he set down in the history he wrote of things done in his time.

And there were wars between Rehoboam and Jeroboam continually.] See 1 Kings xiv. 30.

Ver. 16. And Rehoboam slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David: and Abijah his son reigned in his stead.] As he had designed in his lifetime. (See chap. xi. 22, 23.)

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. NOW, in the eighteenth year of king Jeroboam began Abijah to reign over Judah.] See 1 Kings xv. 1.

Ver. 2. And he reigned three years in Jerusalem (his mother's name also was Michaiah, the daughter of Uriel of Gibeah).] He gives a different account above, xi. 20, 21. for there his mother is called Maachah, and her father's name is said to be Absalom: and so we read 1 Kings xv. 2. The Targum, therefore, to reconcile these two places, adds a long gloss, in these words, Because she was his legal wife, her name was changed from Maachah to Michajaha, which was a more honourable name: and the name of her father changed into Uriel, that no mention might be made of the name of Absalom. But this reason is frivolous, for she is said to be the daughter of Absalom in the place abovenamed. Therefore a better account of this is given by Jarchi and by Kimchi, who say, that her entire name was Michaiah Maachah; and her father's entire, name was Uriel Absalom. (See what I have noted upon 1 Kings xv. 2.)

And there was war between Abijah and Jeroboam.] See 1 Kings xv. 7.

Ver. 3. And Abijah set the battle in array with an army of valiant men of war, even four hundred thousand chosen men: Jeroboam also set the battle in array against him with eight hundred thousand chosen men, being mighty men of valour.] Here was such a vast army brought into the field, that the whole strength of both sides was engaged in the controversy, about the restoring the kingdom of Israel to the house of David, who had but half the number of men that was on Jeroboam's side; but thought they had the better cause, and seemed by Abijah's speech to have put such trust in God for succour, that they doubted not of success.

Ver. 4. And Abijah stood upon Mount Zemaraim, which is in Mount Ephraim.] It seems Abijah had entered into the country of the Israelites, and there drew up his army, on the hill afterward called Samaria.

And said, Hear me, thou Jeroboam, and all Israel.] A great many might hear his voice from so advantageous a place; but all the eight hundred thousand could not. But he desired what he said might be reported to them; and it is very likely he desired a parley before they fought, to see if they could accommodate matters without shedding blood.

Ver. 5. Ought you not to know.] They did know, but he means they ought to consider and acknowledge.

That the Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom over Israel to David for ever, even to him and his sons by a covenant of salt?] See concerning this expression, covenant of salt, Numb. xviii. 19. The Targum here expounds it, as the waters of the sea, which never alter their saltness. But it rather signifies a solemn covenant made by sacrifice, which was always salted, (Lev. ii. 13.)

Ver. 6. Yet Jeroboam the son of Nebat, the servant of Solomon the son of David, is risen up, and has rebelled against his lord.] Though he had the warrant of a prophet to take the kingdom, yet his own ambition first led him to it; as we may gather from 1 Kings xi. 27.

Ver. 7. And there are gathered unto him vain men, the children of Belial.] Such, one would think, his principal partakers were, who so easily changed their religion, that it shewed they regarded neither God nor man, as the word Belial signifies. (See my notes upon 1 Kings xii. 24.) And here it may be further noted, that the high offenders of all sorts are called by the name of children of Belial. As those ungodly men, who, like a torrent, came upon David with all manner of violence, are called the floods of Belial, (2 Sam. xxii. 5.) and the sacrilegious sons of Eli, (1 Sam. ii. 12.) and the filthy beasts of Gibeah, (Judg. xix. 22.) and blood-thirsty men, (2 Sam. xvi. 7.) and perjured persons, (1 Kings xx. 10.) and pernicious counsellors, (Nahum i. 11.)

And have strengthened themselves against Rehoboam the son of Solomon, when Rehoboam was young.] He was one-and-forty years old when he came to his kingdom, but not bred up to military affairs; in which he was raw and inexperienced, in a time of long peace.

And tender-hearted.] This doth not so much aggravate their crime, as reflect upon his father; who wanted courage, as this phrase signifies. But if we take it in this sense, Abijah overshot himself: for Rehoboam gathered a great army, and would have fought, if God, by his prophet, had not forbidden him. And if that was his meaning, that he had a tender regard to God's commands, and yielded immediately to them, he spake the truth: for he was fearful then to offend God, and so could not withstand them, as it here follows.

Ver. 8. And now ye think to withstand the kingdom of the Lord in the hand of the sons of David.] But he would not have them think that God would always be of that mind, and let them quietly enjoy what they had usurped. For the kingdom which he governed was not set up by such vain persons as advanced Jeroboam; but the Lord himself: whom they should not be able to withstand.

And ye be a great multitude.] Or, though you be far more in number than we; being two to one, (ver. 3.)

And there are with you golden calves, which Jeroboam made you for gods.] It may be better translated, but there are with you, &c. i. e. you have forsaken the Lord, and worshipped other gods (for so the golden calves were esteemed by God), and therefore your vast forces will do you no service.

Ver. 9. Have you not cast out the priests of the Lord, the sons of Aaron, and the Levites.] This they could not deny, whatsoever they might pretend against the charge of forsaking the Lord.

And have made you priests after the manner of the nations of other lands?] Without any regard to the family they were of, and out of any part of the country. (See 1 Kings xii. 31.)

So that whosoever cometh to consecrate himself with a young bullock and seven rams.] Any one that could make this expense might consecrate himself to be a priest.

The same might be a priest of them that are no gods.] The Targum expresses it thus, is the priest of him that is not the Word of the Lord. By which it appears (as from innumerable other places) the Divine Word was the God of Israel, worshipped in the most holy place.

Ver. 10. But as for us, the Lord is our God.] So it follows in the Targum, Unto us the Word of the Lord is our helper, he is our God.

And we have not forsaken him.] Not quite departed from him: though in some part Abijah (who spake these words) had done evil in the sight of the Lord, as his father had done; and his heart was not perfect with God. (1 Kings xv. 3.)

And the priests, which minister unto the Lord, are the sons of Aaron, and the Levites wait upon their business.] The service of God was orderly performed in his house, by such only as were appointed to it by himself.

Ver. 11. And they burn unto the Lord, every morning and every evening, burnt-sacrifices and sweet incense: the shew-bread also set they in order upon the pure table; and the candlestick of gold, with the lamps thereof, to burn every evening.] There was nothing omitted, either day or night, which the law required: and he mentions these things thus particularly, that he might put the Israelites in mind how the worship of God was with great solemnity kept up in Judah, which in some years the Israelites had not seen, and perhaps had forgot. But he mentions here only one candlestick, and its lamps, because, as some think, Shishak had carried away the rest.

Or rather, because Solomon had made the other ten candlesticks for ornament, so that they had not lamps in them every night, which burnt only in the great candlestick made by Moses, from evening until morning. (Lev. xxiv. 2, 3.)

For we keep the charge of the Lord our God; but ye have forsaken him.] The Targum here again thus expresses it, We keep the charge of the Word of the Lord our God. This gives us reason to think, that Abijah kept up the public worship of God very regularly: though he did evil in the sight of the Lord privately.

Ver. 12. And, behold, God himself is with us for our captain, and his priests with sounding trumpets to cry alarm against you.] Upon the sounding of which Moses promised they should "be remembered before the Lord, and saved from their enemies," (Numb. x. 9.) This seems to be added as an amplification of their strict observance of the law of God in all things, in war as well as in peace, which gave them a good hope that he would be with them. And here it may be noted, that it doth not appear, that the priests were forbidden any functions in a civil life: for they went to war, and performed the office of trumpeters in the army, as well as in the temple.

O children of Israel, fight ye not against the Lord God of your fathers; for you shall not prosper.] So he concludes his speech, that, if they fought, it was not so much against him, as against the Lord whom their fathers worshipped and they had forsaken, and therefore should not succeed. None of the great captains and commanders, whose speeches are recorded in heathen authors, ever spoke more movingly than this king of Judah did.

Ver. 13. But Jeroboam caused an ambushment to come about behind them: so they were before Judah, and the ambushment was behind them.] We read of no answer to this speech, but Jeroboam seems to have been so much touched with it, that he would not trust to his numbers, but used policy: and, like a great captain, laid an ambush behind the army of Judah, while he faced them with his main body, drawn up in battle-array. For he had such a prodigious multitude with him, that he had men enough to spare upon any design, and more than enough to fight also.

Ver. 14. And when Judah looked back.] Hearing a great noise, it is like, behind them.

Behold, the battle was before and behind.] Which put them into sore distress.

And they cried unto the Lord, and the priests sounded with the trumpets.] They were not dismayed, but implored help from God; which the priests gave them hopes to obtain. For the sounding with the trumpets, was an imploring of the Divine aid, which God had promised (as I before noted) when they sounded.

Ver. 15. Then the men of Judah gave a shout.] To terrify their enemies, by this token of their confidence, that they should have the victory.

And as the men of Judah shouted, it came to pass, that God smote Jeroboam and all Israel before Abijah and Judah.] This is thus expressed by the Targum: When the alarm sounded, the Word of the Lord caused Jeroboam and all Israel to fall, and to be slain by Abijah. For to smite, commonly signifies in Scripture language to kill.

Ver. 16. And the children of Israel fled before Judah: and God delivered them into their hands.] They seem not to have struck a stroke, but to have been so dismayed, that they run away; and in the chase were slain in vast numbers.

Ver. 17. And Abijah and his people slew them with a great slaughter: so there fell down slain of Israel five hundred thousand chosen men.] This is the greatest slaughter that we ever read of in any story, as Bochartus observes: but it is not incredible, when we consider that God fought for them, and chastised the idolatry of the Israelites to such a degree, that the Jews killed a hundred thousand of them, more than they had in their own army. So Josephus also long ago observes, that there never was such a slaughter heard of, either among the Greeks or barbarians.

Ver. 18. Thus the children of Israel were brought under at that time.] Very much humbled, but not made subject to the house of David.

And the children of Judah prevailed, because they relied upon the Lord God of their fathers.] It was not by their own valour that they obtained this great victory; but by their leaning (or relying) upon the Word of the Lord God of their fathers, as the Targum expresses it.

Ver. 19. And Abijah pursued after Jeroboam, and took cities from him.] He followed his blow (as we speak), and did not content himself with beating them in the field, but pursued the Israelites into their country, and possessed himself of some of their cities.

Beth-el with the towns thereof.] From whence, it is likely, Jeroboam removed the golden calf, unto some place of greater safety: or else the destruction of it would have been mentioned.

And Jeshanah with the towns thereof, and Ephraim with the towns thereof.] There was a city, as well as a tribe called Ephraim, John xi. 54. which some think was the same with Ophrah.

Ver. 20. Neither did Jeroboam recover strength again in the days of Abijah: and the Lord struck him, and he died.] Some have made it a doubt, who it is of whom it is said that God struck him. And in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 21, the Jews say it was Abijah: for Jeroboam lived a long time, but Abijah reigned only three years: God not granting him a longer life, because of his ingratitude for so great a victory; or, as others will have it, because, when he took Beth-el, he did not destroy nor carry away the golden calf, but let it remain, although he had reproached the Israelites with it, (ver. 8.) But it is uncertain, as I said, whether it was there when the city was taken: and the next verse plainly shews, that Abijah while he lived was mighty: and therefore it was Jeroboam who was struck, and died a year or two after this blow. And as long as he lived, after this defeat, some think he was full of anguish, and such pain in his bowels, as Jehoram had, (chap. xxi. 19.) Thus Abarbinel, and many others.

Ver. 21. But Abijah waxed mighty, and married fourteen wives, and begat twenty and two sons, and sixteen daughters.] Not after this victory, but before he was king, in the time of his father; for he lived not long after this success.

Ver. 22. And the rest of the acts of Abijah, and his ways, and his sayings, are written in the story of the prophet Iddo.] In the Targum it is, they are written in the Midrasch of the prophet Iddo: that is, in his Commentary, as we translate the Hebrew word here, in the margin of our Bible. (See chap. xii. 15.) This king was a very wise man (as appears by the excellent oration abovementioned); and in familiar conversation dropped many remarkable sayings, like the proverbs of Solomon: which Iddo thought worthy to be recorded and transmitted to posterity.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. So Abijah slept with his fathers, and they buried him in the city of David; and Asa his son reigned in his stead. In his days the land was quiet ten years.] There was no war declared, but only some private bickerings between his subjects and Baasha's. (See 1 Kings xv. 16.)

Ver. 2. And Asa did that which was good and right in the eyes of the Lord his God.] See concerning this verse and the next, in 1 Kings xv. 11, 12.

Ver. 3. For he took away the altars of the strange gods, and the high places, and brake down the images, and cut down the groves.] By this it appears, that though Abijah maintained the public worship of God, (as I observed, chap. xiii. 11.) yet there were also strange gods worshipped in some places.

Ver. 4. And commanded Judah to seek the Lord God of their fathers, and to do the law and the commandment.] I suppose he set forth royal edicts, requiring the people to worship the Lord alone, and to observe all the laws of Moses.

Ver. 5. Also he took away out of all the cities of Judah the high places.] There were high places in the open fields, (mentioned before, ver. 3.) and also in the cities, which were all taken away by him.

And the images.] In the Hebrew the sun images, as we translate it in the margin. Certain it is, that the word hammanim imports something belonging to the sun, which Buxtorf renders Solares statuæ, sun-statues; because, saith Jarchi, they were set on the tops of houses, and so exposed to the sun. Whence Junius and Tremellius called them subdiales statuæ. But Abarbinel thinks they were in the form of the sun, made after the similitude of that globe, and worshipped by those who took the sun for their god. Others think they were temples built for the worship of the sun: which the Vulgar Latin follows.

And the kingdom was quiet before him.] Nobody made opposition to him.

Ver. 6. And he built fenced cities in Judah.] On the frontiers of his kingdom.

For the land had rest, and he had no war in those years; because the Lord had given him rest.] The Targum thus explains it, Because the land of Israel rested, neither did they more war against him in those years. That is, the Israelites and their king made no attempt upon him, nor endeavoured to vindicate the late great loss they had received, by the singular providence of God over him. But the meaning may rather be, that the land of Judah (which he is speaking of), which had hitherto endeavoured to reduce the ten tribes to the obedience of the house of David, now attempted nothing, nor was assaulted by them or others.

Because the Lord had given him rest.] Of which he made this good use, in providing for war in the time of peace.

Ver. 7. Therefore he said unto Judah, Let us build these cities, and make about them walls and towers, gates and bars.] But he shewed his wisdom in this also, that he did not go about this work without the advice of his council, and the elders of Judah.

While the land is yet before us.] Which the Targum thus expounds, While the inhabitants of the land are subdued to us: or, as Jarchi, While the kingdom is established before us. That is, while it is in our power, as this phrase signifies.

Because we have sought the Lord our God, we have sought him, and he hath given us rest on every side: so they have built and prospered.] None gave him the least disturbance till he had finished his works.

Ver. 8. And Asa had an army of men that bare targets and spears, out of Judah three hundred thousand, and out of Benjamin, that bare shields and drew bows, two hundred and fourscore thousand: all these were mighty men of valour.] He was provided also of a great army, if there were any occasion to use it, as well as of places of defence. Some think he raised these men after he heard Zerah intended an invasion upon him: but it rather signifies his great care to have an army in readiness, when he saw no danger of any enemy.

Ver. 9. And there came out against them Zerah the Ethiopian.] King of the Arabians, as Cush here signifies: and must necessarily be so understood in chap. xxi. 16. and 2 Kings xix. 9. See what I have there noted; and Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. iv. cap. 2. where he shews they were a very powerful nation.

With a host of a thousand thousand, and three hundred chariots, and came to Mareshah.] A city upon the borders of Judah, (Josh. xv. 44.)

Ver. 10. Then Asa went out against him, and they set the battle in array in the valley of Zephathah at Mareshah.] He did not stay till he entered his country, but went to fight him upon the frontiers of it.

Ver. 11. And Asa cried unto the Lord his God, and said.] Before he began to fight, he implored the help of Heaven; which he did, I suppose, in the face of all his army, that they might look up to God as their strength and salvation.

Lord, it is nothing with thee to help, whether with many, or with them that have no power.] Or, as the Targum renders it, There is none besides thee, who helpest both the strong and the weak.

Help us, O Lord our God; for we rest on thee, and in thy name we go against this multitude.] In the Targum it is, We rely upon thy Word, in the name of thy Word we go forth. That is, by his authority, in confidence of his power, and in the defence of his kingdom and religion.

O Lord, thou art our God; let not man prevail against thee.] Nothing could more inspire them with courage, than to believe he looked upon their cause as his own, while they owned him for their God.

Ver. 12. So the Lord smote the Ethiopians before Asa, and before Judah: and the Ethiopians fled.] As the Israelites had done not long before, (chap. xiii. 15.)

Ver. 13. And Asa, and the people that were with him, pursued them unto Gerar.] This was a city of the Philistines, who, it is likely, were their allies and confederates in this war.

And the Ethiopians were overthrown, that they could not recover themselves; for they were destroyed before the Lord, and before his host.] The victory was so entire, that they could not rally their forces to renew the fight. It is not said what number were slain, but the word destroy signifies that very many perished; for they fought against the Lord and his host, who made a great destruction among them.

And they carried away very much spoil.] From the men that were slain in the field of battle, and those that run away and left their baggage behind them: for he speaks in the next verses of the spoil of their cities, and of the fields about them.

Ver. 14. And they smote all the cities round about Gerar.] Into which, it is likely, the Ethiopians fled.

For the fear of the Lord came upon them.] Seeing so vast a host defeated, they had no courage to defend themselves.

And they spoiled all the cities; for there was exceeding much spoil in them.] Partly by their own riches, and partly by the booty which the Ethiopians afforded them.

Ver. 15. They smote also the tents of cattle, and carried away sheep and camels in abundance, and returned to Jerusalem.] The abundance of camels which they had shew they were Arabians. And the Scenitæ and Nomades (as Bochartus observes) did not live all the year in the open air, but had tents both for themselves and their cattle in winter time. And they that dwelt in tents are opposed to those who lived in the open field, who are said ἀγραυλεῖν. Thus Esau and Jacob are distinguished; the former of which is said to be a man of the field, and the other to dwell in tents, (Gen. xxv. 27.)

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. AND the Spirit of God came upon Azariah the son of Oded.] Some think he was also called Obed, (ver. 8.) but had the name of Azariah given him, to distinguish him from his father.

Ver. 2. And he went out to meet Asa, and said unto him, Hear ye me, Asa, and all Judah and Benjamin; The Lord is with you.] As appeared by the late glorious victory they had obtained by his help, (chap. xiv. 13.)

While ye be with him.] While you continue to worship him alone.

And if ye seek him, he will be found of you; but if ye forsake him, he will forsake you.] He would not have them presume of his continued favour, if they forsook his worship and service: and therefore admonishes them to stick close to him, otherwise he would forsake them. The Targum thus expresses it, The Word of the Lord is your helper, while you walk in his ways, &c.

Ver. 3. Now for a long season Israel hath been without the true God.] The Targum explains it very clearly: There have been many days since the house of Israel departed from the house of David, because of Jeroboam: in which they have not worshipped the true God, but the golden calves.

And without a teaching priest, and without law.] For all the priests were gone into the land of Judah: and the Israelites neglected the study of the law, as the Targum explains the last words. But there are a great number of learned men who will have these words, and those that follow, relate to the times of the judges; when they were more manifestly in such a condition as is here described. And truly Campegius Vitringa hath learnedly asserted this opinion, in his book de Synagoga Veteri, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 6.

Ver. 4. But when they in their trouble did turn unto the Lord God of Israel, and sought him, he was found of them.] If we follow the common interpretation, which respects the present and future state of Israel, these words should thus be translated; If in their trouble they had turned, &c. they should have found him.

Ver. 5. And in those times there was no peace to him that went out, nor to him that came in; but great vexations were upon all the inhabitants of the countries.] We do not read of such troubles hitherto in the kingdom of Israel; therefore the words must be translated, In those times (if they continue to displease God) there shall be no peace, &c. No quiet, no safety; but they shall be infested both by external wars and intestine discords. Which was fulfilled, as we find in their history, 1 Kings xv. xvi. &c.

Ver. 6. And nation was destroyed of nation, and city of city.] These words also must be translated in the future tense, Nation shall be destroyed of nation, &c. Where by nation is meant tribe: one of which fought against another, in those times, when there was no certain settled succession in the kingdom; but whosoever killed their king, hoped to make a party to help him to get into the throne.

For God did vex them with all adversity.] For God shall set them one against another, with mutual slaughters, and all those evils that accompany civil wars. The Targum here again translates it, The Word of the Lord, &c.

Ver. 7. Be ye strong therefore, and let not your hands be weak.] To root out idolatry; which had brought such calamities upon the Israelites, and would still bring more.

For your work shall be rewarded.] As they might learn from their late great victory over idolaters.

Ver. 8. And when Asa heard these words, and the prophecy of Oded the prophet.] A short expression, being as much as the son of Obed the prophet. Though some think the father prophesied as well as the son, and foretold the same calamities: the more to awaken them, and confirm them in the belief of what Azariah said.

He took courage.] This explains the foregoing words, be strong therefore, to be meant of an undaunted resolution to abolish idolatry: which required great courage, when so many were addicted to it, and had practised it both in the days of Rehoboam and Abijah.

And put away the abominable idols out of all the land of Judah and Benjamin, and out of the cities which he had taken from Mount Ephraim.] Or, which had been taken, viz. by Abijah.

And renewed the altar of the Lord that was before the porch of the Lord.] At the entry of the court of the priests.

Ver. 9. And he gathered all Judah and Benjamin, and the strangers with them out of Ephraim and Manasseh, and out of Simeon: (for they fell to him out of Israel in abundance.] Though the Simeonites had their portion out of the tribe of Judah, when the land was divided by Joshua, yet it appears from hence, as well as from other places, that they joined themselves to the rest of the Israelites, when the kingdom was rent by Jeroboam. But now great numbers of them came over to Asa: which they might easily do, for one side of their tribe adjoined to Judah, as the other to Dan.

When they saw that the Lord his God was with him).] The Targum here again renders it, When he saw the Word of the Lord was his helper.

Ver. 10. So they gathered themselves together at Jerusalem, in the third month, in the fifteenth year of the reign of Asa.] This seems to have been a voluntary assembly by common agreement, rather than by the king's commandment or invitation. Unless we suppose it to have been at one of the great festivals, when they were bound by God to go up to Jerusalem.

Ver. 11. And they offered unto the Lord the same time.] In the Hebrew, in that day. Which the Targum takes to have been in the feast of weeks; which in the New Testament is called Pentecost; which was kept in the third month, called Sivan.

Of the spoil which they had brought.] From Zerah, and from the cities they took about Gerar.

Seven hundred oxen and seven thousand sheep.] Which they offered besides the appointed offerings at the feast. And they seem to have been partly burnt-offerings, in acknowledgment of God's goodness for their great victory: and partly peace-offerings, in eating of which they made the following covenant.

Ver. 12. And they entered into a covenant to seek the Lord God of their fathers with all their heart, and with all their soul.] Engaged themselves, by a solemn oath, to worship the Lord alone, and professed to do it sincerely, and with entire affection to him. But this doth not signify that Asa had no fault: for it appears, by the next chapter, that he had a great many.

Ver. 13. That whosoever would not seek the Lord God of Israel should be put to death.] If any body did, either publicly or privately, worship any other god, they agreed the sentence of the law should be executed upon him, which was death, (Deut. xvii. 2.)

Whether small or great, whether man or woman.] That is, without any respect to persons; no consideration being had of any one's dignity, nor the weakness of their sex moving pity and compassion.

Ver. 14. And they sware unto the Lord with a loud voice, and with shouting, and with trumpets, and with cornets.] These were expressions of the joy mentioned in the next verse, wherewith they took this oath. The difference between trumpets and cornets it is not worth inquiring after: the former seem to have been made of metals, the other of horns or wood.

Ver. 15. And all Judah rejoiced at the oath.] The main body of the people: and though there might be some idolaters secretly lurking among them, yet they all gave those outward tokens of their joy to see the worship of God thus established.

For they had sworn with all their heart, and sought him with their whole desire.] That is, they professed to do this most sincerely and heartily; and many of them, no doubt, did, at that time, resolve to worship God alone, though afterward they apostatized from him.

And he was found of them: and the Lord gave them rest round about.] They reaped the happy fruit of this reformation, in the great peace which they enjoyed, without disturbance from any of their neighbours.

Ver. 16. And also concerning Maachah, the mother of Asa the king.] His grandmother, as the Targum observes: it being usual in Scripture to call such their parents, (Exod. ii. 18.)

He removed her from being queen.] This was a great testimony of the uprightness of this king, that he would not suffer such a near relation to retain her idols, or any authority: his love to God overcoming his affection to his parents. (See 1 Kings xv. 13.) Jacobus Capellus thinks this stirred up Baasha to make war upon him: for having lived peaceably with him a long time, upon this he broke out into hostility. (Histor. Sacra et Exot. ad Annum Mundi 3053.)

Because she had made an idol in a grove.] Or rather, an Asherah, or Astarte, for so Laasherah is translated by the LXX. And, in all probability, Astarte, the famous goddess of Syria, was the deity which was worshipped by Maachah, as Mr. Selden observes in his de Diis Syris, Syntagm. ii. cap. 2. And thus Abarbinel upon Jer. xliv. makes Asherah to be the same with the queen of heaven there mentioned, viz. the moon.

And Asa cut down her idol, and stamped it, and burnt it at the brook Kidron.] He destroyed it with the utmost contempt, (1 Kings xv. 13.)

Ver. 17. But the high places were not taken away out of Israel.] It is said twice in the foregoing chapter, that he did take away the high places, (ver. 3. 5.) But that was of Judah: whereas out of the territories he had conquered in the land of Israel, we are here informed, he was not able to remove them. Or else the meaning is, that he gave orders for the taking them away every where; but they were not obeyed. Or, as others think, he took away those high places that were for the service of other gods; but let those alone where the true God alone was worshipped.

Nevertheless the heart of Asa was perfect all his days.] He heartily hated all idolatrous worship as long as he lived.

Ver. 18. And he brought into the house of God the things that his father had dedicated, and that he himself had dedicated, silver, and gold, and vessels.] See upon 1 Kings xv. 15.

Ver. 19. And there was no more war unto the five-and thirtieth year of the reign of Asa.] That is, as some interpret it, there was no war with the Ethiopians, or such-like people; though with Baasha he had perpetual war, (1 Kings xv. 16.) But Jacobus Capellus in the place abovenamed would have the words thus translated, There was no war in the kingdom of Asa, till the thirty-fifth year, viz. of the kingdom of Israel, not of Judah, or Asa: for this was the thirty-fifth year after Jeroboam rent the kingdom from the house of David. In which he follows Torniellus, as he doth Beroaldus and Junius, though he would not vouchsafe to name them. But more of this in the beginning of the next chapter.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. IN the six-and-thirtieth year of the reign of Asa, Baasha king of Israel came up against Judah.] The war was begun in the conclusion of the five-and-thirtieth year: and in the beginning of the six-and-thirtieth he made this invasion. But this disagrees so much with what is said in 1 Kings xv. 33. that interpreters labour hard to reconcile them. For by that place it appears, that Baasha began his reign in the third year of Asa, and reigned no more than four-and-twenty years. From whence it follows, that he was dead nine or ten years before the thirty-sixth year of Asa. It is a short way of solving this which Josephus seems to take, (lib. viii. Ant. cap. 6.) by supposing a mistake in the transcriber from the original copy, in which it was not the six-and-thirtieth of Asa's reign, but the six-and-twentieth, which was the last year of the reign of Baasha. Who died, he thinks, immediately after Ben-hadad had defeated his intentions of building Ramah. But most think this too bold a supposal: and therefore I gave in few words another account of this difficulty in my notes upon 1 Kings xvi. 8. viz. that this was the six-and-thirtieth year since the division of the kingdom, after the death of Solomon, when Israel was rent from Judah. For so many years were now past since that time; viz. twenty years in the reign of Rehoboam and Abijah, and fifteen of Asa's reign, when many of the Israelites came to him, (xv. 10.) Thus Seder Olam Rabba, Ralbag, Abarbinel also, with a great number of eminent modern writers, both protestants and papists: such as Junius, Piscator, Cocceius, Jacobus Capellus, Lightfoot, Mariana, Torniellus, Sanctius, Salianus, and Petavius himself, with many others. It is not said, indeed, that Baasha came up in the thirty-sixth year of the kingdom of Judah, but in that year of the reign of king Asa: but they make account, that the kingdom of Judah and of Asa were all one: and so they might easily be put one for the other. And whereas it is objected, that the Scripture is not wont to reckon the years of any king from any other term but the time wherein he began to reign: they produce an example to the contrary from 2 Sam. xv. 7. where Absalom is said to have gone to Hebron in the end of forty years, and there conspired against his father; which years Seder Olam reckons from the beginning of the kingdom, or the inauguration of Saul. And our Dr. Lightfoot alleges another instance in the thirty-sixth chapter of this book, ver. 9. where Jehoiachin is said to be eight years old when he began to reign: that is, said he, in the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar: for he was eighteen years old, as appears from 2 Kings xxiv. 8. But this difference, I think, may be better reconciled another way, as I shall observe on that place. I shall here only add, that as this is the most ancient way of solving this difficulty, so they that go another are forced to suppose, that these words do not relate to the beginning of the reign of Asa, but to something else; for instance, to the beginning of his wars with Israel. Which Kimchi endeavours to make out; but I shall not trouble the reader with it: for many good men think Josephus in the right.

And built Ramah.] That is, made a wall about it, and fortified it.

To the intent that he might let none go out or come in to Asa king of Judah.] The late defection of so many of his subjects, as fell from him to the house of David, (xv. 9.) was the occasion of setting a strong guard in this place, which was the passage between the dominions of Israel and Judah, (1 Kings xv. 17.)

Ver. 2. Then Asa brought out silver and gold out of the treasures of the house of the Lord, and of the king's house, and sent to Ben-hadad king of Syria, that dwelt at Damascus, saying.] This is a little more largely related in 1 Kings xv. 18. (See my notes there.)

Ver. 3. There is a league between me and thee, as there was between my father and thy father: behold, I have sent thee silver and gold; go, break thy league with Baasha king of Israel, that he may depart from me.

Ver. 4. And Ben-hadad hearkened unto king Asa, and sent the captains of his armies against the cities of Israel; and they smote Ijon, and Dan, and Abel-maim, and all the store-cities of Naphtali.

Ver. 5. And it came to pass, when Baasha heard it, that he left off building of Ramah, and let his work cease.

Ver. 6. Then Asa the king took all Judah; and they carried away the stones of Ramah, and the timber thereof, wherewith Baasha was a building; and he built therewith Geba and Mizpah.] These four verses are the very same (with small variation) with those in 1 Kings xv. 19—21. 29. (See my notes there.)

Ver. 7. And at that time Hanani the seer came to Asa king of Judah, and said unto him.] Here follows a remarkable history added to what we read in the book of the Kings: which relates the great weakness of Asa in his declining years, and God's displeasure at it.

Because thou hast relied on the king of Syria, and not relied on the Lord thy God.] Who had promised great victories to him, by the prophet Azariah, if he did well, (xv. 7.)

Therefore is the host of the king of Syria escaped out of thine hand.] Whom God would have overthrown, as he did the Ethiopians, if they had continued their league with Baasha, and come to his assistance against Asa. But now the Syrians were reserved to be a scourge to his family.

Ver. 8. Were not the Ethiopians and the Lubims a huge host, with very many chariots and horsemen?] See xiv. 9. By the Lubims are meant the people of Lybia, or the Africans beyond Egypt: who are sometimes in Scripture called Phut, and sometimes Lubim, from the Arabic word Lub, which signifies dry or thirsty, as Bochartus observes: for such was the country which this people inhabited, terra sitiens (as Lucian calls it), a thirsty land. They are noted by authors to have had abundance of horsemen and chariots, in which they fought, as Xenophon tells us. And Herodotus saith, the Greeks learnt from them τέσσαρας ἵππους ζευγνύναι, to yoke four horses together to draw a chariot.

Yet, because thou didst rely on the Lord, he delivered them into thine hand.] See xiv. 11. The words of Conradus Pellicanus upon this verse are so pious, that I think fit to transcribe them: "Asa committed a triple offence; in distrusting the goodness of God for help, and calling to his aid an infidel and impious king; when he had lately had such an experiment of God's clemency in his triumph over the king of Ethiopia. Nothing offends God so much as distrust in his goodness towards the faithful: as an entire faith and confidence in his mercy pleases him above all things. Upon which account David was so highly in his favour, though otherwise guilty of sundry crimes."

Ver. 9. For the eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the whole earth, to shew himself strong in the behalf of them whose heart is perfect towards him.] He exercises a most watchful providence over those throughout the whole world, who sincerely commit themselves unto him, and depend upon him in well-doing, and will not fail to protect them. For these words, as Mr. Mede observes, are of the same import with those in the prophecy of Zechariah, iv. 11. where the seven eyes of the Lord are said to run to and fro through the earth. Which took such care of that one stone which Zerubbabel had laid for the foundation of the temple, that the work could not be disappointed, but should certainly at length be finished, (par. i. discourse 10.)

Herein thou hast done foolishly; therefore from henceforth thou shalt have wars.] The heart of Asa is said to have been perfect all his days, in the foregoing chapter, ver. 17. And so it was in the matter of the outward worship of God at the temple, of which he was there speaking. But in the latter end of his life he was defective in his inward trust and confidence in God: which is called foolishness; both because it was a sinful thing, and very pernicious. For God exposed him to his enemies, as a punishment for relying on man more than his friendship.

Ver. 10. Then Asa was wroth with the seer.] This was still a greater sin, to be so angry with his reprover (though he had his commission from God) as to put him in prison. But anger is no good adviser; and when men forget God, they are not themselves.

And put him in a prison-house.] In the stocks which were in the prison, as Tremellius translates it, in domum cippi.

For he was in a rage with him because of this thing.] For which he ought to have thanked and rewarded him.

And Asa oppressed some of the people at the same time.] He enslaved them, as the Targum translates it. That is, in the latter part of his reign he grew something tyrannical. And no wonder, when he relied not upon God, but upon human power, and was full of pride and passion.

Ver. 11. And, behold, the acts of Asa, first and last, lo, they are written in the books of the kings of Judah and Israel.] Not in those books of the Kings which we have in the Bible; but in those written by the prophets, mentioned xii. 15.

Ver. 12. And Asa, in the thirty and ninth year of his reign, was diseased in his feet, until his disease was exceeding great.] He had the gout; which increased to such a height, that he died of it, as Pellicanus thinks. Which was a just punishment upon him, for putting the prophet's feet in the stocks: "Ut per id quod peccaverat, per id puniretur;" that his offence might be seen in his punishment.

Yet in his disease he sought not to the Lord, but to the physicians.] It was not a fault that he desired the help of physicians; but that he trusted to their skill, more than to the goodness and power of God: which he did not implore, but continued in his former fault, of putting confidence in man. And so Grotius thinks, he did not sin in seeking help from the Syrians, but in trusting to them more than God, and hiring them with things consecrated to God, (lib. ii. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 15. sect. 9.) An excellent person whom I have often mentioned (Dr. Alix) is of opinion, that these physicians were heathens; for we never read of any before in the sacred story, but among the Egyptians: and the heathen physicians in those days were a sort of charmers.

Ver. 13. And Asa slept with his fathers, and died in the one-and-fortieth year of his reign.

Ver. 14. And they buried him in his own sepulchres, which he had made for himself in the city of David.] In the Hebrew the words are, they buried him in his sepulchres; the plural number being used, as many think, for the singular, which is frequent in the Scripture. But the words rather respect the form of their monuments in that nation, which contained many sepulchres; that is, several cells wherein dead bodies were laid. And it is likely he made one for himself, which he added to the rest of the sepulchres in that vault, or monument.

And laid him in the bed which was filled with sweet odours, and divers kinds of spices prepared by the apothecaries' art.] To all his other offences he added this vanity (as Conradus Pellicanus thinks), that he ordered his body to be buried after the manner of the gentiles, rather than like the people of God. Though it must be confessed, it was an ancient custom to embalm bodies, which was used in the burial of Jacob. But what is here related doth not seem to be meant of any thing done to the body, but to the bed on which it lay; which, among the Romans, was very stately for great persons. (See Suetonius, in the life of Julius Cæsar, cap. 84.) For the heathens were wont to burn their goods with them, to serve them in the other world.

And they made a very great burning for him.] The Greeks and Romans burnt dead bodies, throwing frankincense, myrrh, cassia, and other fragrant things, into the fire. And these in such vast quantity, that Pliny represents it as a piece of profaneness to bestow such heaps of frankincense upon a dead body, when they offered it to their gods by crumbs, (lib. xii. Nat. Hist. cap. 18.) But the Israelites had no such custom; but from the ancient Egyptians perhaps learnt the custom, not of burning bodies, but of burning many spices at their funerals; as we find not only here, but at the funeral of Jehoram, (chap. xxi. 9.) and of Zedekiah, (Jer. xxxiv. 5.) Kimchi here says, that they burnt the bed on which they lay, and other household-stuff, that none might have the honour to use them when they were gone.

If we may believe what the Jews say in Juchasin, when Gamaleel the son of Simeon, the grandchild of Hillel (at whose feet St. Paul sat), was buried, Onkelos burnt seventy pounds of frankincense upon his sepulchre. But this is a fable invented to raise the credit of the Targum of Onkelos, which was not known till many ages after. But the best of the Jews believe this burning of sweet spices and woods was first intended, merely to prevent the offence which the smell of dead bodies might possibly sometimes give. But the vanity of some men made them exceed beyond necessity.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. AND Jehoshaphat his son reigned in his stead, and strengthened himself against Israel.] The first thing he did after he came to the crown, was to put his kingdom in a good posture of defence against the king and people of Israel; who had given disturbance to his father, (xvi. 1, &c.)

Ver. 2. And he placed forces in all the fenced cities of Judah, and set garrisons in the land of Judah, and in the cities of Ephraim, which Asa his father had taken.] He fortified his frontier cities, and increased the garrisons in the rest of the country, and in those cities which his father took from Israel. We do not read, indeed, of any cities that Asa took, but Abijah possessed himself of several, which Asa kept and took for his own, (xiii. 19.) and Jehoshaphat put such forces in them as might secure them to himself.

Ver. 3. And the Lord was with Jehoshaphat.] The Targum, according to the usual language of that paraphrast, saith, The Word of the Lord was his helper.

Because he walked in the first ways of his father David.] Before he committed those foul sins, in the matter of Uriah. But some read it, of his father, and of David. For Asa in the beginning of his reign was very pious, as David was. And thus it is some reflection upon Asa, for his offences in the latter end of his life: his son being noted to have followed him as he was in his first days, not in his old age.

And sought not unto Baalim.] Which were the gods worshipped in all the eastern countries round about them.

Ver. 4. But sought the Lord God of his father, and walked in his commandments, and not after the doings of Israel.] As he worshipped not the gods of other countries; so he did not join with the Israelites in worshipping God by the calves.

Ver. 5. Therefore the Lord established the kingdom in his hand; and all Judah brought up Jehoshaphat presents.] As they used to do in those countries, in the beginning of their king's reign. (See 1 Sam. x. 27, 28. 1 Kings x. 25.)

And he had riches and honour in abundance.] Riches procure men honour; when they make such a good use of them as he did.

Ver. 6. And his heart was lifted up in the ways of the Lord.] He had very generous resolutions, as Strigelius renders it, to promote the true worship of God, and all goodness: his mind being raised above all fear and discouragement.

Moreover, he took away the high places and groves out of Judah.] The meaning is plain, that those high places wherein they sacrificed to idols he destroyed, as Asa had done in the beginning of his reign: but, in the latter end, some had restored them again. There is no need, therefore, of their amendment, who fancy that, anciently, instead of veoth, moreover, there was velo, he did not; that so it may agree with 1 Kings xxii. 43. and with the twentieth chapter of this book, ver. 33. As if the meaning was, that though he was courageous above all that had been before him; yet the people were so accustomed to sacrifices in high places, that he durst not take them away. This is true, that where they offered to the true God he did not take them away: but those wherein idols were worshipped were abolished.

Ver. 7. Also in the third year of his reign he sent to his princes, even to Ben-hail, and to Obadiah, and to Zechariah, and to Nethaneel, and to Michaiah, to teach in the cities of Judah.] He sent some that were of his council, to see the people taught; by removing all impediments, and making the people come to hear the priests and the Levites. For it had been to little purpose to take away their idols, if they had not been withal better instructed: and the priests and the Levites would not have had much authority among the people, if they had not been backed by such great persons as are here mentioned. Grotius, indeed, will have it, that these great men did themselves instruct the people: for, as the Jews observe, it was not proper to the priests and Levites, but all learned men might teach the people: and these who were of the king's council were certainly learned in the law. But the two next verses tell us, that priests and Levites were sent along with them, who taught in Judah. And therefore I take the meaning to be, that Jehoshaphat, being very desirous to have the people understand their duty, took this singular and extraordinary course to send some princes, together with the priests and Levites, upon this weighty business. The latter, that they might teach the people, the former to see them do it carefully, and require the people to come and receive instruction, and to be obedient to what they heard. Thus Jarchi and other interpreters explain it: "It belonged to the priests and Levites to inform the people of their duty, as it is written, Deut. xxiv. 8. and these political persons went along with them, to quicken the people to hear them, and compel them to obey them, and do according to their commands." (See Nehem. viii. 9.) Campegius Vitringa hath a large discourse to this purpose in his Synag. Vet. par. ii. lib. i. cap. 9. where he takes this to be an indication that the people in those times had little solemn public instruction; and thinks it a good proof that there were no synagogues in the country in those days, as there were in aftertimes, wherein the people were constantly instructed in the sense of the Divine law. Mr. Thorndike, indeed, rightly observes, that the words of Moses, Deut. xxiv. 8. are not rightly alleged by Jarchi to this purpose. But there is another place, Deut. xvi. 18. from whence he also concludes, (Religious Assemblies, p. 23.) that this teaching consisted in declaring the obligation of the law by the judges of it, the priests and Levites; and the princes were officers with power to enforce the execution of it. (See Malachi ii. 7.)

Ver. 8. And with them he sent Levites, even Shemaiah, and Nethaniah, and Zebadiah, and Asahel, and Shemiramoth, and Jehonathan, and Adonijah, and Tobijah, and Tob-Adonijah, Levites.] These, no doubt, were eminent men among the Levites, as the two priests, Elishama and Jehoram, were, who were joined with them.

Ver. 9. And they taught in Judah, and had the book of the law of the Lord with them.] That they might teach with the greater authority, by reciting the very words of that sacred book. But from hence Vitringa argues, that the books of Moses were scarce among the people in those days; for if there had been then public synagogues, wherein the law had been read (as it was afterward, every sabbath-day), there had been no need of carrying a copy of the law with them; which they might have had in every synagogue.

And went about throughout all the cities of Judah, and taught the people.] Which is too plain an argument, that there were not settled teachers in every city, who on all occasions instructed the people; nor doth it appear by this history, that these great men who were sent to see the people instructed, settled such constant teachers in every city, to instruct them when they were gone. The priests and Levites, no doubt, were ready to teach the people in their cities where they dwelt; and there is good reason to think, that most part of the prophets, who were the great instructors of the people, were priests and Levites. But it is as certain, that the charge of teaching the people belonged to those prophets who were not priests and Levites, as much as to those that were, as Mr. Thorndike observes in the same place.

Ver. 10. And the fear of the Lord fell upon all the kingdoms of the lands that were round about Judah, so that they made no war against Jehoshaphat.] God took care to prevent any disturbance, while they were about this pious work, by striking a terror into all their neighbours; who, it is likely, were sensible that it was in vain to assault them, while they continued firm in their religion. For they could not but observe how much their prosperity depended on that; and that they never fell into their enemies' hands, but when they fell off from God.

Ver. 11. Also some of the Philistines brought Jehoshaphat presents, and tribute-silver.] They were so far from giving him any disturbance, that some of his neighbours complimented him by presents, and voluntarily paid their tribute. Which it is likely they had neglected in the time of some of his predecessors, though imposed on them by David, who had conquered the Philistines.

And the Arabians brought him flocks, seven thousand and seven hundred rams, and seven thousand and seven hundred he-goats.] The riches of the Arabians consisted in cattle, as Fuller observes out of Strabo and Pliny, in his Miscellanies, lib. iii. cap. 16. And the Scripture informs us, how they abounded in both the sorts of flocks here mentioned, (Isa. lx. 7. Ezek. xxvii. 21.) And these, perhaps, were their tribute, they having been brought under the Jews; or rather their present, by which they sought Jehoshaphat's friendship, and put themselves under his protection.

Ver. 12. And Jehoshaphat waxed great exceedingly: and he built in Judah castles, and cities of store.] He built very strong towers (as Jarchi understands it), and cities wherein he laid up provisions of wine and corn.

Ver. 13. And he had much business in the cities of Judah.] To settle religion, and purge out idolatry; as well as to provide for their safety, by fortifications, and whatsoever was necessary for the preservation of public tranquillity.

And the men of war, mighty men of valour, were in Jerusalem.] He kept the principal officers in his army near to himself; that he might advise with them upon any emergency.

Ver. 14. And these are the numbers of them, according to the house of their fathers: Of Judah, the captains of thousands; Adnah the chief, and with him mighty men of valour, three hundred thousand.] He mentions only the commanders-in-chief: under whom were a great number of captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds, who are not named.

Ver. 15. And next to him was Jehohanan the captain, and with him two hundred and fourscore thousand.] In the Hebrew (as it is noted in the margin) the first words are, at his hand was, &c. Which may seem to import, that he was lieutenant-general (as we speak) to the former great man: who assisted him in the management of that army. But the following words plainly signify, that he was another commander-in-chief, having under him a great body of men, though not equal to the former. And, as the Targum translates the first words (whom Jarchi follows), he encamped near to the former.

Ver. 16. And next to him was Amaziah the son of Zichri, who willingly offered himself unto the Lord; and with him two hundred thousand mighty men of valour.] Some think, he served as a volunteer, without any stipend; or that he vowed himself to the service. Kimchi thinks that he offered gold and silver to the treasury, for the service of the Lord.

Ver. 17. And of Benjamin; Eliada, a mighty man of valour, and with him armed men, with bow and shield, two hundred thousand.] All the former were of Judah; now he mentions those of Benjamin, and the eminent persons who commanded them.

Ver. 18. And next him was Jehozabad, and with him a hundred and fourscore thousand ready prepared for the war.] See ver. 16. If we put all these numbers of valiant men together, they make a great demonstration of the wonderful blessings of God upon Jehoshaphat: who, though he had little more than the third part of the kingdom which David had, yet went much beyond him, in proportion, in the number of able men that were subject to him. For David, when he numbered the people, found but thirteen hundred thousand; and Jehoshaphat had several bodies of good troops, which altogether amounted to eleven hundred and sixty thousand: not reckoning the garrisons, which were in the strong holds. Nor is there any thing incredible in this, for we read the like in profane histories. The great Thebes, for instance, (as Tacitus relates in his Annales, lib. ii.) furnished seven hundred thousand soldiers, of its own inhabitants alone. But it is farther observable, how God blessed the reign of these two last kings, Asa and Jehoshaphat: in that when Abijah, the father of Asa, could scarce bring into the field four hundred thousand men, (xiii. 3.) his grandson was able to muster almost three times that number.

Ver. 19. These waited on the king.] That is, these great men, who had such numerous forces at their command, attended the king's person always, wheresoever he went.

Besides those whom the king put in the fenced cities throughout all Judah.] He made governors of all strong places, who constantly attended their duty there: and were under the direction of the great men beforementioned. Who did not only wait upon the king, but, as Pellicanus conjectures, presided over the whole kingdom: and were ready upon any occasion to send abroad the king's orders, and take care of the public concerns.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. NOW Jehoshaphat had riches and honour in abundance.] So he had before this time, (xvii. 5.) but now they were more increased.

And joined affinity with Ahab.] For his son married Athaliah the daughter of Ahab, (2 Kings viii. 18. and chap. xxi. ver. 6. of this book.) His great prosperity tempted him to this affinity with an abominable idolater: having some conceit, perhaps, that he might again unite, by this marriage, the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah.

Ver. 2. And after certain years.] After there had been peace three years between Israel and Syria, as it is explained 1 Kings xxii. 1.

He went down to Ahab to Samaria.] The affinity between them was the occasion, I suppose, of this visit.

And Ahab killed sheep and oxen for him in abundance, and for the people that were with him.] He entertained both Jehoshaphat and all his attendants with great splendour: which is not mentioned in the book of the Kings, though the substance of this chapter is the same with that abovementioned; and is there explained.

And persuaded him to go up with him to Ramoth-Gilead.] He caressed him so at this feast, and used such arguments, as prevailed with him to undertake this expedition.

Ver. 3. And Ahab king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat king of Judah, Wilt thou go up with me to Ramoth-Gilead?] What he had consented unto in the midst of their merriment, he seems now to resolve more deliberately. (See 1 Kings xxii. 4.)

And he answered him, I am as thou art, and my people as thy people; and will be with thee in the war.] The prophet

Hanani had given his father a caution against this, (xvi. 7.) and Jehoshaphat is reproved for it afterward, (xix. 2. xx. 37.) The Targum expounds the last words thus, that which happens to thee, shall happen to me, in this war.

Ver. 4. And Jehoshaphat said unto the king of Israel, Inquire, I pray thee, at the word of the Lord to-day.

Ver. 5. Therefore the king of Israel gathered together of prophets four hundred men, and said unto them, Shall we go to Ramoth-Gilead to battle, or shall I forbear? And they said, Go up; for God will deliver it into the king's hand.

Ver. 6. But Jehoshaphat said, Is there not here a prophet of the Lord besides, that we might inquire of him?] These three verses are the same in sense, and almost in words, with those which I have explained in 1 Kings xxii. 5—7.

Ver. 7. And the king of Israel said unto Jehoshaphat, There is yet one man, by whom we may inquire of the Lord: but I hate him; for he never prophesieth good unto me, but always evil: the same is Micaiah the son of Imla. And Jehoshaphat said, Let not the king say so.] See there, ver. 8.

Ver. 8. And the king of Israel called for one of his officers, and said, Fetch quickly Micaiah the son of Imla.] He seems to have thought, that Micaiah would be backward to come, because he knew the king's hatred to him; and therefore he bids the officer (who was a person of quality) quicken him.

Ver. 9. And the king of Israel, and Jehoshaphat king of Judah, sat either of them on his throne, clothed in their robes, and they sat in a void place at the entering in of the gate of Samaria.] The very same we read there, ver. 10. And the Targum explains it thus; they sat in a semicircle, as the court of judgment used to do, that they might see one another, and all the people stood before them.

And all the prophets prophesied before them.] All the false prophets, as the Targum understands it, who pretended to the gift of prophecy, which the following words shew to be the meaning.

Ver. 10. And Zedekiah the son of Chenaanah had made him horns of iron, and said, Thus saith the Lord, With these thou shalt push Syria until they be consumed.

Ver. 11. And all the prophets prophesied so, saying, Go up to Ramoth-Gilead, and prosper; for the Lord shall deliver it into the hand of the king.

Ver. 12. And the messenger that went to call Micaiah, spake to him, saying, Behold, the words of the prophets declare good to the king with one assent: let thy word therefore, I pray thee, be like one of theirs, and speak thou good.

Ver. 13. And Micaiah said, As the Lord liveth, even what my God saith, that will I speak.] There is no difference between these verses and those in 1 Kings xxii. 11—14.

Ver. 14. And when he was come to the king, the king said unto him, Micaiah, shall we go up to Ramoth-Gilead to battle, or shall I forbear? and he said, Go ye up, and prosper, and they shall be delivered into your hand.

Ver. 15. And the king said to him, How many times shall I adjure thee that thou say nothing but the truth to me, in the name of the Lord?

Ver. 16. Then he said, I did see all Israel scattered upon the mountains, as sheep that have no shepherd: and the Lord said, These have no master; let them return therefore every man to his house in peace.

Ver. 17. And the king of Israel said to Jehoshaphat, Did I not tell thee that he would not prophesy good unto me, but evil?

Ver. 18. Again he said, Therefore hear the word of the Lord.] Some think he spake these words to the bystanders: but this is confuted by 1 Kings xxii. 19. where the words are, Hear thou therefore, speaking again to the king.

In all that follows, to the end of the chapter, there is scarce any difference between it, and what is recorded in the book of the Kings; where I have explained it: and will not here transcribe what the reader may find there.

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1. AND Jehoshaphat king of Judah returned to his house in peace to Jerusalem.] I suppose, as soon as the battle was over, he immediately went to Jerusalem; to return thanks to God for his wonderful preservation.

Ver. 2. And Jehu the son of Hanani the seer.] See 1 Kings xvi. 1.

Went out to meet him.] Before he came into the city: that, being admonished by him, he might be the more affected with the mercy of God towards him in his deliverance.

And said to king Jehoshaphat, Shouldest thou help the ungodly, and love them that hate the Lord?] As much as to say, This is contrary to common reason, which taught the gentiles to make no friendship with such as were God's enemies. So Callimachus in his hymn to Ceres, ver. 117, 118.

Δάμητερ, μὴ τῆνος ἐμὶν φίλος, ὅς τοι ἀπεχθὴς,
Ἔσται, μηδ' ὁμόστοιχος· ἐμοὶ κακογείτονες ἐχθροί.

O Ceres, he shall be none of my friend who is hated by thee; nor shall he live under my roof: such neighbours are odious unto me. Where the illustrious Spanhemius hath observed many the like sayings among the heathens; and shews how the ancient Greeks abhorred to lodge in the same house with a murderer, or other grievous criminals; with whom they would not eat, much less be with them in their sacred assemblies; looking upon them as impure creatures.

Therefore is wrath upon thee from before the Lord.] Upon which account God threatens to punish him: which some think he did by raising such numerous enemies to invade him, as we read of in the next chapter. But most of all, by suffering all his sons to be murdered by their elder brother, (chap. xxi. 4.) and his grandchildren by Jehu, (2 Kings ix. 27. x. 13, 14.)

Ver. 3. Nevertheless there are good things found in thee.] For the sake of which he so far pardoned his error as not to punish him in his own person, but in his posterity.

In that thou hast taken away the groves out of the land, and hast prepared thine heart to seek God.] The chief thing wherein he pleased God was by abolishing idolatrous worship: which he had done rigorously, and served God with a sincere heart.

Ver. 4. And Jehoshaphat dwelt at Jerusalem.] Being settled at Jerusalem after his visit to Ahab, and the war with Syria, he had time to reflect upon his escape out of the late battle, and the reproof of the prophet: at which he was so far from being angry (as his father Asa had been, xvi. 7.) that he laid it to heart, and seriously resolved upon a farther reformation, in other matters, as well as religion.

And he went out again through the people.] He had sent out his officers before, (chap. xvii. 7.) who went out by his authority, and acted in his name, about this very business; but now he went in person, as then by his orders.

From Beer-sheba to Mount Ephraim.] The former of these had always been the utmost bound southward of the tribe of Judah: and the latter, since the division of the kingdom, had been the northern bound, as before the division was Dan.

And brought them back unto the Lord God of their fathers.] Since the last reformation, it seems, some had revolted to their former idolatry, whom he now reduced; especially those cities which his father had taken in Mount Ephraim, (chap. xv. 8.) who, being Israelites, might have been drawn in again to worship the calves.

Ver. 5. And he set judges in the land, throughout all the fenced cities of Judah, city by city.] That is, in every one of these cities: or, as Bertram thinks it should be translated, for city, and city. That is, he placed judges in the principal cities, unto which all causes were brought from the lesser cities and villages. This was a means both to have justice done between man and man, and also to preserve them in the worship of God, when judges were ready at hand, to call those to an account who went after other gods.

Ver. 6. And said to the judges, Take heed what ye do: for ye judge not for man, but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment.] He gave them this very solemn admonition when he settled them in their places: which the Targum thus translates, Ye do not judge before the sons of men, but before the Word of the Lord; and his glorious presence resides among you in the act of judgment. Which is a most illustrious testimony that the ancient Jews believed more persons than one in the Deity.

Ver. 7. Wherefore now, let the fear of the Lord be upon you; take heed and do it.] That is, Do as I command you, judge according to the law: for such as God is, such you ought to be, since you are in his place.

For there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts.] He bids them remember that as the nature of God is perfectly just, so he cannot be moved to do iniquity by respect to the greatest, or pity to the meanest, or by any gift be bribed to do unjustly. Whom they ought to imitate, being entrusted by him with his authority.

Ver. 8. Moreover, in Jerusalem did Jehoshaphat set of the Levites, and of the priests, and of the chief of the fathers of Israel.] Many were of opinion, that as before he speaks of the courts consisting of twenty-three judges, which were settled in every considerable city of the kingdom; so here he speaks of the high court of all, consisting of seventy, called by the Jews the great Sanhedrin, sitting at Jerusalem: whither appeals were made in all causes, that could not be determined below. But if this be true, Jehoshaphat was the first that we can find who settled this excellent constitution: of which we can find no footsteps in the books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Samuel, or in the foregoing kings, as I have discoursed at large upon Deut. xvi. 18. xvii. 9. (See my notes there.) And there is little in the succeeding times to persuade us of it; for Ezra and Nehemiah set up no such judicature as that the Jews call Sanhedrin. Which seems to have been wisely constituted, when they fell under the government of the Macedonian princes, from whose language they borrowed the name. Though Jehoshaphat therefore settled judges in Jerusalem, yet the number of them is not certain.

For the judgment of the Lord, and for controversies.] These words are variously expounded: some understanding by the judgment of the Lord, causes about sacred matters, others pecuniary matters: and by controversies, some understanding civil causes, others criminal and capital. It is sufficient, I think, to say, they tried all sorts of causes.

When they returned to Jerusalem.] That is, when Jehoshaphat, and those that attended him, returned from the other cities, where they had appointed judges, (ver. 5.) he constituted this supreme court in the chief city of his kingdom. I say supreme court, for there were not two of them; one for ecclesiastical, the other for civil causes, as some have imagined: but one court judged both, as Grotius hath very well proved, from the very account here given of this matter. For Jehoshaphat bids these judges try what cause soever should come to them, (ver. 10.) and adds, between blood and blood, between law and commandment, statutes and judgments. Which shews there was no kind of business in controversy, which did not come before this one court. Nor do those words ver. 11. prove the contrary, as he shews in his book, de Imperio Sum. Potest. circa Sacra, cap. 11. sect. 15.

Ver. 9. And he charged them, saying, Thus shall ye do in the fear of the Lord, faithfully, and with a perfect heart.] He gives them the same solemn charge, which he had given the other judges; (ver. 7.) that having the fear of God before their eyes, they should do righteous judgment, and not suffer themselves to be any way corrupted, for God would judge all over again.

It is a most memorable saying of Cicero, that judges, being sworn to do justice, should remember, when they come to pass sentence, "Deum se habere testem; id est, ut ego arbitror, mentem suam, qua nihil homini dedit ipse Deus divinius;" that he hath God a witness of what he doth, even his own conscience, than which God himself hath given unto man nothing more Divine: lib. iii. de Officiis, cap. 10. where he hath left this excellent instruction also, that a man must lay aside the person of a friend, when he puts on the person of a judge.

Ver. 10. And what cause soever shall come to you of your brethren that dwell in their cities.] By way of appeal from the other cities: where the judges were wont to refer matters of great difficulty to this supreme court at Jerusalem, where the judges were most learned.

Between blood and blood.] When the question was, who was next of kin to an estate, and should succeed him that was deceased. So some understand the word blood to signify kindred. But Jarchi understands it of a question, whether a murder was voluntary, or a man was killed by chance.

Between law and commandment, statutes and judgments.] Some take the word law to be a general word, the species of which follow. So that it is as much as to say, Ye shall judge concerning all manner of laws: first, of command- ments, such as have a natural equity in them; then statutes, or positive laws belonging to rites and ceremonies; and judgments, concerning those precepts, which direct the manner of proceeding in judgment.

Ye shall even warn them that they trespass not against the Lord, and so wrath come upon you, and upon your brethren.] This seems to be a command, that they should not only pronounce a righteous sentence in every cause that came before them, but that they should admonish him, who was in the wrong (and all other persons in the like case), to beware of injuring their neighbours for the time to come.

This do, and ye shall not trespass.] But worthily discharge their office.

Ver. 11. And, behold, Amariah the chief priest.] See concerning him, what I have noted upon 1 Chron. vi. 9, 10, &c.

Is over you in all matters of the Lord; and Zebadiah the son of Ishmael, the ruler of the house of Judah, for all the king's matters.] Many understand by the matters of the Lord, all things sacred; and by the king's matters, all civil and political causes. But Grotius hath judiciously observed, (in his book de Imperio Sum. Potest. circa Sacra, cap. 11. sect. 15.) that it is most agreeable to the Scripture to understand by the things of God, those which were defined by the law of God, and were to be judged by that law: and by the king's matters, such as, not being defined by the Divine law, were left to the judgment of the king. Of which kind were all deliberations about what was expedient or not expedient. And thus he observes, the most learned of the Jewish interpreters explain these words in his book, de Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. i. cap. 3. sect. 20. But which way soever we distinguish the things of God and the king's things, yet one and the same court took cognizance of them both: only with this difference, that the court had different presidents according to the nature of the causes. In things pertaining to God, Amarias the high-priest sat as the first judge; in things pertaining to the king, Zebadiah, a principal person about the king, had the chair, and was the moderator. For, as the high-priest was most conversant in the law of God, and therefore fittest to direct in such matters; so the chief ruler about the king was most exercised in matters left undetermined by the law, and so fittest to preside in such consultations.

There are, indeed, very learned men who think these words plainly prove two different courts: in one of which ecclesiastical matters were determined, in the other civil; in the former of which Amarias presided; in the latter, Zebadiah. Thus Corn. Bertram, in his book De Republ. Judaica, p. 137. 139. whom Const. L'Empereur defends in his annotations on that place: and endeavours to prove out of Deuteronomy, that God himself instituted an ecclesiastical senate, distinct from the civil, p. 389. But this is not a fit place to meddle further with that controversy: I shall only say, that I think Grotius hath sufficiently confuted this opinion in the book and chapter beforementioned, de Imperio, &c. And in his annotations also upon St. Matt. v. 22. (on those words ἔνοχος ἔσται τῷ συνεδρίῳ) where he makes this paraphrase upon this speech of Jehoshaphat: "Do not despond, as not able to discharge so weighty an office, for want of such learning and knowledge as are necessary for such a work: you have excellent men to guide you with their counsel. Such is the prince of the senate Amarias the priest, a man skilled in judgment; and if any thing fall out belonging rather to civil prudence than to the knowledge of the law, Sabadias the Ishmaelite is ready at hand, who is a principal person in such kind of deliberations. And besides (as it here follows) you have the Levites their assessors, who are very well skilled in many arts."

Also the Levites shall be officers before you.] Some of the Levites were members of this great court, who sat in judgment: (ver. 8.) the rest, who were not judges, were ministers under them to see their sentence executed. But it appears by this place, that the word shoterim doth not here signify, as in others, mere apparators who summoned men to the court, or such officers as executed the sentence of the court; but persons of some authority, who had power to make offenders sensible of the justice of the sentence, and convince them of their error: which was a great encouragement to the judges to undertake this office, and to judge uprightly.

Deal courageously, and the Lord shall be with the good.] He bids them not be afraid of any man: for God, who employed them, would stand by them and defend them, if they were good and upright judges. The Targum hath it, The Word of the Lord will help you, who is good.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. IT came to pass after this also, that the children of Moab, and the children of Ammon.] These seem to have been the principal in this invasion: the other here mentioned (in the next verse and in ver. 22.) to have been auxiliaries. For such was the ancient way of making war, and still is to this day, to call in the assistance of their neighbours. As appears by the Romans more especially, whose armies consisted of their own legions, on whom they chiefly relied, and their auxiliaries: who agreed neither in their discipline, nor in their language, nor in their affection, as Vegetius observes in his book de Re Militari, lib. ii. cap. 2. and therefore could not do such service. For which cause (as he observes in the beginning of his third book) they took care their Socii Militares should never exceed the number of their own soldiers, which is a rule laid down by Livy and Tacitus.

And with them other besides the Ammonites.] It ought to be translated, and with them the Meunims: who were a people in Arabia, near the Moabites and Ammonites. (See my annotations upon Judges x. 12. and in this book, chap. xxvi. 6, 7. and Bochartus, in his Phaleg. lib. ii. cap. 22.)

Came against Jehoshaphat to battle.] Made an invasion upon his country.

Ver. 2. Then there came some that told Jehoshaphat, saying, There cometh a great multitude against thee from beyond the sea.] That is the Dead Sea, as it is called in Scripture.

On this side Syria.] The Targum translates it, from the western part of Syria: for the Dead Sea was the western bounds of that country; and it is likely the Syrians joined against him, to revenge the assistance he gave to Ahab.

And, behold, they be in Hazazon-tamar, which is En-gedi.] A place where there was a great forest of palm-trees. It seems he had but slender intelligence, for he heard not of their motion till they were upon the borders of his country.

Ver. 3. And Jehoshaphat feared.] Having been lately told by the prophet (chap. xix. 2.) that God was very angry with him.

And set himself to seek the Lord, and proclaimed a fast throughout all Judah.] Fasting was generally joined with prayer in times of distress: unto which he publicly called the whole nation, that they might obtain help from God.

Ver. 4. And Judah gathered themselves together to ask help of the Lord: even out of all the cities of Judah they came to seek the Lord.] The Targum translates it, to ask mercy of him, and to beg his direction, and to hear his holy word. For some part of the law was read upon those solemn days. Vitringa takes this to be an argument, that there were no synagogues in every city in those days. For there would have been no need they should come out of their cities, and all resort to Jerusalem, to fast and pray, and hear the law there; which might have been done at home in their synagogues, as well as in the temple. Though not, indeed, in such a solemn manner, as it was performed by such a vast conflux of people, in one place, to make their supplications to God, (de Vet. Synag. par. ii. lib. i. cap. 9.)

Ver. 5. And Jehoshaphat stood in the congregation of Judah and Jerusalem, in the house of the Lord.] For there was a throne, the Hebrew doctors tell us, in the court of the Israelites, where their kings prayed to God, or spake to the people, as there was occasion. So Jehoshaphat did, and, in following times, Hezekiah and Josiah: after the example of Solomon, who began this custom, (chap. vi. 13.)

Before the new court.] The most learned in these matters confess they do not know what is meant by the new court. Some think it probable, that it was only some enlargement that Jehoshaphat had made of the court of the people, to render it more capacious: but others are of opinion, that it signifies the court of the women, which was now made distinct from the court of the men. (See 1 Chron. xv. 3.) Thus Constantine L'Empereur thinks that the court of the women was not built by Solomon, but added in aftertimes, Annot. in Cod. Middoth, cap. 2. sect. 5. where he disputes, that, according to the Mischna, this court when it was made did not surround the court of Israel: but the breadth of them was equal, according to the delineation there.

Ver. 6. And said, O Lord God of our fathers, art thou not God in heaven? and rulest not thou over all the kingdoms of the heathen? and in thine hand is there not power and might, so that none is able to withstand thee?] This is the most admirable prayer that we read any of their kings made: expressing the greatest confidence in God, and representing to him the justice of their cause. He begins with an acknowledgment of God's supreme and irresistible power; which extends itself every where over all creatures in heaven and earth, who are every one of them subject to his authority.

Ver. 7. Art not thou our God, who didst drive out the inhabitants of this land before thy people Israel, and gavest it to the seed of Abraham thy friend for ever?] Then he remembers the peculiar relation the people of Israel had to him, and the promise to Abraham, and the deed of gift which he made of this country to him, and to his posterity for ever, as a reward of his fidelity to him.

Ver. 8. And they dwelt therein, and have built thee a sanctuary therein for thy name, saying.] Next to that he remembers, that they had been long possessed of this country, wherein a house had been built for his worship by Solomon: to whom God promised at the consecration of it, that he would have regard to the prayers made in that place; (see the sixth chapter of this book, and 1 Kings viii.) The Targum here again saith this sanctuary was built to the name of thy Word; as in the foregoing verse God is said to have driven out the inhabitants of this land by his Word.

Ver. 9. If, when evil cometh upon us, as the sword, judgment.] Some translate it, the sword of judgment, that is, the punishing sword. But if judgment signify any particular punishment, distinct from the sword, it must be wild beasts, or captivity: for pestilence and famine are particularly mentioned in the following words. The Targum translates it, slaughter of the sword, which was a sore judgment.

We stand before this house, and in thy presence (for thy name is in this house), and cry unto thee in our affliction, then thou wilt hear and help.] See 1 Kings viii. 38, 39.

Ver. 10. And now, behold, the children of Ammon, and Moab, and Mount Seir.] Some think this explains what is meant by other besides the Ammonites, (as we translate ver. 1.) viz. Edomites. So the Targum in that place, With these the Edomites, who joined with the Ammonites. But see there.

Whom thou wouldest not let Israel invade, when they came out of the land of Egypt, but they turned from them, and destroyed them not.] He represents, in the next place, the foul ingratitude of their enemies (added to their injustice) in invading their country, unto which they had an undoubted title: when the Israelites did not do them the least harm, as they went to take possession of it, but took the pains to march a long way about to come at it, rather than give them any disturbance in their country.

Ver. 11. Behold, I say, how they reward us, to come to cast us out of thy possession, which thou hast given us to inherit.] It is a most odious thing not to make grateful returns of benefits received; but to return evil for good is the highest wickedness. Which in this case was aggravated by this, that they made an attempt not only upon the rights of the Israelites, but of God himself; whose land this was, which they held of him as their Lord.

Ver. 12. O our God, wilt thou not judge them?] He appeals to the justice of God, the righteous Judge, who rights those that suffer wrong, especially when they have no helper. To judge in this place signifies to punish, as in Exod. vi. 6. Psal. ix. 16. where these words, the Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth, are thus interpreted by Drusius, The Lord is known by the just punishment which he inflicts: in his Miscellanies, cent. i. cap. 18.

For we have no might against this great company that cometh against us; neither know we what to do: but our eyes are upon thee.] This is the last argument he uses to obtain help from God: the weak condition wherein he and his people were, which made them the objects of the Divine pity; especially since they placed all their confidence and hope in him alone. But it may seem strange that he should say they had no might against this multitude, when he had so many hundred thousand men at command, as are mentioned chap. xvii. 14—16, &c. To which it may be replied, that perhaps this was such a sudden invasion, that he had not time to gather a considerable body to oppose them: or rather he distrusted the greatest army, and acknowledged them to be of no force if God was not with them: on whom he entirely relied, and not on the number and valour of his soldiers, though both were very great.

Victorinus Strigelius hath such a devout reflection upon this prayer of Jehoshaphat, that it will not be unacceptable, I persuade myself, to the pious reader, if I here transcribe it: "In this weak and declining condition wherein the church now is, when the devil is very outrageous, because he knows his time to be short, &c. let us say daily with Jehoshaphat, We know not what to do; but our eyes are upon thee. Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory. Thou art our king and our shepherd; we are thy people, and the sheep of thy pasture. Thou only art powerful, we are infirm: but thy power will be perfected in our weakness. Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name give the glory; for thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake. Do not remember our iniquities, but save us for thy mercy's sake; for we are brought very low. Help us, O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy name: deliver us, and be merciful to our sins, for thy name's sake. Save us, O Lord our God, that we may give thanks unto thy holy name, and triumph in thy praise." Such addresses to God (so he concludes) will illustrate this prayer of Jehoshaphat better than the largest commentaries.

Ver. 13. And all Judah stood before the Lord, with their little ones, their wives, and their children.] The more to move the Divine compassion towards them.

Ver. 14. Then upon Jahaziel the son of Zechariah, the son of Benaiah, the son of Jeiel, the son of Mattaniah, a Levite of the sons of Asaph, came the Spirit of the Lord in the midst of the congregation.] He seems not to have been a prophet before this time: when a sudden inspiration came upon him from God, to comfort this great assembly with assured hope of deliverance, before they stirred from the place where they had prayed.

Ver. 15. And he said, Hearken ye, all Judah, and ye inhabitants of Jerusalem, and thou king Jehoshaphat; Thus saith the Lord unto you, Be not afraid nor dismayed by reason of this great multitude; for the battle is not yours, but God's.] As it was God's cause which they now asserted, so they might be assured he would maintain it, by overthrowing their enemies.

Ver. 16. To-morrow go ye down against them.] Jerusalem, where they now were, was situated on a high hill, and therefore he saith they should go down against these enemies: who are said in the next words to come up.

Behold, they come up by the cliff of Ziz; and ye shall find them at the end of the brook (or valley), before the wilderness of Jeruel.] God was so very gracious to them, as, by this prophet, not only to assure them of victory, but to inform them of the very time, and place, and manner of it. The time was the very next morning: the place is mentioned in the latter end of this verse, as the time is in the beginning: and the manner, in the conclusion of the foregoing verse, that it should be by the hand of God, and not by their own: who should be only spectators of the victory which God himself would give them: so it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 17. Ye shall not need to fight in this battle; set yourselves, stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord with you, O Judah and Jerusalem: fear not, nor be dismayed; to-morrow go out against them.] He repeats what he had said before (which he knew would be the greatest comfort to them), that they should have no conflict with their enemies; but only stand still in their place, and see the hand of God overthrowing them all. In which there was a notable accomplishment of Solomon's prayer, which Jehoshaphat recited.

For the Lord will be with you.] The Word of the Lord will be your helper, as the Targum expounds it.

Ver. 18. And Jehoshaphat bowed his head with his face to the ground; and all Judah and Jerusalem fell before the Lord, worshipping the Lord.] The king gave most humble thanks to God, as did all the people with him, after his example.

Ver. 19. And the Levites, of the children of the Kohathites, and of the children of the Korhites.] Who were then waiting, in their course, at the temple.

Stood up to praise the Lord God of Israel with a loud voice on high.] They sung praise to God before the army went out, as if the victory had been already obtained. And they raised their voice as high as they could, to express their full assurance of success. This, I suppose, they did by the order of Jehoshaphat.

Ver. 20. And they rose up early in the morning, and went forth into the wilderness of Tekoa.] That is, the army who were to stand, and face the enemy, went forth from Jerusalem.

And, as they went forth, Jehoshaphat stood and said, Hear me, O Judah, and ye inhabitants of Jerusalem.] It is likely he stood in the gate of the city, through which they marched out, and spake these words to the several companies as they passed by him.

Believe in the Lord your God, so shall ye be established; believe his prophets, so shall ye prosper.] The Targum translates it, Believe in the Word of the Lord your God, believe his law, and his prophets, &c. God having made them a gracious promise, expected their belief of it, and dependance on it: otherwise they had no reason to hope for victory.

Ver. 21. And when he had consulted with the people.] That is, with the elders and heads of their tribes, who represented the rest: without whose consent he was loath to do any thing, in a time of common danger.

He appointed singers unto the Lord, and that should praise the beauty of holiness.] It may be translated, should praise his most sacred Majesty. Though it is commonly thought he ordered them to praise the Lord with the same state, pomp, and ornament, that they worshipped in the temple: in the same habit, in that order and magnificence, wherein they appeared in the holy place.

As they went out before the army.] This was an argument of great courage and assurance, that they led on the army: declaring to their enemies, that God (whose ministers they were) was coming against them.

And to say, Praise the Lord; for his mercy endureth for ever.] This was the usual song, which they sung at the temple, (ver. 13.)

Ver. 22. And when they began to sing and to praise.] Before they had marched many steps.

The Lord set ambushments against the children of Ammon, Moab, and Mount Seir, which were come against Judah; and they were smitten.] Or smote one another, as it is in the margin. The Targum translates it, The Word of the Lord set ambushments, &c. By which that paraphrast understands his angelical ministers which attended him; who smote some of them secretly, and the rest thinking it was done by their neighbours, fell upon them as their enemies. But the meaning seems rather to be, that the ambushments which they had laid against Judah, by a confusion among themselves, made by a Divine hand, fell upon a part of their own army, mistaking them for their enemies.

Ver. 23. For the children of Ammon and Moab stood up against the inhabitants of Mount Seir, utterly to slay and destroy them: and when they had made an end of the inhabitants of Seir, every one helped to destroy another.] They of Mount Seir were ordered to fall upon Judah, out of an ambushment; but by some mistake they fell upon the Ammonites, their own confederates: and they and the Moabites fell upon them, till they had entirely destroyed those of Seir. And when that was done, they continued in such confusion, that they fell one upon another, still imagining they were destroying the Jews: who came upon them very early in the morning, as the prophet had directed.

Ver. 24. And when Judah came towards the watch-tower in the wilderness, they looked unto the multitude, and, behold, they were dead bodies fallen to the earth, and none escaped.] Instead of meeting with any enemy to oppose them, they saw them all lie dead upon the ground. For this tower, it is probable, stood upon the cliff of Ziz, (mentioned ver. 16.) from whence they could behold how their army lay.

Ver. 25. And when Jehoshaphat and his people came to take away the spoil of them, they found among them in abundance both riches with the dead bodies, and precious jewels (which they stripped off for themselves).] As they found rich garments upon their bodies, so they found great treasure among their baggage (as we call it), and many precious jewels; which they brought along with them, I suppose, that they might appear the more glorious, in the triumph which they promised themselves over the Jews.

More than they could carry away: and they were three days in gathering the spoil, it was so much.] They could not carry all the spoil at once, but spent three days in collecting it, and disposing of it. For there was vast provision, no doubt, which they had made for the subsistence of such a multitude; and a great many beasts for the carriages that brought it to them.

Ver. 26. And on the fourth day they assembled themselves in the valley of Berachah; for there they blessed the Lord: and therefore the name of the same place was called The valley of Berachah unto this day.] One cannot think, that they deferred to give God thanks for so signal a victory, till four days after it; but then they did it in a more solemn manner than they could at first: the whole body of the people assembling together, to acknowledge God's goodness to them. Which they did in such a remarkable manner, that it gave to the place ever after the name of the Valley of Blessing.

Ver. 27. Then they returned, every man of Judah and Jerusalem, and Jehoshaphat in the fore-front of them, to go to Jerusalem with joy.] This is a further instance of their thankfulness to God for their victory; that they did not return every man to his own home, after this overthrow: but first went back to Jerusalem, to bless him again for hearing their prayers, and making good his promises.

For the Lord had made them to rejoice over their enemies.] This they did with great joy, wherewith God had filled their hearts, by making them triumph over such powerful enemies.

Ver. 28. And they came to Jerusalem with psalteries, and harps, and trumpets, unto the house of the Lord.] To express by these the greatness of their joy, and proclaim their thankfulness to God.

Ver. 29. And the fear of God was on all the kingdoms of those countries.] On all the neighbouring nations, who heard of this glorious victory without fighting.

When they had heard that the Lord fought against the enemies of Israel.] Here the Targum hath it, When they heard that the Word of the Lord fought, &c.

Ver. 30. So the realm of Jehoshaphat was quiet; for his God gave him rest round about.] Here again the Targum saith, The Word of his God gave him rest.

Ver. 31. And Jehoshaphat reigned over Judah. He was thirty and five years old when he began to reign; and he reigned twenty and five years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Azubah, the daughter of Shilhi.] See 1 Kings xxii. 42. It is likely, his mother was a very religious woman, who had taken care to bring up Jehoshaphat in the fear of the Lord: and happy had it been for him and his family, if he had taken care to marry his son to such another woman.

Ver. 32. And he walked in the way of Asa his father, and departed not from it, doing that which was right in the sight of the Lord.] Whatsoever other faults he had, he kept close to the worship of God alone: and did many other good things as the law of Moses directed.

Ver. 33. Howbeit the high places were not taken away.] This shews, that the meaning of those words, xvii. 6. is, that the high places wherein God was worshipped were not taken away: though those wherein idols were served were destroyed.

For as yet the people had not prepared their hearts unto the God of their fathers.] The reason of it is here given, the people could not bear it: for their hearts were not disposed to serve God exactly according to the law of Moses. But though they renounced idolatry, and worshipped none but the Lord, yet they would not have his worship, by sacrifices, restrained to one place alone, but have the liberty to sacrifice elsewhere.

Ver. 34. Now the rest of the acts of Jehoshaphat, first and last, behold, they are written in the book of Jehu the son of Hanani, who is mentioned in the book of the Kings of Israel.] He was an eminent prophet in the time of Baasha king of Israel, and lived to the end of Jehoshaphat's reign. (See 1 Kings xvi. 1. 7.) He, as several other prophets, wrote the history of his own time: out of which monuments these books were collected. And his work was so highly esteemed that it was registered in the book of the Kings of Israel: which were commentaries, as Huetius thinks, of what daily passed, (Demonstr. Evang. p. 202.)

Ver. 35. And after this.] That is, after the Lord had given him such a glorious victory, and struck terror into all his enemies, and given him rest and quiet round about.

Did Jehoshaphat king of Judah join himself with Ahaziah king of Israel, who did very wickedly.] This was a great weakness, to make friendship with the son, when he had been so sharply reproved for joining with his father Ahab, (xix. 2.) especially since he was no better, but a very wicked idolater. And though he did not join with him in making war, but only in trade: yet God took it ill of him, and threatened to punish him for it, (ver. 37.) Into this he was betrayed by the affinity which was between them, which shews how dangerous it is to marry with idolaters.

Ver. 36. And he joined himself with him to make ships to go to Tarshish: and they made the ships in Ezion-gaber.] They were ships of Tarshish made to go to Ophir, as we learn from 1 Kings xxii. 48, 49. where I have shewn how this place and that agree. Bochart thinks there was a place called Tarshish in the Indian Ocean near to Ophir (that is, Taprobana), which the Phœnicians called by the same name with the other Tarshish, because the same commodities came from both. (See his Phaleg. lib. iii. cap. 7.)

Ver. 37. Then Eliezer, the son of Dodavah of Mareshah, prophesied against Jehoshaphat, saying, Because thou hast joined thyself with Ahaziah, the Lord hath broken thy works.] In the Targum it is again, The Word of the Lord hath destroyed thy works. Which he laid to heart so much, that when Ahaziah afterward desired to join in some voyage with him, he would not consent: as we read in 1 Kings xxii. 49.

And the ships were broken that they were not able to go to Tarshish.] They were shattered in the very place where they were built, in Ezion-gaber. (See 1 Kings xxii. 48.)

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. NOW Jehoshaphat slept with his fathers, and was buried with his fathers in the city of David: and Jehoram his son reigned in his stead.] By his own appointment, as appears from ver. 3. He was designed king in the seventeenth year of the reign of Jehoshaphat; and crowned in the twenty-third year, and afterward reigned eight years; three with his father, and five alone. (See ver. 5.)

Ver. 2. And he had brethren, the sons of Jehoshaphat.] They had the same father, if not the same mother: which made his wickedness in killing them the more unnatural.

Azariah, and Jehiel, and Zechariah, and Azariah, and Michael, and Shephatiah.] The fourth son is distinguished in the Hebrew from the first, by the addition of hu; the first being called Azariah, this Azariahu.

All these were the sons of Jehoshaphat king of Israel.] He was king of Israel in a large sense, many of Israel being subject to him. So Ahaz is also called, xxviii. 19. where I shall give some further account of it.

Ver. 3. And their father gave them great gifts of silver, and gold.] After the manner of the ancient patriarchs. (See Gen. xxv. 6.)

And of precious things.] The Hebrew word signifies any thing that is excellent in its kind; whether jewels, or garments, or fruits of the earth, as Beckius observes out of Solomon Abu Melech.

With fenced cities in Judah.] Over which he made them governors. This he did very prudently, for providing so well for them, that they might not be tempted to envy the kingdom to their brother; nor quarrel among themselves. But, as Strigelius observes out of Cicero, "Sæpe optime cogitata pessime cadunt;" things excellently designed have often very ill event. For these riches of theirs made their brother first fear them; and then, being wickedly covetous, he was tempted to make them away, that he might get what they had into his possession.

But the kingdom gave he to Jehoram, because he was the first-born.] He could not but know his wicked disposition, by his inclination to idolatry: but was swayed purely by his being the first-born, to settle the kingdom upon him, though not so deserving as his brethren. For such was the power of the kings of Judah (as Conringius observes), that they took upon them to dispose of the kingdom, as if it had been their patrimony. Some think he superstitiously observed that law, Deut. xxi. 13. for sometime the younger sons were preferred to the elder, as we find in the sons of Josiah, 2 Kings xxiii. 30. But (as Mr. Selden shews) common usage was otherwise, lib. ii. de Successione ad Pontif. cap. 1. p. 202. where he translates these words, "Regnum autem transmisit," &c. not he gave, but he transmitted the kingdom to Jehoram.

Ver. 4. Now, when Jehoram was risen up to the kingdom of his father, he strengthened himself, and slew all his brethren with the sword.] Being advanced to the throne, his first business was to make himself so strong, that he might be able without danger to murder all his brethren. Which he did; that neither they nor their posterity might ever pretend to the crown. Perhaps they were inclined to the true religion, and therefore he made them away; lest they should oppose him, when he went about to alter it, and bring in the old idolatry.

And divers also of the princes of Israel.] Several of the most eminent persons in the country: such as the judges, established by Jehoshaphat in Jerusalem, and in the country; lest they should revenge the death of his brethren. (See Grotius.)

Ver. 5. Jehoram was thirty and two years old when he began to reign; and he reigned eight years in Jerusalem.

Ver. 6. And he walked in the way of the kings of Israel, like as did the house of Ahab; for he had the daughter of Ahab to wife: and he wrought that which was evil in the eyes of the Lord.] These two verses are the very same with 2 Kings viii. 17, 18. where see what I have noted.

Ver. 7. Howbeit the Lord would not destroy the house of David, because of the covenant that he had made with David, and as he promised to give a light to him and to his sons for ever.

Ver. 8. In his days the Edomites revolted from under the dominion of Judah, and made themselves a king.

Ver. 9. Then Jehoram went forth with his princes, and all his chariots with him: and he rose up by night, and smote the Edomites which compassed him in, and the captains of the chariots.

Ver. 10. So the Edomites revolted from under the hand of Judah unto this day. The same time also did Libnah revolt from under his hand; because he had forsaken the Lord God of his fathers.] There is little difference between these four verses, and what we read in 2 Kings viii. 19—22. I shall only note here, that this was the first punishment God inflicted on him for his sin, in not following his good father, but turning unto idols.

Ver. 11. Moreover, he made high places in the mountains of Judah.] For the worship of strange gods.

And caused the inhabitants of Jerusalem to commit fornication, and compelled Judah thereto.] He not only gave them a bad example, and enticed them to idolatry; but by threatenings and compulsions he endeavoured to constrain them to conform to his example.

Ver. 12. And there came a writing from Elijah the prophet.] It is certain Elijah was taken up into heaven in the time of Jehoshaphat: therefore Josephus and the LXX. imagine (as Grotius observes), that from thence he sent a letter. Which is no more wonderful, than that Judas Maccabæus should see in a Divine dream Onias and Jeremiah praying for the people; (2 Maccab. xv.) so that the meaning may be, that Elisha saw Elijah appear to him, and bid him write these words and send them to Jehoram. But our Dr. Lightfoot is of opinion, that it is not meant of that Elijah, who was carried up to heaven, but of another of his name, who sent this letter. His reason is, because he is always called Elijah the Tishbite, and never Elijah the prophet. (See him upon Luke i. 17.) But in this, I think, he is singular; and it is not true, that he is always called the Tishbite: but sometimes simply Elijah; and in 1 Kings xix. 16. God calls him prophet. Therefore Kimchi seems to me to have given the most natural and plainest sense of these words, in his commentary on this place: That Elijah foreseeing, by the spirit of prophecy, before he went to heaven, the wickedness of Jehoram, spake these words to one of the prophets, and charged him to put them down in writing, and send them in a letter to Jehoram, when he grew so impious as is here related; and let him know, that Elijah commanded this writing to be delivered to him: that so Jehoram being affected with it, as if it had been sent from heaven, might be moved to repent of the evil he had done. And indeed this passage will bear this sense, if we take the words from Elijah not to relate to the first words there came, but to the immediately precedent, a writing. He did not send a writing, but it was sent as his writing. For there is nothing in the words to intimate that this was written after his death, but delivered after his death: so that it might have been written (for any thing that appears to the contrary) by Elijah himself, before he was taken up into heaven.

Saying, Thus saith the Lord God of thy father David.] He seems to upbraid him with his degeneracy from so pious an ancestor as David was, from whom he descended.

Because thou hast not walked in the ways of Jehoshaphat thy father, nor in the ways of Asa king of Judah.] His sin was the greater, because both his father and his grandfather had left him an excellent example.

Ver. 13. But hast walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, and hast made Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to go a whoring, like to the whoredoms of the house of Ahab.] He was not only an idolater himself, not only by his example corrupted others, but used his authority to draw, or rather to force them into idolatrous worship, and that of the very worst sort.

And also hast slain thy brethren of thy father's house, which were better than thyself.] This seems to signify that they were pious persons, who abhorred idolatry: and therefore his sin was the more heinous in cutting them off, proceeding from enmity to God as well as to them.

Ver. 14. Behold, with a great plague will the Lord smite thy people, and thy children, and thy wives, and all thy goods.] There was no calamity that could be thought of (as Vict. Strigelius observes) which did not befall this wicked prince: whose kingdom was destroyed and depopulated by the fiercest nations; his treasures ransacked; his wives carried into captivity; his children slain; and he himself laboured under a sore disease for two years; and when he was dead had not the honour of royal sepulture, such as his ancestors had. All which calamities were threatened in the writing sent him in the name of Elijah, that he might not think they came by chance, but by the special direction of Almighty God, as a punishment for his wickedness. But why should his people suffer, who are threatened in the first place to be plagued? the reason was, because their base fear made them comply with him in his idolatry; and besides, he was punished by the loss of them.

Ver. 15. And thou shalt have great sickness by disease of thy bowels.] A dysentery miserably tormented him.

Till thy bowels fall out.] For what should he do with bowels, who had no pity and compassion on his own brethren?

By reason of the sickness day by day.] For two years, as it is interpreted ver. 19. For days sometimes signifies a year: and in the Hebrew the words are days upon days, that is, one year after another.

Ver. 16. Moreover, the Lord stirred up against Jehoram the spirit of the Philistines.] Who invaded him on the west side of his kingdom, as the Arabians did on the east side: who stood in such awe of his father, that they brought him presents, (chap. xvii. 11.)

And of the Arabians, that were near to the Ethiopians.] It should be translated, that were near to the Cushites. A people inhabiting the inmost part of Arabia, not far from Nabathea and Negid, which was then called Cush, in the confines of the territories of Babylon, which was the ancient Cush: by which name Arabia, or some part of it, is to be understood in many places. (See xiv. 9. 2 Kings xix. 9.) Whence the topaz of Cush must be understood of the topaz of Arabia, not of Ethiopia. In which country there are no precious stones, as Ludolphus was assured by a priest of Ethiopia, and is confirmed by our merchants. (See Dr. Hyde, in his late book de Relig. Veterum Persarum, cap. 1. p. 37. and my annotations on the place abovementioned.)

The Hebrew phrase aljad (at hand) is well translated near by us, for so it signifies plainly in other places. And Forsterus, perhaps, hath rightly observed, that the bounds and limits of countries were called jad (i. e. a hand), because a hand was there placed, to denote that there was the end of the territory, which reached no farther.

Ver. 17. And they came up into Judah, and brake into it.] For his soldiers were not able to defend it from this irruption on both sides.

And carried away all the substance that was found in the king's house, and his sons also.] Whom they slew, chap. xxii. 1.

And his wives.] All except Athaliah: who hid herself, it is likely, in some secret place, with her youngest son.

So that there was never a son left him, save Jehoahaz, the youngest of his sons.] Who is also called Ahaziah, chap. xxii. 1. and by the interposition of one letter Azariah, ver. 6.

Ver. 18. And after all this the Lord smote him in his bowels with an incurable disease.] He lived to see all those calamities, which the prophet threatened, come upon him: and then the Word of the Lord, saith the Targum, smote him with a disease, for which there was no remedy.

Ver. 19. And it came to pass, in process of time, after the end of two years, his bowels fell out by reason of his sickness: so he died of sore diseases.] The last words seem to import, that there was a complication of other diseases, together with his dysentery: all which were very grievous, and a suitable punishment to his horrid wickedness.

And his people made no burning for him like the burning of his fathers.] See upon chap. xvi. 14.

Ver. 20. Thirty and two years old was he when he began to reign; and he reigned in Jerusalem eight years, and departed without being desired.] Some think the meaning is, he was weary of his life, being so full of pain, as to desire to die, rather than live in such misery. But the most natural sense is, that his people did not wish he should live any longer, but were glad his reign was so short: as appeared by their contempt of him, in making no burning for him, nor burying him in the sepulchre of the kings, as it here follows.

Howbeit they buried him in the city of David, but not in the sepulchres of the kings.] They shewed some respect to him, but not such as expressed any esteem for him.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1. AND the inhabitants of Jerusalem made Ahaziah his youngest son king in his stead.] They declared him king, and set him on his father's throne: but the kingdom was his of right, without the suffrage of the people.

For the band of men that came with the Arabians to the camp.] Mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 16.

Had slain all the eldest. So Ahaziah the son of Jehoram king of Judah reigned.] This band of men came up with the Arabians, but, it seems, acted by themselves; and killed those in cold blood, whom the Arabians had carried captive, (chap. xxi. 17.)

Ver. 2. Forty and two years old was Ahaziah when he began to reign, and he reigned one year in Jerusalem.] Many ways there are to reconcile this with 2 Kings viii. 26. where it is said he was two-and-twenty years old when he began to reign. (See my annotations on that place.) The shortest and plainest way is to acknowledge an error in the copyist or transcriber: for some Greek copies have here twenty-two years old; and so it is in the Syriac and Arabic translations: and our great primate Usher found it so, in a copy which he procured, at great charge, from that of the patriarch of Antioch. Piscator also acknowledges, there is no other way, that he knew, to solve this doubt.

His mother's name also was Athaliah, the daughter of Omri.] His grand-daughter, for she was Ahab's daughter, (chap. xxi. 6. and see 2 Kings viii. 26.)

Ver. 3. He also walked in the ways of the house of Ahab: for his mother was his counsellor to do wickedly.] She had the greater power of him, because she had saved him, together with herself, when the other wives and children of Jehoram were carried away captive. And she is said to have advised him to do wickedly, because she led him into a worse idolatry than that of Jeroboam's. Which is called the way of the house of Ahab; not because they were the first inventors of it, but the chief establishers of it in these parts. It did not consist merely in the worship of God by an image, which was the way of Jeroboam, but in the worship of other gods beside the God of Israel: viz. Baal-gods, or Baalim. Supposing, either by these to have easier access to the sovereign God the Lord of hosts; or that these they might resort unto at all times, and for all matters, as being nearer at hand, and not of so high a dignity. Whereas Jehovah, the God of Israel, Most High, either managed not smaller matters, or might not be troubled with them. For such was the conceit of the heathen, that the souls of great men after death had the honour to be agents between the supreme God and men, as being of a middle nature between them; which the Greeks called demons, and the Scriptures call Baalim. (See Mr. Mede, book i. discourse xliii. 243.)

Ver. 4. Wherefore he did evil in the sight of the Lord, like the house of Ahab; for they were his counsellors, after the death of his father, to his destruction.] His father was so bad, that there was no need any other should endeavour to seduce him, while he lived: but when he was dead, his mother's kindred thought it necessary to confirm him in his idolatry.

Ver. 5. He walked also after their counsel.] In other matters as well as in religion.

And went with Jehoram the son of Ahab king of Israel, to war against Hazael king of Syria at Ramoth-Gilead: and the Syrians smote Joram.] Though he would not imitate his grandfather in that which was good in him, yet he followed his bad example; in joining with Ahab's son, as Jehoshaphat had with Ahab, in the like war.

Ver. 6. And he returned to be healed in Jezreel, because of the wounds which were given him at Ramah, when he fought with Hazael king of Syria. And Azariah the son of Jehoram king of Judah went down to see Jehoram the son of Ahab at Jezreel, because he was sick.] These two verses have been explained in 2 Kings viii. 28, 29.

Ver. 7. And the destruction of Ahaziah was of God, by coming to Joram: for, when he was come, he went out with Jehoram against Jehu the son of Nimshi, whom the Lord had anointed to cut off the house of Ahab.] See how this was done in 2 Kings ix. 21. 27. and what I have noted there.

Ver. 8. And it came to pass, that when Jehu was executing judgment upon the house of Ahab, and found the princes of Judah, and the sons of the brethren of Ahaziah, that ministered to Ahaziah, he slew them.] As they were going to Samaria. (See 2 Kings x. 13, 14.)

Ver. 9. And he sought Ahaziah: and they caught him (for he was hid in Samaria), and brought him to Jehu; and when they had slain him, they buried him: because (said they) he is the son of Jehoshaphat, who sought the Lord with all his heart. So the house of Ahaziah had no power to keep still the kingdom.] The story of his death is related here a little more particularly than in the book of the Kings. (See what I have noted there concerning the whole, 2 Kings ix. 27, 28.)

Ver. 10. But when Athaliah, the mother of Ahaziah, saw that her son was dead, she arose and destroyed all the seed-royal of the house of Judah.] See 2 Kings xi. 1.

Ver. 11. But Jehoshabeath, the daughter of the king.] i.e. Of the former king, Jehoram, Took Joash the son of Ahaziah, and stole him from among the king's sons that were slain, and put him and his nurse in a bedchamber.] See concerning this my annotations upon 2 Kings xi. 2.

So Jehoshabeath, the daughter of king Jehoram, the wife of Jehoiada the priest (for she was the sister of Ahaziah), hid him from Athaliah, so that she slew him not.] She was the sister of Ahaziah by the father's side, though not by the mother's: for Jehoram had many wives, as we read in the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 12. And he was with them hid in the house of God six years: and Athaliah reigned over the land.] See in the place abovenamed what I have noted about the place wherein he was hid in the house of God: which the Targum here fancies was in the very holy of holies; into which none but the high-priest might enter, and that but once a year. But if this should pass for truth, we must not understand it of the most holy place itself, but of some chamber over it, as Beckius there observes, which will not justify this exposition; for, as I have observed before, there was no entrance into the room over it; nor is there any ground to think there was any building over it.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. AND in the seventh year Jehoiada strengthened himself, and took the captains of hundreds, Azariah the son of Jeroham, and Ishmael the son of Jehohanan, and Azariah the son of Obed, and Maaseiah the son of Adaiah, and Elishaphat the son of Zichri, into covenant with him.] It is not to be supposed that he took all the captains of hundreds that were in the nation into confederacy with him: but such whom he could depend upon, whose names are here mentioned.

Ver. 2. And they went about in Judah, and gathered the Levites out of all the cities of Judah.] These captains went about, and communicated the design to the Levites, as men that might be trusted with it.

And the chief of the fathers of Israel.] Some of which were under the government of the king of Judah; and others, perhaps, were known to be well affected to religion, and so were invited to give their assistance. But it is most likely that Judah is here called Israel (as in several other places), the principal men of authority of which were acquainted with Jehoiada's intentions.

And they came to Jerusalem.] To settle their resolution with Jehoiada.

Ver. 3. And all the congregation made a covenant with the king in the house of God. And he said unto them, Behold, the king's son shall reign, as the Lord hath said of the sons of David.] When all the forenamed persons were assembled at the temple, the young king was produced, and they all swore to be faithful to him. See 2 Kings xi. 4. where, in the following verses, most of this chapter hath been explained already.

Ver. 4. This is the thing that ye shall do; A third part of you entering on the sabbath, of the priests and of the Levites, shall be porters of the doors.

Ver. 5. And a third part shall be at the king's house; and a third part at the gate of the foundation: and all the people shall be in the courts of the house of the Lord.] See 2 Kings xi. 5—7. where this is delivered a little more largely.

Ver. 6. But let none come into the house of the Lord, save the priests, and they that minister of the Levites.] Who were then in waiting in their course.

They shall go in, for they are holy.] They were consecrated to the service of God, and were bound to attend there.

But all the people shall keep the watch of the Lord.] That is, of the house of the Lord, as was said before, ver. 5.

Ver. 7. And the Levites shall compass the king round about, every man with his weapons in his hand; and whosoever else cometh into the house, he shall be put to death: but be you with the king when he cometh in, and when he goeth out.] It appears by 2 Kings xi. 8. that part of the Levites were assigned to be the king's guard, which did not belong to their office (which was to guard the temple, and minister there); but upon this extraordinary occasion they were thus employed, as men upon whose fidelity Jehoiada might rely.

Ver. 8. So the Levites, and all Judah, did according to all things that Jehoiada the priest had commanded, and took every man his men that were to come in on the sabbath, with them that were to go out on the sabbath: for Jehoiada the priest dismissed not the courses.] This is more distinctly set down in 2 Kings xi. 7. to which I refer the reader.

Ver. 9. Moreover, Jehoiada the priest delivered to the captains of hundreds spears, and bucklers, and shields, that had been king David's, which were in the house of God.] These seem to have been hung up as trophies in the house of God, after David's victories. (See there, ver. 10.)

Ver. 10. And he set all the people (every man having his weapon in his hand) from the right side of the temple to the left side of the temple, along by the altar and the temple, by the king round about.] See there, ver. 11.

Ver. 11. Then they brought out the king's son, and put upon him the crown, and gave him the testimony, and made him king: and Jehoiada and his sons anointed him.] The same is said in 2 Kings xi. 12. only one thing is here added, that he was anointed by Jehoiada and his sons. Among whom Zacharias was one, whom the king most basely requited. The Targum here hath a long fable, that this was the crown taken from the head of the king of Ammon, wherein was a magnet, &c.

And said, God save the king.] They said this, with clapping their hands, as we read in the book of the Kings.

Ver. 12. Now, when Athaliah heard the noise of the people running and praising the king, she came to the people into the house of the Lord.] They ran from place to place proclaiming the king, and praising God, for setting him upon the throne. This is more briefly related in 2 Kings xi. 13.

Ver. 13. And she looked, and, behold, the king stood at his pillar, at the entering in, and the princes and the trumpets by the king: and all the people of the land rejoiced, and sounded with trumpets; also the singers with instruments of music, and such as taught to sing praise. Then Athaliah rent her clothes, and said, Treason, treason!] In this verse something is added concerning their expressions of joy, with instruments of music, &c. otherwise it is the same with 2 Kings xi. 14.

Ver. 14. Then Jehoiada the priest brought out the captains of hundreds that were set over the host, and said unto them, Have her forth of the ranges; and whoso followeth her, let him be slain with the sword. For the priest said, Slay her not in the house of the Lord.] See 2 Kings xi. 15. where this is expressed more plainly.

Ver. 15. So they laid hands on her: and when she was come to the entering of the horse-gate, by the king's house, they slew her there.] See 2 Kings xi. 16. For no doubt an usurper may be slain, by those who have the supreme power and authority: whether it be in the king, or the senate, or the people, as Grotius speaks. To which he adds, the tutors of young kings who are their pupils, such as Jehoiada, lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4. sect. 8. where he very wisely subjoins, that he cannot allow any private man to have a right to kill an usurper, sect. 19. Such a one Athaliah was, for she had no right to reign, but invaded the throne, by a tyrannical force, as Schickard calls it, (cap. 1. Theor. 3. de Jure Regio.)

Ver. 16. And Jehoiada made a covenant between him, and between all the people, and between the king, that they should be the Lord's people.] I have explained this in 2 Kings xi. 17. where it is expressly said this covenant was made between the Lord, and the people, and the king. (See there.) Unto which I may here add, that there is no such difference between these two verses as may be imagined. For Jehoiada the priest sustaining the person of God, the covenant was made with God, not with Jehoiada, who only represented God, to whom they promised obedience.

Ver. 17. Then all the people went to the house of Baal, and brake it down, and brake his altars and his images in pieces, and slew Mattan the priest of Baal before the altars.] See 2 Kings xi. 18.

Ver. 18. Also Jehoiada appointed the offices of the house of the Lord by the hand of the priests the Levites, whom David had distributed in the house of the Lord, to offer the burnt-offerings of the Lord, as it is written in the law of Moses, with rejoicing and with singing, as it was ordained by David.] What is set down briefly, at the end of that eighteenth verse, that the priest appointed officers over the house of the Lord, is here set down more largely in this verse, and in the next. The first words of which sound thus in the Hebrew, he put the offices, the offices of the house of the Lord, in the hand of the priests and Levites. Who, perhaps, had been put out of their offices by the former wicked kings, or by Athaliah, and now were restored by Jehoiada, according to the regulation made by David.

Ver. 19. And he set the porters at the gates of the house of the Lord, that none which was unclean in any thing should enter therein.] These also had been constituted by David. (See 1 Chron. xxvi. 1, &c.) For there is no earthly king, as Maimonides observes, whose palace is not encompassed with strong guards: and therefore much more fit was it that the dwelling-place of God, the King of kings, should be surrounded by his ministers, priests, and Levites, who should carefully watch that nothing did pollute it.

Ver. 20. And he took the captains of hundreds, and the nobles, and the governors of the people, and all the people of the land, and brought down the king from the house of the Lord: and they came through the high gate into the king's house, and set the king upon the throne of the kingdom.] He would have those who had begun this work see it accomplished: and therefore they all accompanied the king from the temple to his palace, and saw him set on the throne of his father, (see 2 Kings xi. 19.) whereby he took possession of the kingdom, to which he had been anointed in the temple.

Ver. 21. And all the people of the land rejoiced: and the city was quiet, after that they had slain Athaliah with the sword.] See this explained in 2 Kings xi. 20.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1. JOASH was seven years old when he began to reign; and he reigned forty years in Jerusalem: his mother's name also was Zibiah of Beer-sheba.

Ver. 2. And Joash did that which was right in the sight of the Lord all the days of Jehoiada the priest.] These two verses are the same with those 2 Kings xii. 1, 2.

Ver. 3. And Jehoiada took for him two wives; and he begat sons and daughters.] He did not take these two wives for the king, but for himself: which was contrary to the constant tradition of the Jews, that the high-priest was to be so pure as to have but one wife at a time: which they endeavour to prove by Scripture, from Lev. xxi. 13, 14. The Gemara Babylonica reports this, and Maimonides asserts it, (see Braunius in his Selecta Sacra, lib. iii. cap. 2.) Therefore Jehoiada is supposed to have had two wives before he was high-priest; or rather, one being dead, he took another. Or, as the Talmudists will have it, after he had divorced one he married another, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 19. But, after all, it is not certain that Jehoiada was high-priest, for he is every where called Jehoiada the priest; and but once only (ver. 6.) the chief: which doth not necessarily imply that he was the high-priest, but only a great man, because of his relation to the royal family; or because he was the chief head of one of the twenty-four families of the priests. But he seems to be distinguished from the high-priest in 2 Kings xii. 9, 10. and is not mentioned either in Ezra vii. or 1 Chron. vi.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass after this, that Joash was minded to repair the house of the Lord.] As is related something more particularly in 2 Kings xii. 4, &c.

Ver. 5. And he gathered together the priests and the Levites, and said unto them, Go out unto the cities of Judah, and gather of all Israel money to repair the house of your God from year to year.] That something might be done every year, till the temple was put into good repair. What money this was that they were to collect, we are informed 2 Kings xii. 4.

And see that ye hasten the matter: howbeit the Levites hastened it not.] Things were in so bad a condition, that it required the work should be begun with speed: yet such was the negligence of the Levites, and the backwardness, perhaps, of the people to part with their money, that in the twenty-third of this king's reign nothing was done, as we are informed in 2 Kings xii. 6.

Ver. 6. And the king called for Jehoiada the chief, and said unto him, Why hast thou not required of the Levites to bring in out of Judah, and out of Jerusalem, the collection, according to the commandment of Moses, the servant of the Lord, and of the congregation of Israel, for the tabernacle of witness?] Such oblations as were freely made in Moses's time for the building of the tabernacle. (See Exod. xxxv. 5.) There was also, beside this voluntary oblation, a tax set upon them. (See Exod. xxx. 12, 13.) It is called the tabernacle of witness, because here were kept the two tables in the ark, which witnessed the covenant between God and them. (See upon Exod. xxv. 16.)

Ver. 7. For the sons of Athaliah, that wicked woman, had broken up the house of God.] That is, Ahaziah, and the sons of his brethren, mentioned chap. xxii. 8. For his brethren themselves were carried captive before their father died: (chap. xxi. 17.) or, as Abarbinel expounds it, she being a wicked woman, played the whore with another man, by whom she had several bastards, who committed this impiety: therefore they are called the sons of Athaliah, their father being unknown.

And also all the dedicated things of the house of the Lord.] Which should have been employed in the reparation of it.

Did they bestow upon Baalim.] Gave them either to adorn the temples of those false gods, or to promote their worship.

Ver. 8. And at the king's commandment they made a chest, and set it without at the gate of the house of the Lord.] This is more largely related in 2 Kings xii. 9. (See there.)

Ver. 9. And they made a proclamation through Judah and Jerusalem, to bring in to the Lord the collection that Moses, the servant of God, laid upon Israel in the wilderness.] One like to that, according as every man should freely offer.

Ver. 10. And all the princes, and all the people rejoiced, and brought in, and cast into the chest.] The great men set so good an example to the people, that they cheerfully joined with them in this good work.

Until they had made an end.] Till every body had given something, or all that had a mind had offered, and they saw no more would be given: or, till the temple was repaired, and the work finished.

Ver. 11. Now it came to pass, that at what time the chest was brought unto the king's office by the hand of the Levites.] Who brought it from the gate of the house of the Lord, (ver. 8.) that the king's officers might examine what the contribution amounted unto.

And when they saw that there was much money, the king's scribe and the high-priest's officer came and emptied the chest, and took it, and carried it to his place again.] By the hands of the Levites, who brought it thither.

Thus they did day by day, and gathered money in abundance.] This is related a little more largely than in 2 Kings xii. 10. (See what I have noted there.)

Ver. 12. And the king and Jehoiada gave it to such as did the work of the service of the house of the Lord, and hired masons and carpenters to repair the house of the Lord, and also such as wrought iron and brass to mend the house of the Lord.] See 2 Kings xii. 11—13, &c. where this is more distinctly related. Only here we are told who put the money into the hands of those that were to oversee the work, viz. the king and Jehoiada, which is not there mentioned.

Ver. 13. So the workmen wrought, and the work was perfected by them, and they set the house of God in his state, and strengthened it.] For the men were so honest, that there was no time spent in calling them to an account, how they laid out the money: which they did very faithfully, (2 Kings xii. 15.)

Ver. 14. And when they had finished it, they brought the rest of the money before the king and Jehoiada, whereof were made vessels for the house of the Lord, even vessels to minister, and to offer withal, and spoons, and vessels of gold and silver: and they offered burnt-offerings in the house of the Lord continually all the days of Jehoiada.] It is likely Athaliah and her wicked sons had embezzled the holy vessels, and employed them to the service of Baalim. But till the temple was completely repaired, none of the money was converted to this other pious use, of purchasing vessels for the sanctuary, as we are distinctly told in 2 Kings xii. 13.

Ver. 15. But Jehoiada waxed old, and was full of days when he died; a hundred and thirty years old was he when he died.] He seems to have lived long after this work was finished, being well stricken in years when he undertook it. Many such examples of long-lived men are collected by primate Usher, in his Chronologia Sacra, par. i. cap. 12. p. 70.

Ver. 16. And they buried him in the city of David among the kings.] This shews a good disposition in the king and the people at this time, though they soon changed after he was dead and buried.

Because he had done good in Israel.] The good he had done was in Judah, which is often in this history called Israel: because they were the principal tribe among the Israelites, and were, indeed, the true Israel of God, while they continued to worship him sincerely.

Both towards God, and towards his house.] He had been an instrument in restoring the Divine worship, which now they were sensible was a great blessing: and in repairing the decays which were in the temple, and furnishing it with vessels for the Divine service.

Ver. 17. Now after the death of Jehoiada.] In his lifetime they durst not attempt this, for though he was old and feeble he retained great authority.

Came the princes of Judah, and made obeisance to the king.] Some of the great men, who in their hearts continued Baalites, desired to be admitted into the king's presence, and made their addresses with great reverence, pretending the greatest devotion to his service. And so falling into discourse with him concerning the state of religion, and other affairs, desired, at last, they might have leave to worship Baal, which Jehoiada had destroyed.

Then the king hearkened unto them.] To this dangerous discourse he listened and consented to them: for fair words and flatteries easily deceive princes, as Grotius here observes: and they wanted not specious reasons to persuade the king not to be so strict, as to permit no god to be worshipped but only one. Some of the Jews fancy, that they flattered him with a conceit, that he himself was worthy of Divine honour, being wonderfully preserved six years in the house of God; as the people flattered Herod after his oration, saying, It is the voice of a god, not of a man.

Ver. 18. And they left the house of the Lord God of their fathers, and served groves and idols.] Though at the first, it is likely, these great men only worshipped Baal themselves: yet they had their emissaries who persuaded the people to join with them. So that the house of God was deserted, and they worshipped idols in the groves.

And wrath came upon Judah and Jerusalem for this their trespass.] Which God punished by the hand of Hazael king of Syria. (See 2 Kings xii. 17, 18.)

Ver. 19. Yet he sent prophets to them, to bring them back again unto the Lord; and they testified against them: but they would not give ear.] God's goodness was wonderful in sending his messengers to reduce such a base people: whose wickedness was no less wonderful, in that they hearkened to the great men among them rather than to the prophets of Almighty God.

Ver. 20. And the Spirit of God came upon Zechariah the son of Jehoiada the priest, which stood above the people, and said unto them.] He had a Divine motion to speak publicly to the people and reprove them: which that he might do and be heard of all, he got up into a high place where they might all both see and hear him. L'Empereur, in his Annotations upon Codex Middoth, p. 80. thinks, he got up into some desk or pulpit in the court of the priests.

Thus saith God, Why transgress ye the commandments of the Lord, that ye cannot prosper? because ye have forsaken the Lord, he hath also forsaken you.] This he spake with great vehemence, and, it is likely, enlarged upon this subject so long, that it raised their indignation. It is very remarkable, that though he spake by the spirit of prophecy, yet he only applied the general prediction of Moses, Deut. xxxi. 16. unto the present time: that they might all learn to have a greater regard to Moses, and continually meditate in his law; unto which if they had attended, they would have easily discerned who were true prophets and who were false.

Ver. 21. And they conspired against him, and stoned him with stones at the commandment of the king.] Who, it is likely, was present when he reproved them; or, being told what he said, sent an order to kill him. Which shews their error, who think Joash was not an idolater himself, but only connived at the great men's idolatry, and gave them liberty to exercise it. Josephus rightly accuses him of this sin, of which if he had not been guilty, he would not sure have slain the Lord's prophet who reproved it.

In the court of the house of the Lord.] This shews that they were there assembled; of which he took the advantage to put them in mind of their duty: and, if we believe the Jews, it was upon the great day of expiation. For, as Bochartus observes, (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 1.) "Plebeius furor nullos habet limites, maxime cum religionis velum illi obtenditur;" popular fury hath no bounds, especially when the veil of religion is thrown over it.

Ver. 22. Thus Joash the king remembered not the kindness which Jehoiada his father had done to him, but slew his son.] This sin, besides the contempt of God's prophet, and of the place where he was murdered, had a horrid ingratitude in it: he being the son of him to whom the king owed his life and his kingdom. Who assisted his father at his unction, as some think, because it is said, chap. xxiii. 11. "Jehoiada and his sons anointed him." But if Jehoiada was high-priest, this son is not reckoned among the successors of Aaron in 1 Chron. vi. And therefore it is likely he was a younger son of Jehoiada: for if he had been his eldest, he would have had sufficient authority, without the spirit of prophecy, to reprove Joash for his idolatry: as Azariah resisted Uzziah when he would have usurped his office. Ludovicus Capellus therefore thinks it probable, that his brother the high-priest conniving at Joash's apostacy, this younger brother was inspired by God to reprove it. Which boldness Joash and his courtiers thought they might punish with some colour, by alleging, that he was not moved by God to it, but by his juvenile heat and rashness, which they stirred up the people to chastise. (See Chronol. Sacra, p. 285.)

And when he died, he said, The Lord look upon it, and require it.] And so he did, both by external wars (ver. 23.) and by a conspiracy against him, (ver. 25.) It is not to be thought, that he died with a spirit of revenge; but by the spirit of prophecy foretold God would punish them for their hard usage of him. Thus the apostle, 1 Tim. iv. 14. speaks of Alexander the coppersmith, who had greatly opposed him, "The Lord reward him according to his work:" which may be understood as a sentence pronounced against him.

The Jews tell a strange story in the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 11. how Nebuzar-adan, when he burnt the temple, saw blood bubbling up in a certain place; and inquiring into the matter, he understood, that a priest and prophet of the Lord had been slain there, because he foretold their destruction. Whereupon he killed all the doctors of the law, but still the blood was not at rest: then all the scholars in their schools, but still it was not quiet: then all the priests, and at last many thousands of the people, but still it continued to bubble. So that he said, Zechariah, Zechariah, wouldest thou have me to destroy all the nation? and then it rested, (sect. 24.) In other books they say, there were seven transgressions upon this day, in which they killed a priest, a prophet, a judge, shed innocent blood, polluted the court of the Lord's house, and the sabbath, and the day of expiation.

Ver. 23. And it came to pass, at the end of the year, that the host of Syria came up against him.] God was very speedy in punishing this, and the rest of the wickedness they had committed.

And they came to Judah and Jerusalem, and destroyed all the princes of the people from among the people.] Who had advised king Joash to restore the worship of Baal. This was a distinct war from that mentioned 2 Kings xii. 17, 18. Here Hazael is not said to have come up, but only his army, and that a small party. There it is not said, he took Jerusalem; but here he destroyed all the princes. There it is said, Joash diverted Hazael from him by presents; here, that they spoiled the city, and sent the prey to Syria. We are therefore thus to understand the whole: that when they did evil in the sight of the Lord, he sent Hazael to afflict them, who, we read in the book of Kings, took Gath, and set his face, as if he meant to set upon Jerusalem: whereupon Joash took the hallowed things, and thereby procured his departure from them. But in the end of the year Zechariah being murdered, this other war begun, which is here related in this book.

And sent all the spoil of them unto the king at Damascus.] Who was not here at this invasion, but contented himself to send a few forces against Judah, as the next words tell us.

Ver. 24. For the army of the Syrians came with a small company of men, and the Lord delivered a very great host into their hand.] This declared the punishment the more remarkably to proceed from the hand of God, who took away their courage, so that with a great host they could not resist a handful of their enemies.

Because they had forsaken the Lord God of their fathers.] According to the prophecy of Zechariah, ver. 20.

So they executed judgment against Joash.] They left him in a miserable condition; for all punishments are called judgments among the Hebrews.

Ver. 25. And when they were departed from him (for they left him in great diseases).] Many think he was sorely wounded in the battle; which brought him into great diseases. And they increased, it is likely, by the grief and anguish of his mind, to see his country ruined: and by the hatred and contempt into which he was fallen, which encouraged his own servants (as it follows) to conspire against him.

His own servants conspired against him for the blood of the sons of Jehoiada the priest.] This doth not denote he killed more of his sons than one; but, according to the frequent use of this language, the plural number is put for the singular.

And slew him on his bed, and he died.] Perhaps they were of his bedchamber, and so could more easily compass their design. Howsoever, he was so weak and feeble that he could make no resistance, and was so little esteemed, that his guard minded not what became of him. This bed was in his house of Millo, as we read 2 Kings xii. 21. which is said to be in the way to Silla: because there was another house of Millo, from which this is thus distinguished.

And they buried him in the city of David, but they buried him not in the sepulchres of the kings.] The same is said of Ahaz, xxviii. 27. Though the people could not punish wicked kings for their impieties while they lived; yet they set blots upon their memory when they were dead, as Grotius observes, lib. i. de Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 3. sect. 16. Egregio temperamento, as he speaks, by a most admirable temperament: wherewith the sacredness of the supreme power was preserved, and yet kings out of fear of future judgment were kept from altering religion. But it may be doubted whether this was done perpetually: for we find bad kings builded themselves sepulchres, (2 Kings xxi. 18. 26.)

Ver. 26. And these are they that conspired against him; Zabad the son of Shimeath an Ammonitess, and Jehozabad the son of Shimrith a Moabitess.] They were mongrel fellows, whose fathers were Jews, but their mothers aliens. For so the manner of this impious people was, to make marriages contrary to the law.

Ver. 27. Now concerning his sons, and the greatness of the burdens laid upon him, and the repairing of the house of God, behold, they are written in the story of the book of the Kings.] Some by burdens understand the sore punishments God inflicted on him, called in Scripture the burden of the Lord: others, the great tribute laid upon him by the Syrians, which was a heavy burden, and a sore punishment.

And Amaziah his son reigned in his stead.] Though the father was not beloved, it did not hinder the succession of his son.

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. AMAZIAH was twenty and five years old when he began to reign; and he reigned twenty and nine years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Jehoaddan of Jerusalem.] See 2 Kings xiv. 1.

Ver. 2. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, but not with a perfect heart.] He followed the right religion, and worshipped God aright, but not with such sincerity as David his father did, (2 Kings xiv. 3.) See Grotius upon xxvi. 4. where he observes, his son did in fact what the law required; but not with a solid piety.

Ver. 3. And it came to pass, when the kingdom was established to him, that he slew his servants that had killed the king his father.] They seem to have been men of some power and interest in the court, whom he durst not meddle withal till he was well settled in his authority. (See 2 Kings xiv. 5.)

Ver. 4. But he slew not their children: but did as it is written in the law in the book of Moses, where the Lord commanded, saying, The fathers shall not die for the children, neither shall the children die for the fathers, but every man shall die for his own sin.] The very same is observed there, 2 Kings xiv. 6.

Ver. 5. Moreover, Amaziah gathered Judah together, and made them captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, according to the houses of their fathers, throughout all Judah and Benjamin.] All that belonged to one family, he put under the command of one leader, whereby they became the more unanimous.

And he numbered them from twenty years old and above, and found them three hundred thousand choice men, able to go forth to war, that could handle spear and shield.] Behold here, how their iniquities had diminished their numbers, since the days of Jehoshaphat (i. e. in the space of eighty-two years); for this king could bring but three hundred thousand fighting men into the field, and Jehoshaphat brought near four times as many. (See upon chap. xvii. ult.)

Ver. 6. He hired also a hundred thousand mighty men of valour out of Israel for a hundred talents of silver.] In two things he shewed his heart was not perfect with God: (as it is noted ver. 2.) for, first, he sinned in making a league with the ten tribes, contrary to what the prophet Azariah had declared, chap. xix.: and, secondly, he invited them to battle without any provocation; whereas he should have done as the Lord commanded, 1 Kings xii. 24. and left them to end their quarrels among themselves; only repelling them if they had invaded him, but no more.

Ver. 7. But there came a man of God to him, saying, O king, let not the army of Israel go with thee.] This was the prophet Amos, father of the prophet Isaiah, if we will believe the Jews, particularly Kimchi upon this place: but this is a foolish tradition, built on a mistake that Amos the prophet was Isaiah's father.

For the Lord is not with Israel, to wit, with all the children of Ephraim.] In the Targum it is, The Word of the Lord will not help Israel: who had highly offended him by the idolatry which Jeroboam of the tribe of Ephraim introduced.

Ver. 8. But if thou wilt go, do it, be strong for the battle; God shall make thee fall before the enemy: for God hath power to help, and to cast down.] If he had a settled resolution not to desist, the prophet bade him go and try, whether with the greatest power he could muster up he should be able to prevail against the Lord, who could either help a few, or destroy a great many.

Ver. 9. And Amaziah said unto the man of God, But what shall we do for the hundred talents which I have given to the army of Israel?] That which stuck with him was, the money he was likely to lose; for they would not return that, if he dismissed them from his army.

And the man of God answered, The Lord is able to give thee much more than this.] This objection was presently answered, if he would but obey God, and trust in his goodness, who was able to give his faithful servants more than that came to: and, as Grotius notes, he is rich enough who is impoverished for God's sake.

Ver. 10. Then Amaziah separated them, to wit, the army that was come to him out of Ephraim, to go home again.] This argued some goodness in him, though his heart was not perfect with God.

Wherefore their anger was greatly kindled against Judah, and they returned home in great anger.] Because they looked upon them as enemies of God, and durst not employ them. St. Jerome thinks they carried idols along with them.

Ver. 11. And Amaziah strengthened himself.] With his own men only.

And led forth his people, and went to the valley of Salt, and smote of the children of Seir.] Who dwelt in Mount Seir.

Ten thousand.] See 2 Kings xiv. 7. where this story is told more briefly: for what follows in the next verse is there omitted.

Ver. 12. And other ten thousand left alive did the children of Judah carry away captive, and brought them unto the top of the rock, and cast them down from the top of the rock, that they were broken all in pieces.] This was a very ancient punishment among the Romans, as we learn from Livy, Plutarch, Dionysius Halicarnasseus, and others; and was used among other nations, as Mr. Selden shews, lib. i. de Synedriis, cap. 17. where he observes an illustrious example of this among the Israelites; who threw Jezebel down upon the stones out of the windows, by the command of Jehu.

Ver. 13. But the soldiers of the army, which Amaziah sent back, that they should not go with him to battle.] The men of Ephraim, whom the prophet forbade him to join withal; and were therefore sent home.

Fell upon the cities of Judah, from Samaria even unto Beth-horon.] They went away from Amaziah in a great rage, (ver. 10.) which instigated them to revenge the affront put upon them in this manner: taking hold of the fair opportunity which presented itself, by his war with Edom; which had drained his country of all the forces that should have opposed them.

And smote three thousand of them, and took much spoil.] Thus Amaziah was punished for having entered into a society with idolaters, though at the prophet's reproof he broke it off: and God, it is not unlikely, also suffered this calamity to fall upon him, because he used his victory over the Edomites with too much cruelty.

Ver. 14. Now it came to pass, after that Amaziah was come from the slaughter of the Edomites, that he brought the gods of the children of Seir.] Which he should have burnt with fire.

And set them up to be his gods, and bowed down himself before them, and burned incense unto them.] A most prodigious sottishness, as the prophet shews him in the next verse. Ahaz was wiser (though very wicked), who sacrificed to the gods of those people who had overcome him: hoping they might be persuaded to help him also, (xxviii. 23.) Or, perhaps, Amaziah worshipped them for fear they should owe him a spite, and contrive some mischief against him, in revenge of what he had done against the Edomites. (See Dr. Jackson, in his book of the Original of Belief, chap. 17. parag. 5. 10.)

Ver. 15. Wherefore the anger of the Lord was kindled against Amaziah, and he sent unto him a prophet, which said unto him, Why hast thou sought after the gods of the people, which could not deliver their own people out of thine hand?] Nothing need be said more to convince him of his monstrous stupidity, of which no account could be given. Unless we suppose them to have been such beautiful images, that he looked upon them till he fell in love with them, and doated upon them, so that he was bewitched into a senseless idolatry. Fabius Maximus (as Strigelius here notes) was much wiser; who, having conquered Tarentum, and being asked what should be done with their gods, "Deos iratos Tarentinis relinqui jussit," bade them leave their gods that were angry with the Tarentines. For what vanity is it (as he adds) to hope for any safety from those that cannot preserve themselves? but such is the madness of idolaters, that it is reproved by sober heathens.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, as he talked with him, that the king said unto him, Art thou made of the king's counsel?] Yes, undoubtedly, for he was made so by God; and did nothing but what belonged to his office, (Jer. i. 10.) But Amaziah thought not of this; but scornfully asked him, who made him a counsellor of state?

Forbear; why shouldest thou be smitten?] He bids him meddle no more in this matter, lest he should be provoked to deal with him as they did with Zechariah, (xxiv. 21.)

Then the prophet forbare, and said, I know that God hath determined to destroy thee, because thou hast done this, and hast not hearkened unto my counsel.] He forbare to advise or reprove him any further, but only denounced the sentence God had passed upon him for this contempt of him, and his other sins: which came to pass, ver. 20. 27.

Ver. 17. Then Amaziah king of Judah took advice.] He would not be advised by the prophet, but consulted those that led him to his destruction.

And sent to Joash the son of Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu king of Israel, saying, Come, let us see one another in the face.] He was advised, it seems, without first desiring satisfaction for the damage done him, (ver. 12.) in which perhaps Joash had no hand, to make war upon him, and provoke him to battle. (See 2 Kings xiv. 8, &c. where this and the following verses are explained.)

Ver. 18. And Joash king of Israel sent to Amaziah king of Judah, saying, The thistle that was in Lebanon sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, Give thy daughter to my son to wife: and there passed by a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trode down the thistle.

Ver. 19. Thou sayest, Lo, thou hast smitten the Edomites, and thine heart lifteth thee up to boast: abide now at home; why shouldest thou meddle to thine hurt, that thou shouldest fall, even thou and Judah with thee?] See this explained there, 2 Kings xiv. 9, 10.

Ver. 20. But Amaziah would not hear; for it came of God, that he might deliver them into the hand of their enemies, because they sought after the gods of Edom.] God blinds the minds of those whom he intends to destroy for their sins.

Ver. 21. So Joash the king of Israel went up; and they saw one another in the face, both he and Amaziah king of Judah, at Beth-shemesh, which belonged to Judah.] For there was another Beth-shemesh in the tribe of Naphtali, (Josh. xix. 38. Judg. i. 33.)

Ver. 22. And Judah was put to the worse before Israel, and they fled every man to his tent.] These two verses are in the same words, 2 Kings xiv. 11, 12.

Ver. 23. And Joash the king of Israel took Amaziah king of Judah, the son of Joash, the son of Jehoahaz, at Beth-shemesh, and brought him to Jerusalem, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, from the gate of Ephraim to the corner-gate, four hundred cubits.] See there, ver. 13.

Ver. 24. And he took all the gold and the silver, and all the vessels that were found in the house of God with Obed-Edom.] The Targum here explains it, that Obed-Edom consecrated these vessels to God's service, when David brought the ark to his house; and God blessed him for his care in looking after it. But Kimchi judges better, who takes Obed-Edom to have been set over these treasures, in the custody of which his son succeeded him.

And the treasures of the king's house, the hostages also, and returned to Samaria.] These hostages the Targum takes for the sons of the principal men of the city, with whom the generality of the Hebrew interpreters agree. So Jarchi; the children of Israel did not restore to Amaziah the kingdom of Judah, but upon condition, that he should give him the children of great men for a security of his fidelity, and that he should not rebel against him hereafter.

Ver. 25. And Amaziah the son of Joash king of Judah lived after the death of Joash, son of Jehoahaz king of Israel, fifteen years.] See upon 2 Kings xiv. 17.

Ver. 26. Now the rest of the acts of Amaziah, first and last, behold, are they not written in the book of the Kings of Judah and Israel?] See there, ver. 18.

Ver. 27. Now after the time that Amaziah did turn away from following the Lord, they made a conspiracy against him in Jerusalem; and he fled to Lachish: but they sent to Lachish after him, and slew him there.] He turned from God before the death of Joash; therefore this conspiracy was laid a great while before it was discovered; and then he fled to Lachish, where it took effect. Or, as Jacobus Capellus conjectures (in his Hist. Sacra et Exotica), the wars abroad put a stop to this sedition at home; but when they were over, and he returned home, and had a son, then the conspiracy was renewed again, under the specious name of being guardians to the young prince, and taking better care of him than his father was likely to do.

Ver. 28. And they brought him upon horses, and buried him with his fathers in the city of Judah.] That is, in the city of David, as it is explained 1 Kings xiv. 20.

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1. THEN all the people of Judah took Uzziah.] Who was called also Azariah, 2 Kings xiv. 21. xv. 1.

Who was sixteen years old, and made him king in the room of his father Amaziah.] They made him king when he was sixteen years old; for his father left him an infant of four years old: so that there was an interregnum of twelve years; the kingdom being administered by a viceroy, or by the high-priest and the elders. (See Ludovicus Capellus, in his Chronologia Sacra, p. 182.)

Ver. 2. He built Eloth, and restored it to Judah, after that the king slept with his fathers.] He repaired it, after he had retaken it from the Israelites: this being, I suppose, one of the cities, that the soldiers, whom his father Amaziah dismissed, had taken, (2 Kings xiv. 22.) and which, while he lived, he could not recover.

Ver. 3. Sixteen years old was Uzziah when he began to reign; and he reigned fifty and two years in Jerusalem: his mother's name also was Jecoliah of Jerusalem.

Ver. 4. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his father Amaziah did.] These two verses are the very same with those 2 Kings xv. 2, 3. (See there.)

Ver. 5. And he sought God in the days of Zechariah.] He persisted in the true religion, as long as Zechariah lived. By whom is not meant him whose book of prophecies is extant in the Bible, for he lived three hundred years after; nor the son of Jehoiada, who was slain some years ago: but, it is probable, the son of that Zechariah, who was called after his father's name, and was eminent for his Divine wisdom.

Who had understanding in the visions of God.] It is not said he was a prophet, but that he was a man very skilful in expounding the ancient prophecies, and giving instruction out of them, as Grotius understands it.

And as long as he sought the Lord, God made him to prosper.] Of which he gives instances in the following verses.

Ver. 6. And he went forth and warred against the Philistines, and brake down the wall of Gath, and the wall of Jabneh, and the wall of Ashdod, and built cities about Ashdod, and among the Philistines.] From this verse unto the fifteenth, this Divine writer shews how excellent a prince this was, and how God prospered him, while he continued truly religious. For he was skilled in husbandry as well as in warlike affairs: and was very solicitous for the good of his people. The former of these is mentioned ver. 10. and the other in the rest of the verses: which tell us, how prudently he demolished all the fortifications of his enemies on the frontiers; and provided his own frontiers with works, garrisons, arms, and engines of war.

Ver. 7. And God helped him against the Philistines, and against the Arabians that dwelt in Gur-baal, and the Mehunims.] I have noted often before, that these Mehunims were a people in Arabia Deserta. See 1 Chron. iv. 41. 2 Chron. xx. 1. Judg. x. 11, 12. of which this place gives a clear proof.

Ver. 8. And the Ammonites gave gifts to Uzziah.] Made him presents, that they might preserve his friendship.

And his name spread abroad even to the entering in of Egypt; for he strengthened himself exceedingly.] His power grew so very great, that he was formidable, not only to the Philistines in the west, and to the Arabians and others in the east, but to the borders of Egypt in the south.

Ver. 9. Moreover, Uzziah built towers in Jerusalem, at the corner-gate, and at the valley-gate, and at the turning of the wall, and fortified them.] In his father's time the wall of Jerusalem was broken down four hundred cubits, as we read in the foregoing chapter, ver. 23. which, it is likely, was built again before this time. But Uzziah made it stronger by towers, which he built for its defence. One of which was at that very gate where the breach ended, viz. the corner-gate.

Ver. 10. Also he built towers in the desert.] To defend the shepherds from the sudden incursions of their enemies: particularly the Arabs, who had formerly broken in upon them, (xxi. 16.)

And digged many wells: for he had much cattle, both in the low country, and in the plains; husbandmen also, and vine-dressers in the mountains.] Some therefore take the towers forementioned to have been country-houses, where husbandmen dwelt; and where their cattle in hard weather were sheltered; and the fruits of the earth were laid up.

And in Carmel.] By this is not meant the famous mount of that name (for that was not in the tribe of Judah), but a very fertile country, as the word Carmel signifies in several places, (Isa. xvi. 10. Jer. ii. 7. xlviii. 33.)

For he loved husbandry.] As the greatest men (I have often observed) did in ancient times, and followed the plough, and fed cattle themselves. (See 1 Kings xix. 19.)

Ver. 11. Moreover, Uzziah had a host of fighting men that went out to war by bands.] They were sent out by parties, several ways, for it appears by what follows they were very numerous.

According to the number of their account by the hand of Jeiel the scribe.] He was the secretary of war (as we now speak), who took an account of the several bands of men that went out, and of the number whereof they consisted.

And Maaseiah the ruler, under the hand of Hananiah, one of the king's captains.] These two, I suppose, were great officers, who were to oversee Jeiel; that there was no fraud in his account.

Ver. 12. The whole number of the chief of the fathers of the mighty men of valour were two thousand and six hundred.] This is sufficient to shew he had a very great army (there being so many principal persons employed to command them); but a particular account is given of them in the next verse.

Ver. 13. And under their hand was an army, three hundred thousand, and seven thousand and five hundred, that made war with mighty power, to help the king against the enemy.] Perhaps these were a standing force, ready to repel their enemies if they invaded them; besides that host, which went forth by bands, to annoy their enemies on all sides: (ver. 11.) and then he was grown much more powerful than his father. (See xxv. 5.)

Ver. 14. And Uzziah prepared for them, throughout all the host, shields, and spears, and helmets, and habergeons, and bows, and slings to cast stones.] All sorts of arms; both defensive and offensive: but here is no mention of swords; with which, I suppose, all the people were always provided.

Ver. 15. And he made in Jerusalem engines, invented by cunning men, to be on the towers, and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones withal.] The Targum by these engines understands towers perforated: whereas the text plainly tells us they were engines, out of which they shot arrows and threw stones, from the towers and from the walls. Bochartus thinks the word properly imports, they were contrived for the projection of stones, (lib. iii. of his Phaleg. cap. 7. and in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 35.)

And his name spread far abroad.] Beyond the entering in of Egypt, (ver. 8.) unto distant countries.

For he was marvellously helped, till he was strong.] God aided him so wonderfully in all his undertakings, that he feared no enemy, (ver. 7.)

Ver. 16. But when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction.] To the loss of all his authority. How hard is it to bear great prosperity with moderation and humble thankfulness!

For he transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the temple of the Lord to burn incense upon the altar of incense.] What should tempt him to this folly, it is hard to give an account. Perhaps he had a vain ambition to imitate heathen princes; who in many places executed the priesthood also. And Jacobus Capellus thinks, that which puffed him up with pride was, that he had not only a son, viz. Jotham, but a grandson, Ahaz: (ad A.M. 3231.)

Ver. 17. And Azariah the priest went in after him, and with him fourscore priests of the Lord, that were valiant men.] See my annotations on 1 Chron. vi. 10.

Ver. 18. And they withstood Uzziah the king, and said unto him.] It is plain by this, that they did not withstand his attempt by force of arms: but by reasons, persuasions, and exhortations. And, perhaps, they surrounded the altar, so that he could not, without offering violence to them, approach it.

It appertaineth not unto thee, Uzziah, to burn incense unto the Lord, but to the priests the sons of Aaron, that are consecrated to burn incense.] They represented to him, that he invaded the office of the priests, who were consecrated to this service: which he was not, and therefore ought not to meddle with it.

Go out of the sanctuary; for thou hast trespassed.] He had gone too far already, in going into the holy place; whereby he had offended the Divine Majesty: but they beseech him to proceed no further.

Neither shall it be for thine honour from the Lord God.] They represent to him, that he could get no honour, but lose very much by aspiring to this dignity of the priesthood, which the Lord had placed in other hands.

Ver. 19. Then Uzziah was wroth, and had a censer in his hand to burn incense.] Which he would not lay aside upon their admonition: but fell into a great passion, because he was hindered in that which he designed.

And while he was wroth with the priests.] And, perhaps, threatening that he would have his will.

The leprosy even rose up in his forehead.] Where it could not be concealed, but was apparent to all that were present.

Before the priests in the house of the Lord, from beside the incense-altar.] Where they stood to keep him from it.

Ver. 20. And Azariah the chief priest, and all the priests, looked upon him, and, behold, he was leprous in his forehead, and they thrust him out from thence.] There was no need to use force to thrust him out, for he hasted himself, as it follows, to be gone: therefore they only admonished him most earnestly to depart, because the law permitted not a leper to remain in a city, much less to come into the house of God.

Yea, himself hasted also to go out, because the Lord had smitten him.] And he was afraid of a sorer punishment, if he stayed there. (See Grotius, de Imperio S. P. circa Sacra, p. 251.)

Ver. 21. And Uzziah the king was a leper unto the day of his death.] The punishment was capital for meddling rashly with Divine ministrations, as we see from the beginning, in the case of Nadab and Abihu, (Lev. x. 1, 2. and see Numb. iii. 10. xviii. 7.) Now the leprosy was a kind of death, because it separated those who were smitten with it from the society of men, as if they were dead, and no part of this world.

And dwelt in a several house, being a leper; for he was cut off from the house of the Lord.] In the Hebrew the words are, he dwelt in a house of freedom; so such places were called, because such as were there were exempt from the common affairs, and shut up from the conversation of men: whence such as are laid in their grave, are said to be free among the dead, (Psal. lxxxviii. 5.) because removed from all the affairs and conversation of the world. (See Dr. Hammond upon that place, annot. c.)

And Jotham his son was over the king's house, judging the people of the land.] See 2 Kings xv. 5.

Ver. 22. Now the rest of the acts of Uzziah, first and last, did Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz, write.] This shews, the prophets were wont (as I have before observed) to write the history of their own times. For Isaiah prophesied in the beginning of Uzziah's reign, and, as Abarbinel thinks, before Hosea, who lived in the same period of time; and prophesied before Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

Ver. 23. So Uzziah slept with his fathers, and they buried him with his fathers in the field of the burial which belonged to the kings.] This was in the city of David, as we read in 2 Kings xv. 7.

For they said, He is a leper.] Therefore he was not buried in the sepulchre of the kings his predecessors; but had a several burial-place when he was dead, as he had a several house while he lived.

And Jotham his son reigned in his stead.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. JOTHAM was twenty and five years old when he began to reign; and he reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem: his mother's name also was Jerushah, the daughter of Zadok.

Ver. 2. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his father Uzziah did.] The very same is said in 2 Kings xv. 33, 34.

Howbeit he entered not into the temple of the Lord.] Some imagine, he was so frighted at what befel his father, that he did not so much as go into the court of the temple, or that he did not offer sacrifices in the temple, but in high places. But this doth not well agree with the words foregoing: therefore the meaning rather is, that he imitated his father in all that was good in him; but did not profanely enter into the temple to offer incense, as he did.

And the people did yet corruptly.] For they offered incense in high places, 2 Kings xv. 35. and, as some think, committed idolatry.

Ver. 3. He built the high gate of the house of the Lord.] It was built before by Solomon, but he repaired it, (2 Kings xv. 35.) and, as some think, added a very glorious structure to it.

And on the wall of Ophel he built much.] The Targum translates it, a palace: but others understand by Ophel a high place, or cliff, where there was a tower. Pellicanus thinks, the meaning is, that he much beautified, as well as repaired, the porch of the Lord's house, which was a hundred and twenty cubits high.

Ver. 4. Moreover, he built cities in the mountains of Judah, and in the forests he built castles and towers.] That is, he took care to fortify his kingdom strongly on all sides against his enemies.

Ver. 5. He fought also with the king of the Ammonites, and prevailed against them.] This people had been entirely subdued by David, as we read 2 Sam. x. xii. 31. but now it seems they had recovered so much strength, that they invaded the country of Judah; but were overthrown by Jotham.

And the children of Ammon gave him the same year a hundred talents of silver, and ten thousand measures of wheat, and ten thousand of barley.] He made them tributaries to him; and they began the very same year to pay the tribute.

So much did the children of Ammon pay unto him, both the second year and the third.] Either this was the agreement, that for three years they should make this acknowledgment; or, at the three years' end they grew so strong again, that they refused to continue it longer.

Ver. 6. So Jotham became mighty, because he prepared his ways before the Lord his God.] Directed his counsels and actions aright, according to the rule of God's word. Solomon Jarchi here observes, that all the kings of Judah had some ill thing laid to their charge, but only Jotham: for David himself sinned grievously in the matter of Uriah: Solomon was drawn away by his wives to countenance idolatry: Rehoboam forsook the law of God; and Abijah walked in his steps: Asa took the treasures of God's house, and sent them to the king of Syria; and likewise put the prophet in the stocks: Jehoshaphat entered into society with the wicked; and so he goes on with the rest. But in Jotham (saith he) there is no fault found; which is a wonder, when there were so few good people among them: for his integrity was not so great, as the corruption of his people; who immediately after his death joined with Ahaz in his abominable idolatries.

Ver. 7. Now the rest of the acts of Jotham, and all his wars, and his ways.] He had wars not only with the Ammonites, but with the Syrians, and with the ten tribes, as may be gathered from 2 Kings xv. 37.

Lo, they are written in the book of the Kings of Israel and Judah.] The affairs of the kings of Judah are commonly said to be recorded in the Chronicles of the kings of Judah: but this king's actions, it seems, were so eminent, that the Israelites also recorded some of them in their books.

Ver. 8. He was five-and-twenty years old when he began to reign; and reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem.] This was said before, ver. 1. and it is not easy to give an account why it is here repeated. Unless it be true, which Kimchi saith, that Jotham was born the same year that his father was struck with a leprosy; but was not king till he grew up, and was instructed in the government; which was managed during his minority by the princes of the people. But Jacobus Capellus rather thinks he reigned sixteen years by himself alone; and then took his son into society with him, in the government of the kingdom.

Ver. 9. And Jotham slept with his fathers, and they buried him in the city of David: and Ahaz his son reigned in his stead.] See 2 Kings xv. 38.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1. AHAZ was twenty years old when he began to reign; and he reigned sixteen years in Jerusalem: but he did not that which was right in the sight of the Lord, like David his father.] See 2 Kings xvi. 2. where there are the very same words.

Ver. 2. For he walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, and made also molten images for Baalim.] He not only worshipped the golden calves (which was the way of the kings of Israel), but many other gods of the nations round about: which are all comprehended under the name of Baalim. (See what I have noted upon Judg. ii. 11.)

Ver. 3. Moreover, he burnt incense in the valley of the son of Hinnom.] Where Moloch was worshipped.

And burnt his children in the fire.] Or, made them to pass through the fire; for the words are ambiguous. The Targum here saith, The Word of the Lord snatched Hezekiah out of the fire; because he foresaw three saints would spring from him: and here he tells a long tale of Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, who were thrown into the fiery furnace.

After the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord had cast out before the children of Israel.] This was the most detestable idolatry that was practised among the ancient inhabitants of Canaan, as appears from Lev. xviii. 21. xx. 2—4, &c.

Ver. 4. He sacrificed also and burnt incense in the high places.] Not unto God, but unto his idols, whom he worshipped also on the hills, and under every green tree, as it here follows.

Ver. 5. Wherefore the Lord his God.] The Lord is called his God, because he was so by the right of his dominion over him, and his kindness to him for his father's sake.

Delivered him into the hand of the king of Syria.] That by this punishment he might return from his evil ways. These two kings, Rezin king of Syria, and Pekah king of Israel, seem to have come upon him together, whereby he was put to some distress.

And they smote him.] That is, the Syrians slew many of his people.

And carried away a great multitude of them captives, and brought them to Damascus.] This was after that invasion mentioned 2 Kings xvi. 5.

And he was also delivered into the hand of the king of Israel, who smote him with a great slaughter.] As is related in the next verse.

Ver. 6. For Pekah the son of Remaliah slew in Judah a hundred and twenty thousand in one day, which were all valiant men; because they had forsaken the Lord God of their fathers.] Who therefore forsook them, and took away their courage, that they could make no resistance; for otherwise, it had not been possible to make so great a slaughter in one day.

Ver. 7. And Zichri, a mighty man of Ephraim, slew Maaseiah the king's son, and Azrikam the governor of the house, and Elkanah that was next to the king.] They seem to have taken Jerusalem (though they did not keep it), and to have slain these great persons. The Targum translates the last words, the arkapta of the king: that is, as some interpret it, the captain of his host. But our translation comes nearest to the Hebrew, second to the king. Who was inferior to the king alone; insomuch that the LXX. translate it Διάδοχον, he that immediately followed the king, and succeeded him. His viceroy, as some interpret it.

Ver. 8. And the children of Israel carried away captive of their brethren two hundred thousand, women, sons, and daughters, and took also away much spoil from them.] This is an argument that they were quite dispirited, and had no heart to defend themselves, being not only slaughtered like sheep, but carried captive by droves.

And brought the spoil to Samaria.] Into their own country, towards Samaria: but they had not yet brought it into the city of Samaria, (ver. 13.)

Ver. 9. But a prophet of the Lord was there, whose name was Oded.] By this it appears that God continued his prophets among the Israelites, to bring them to repentance, if they would have hearkened to their admonitions.

And he went out before the host that came to Samaria.] Bringing their captives and spoil in great triumph thither.

And said unto them, Behold, because the Lord God of your fathers was wroth with Judah, he hath delivered them into your hand.] He would not have them lifted up with their victory; which was not to be ascribed so much to their valour, as to the anger of God against Judah, who abandoned them to their fury.

And ye have slain them in a rage that reached up unto heaven.] That had no measure, and cried to heaven for vengeance upon the Israelites.

Ver. 10. And now ye purpose to keep under the children of Judah and Jerusalem.] This seems to denote that they had sacked Jerusalem.

For bond-men and bond-women unto you.] To use them as slaves of another nation, of whom they might make money, by selling them to their neighbour, or make them drudges to serve them for nought.

But are there not with you, even with you, sins against the Lord your God?] He bids them consider, that they who thought themselves God's favourites because he had made them so victorious, had sins enough to answer for: for which if he punished them as they deserved, they might be reduced to the same condition with the brethren of Judah.

Ver. 11. Now hear me therefore, and deliver the captives again, which ye have taken captive of your brethren; for the fierce wrath of the Lord is upon you.] If they did not set them at liberty, he threatens sudden destruction, which was ready to break forth upon them for their cruelty.

Ver. 12. Then certain of the heads of the children of Ephraim, Azariah the son of Johanan, Berechiah the son of Meshillemoth, and Jehizkiah the son of Shallum, and Amasa the son of Hadlai, stood up against them that came from the war.] These persons had some goodness in them, as well as courage, and great authority with the people and soldiers.

Ver. 13. And said unto them, Ye shall not bring in the captives hither.] That is, into the city of Samaria.

For whereas we have offended against the Lord already.] By making such an unmerciful slaughter of their brethren.

Ye intend to add more to our sins and to our trespass; for our trespass is great, and there is fierce wrath against Israel.] Or, though our trespass is great, and deserves to be punished with a fierce wrath, as we have exercised against Judah.

Ver. 14. So the armed men left the captives and the spoil before the princes and all the congregation.] To dispose of them as they pleased. A wonderful instance of obedience; in restoring not only the captives which were very valuable, but all the spoil also, which, no doubt, was considerable. What might not these great men have done, to bring them to repent of their idolatry, if they had been truly religious, and exerted their authority?

Ver. 15. And the men which were expressed by name.] There were some nominated and appointed, I suppose, by the heads of the people, to take care of the captives, and see them well treated.

Rose up, and took the captives, and with the spoil clothed all that were naked among them, and arrayed them, and shod them, and gave them to eat and to drink, and anointed them.] They not only gave them necessary sustenance, but refreshed their weariness, like the good Samaritan in the parable, who poured oil and wine into the wounds of a poor traveller. This was an extraordinary goodness, not only to release poor captives without doing them hurt, or making any gain of them, but to dismiss them with a viaticum (as Strigelius speaks), giving them all things necessary for their return home. And it was still a greater kindness to provide vehicles (as it here follows) for the infirm multitude, and bring them to their own country without hard travel.

And carried all the feeble of them upon asses, and brought them to Jericho, the city of palm-trees, to their brethren: then they returned to Samaria.] So great was the power of the prophet at this time, that he turned their barbarous cruelty into the tenderest humanity. But, as I said, they were not so easily converted from idolatry: unto which they had so strong an inclination, that nothing could persuade them to forsake it.

Ver. 16. At that time did king Ahaz send unto the king of Assyria to help him.] When Rezin king of Syria invaded him, 2 Kings xvi. 6, 7. This is the first time that we read of the king of Assyria, except in 2 Kings xv. 19. where Pul, king of Assyria, is mentioned as a powerful prince, who invaded the Israelites. Before his time we read nothing of that monarchy, which grew by degrees to its greatness from small beginnings. For in David's time, or whensoever Psalm lxxxiii. was written, the king of Assyria was but a petty prince, like those of Moab and Ammon, and the like, with whom he joined, (ver. 8.) to enslave the Israelites: but now had swallowed up all those little princes, and grown to such a height that none could stand before them. But if their large empire had been of long standing, we should in all probability have heard of them before this time, as we do often afterward.

Ver. 17. For again the Edomites had come and smitten Judah, and carried away captives.] When Rezin fell upon them, the Edomites took that advantage, and made great ravage in the land of Judah.

Ver. 18. The Philistines also had invaded the cities of the low country.] Which lay next to them.

And of the south of Judah, and had taken Beth-shemesh, and Ajalon, and Gederoth, and Shocho with the villages thereof, and Timnah with the villages thereof, Gimzo also and the villages thereof: and they dwelt there.] They prevailed so far as to make an inroad further into the country of Judah; and not only possessed themselves of the cities here mentioned, but settled in them. For in this weak condition into which Ahaz was fallen, they took their revenge for the mischief which Uzziah had done them, who subdued them as far as Gath, (chap. xxvi. 6.)

Ver. 19. For the Lord brought Judah low because of Ahaz.] It was purely upon his account that God gave them up into the hand of the Philistines; for that very year in which Ahaz died, the prophet Isaiah foretold his son should afflict them, (Isa. xiv. 27—29.) and accordingly Hezekiah smote them as far as Gaza, (2 Kings xviii. 8.)

King of Israel.] We cannot gather from hence that he is called king of Israel, because he walked in their ways, for a good king is so called, xx. 2. And the Masorites observe, that six times we read the king of Israel instead of king of Judah, because they all descended from Israel. So Beckius here expounds it, in a large sense, he was king of Israel: for Israel is not here opposed to Judah, but comprehends it. Therefore the Targum hath the king of Judah: and so the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin. For Israel was once the name of the whole people, and after the division of the kingdom, the two tribes were still a part of Israel, in the ancient state of the world. See Buxtorf; who observes, out of the Hebrew grammarians, that the manner of the Scripture is to put the genus sometimes for the species, and the species for the genus, (Vindiciæ Hebr. Veritatis, cap. 7. par. ii.)

For he made Judah naked.] Deprived them of the Divine protection by his foul transgressions.

And transgressed sore against the Lord.] The Targum renders it, The house of Judah ceased from the worship of God. Which Ahaz in a manner wholly abolished, and thereby transgressed more grievously than all his predecessors.

Ver. 20. And Tiglath-pilneser king of Assyria came unto him.] As he desired by the messengers he sent to him, (ver. 10.)

And distressed him, but strengthened him not.] In 2 Kings xvi. 9. it is said, that he did help him; how therefore did he distress him? Both these are true, for as he did come to his assistance against the king of Syria, so he took Damascus, carried the people captive, and delivered Ahaz from the power of the Syrians, (2 Kings xvi. 7—9.) But this did Ahaz little good, for he helped him not to recover the cities the Philistines had taken from him, nor did he lend him any forces, nor enable him to recruit his own; but rather weakened him by exhausting his treasures, and by destroying Samaria, whereby the way was opened to invade his country the more easily in the next reign. Thus many countries in latter ages, by calling in the assistance of some foreign prince against their enemies, have been overrun, and conquered by those who came to their help.

Ver. 21. For Ahaz took away a portion out of the house of the Lord, and out of the house of the king, and of the princes, and gave it unto the king of Assyria: but he helped him not.] Did not make his condition better, but so much the worse. (See 2 Kings xvi. 8.)

Ver. 22. And in the time of his distress did he trespass yet more against the Lord.] He was not at all amended by the sore calamities which fell on him, but introduced more idolatry than had been practised before.

This is that king Ahaz.] The word hu is sometimes a word of contempt, as Kimchi observes, (Gen. xxxvi. ult. Numb. xxvi. 9.) And Ahaz deserved to be branded, as the most notorious offender that had ever been among the kings of Judah: and was remarkable for this also, that he never prospered in any thing he undertook.

Ver. 23. For he sacrificed unto the gods of Damascus, which smote him.] A most monstrous stupidity, to imagine they had any power over him, who could not defend themselves from Tiglath-pilneser: but being of opinion that they were gods, he sacrificed to them to appease them, that they might do him no further hurt; doing as the ancient Romans, who wooed by larger sacrifices the gods of their enemies to come over to their side, and be their friends, as Dr. Jackson discourses, in his Original of Unbelief, chap. 17. parag. 5.

And he said, Because the gods of the kings of Syria help them, therefore will I sacrifice to them, that they may help me.] Not against the Syrians, but he foolishly imagined they might help him against the Edomites, Philistines, and other enemies.

But they were the ruin of him and of all Israel.] They were so far from being his friends, that they proved the destruction of him, and of his whole country: for though it was not in their power to do him either harm or good, yet his worshipping of them undid him and all his people.

Ver. 24. And Ahaz gathered together the vessels of the house of God, and cut in pieces the vessels of the house of God.] That the priests might not be able to minister before God for want of them, (xxix. 19.) and that he might employ the money he made of them (for what he cut in pieces, I suppose, he sold) in building altars (as it follows) in every corner of Jerusalem.

And shut up the doors of the house of the Lord.] That no man might come to worship God there, but sacrifice every where, but only where they should; and this continued till the beginning of his son's reign, (xxix. 3.)

Ver. 25. And in every several city of Judah he made high places to burn incense unto other gods.] He took care the people should not think of going up to Jerusalem; by erecting, at his own charge, high places in every city, wherein to perform Divine service to what God they pleased.

And provoked to anger the Lord God of his fathers.] With whom he did not join other gods, but worshipped him not at all.

Ver. 26. Now the rest of his acts, and of all his ways, first and last, behold, they are written in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel.] In 2 Kings xvi. 19. it is only said, they were written in the book of the kings of Judah: but Ezra, it seems, found that the book of the kings of Israel contained some memorable passages of his reign; there being, as is here recorded, great wars between them and Judah.

Ver. 27. And Ahaz slept with his fathers, and they buried him in the city, even in Jerusalem; but they brought him not into the sepulchres of the kings of Israel.] They are called the kings of Israel, because they had an ancient right to govern the whole twelve tribes.

And Hezekiah his son reigned in his stead.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. HEZEKIAH began to reign when he was five-and-twenty years old; and he reigned nine-and-twenty years in Jerusalem: and his mother's name was Abijah the daughter of Zechariah.] See upon 2 Kings xviii. 1, 2. where I have noted, that Ahaz therefore was very young when he begat Hezekiah. And we may grant, as Jacobus Capellus thinks, that he was but ten years old (though, as I have there shewn, Bochartus thinks he was more); for though this was wonderful, yet not incredible, as his words are. For he refers us to Scaliger in his first oration against Paræus, where he mentions a city, in which a boy not twelve years old begat a child of a girl, a cousin of his, not ten years old: and adds, "Rem notam narro," &c. I tell a known story, whose memory is still fresh in Aquitain. (See his Histor. Sacra et Exotica, ad Annum Mundi, 2292.)

Ver. 2. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, according to all that David his father had done.] The same is recorded in 2 Kings xviii. 2.

Ver. 3. He, in the first year of his reign, in the first month.] This demonstrates his great piety and zeal for God, that he began so soon to reform religion, and did not stay till he was established in his throne. For the surest way to establish himself, he thought, was to establish true religion; though he run a great hazard in attempting the abolishing idolatry, which had been confirmed by some years' prescription.

Opened the doors of the house of the Lord.] Which his father had shut up, (chap. xxviii. 24.)

And repaired them.] For by long neglect they were gone to decay.

Ver. 4. And he brought in the priests and the Levites.] Whose business it was to take care of religion, and look after things sacred, and admonish kings of their duty. But Hezekiah was beforehand with them, and prevented their endeavours; not only exciting them to reform what was amiss, but using the most proper arguments to press them to it.

And gathered them together into the east street.] Which was before the east gate of the temple, where the entrance into it was.

Ver. 5. And said unto them, Hear me, ye Levites; Sanctify now yourselves, and sanctify the house of the Lord God of your fathers, and carry forth the filthiness out of the holy place.] The abomination, as the Jews translate it; that is, the altar of Damascus, and all the idols that were upon it. (See 2 Kings xvi. 10, &c.) These were brought by Ahaz into the temple; that is, into the court of the priests, which is called the holy place, in Lev. vi. 16, &c.

Ver. 6. For our fathers have trespassed, and done that which was evil in the eyes of the Lord our God, and have forsaken him.] He urges them to this pious work, from the consideration of the great sin of their forefathers, and their horrible contempt of the service of God, as it follows in the next words.

And have turned away their faces from the habitation of the Lord, and turned their backs.] This seems to signify that Ahaz brought in a way of worship directly contrary to the law of God; which commanded them to worship towards the ark, which was placed in the west. But he ordered they should turn their backs upon that (which was a disrespect and contumely to the Divine Majesty), and worship towards the east, where he had set his altar. And at last he shut up the doors of the temple, that they should not worship there at all, as it is again observed in the next verse.

Ver. 7. Also they have shut up the doors of the porch.] That none might enter into the temple, but it might be left a desolate place.

And put out the lamps.] The priests having nothing to do there.

And have not burnt incense, nor offered burnt-offerings in the holy place, unto the God of Israel.] But made high places in every city, to burn incense unto other gods, as it is ver. 25. of the foregoing chapter.

Ver. 8. Wherefore the wrath of the Lord was upon Judah and Jerusalem.] After the confession of their sins, he represents to them the calamities wherewith God had punished them.

And he hath delivered them to trouble, to astonishment, and to hissing, as you see with your eyes.] Sent such a panic fear and terror into them (such as is mentioned chap. xx. 22.) that they could not stand before their enemies, but became a scorn to them. For it had not been possible that they should slay such a vast number of them in one day (as we read chap. xxviii. 6.) if they had not been perfectly astonished, and bereaved of their senses.

Ver. 9. For, lo, our fathers have fallen by the sword; and our sons, and our daughters, and our wives, are in captivity for this.] Or rather, were in captivity, till the tender mercy of God released them. And it is likely some were still in captivity to other nations, though the Israelites had dismissed their captives: for they were distressed in Ahaz's time by the Edomites, and the Philistines; the former of which carried away captives, as we read xxviii. 17, 18.

Ver. 10. Now it is in mine heart to make a covenant with the Lord God of Israel, that his fierce wrath may turn away from us.] He resolved therefore to renew the covenant between God and the people, because he foresaw there was immediate destruction impending upon the whole nation for their iniquities, unless they did heartily and speedily repent of them; for they were grown to the greatest height of impiety, his father having by degrees proceeded to the utmost pitch of idolatry: which, though God had many ways punished very severely, yet he persisted in his wickedness; and to the very end of his life amended nothing, but grew worse and worse: therefore this good king thought it absolutely necessary forthwith to make a thorough reformation, and engage the whole nation in a solemn covenant to worship God purely. Thus Conradus Pellicanus.

Ver. 11. My sons, be not now negligent.] He beseeches the Levites, in the most tender language, no longer to go along with the people in their error, but to bestir themselves to make them better.

For the Lord hath chosen you to stand before him, to serve him, and that you should minister unto him, and burn incense.] This was the work of the priests, unto whom he speaks as well as to the Levites, remembering them what their office was to which they were peculiarly chosen, viz. to take care to see his laws observed, and to minister to him, according to his directions; and therefore not to omit the performance of their duty in the house of God, now that it was open to them.

Ver. 12. Then the Levites arose, Mahath the son of Amasai, and Joel the son of Azariah, of the sons of the Kohathites: and of the sons of Merari; Kish the son of Abdi, and Azariah the son of Jehalelel: and of the Gershonites; Joah the son of Zimmah, and Eden the son of Joah:

Ver. 13. And of the sons of Elizaphan; Shimri and Jeiel: and of the sons of Asaph; Zechariah and Mattaniah:

Ver. 14. And of the sons of Heman; Jehiel and Shimei: and of the sons of Jeduthun; Shemaiah and Uzziel.] These were the principal persons among the Levites, who readily complied with the king's exhortation, and engaged their brethren also (as it here follows) in the same work, which they undertook, of cleansing the house of the Lord.

Ver. 15. And they gathered their brethren, and sanctified themselves.] By washing their bodies, I suppose, and other rites prescribed by the law.

And came, according to the commandment of the king, by the words of the Lord, to cleanse the house of the Lord.] The king had a great power in things commanded by God: the exercise of which power is here very properly called the commandment of the king, by the words of the Lord: or, as in the margin, in the business of the Lord. The like we read chap. xxx. 12. (See Grotius, in his book de Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, p. 59.)

Ver. 16. And the priests went into the inner part of the house of the Lord, to cleanse it.] That is, into the sanctuary (for into the most holy none might go but the high-priest), whither the Levites might not come.

And brought out all the uncleanness that they found in the temple of the Lord into the court of the house of the Lord.] That is, the court of the priests, where the Levites attended upon them, and ministered unto them.

And the Levites took it, to carry it out abroad into the brook Kidron.] They cast the filth into the valley of the son of Hinnom, or Tophet, through which Kidron ran, (2 Kings xxiii. 10. 12.)

Ver. 17. Now they began on the first day of the first month to sanctify.] This was the month Abib, as our great primate Usher observes, but not on the day he was made king, but nine months after his father's death. (See his Chronol. Sacra, p. 82.)

And on the eighth day of the month came they to the porch of the Lord.] Which they cleansed together with the outward courts, and the chambers of the temple, in which they spent eight days more, as the next words signify. The house having been long shut up, and nobody coming into it, must needs be full of dust, and the vessels become rusty: in the scouring of which, and restoring them to their splendour, and wiping the walls of the house, they must necessarily spend a great deal of time, for the neglect had been great, and their diligence extraordinary: it being probable, that this sanctification was by washing both the walls of the house, and the floor, and every thing else.

So they sanctified the house of the Lord in eight days; and in the sixteenth day of the first month they made an end.]

The pollution was so universal, and their exactness so great in restoring all things to their purity, that they could not finish their work in less time. Some think they spent eight days in cleansing all the places from filth; and other eight days in sanctifying the temple, and all belonging to it: though how this sanctification was performed we are not told.

Ver. 18. Then they went in to Hezekiah the king, and said, We have cleansed all the house of the Lord, and the altar of burnt-offering, with all the vessels thereof, and the shew-bread table, with all the vessels thereof.] All which they set in their right places, after they had removed all defilements from them.

Ver. 19. Moreover, all the vessels, which king Ahaz in his reign did cast away in his transgression.] The Targum explains it very significantly, Which he profaned, and rendered abominable by idols of other countries, particularly from Damascus. And so Kimchi, Which he translated to idolatrous uses.

Have we prepared and sanctified.] The Targum gives a quite contrary sense of the words, We have set them apart and hidden them, and prepared others in their place. And, indeed, the Talmudists (as Beckius here observes upon the Targum) are of opinion, that all the vessels which Ahaz profaned in his reign were set aside, and others consecrated in their stead: for they thought them not any longer fit to be employed in the Divine service. But Kimchi understands these words as we do, that they purged and purified the vessels which he had profaned.

And, behold, they are before the altar of the Lord.] Before the altar of burnt-offering (I suppose), unto which they went the next morning, and offered sacrifices; with the blood of which, perhaps, they were further purified.

Ver. 20. Then Hezekiah the king rose early, and gathered the rulers of the city, and went up to the house of the Lord.] Now he engaged the principal persons in the city to join with him in his reformation of religion, when all things were ready for the performance of the duties thereof.

Ver. 21. And they brought seven bullocks, and seven rams, and seven lambs, and seven he-goats, for a sin-offering for the kingdom, and for the sanctuary, and for Judah.] It is very observable that the word tsaphir, which here signifies the he-goat, was never used by the Hebrews till after the captivity of Babylon, when we find it in Daniel who lived in the captivity, (chap. viii. 21.) And here being used, and in no other place beside, it is some argument that Ezra was the author of this book, which he wrote after their return from that captivity, in which he had learned the Chaldee language, and thence mixed some Chaldee words with the Hebrew, whereof this is one. And therefore Daniel, to explain it, adds the Hebrew word seir to it, just as in the New Testament the word ὁ πατὴρ is added to abba.

And he commanded the priests, the sons of Aaron, to offer them on the altar of the Lord.] There are two laws in the books of Moses, requiring a sacrifice to be offered for the sin of the whole congregation, when they were in an error. The first is in Lev. iv. 13, 14. where a bullock is required to be offered, when they were ignorantly seduced to do something forbidden by the law, though they did not forsake their religion. The other is in Numb. xv. 22—24. where a goat is commanded to be offered together with a bullock, when they acted contrary to their religion, and were fallen by error into the practice of external rites. And the bullock was offered for a burnt-offering in token that they owned no other God but the Lord, nor any other religion but that prescribed by Moses; and the goat for a sin-offering, that they might expiate the guilt they had contracted, by doing contrary to their religion. Now this good king Hezekiah being sensible, that they had not only acted contrary to their religion, but in effect abolished it, by shutting up the doors of the temple, and omitting the daily sacrifice, and every where exercising strange worship, appointed seven bullocks for a burnt-offering, and as many goats for a sin-offering (though the law never required more than one goat), thinking these numerous sacrifices (together with rams and lambs) were, if not necessary, yet very fit, because of the great and long neglect of his Divine service, and because of the multitude and long continuance of their other sins against the Lord, for which they now begged forgiveness. Thus after the captivity they offered twelve bullocks for burnt-offerings, and twelve goats for sin-offerings, (Ezra viii. 35.) according to the number of the children of Israel: for, as they knew one goat was necessary, so they thought a great number would be becoming in such cases.

Ver. 22. So they killed the bullocks, and the priests received the blood, and sprinkled it on the altar: likewise, when they had killed the rams, they sprinkled the blood upon the altar: they killed also the lambs, and they sprinkled the blood upon the altar.] According to the direction of the law, Lev. viii. 15.

Ver. 23. And they brought forth the he-goats for the sin-offering before the king and the congregation; and they laid their hands upon them.] As the law also directed, Lev. iv. 14, 15. viii. 22.

Ver. 24. And the priests killed them, and they made reconciliation with their blood upon the altar, to make an atonement for all Israel; for the king commanded that the burnt-offering and the sin-offering should be made for all Israel.] The burnt-offering, to acknowledge the Lord to be the only God: and the sin-offering, to make expiation for all their offences against his supreme authority. And they were made not only for Judah but for all Israel: a great many of the ten tribes being now joined to them.

Ver. 25. And he set the Levites in the house of the Lord with cymbals, with psalteries, and with harps, according to the commandment of David, and of Gad the king's seer, and Nathan the prophet: for so was the commandment of the Lord by his prophets.] What king David had ordained was approved by the prophets: who liked the design, and, by authority from God, settled this course of Divine service, (1 Chron. xxiii. 5. xxv. 1. 2 Chron. viii. 14. xxiii. 18.) The Targum here translates the last words, For by the Word of the Lord this ordinance was made by the prophets.

Ver. 26. And the Levites stood with the instruments of David, and the priests with the trumpets.] Which were ordained by Moses, Numb. x. 10.

Ver. 27. And Hezekiah commanded to offer the burnt-offering upon the altar: and when the burnt-offering began, the song of the Lord began also.] When the drink-offering was poured out, then began the song: as the practice is described in aftertimes, by the son of Sirach, Ecclus. i. 25, 26, &c. (See Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service.) What the song of the Lord was, we are told ver. 30.

With the trumpets, and with the instruments ordained by David king of Israel.] See 1 Chron. xxv. 1. 6. These hymns and doxologies were in the nature of prayers to God, as Mr. Mede observes, book ii. chap. 6. p. 365.

Ver. 28. And all the congregation worshipped, and the singers sang, and the trumpeters sounded: and all this continued until the burnt-offering was finished.] They all adored, as soon as the sacrifice and the praises of God began: and continued praising God till all was done.

Ver. 29. And when they had made an end of offering, the king, and all that were present with him, bowed themselves, and worshipped.] As they began so they concluded the service, with adoration of the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 30. Moreover, Hezekiah the king and the princes.] Who now joined with him in furthering the reformation.

Commanded the Levites to sing praise unto the Lord with the words of David, and of Asaph the seer.] These were the prophets who composed the songs that the Levites sung, as I observed upon 1 Chron. xxv. 6. But the author of the psalms ascribed to Asaph (in the book of Psalms), seems to be one that lived in aftertimes: perhaps of the same family with this famous Asaph, who lived in David's days, and so called by his name.

And they sang praises with gladness, and they bowed their heads and worshipped.] Not only upon this day, but continually, as David had appointed; and Jehoshaphat in his reign restored, (xx. 19, 20.) But this order had been interrupted in the time of succeeding idolatrous princes, especially in the time of Ahaz; but now revived by this good king Hezekiah.

Ver. 31. Then Hezekiah answered and said, Now ye have consecrated yourselves unto the Lord.] By offering sacrifices of reconciliation with him, whom they had acknowledged to be their Lord; and were anew entered into their office.

Come near, and bring sacrifices and thank-offerings into the house of the Lord. And the congregation brought in sacrifices and thank-offerings.] These were peace-offerings, whereby they acknowledged God's great goodness to them: and gave him thanks for this happy change of religion.

And as many as were of a free heart, burnt-offerings.] These were not like the sacrifices of thanksgiving, as Kimchi observes, which were in great part eaten by the offerers: for burnt-offerings were entirely consumed upon the altar, in honour of God: and therefore it argued greater piety and largeness of heart to offer them.

Ver. 32. And the number of the burnt-offerings, which the congregation brought, was threescore and ten bullocks, a hundred rams, and two hundred lambs: all these were for a burnt-offering to the Lord.] These were not so many in number as had been offered in former times; for the nation was now grown poorer, in comparison to what it was heretofore.

Ver. 33. And the consecrated things were six hundred oxen, and three thousand sheep.] All these were devoted to the service of God, besides the burnt-offerings beforementioned.

Ver. 34. But the priests were too few.] For they who had sacrificed to idols were excluded from their ministry: and they who had not, were not all prepared and sanctified to do their duty. For it appears by what follows, they were backward unto this work to which Hezekiah called them; and therefore could not prepare all the burnt-offerings, (which was their proper work, Lev. i. 5.) much less all the other sacrifices, which were numerous.

So that they could not flay all the burnt-offerings.] This was the work of the priests, (Lev. i. 6.) and could not be done but by those who were skilful in the business. So Bochartus observes out of the heathen poet, that it was practised with great art and industry (Μιστύλλουτ' ἐπισταμένως) by those who had knowledge and skill to do it dexterously, (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 33. p. 324.)

Wherefore their brethren the Levites did help them till the work was ended.] In cases of great necessity, they did not stand nicely upon the observation of the ceremonial law. For both now, and in the days of Josiah, (xxxiv. 11.) some things were admitted, which that law did not allow. For, as now the Levites flayed the sacrifices, (which was the work of priests alone, Lev. i. 6.) so all the people were allowed to keep the Passover in the second month; and the Levites offered the paschal lambs, which were brought by those that were unclean, and the unclean ate them.

And until the other priests had sanctified themselves.] Then the Levites might no longer continue to do their proper work.

For the Levites were more upright in heart to sanctify themselves than the priests.] In the foregoing reign, as Jarchi thinks, such as feared God (that is, would not worship idols) were forced to conceal themselves, and lie hid: so that when Hezekiah came to the crown, they did not presently appear, nor were they forward to be cleansed and sanctified. But the Levites were men of greater integrity than the priests: at least there were more men of zeal found among them, that readily offered themselves to the service of God. (See xxx. 17.)

Ver. 35. And also the burnt-offerings were in abundance, with the fat of the peace-offerings, and the drink-offerings for every burnt-offering.] This is another reason why the number of the priests was not sufficient to discharge the work of this day: because there were not only abundance of burnt-offerings to be flayed, but the fat of peace-offerings to be burnt, and a drink-offering to attend every burnt-offering, which must necessarily employ many hands.

Ver. 36. And Hezekiah rejoiced, and all the people, that God had prepared the people.] Had given this good mind to them, to join so forwardly in this reformation.

For the thing was done suddenly.] Which argued a Divine motion; whereby they were excited without long persuasions.

CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1. AND Hezekiah sent to all Israel and Judah, and wrote letters also to Ephraim and Manasseh.] I look upon the last words as signifying, that more particularly he wrote letters to these two tribes, as he sent messengers to the rest: for they were the tribes nearest to him. Whom he could not command, but only invite and admonish them of their duty. For they were bound by the law, as well as the people of Judah, (see ver. 5.) and great numbers of them had settled themselves in the land of Judah, in the reign of Asa, (xv. 9.)

That they should come to the house of the Lord at Jerusalem, to keep the Passover unto the Lord God of Israel.]

This was a festival that used to be celebrated in this very month wherein he began his reformation: which he resolved therefore to keep with great solemnity; and it could be kept no where but at Jerusalem; whither he invited the Israelites to come: and it seems, Hoshea king of Israel, at this time, did not forbid the messengers of Hezekiah to come and invite them, nor his people to go; as Jacobus Capellus observes: which I cannot but look upon as a remarkable instance of God's goodness towards this sinful people in the kingdom of the ten tribes, that he raised up, at the very last when they were ripe for destruction, such a king to reign over them, as had so much goodness in him, that he did not hinder any of his subjects who would go and worship at Jerusalem. Nor did he prohibit those from coming into his country, who were sent to invite them to it: so that the Israelites could not pretend they were compelled to be idolaters, for fear of the king's displeasure.

Ver. 2. For the king had taken counsel, and his princes, and all the congregation in Jerusalem, to keep the Passover in the second month.] The time being elapsed (by such means as here follow) for its observation in the first month (which was the proper season), he took advice with those who were his proper council in such matters, to keep it in the next. For by the princes, and all the congregation in Jerusalem, are meant the great synagogue, consisting of the senate of that city, and the other senators called from other places. So Grotius understands it upon St. Matt. x. 17. And thus our Mr. Thorndike also, in fewer words; He means the consistory, called the princes, as they are called in the prophet Jeremiah, xxvi. 10, 11. (See Rites of the Church, p. 231.) For Jehoshaphat having settled judges in every city, it is likely they remained in some authority till this time.

Ver. 3. For they could not keep it at that time.] At the time appointed by the law, on the fourteenth day of the first month: for the reason here following.

Because the priests had not sanctified themselves sufficiently, neither had the people gathered themselves together at Jerusalem.] Ahaz had made such confusion in the worship of God, by shutting up the doors of the temple (that no Divine service might be there performed), and by erecting idols every where, and many other ways; that as the priests, by long disuse, could not be sanctified so soon as was necessary, nor the people have time to assemble: so the temple itself could not be purged till the sixteenth day of the first month, (xxix. 17.) and consequently the time was passed for keeping the Passover, which was to have been on the fourteenth: they thought it best therefore to adjourn it to the next month, rather than stay till the next year; especially since God himself allowed, in some cases, those that could not keep it in the first month to keep it in the second, (Numb. ix.) And what was allowed to particular persons, they thought might be allowed to the whole congregation of Israel.

Ver. 4. And the thing pleased the king and all the congregation.] The advice of the great council was approved by the king, and by every one else.

Ver. 5. So they established a decree.] This was the work of a court, or great council.

To make proclamation throughout all Israel.] By the king's authority.

From Beer-sheba even to Dan.] From one end of the country to the other.

That they should come to keep the Passover unto the Lord God of Israel at Jerusalem; for they had not done it of a long time in such sort as it was written.] The ten tribes had never kept it, since the division of the kingdom by Jeroboam (at least not in such manner as the law prescribed), being hindered by his threatening interdicts from going to Jerusalem; as their forefathers were by their long tedious travels in the wilderness, (Josh. v.) And as for Judah, it appears from ver. 26. they had never kept it with such solemnity, since the time of Solomon.

Ver. 6. So the posts went with the letters from the king and his princes throughout all Israel and Judah.] They sent posts, that timely notice might be given to every one, to prepare themselves for this service.

And according to the commandment of the king, saying, Ye children of Israel, turn again unto the Lord God of Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, and he will return to the remnant of you that are escaped out of the hand of the kings of Assyria.] That is, Pul and Tiglath-pileser, who had carried a great many of them captive, (2 Kings xv. 29. 1 Chron. v. 26.)

Ver. 7. And be not ye like your fathers, and like your brethren, which trespassed against the Lord God of their fathers, who therefore gave them up to desolation, as you see.] And would certainly give them up also, if they continued to provoke him, as they did.

Ver. 8. Now, be ye not stiff-necked, as your fathers were.] It is a metaphor (as I have observed elsewhere) from refractory oxen, which will not go forward; but withdraw their necks and their shoulders from the yoke, and go backward.

But yield yourselves unto the Lord.] In the Hebrew, give your hand; concerning which phrase, see 1 Chron. xxix. 24.

And enter into his sanctuary, which he hath sanctified for ever.] Come to worship at Jerusalem: which was the only place appointed by God for his service, as long as that law lasted.

And serve the Lord your God, that the fierceness of his wrath may turn away from you.] Which otherwise was ready to make an utter end of them, as it had done of their brethren.

Ver. 9. For if ye turn again unto the Lord, your brethren and your children shall find compassion before them that lead them captive, so that they shall come again into this land: for the Lord your God is gracious and merciful, and will not turn away his face from you, if ye return unto him.] These were the contents of the letter, which Hezekiah sent throughout all Israel: concluding with a most exuberant grace (as Strigelius justly calls it), which not only promised to them that they should continue in their land; but they also, who were carried captive, should be restored to them. This, no doubt, Hezekiah had authority from God to declare to them, that he might move them to repentance. For Moses had declared this, which Hezekiah applies to them in their circumstances.

Ver. 10. So the posts passed from city to city, through the country of Ephraim and Manasseh, even unto Zebulun: but they laughed them to scorn, and mocked them.] Being long accustomed to serve other gods, their hearts were so hardened, that the generality of the ten tribes scoffed at this most gracious invitation to repentance. For which they paid very dearly shortly after: Shalmaneser coming six years after this, and taking Samaria, and carrying the whole nation captive, (2 Kings xvii. 6. xviii. 10.)

Ver. 11. Nevertheless divers of Asher, and Manasseh, and of Zebulun, humbled themselves, and came to Jerusalem.] Here is not so much as one of Ephraim mentioned: but in some other tribes there were those found who laid to heart their apostacy, and came to Jerusalem, humbly begging pardon. Yet Ephraim is mentioned afterward as partaking of the passover; (ver. 18.) some of them, it is likely, upon consideration following the example of their brethren, though at first they mocked at the message.

Ver. 12. Also in Judah the hand of God was to give them one heart to do the commandment of the king and of the princes.] There was a marvellous unanimity in Judah, who were so obedient to the motions of the Divine grace (without which so great a change could not have been made), as generally to comply with the king's proclamation, made with the consent of the princes.

By the word of the Lord.] They looked upon it as a Divine command, which was brought to them by that authority. And it appeared so to be, by the mighty power of God, which wrought their hearts to a cheerful obedience.

Ver. 13. And there assembled at Jerusalem much people to keep the feast of unleavened bread in the second month, a very great congregation.] This confutes the fancy of the Talmudists, who say, Hezekiah added a month to this year by intercalation; that is, made another month, Adar, which was the last month of the year; and so kept this Passover in the first month of the next year. But this is directly contrary to the express words of this verse, which says, they kept it in the second month. Nor is the opinion of the Karaites truer, who fancy, that though they kept the Passover in the second month, yet they did not keep all the parts of it, but only offered the sacrifice of the paschal lamb; the feast of unleavened bread being performed in the first month. But this doth not agree with ver. 21. which saith expressly, "they kept the feast of unleavened bread seven days."

Ver. 14. And they arose, and took away the altars that were in Jerusalem, and all the altars for incense took they away.] They began as soon as they came to Jerusalem, to shew their zeal against idolatry, by throwing down the altars that Ahaz had erected in high places, either for sacrifice, or burning incense, which were very many. (See xxviii. 24.)

And cast them into the brook Kidron.] They stamped them to powder, I suppose, and then cast it into this brook.

Ver. 15. Then they killed the passover on the fourteenth day of the second month: and the priests and Levites were ashamed.] They blushed to see the people so forward, and themselves so negligent.

And sanctified themselves, and brought in the burnt-offerings into the house of the Lord.] They that had not done it already (xxix. 34. and ver. 3. of this chapter) now sanctified themselves, that they might perform their office; there being many sacrifices to be offered upon this day. (See upon Deut. xvi. 2.)

Ver. 16. And they stood in their places, after their manner, according to the law of Moses, the man of God.] That they might dispatch their business the more readily.

The priests sprinkled the blood, which they received of the hand of the Levites.] Private persons, as well as the Levites, might receive the blood from the beast, but the priests alone could sprinkle it.

Ver. 17. For there were many in the congregation that were not sanctified; therefore the Levites had the charge of the killing of the passover.] The passover doth not only signify the paschal lamb, but all the sacrifices that accompanied it, as I have shewn in the forenamed place, (Deut. xvi. 2.)

For every one that was not clean, to sanctify them unto the Lord.] Abundance of the people that came to keep this Passover were not clean; and therefore there needed the more sacrifices to be offered for their cleansing, which was one reason why the Levites were employed in it, otherwise there had not been a sufficient number to perform this duty.

Ver. 18. For a multitude of the people, even many of Ephraim, and Manasseh, Issachar, and Zebulun, had not cleansed themselves.] And therefore ought not, according to the law, to have come to the sanctuary, much less eaten the passover.

Yet did they eat the passover otherwise than it was written.] They did not understand, after such a long night of ignorance and superstition, what ceremonies were required for their cleansing; or rather, they had not time to use them. Yet, having an eager and pious desire to commemorate their wonderful deliverance out of the Egyptian bondage, they were permitted in their uncleanness to eat the passover, lest they should be discouraged, if they were denied it, in their return to the true religion.

But Hezekiah prayed for them, saying, The good Lord pardon every one.] He had a confidence that God was so gracious, that he would not stand strictly upon the observation of external rites, when he saw men's hearts honest and upright.

Ver. 19. That prepareth his heart to seek God, the Lord God of his fathers.] Who with pure and holy intentions came disposed to worship God, and acknowledge him to be the Lord.

Though he be not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary.] But wanted such ritual purifications as were required of those that were admitted to worship God at the sanctuary.

Ver. 20. And the Lord hearkened to Hezekiah, and healed the people.] Some imagine that God smote them with some disease, because of their impurity, which upon his prayer was cured. But the Scripture uses this phrase, for granting pardon, and freeing men from the guilt of sin, as is apparent from Isa. vi. 10. "Lest they should be converted, and be healed;" i. e. pardoned.

Ver. 21. And the children of Israel, that were present at Jerusalem, kept the feast of unleavened bread seven days with great gladness.] Which was appointed to be observed after the killing of the passover. (See Exod. xii. 15, 16, &c.)

And the Levites and the priests praised the Lord day by day, singing with loud instruments unto the Lord.] All the seven days they sang praises to God with music, when the sacrifices were offered.

Ver. 22. And Hezekiah spake comfortably unto all the Levites that taught the good knowledge of the Lord.] He encouraged them to continue to instruct the people more fully in their duty, by commending them for their care and diligence; and promising, it is likely, to reward them, for what they had done in propagating the true knowledge of God.

And they did eat throughout the feast seven days, offering peace-offerings, and making confession to the Lord God of their fathers.] Acknowledging his great goodness unto them, which is called confessing, in the holy language, (1 Chron. xvi. 23, 24.)

Ver. 23. And the whole assembly took counsel to keep other seven days.] They advised, it is likely, with those mentioned ver. 2.

And they kept other seven days with gladness.] They did not observe other seven days of unleavened bread, but offered sacrifices, with praises and thanksgivings, and feasting seven days.

Ver. 24. For Hezekiah king of Judah did give to the congregation a thousand bullocks, and seven thousand sheep; and the princes gave to the congregation a thousand bullocks, and ten thousand sheep.] Part of these sacrifices was offered unto God, and the priests had another part, and the rest was distributed to the multitude, that they might feast and be merry all the seven days, which was an extraordinary solemnity; but by this means not only all the Israelites were provided for who kept this great feast, but all the strangers also that came with them to Jerusalem.

And a great number of the priests sanctified themselves.] So that there was a sufficient number to offer the sacrifices, and to sprinkle the blood, though not to flay them all.

Ver. 25. And all the congregation of Judah, with the priests and the Levites, and all the congregation that came out of Israel, and the strangers that came out of the land of Israel, and that dwelt in Judah, rejoiced.] From hence we may conclude, that many strangers that were in the kingdom of Israel became proselytes, at this time, to the true religion revived in Judah.

Ver. 26. So there was great joy in Jerusalem: for since the time of Solomon, the son of David king of Israel, there was not the like in Jerusalem.] He held a wonderful great feast for a vast number of people fourteen days, as we read 1 Kings viii. 65.

Ver. 27. Then the priests the Levites arose and blessed the people.] That is, such of the Levites as were priests stood up and dismissed the congregation with a blessing: for it was their office alone to bless, (1 Chron. xxiii. 13.) and this blessing is ordained in the law of Moses, by a Divine commandment, (Numb. vi. 22, 23.) and was continued by them as long as the sanctuary stood. Yea, it was used, if we may believe the Jews, not only in the temple, but in the synagogues; not only in the land of Canaan, but in all countries where they met to worship God, and they think themselves bound to it by the Divine law. (See Campegius Vitringa, in his book de Synagoga Veteri, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 20.)

And their voice was heard, and their prayer came up to his holy dwelling-place, even unto heaven.] This shews that their blessing was a prayer to God to bless them, of which the blessing ordained by Moses is a proof. And, perhaps, God at this time, by some visible token, testified his acceptance of them: but it is not likely the Divine writer would have concealed such a miracle.

CHAP. XXXI.

Ver. 1. NOW, when all this was finished.] In the latter end of the second month, after the Passover and the following festivals were over, and they had received good instructions from the pious Levites, (xxx. 22.) they now produced the fruit of all this, by destroying the monuments of idolatry.

All Israel that were present went out to the cities of Judah, and brake the images in pieces, and cut down the groves, and threw down the high places and the altars.] Which Ahaz had made in all the fenced cities of Judah, (xxviii. 25.)

Out of all Judah and Benjamin, in Ephraim also and Manasseh, until they had utterly destroyed them all.] They had no authority in the kingdom of Israel, to which Ephraim and Manasseh belonged: but some think, that as Hezekiah sent letters to all Israel to come and keep the Passover, so he went by a Divine motion to those tribes which were nearest to him, and, without the consent of Hoshea king of Israel, destroyed their images, and other idolatrous monuments. But these words may signify no more than that he did this in all parts of Ephraim and Manasseh, who were fallen off to Judah, and come under his government, (chap. xv. 9.)

Then all the children of Israel returned, every man to his possession, into their own cities.] This argues great zeal, that they would not return home till they had done all they could to establish and promote true religion. Of so great import it is (as Pellicanus here observes) to have a good king, and a well-instructed people.

Ver. 2. And Hezekiah appointed the courses of the priests, and the Levites after their courses, every man according to his service.] He restored the order which David had instituted; which had been interrupted since the days of Jehoshaphat, who walked in the ways of David, (chap. xvii. 3.)

The priests and the Levites for burnt-offerings, and for peace-offerings, to minister, and to give thanks, and to praise.] Not only upon such solemn feasts as the Passover (which they had lately kept), but every day they sung praise to God, when the sacrifices were offered.

In the gates of the tents of the Lord.] That is, in the Lord's house; which anciently was a tent, as he represents to David, 2 Sam. vii. 6. And all houses were called by that name, Psal. lxix. 25.

Ver. 3. He appointed also the king's portion of his substance for the burnt-offerings, to wit, for the morning and evening burnt-offerings, and the burnt-offerings for the sabbaths, and for the new moons, and for the set feasts, as it is written in the law of the Lord.] There was a particular sacrifice, I suppose, offered for the king every day, at his own cost and charge. Besides which, Hezekiah likewise maintained the morning and evening sacrifices every day, and especially on the sabbaths, and new moons, and solemn feasts: because the condition of the people was so low, that they could not every one pay the tax that was laid on them on purpose for the maintenance of these sacrifices. Yet the first-fruits and the tenths he ordered to be carefully paid, as it here follows. And these words it is possible may mean no more, but that he made an allowance out of his own estate, for the support of all the expenses, ordinary and extraordinary, at the altar.

Ver. 4. Moreover, he commanded the people that dwelt in Jerusalem.] That by their good example others might be stirred up to their duty.

To give the portion of the priests and the Levites, that they might be encouraged in the law of the Lord.] For the service of God could not be maintained, unless there was a due provision made for the maintenance of his ministers, who were always supported out of the public stock. For they who minister to the community, ought by the law of nature (as Estius well observes) to be maintained by it. For their ministry is not appointed for themselves, but for the salvation of all the people.

Ver. 5. And as soon as the commandment came abroad, the children of Israel brought in abundance the first-fruits of corn, wine, and oil, and honey.] The Targum translates the word honey of dates, as the Jews commonly understand it, and so expound Deut. viii. 8. where seven sorts of things are mentioned, of which they brought the first-fruits. But though honey was not offered in sacrifice to God (which is their reason why they will not here understand honey, properly so called), yet I see no reason why they might not bring the first-fruits of it, and give it to the priests for their own use.

And of all the increase of the field.] Which Kimchi expounds of the fruits of the rest of the trees; viz. fig-trees and pomegranates.

And all the tithe of all things brought they in abundantly.] They paid tithe, saith he, not only of the corn, but of the fruit-trees, and of the herbs, which were not due by the law: such herbs as those mentioned by our Saviour, mint, anise, and cummin; (Matt. xxiii. 23.) though these seem to have been of a later date, invented by the Pharisees.

Ver. 6. And concerning the children of Israel and Judah, that dwelt in the city of Judah.] As many of the Israelites as were under the power and dominion of Judah, did the same that they did.

They also brought in the tithe of oxen and sheep.] As the inhabitants of Jerusalem had brought in the tithe of such things as are forementioned, which they had in their storehouses; so they in the country brought in also the tithe of oxen and sheep, which were not kept in the cities.

And the tithe of holy things which were consecrated unto the Lord their God.] That is, saith Jarchi, the tithe which the Levites paid to the priests. But Kimchi takes it for things consecrated, which they had dedicated to God's service; of which they also gave tithe, though they were exempted from the law of the tithing.

And laid them by heaps.] In a great abundance, as is beforesaid.

Ver. 7. In the third month they began to lay the foundation of the heaps, and finished them in the seventh month.] They began to offer first-fruits in the third month, when their harvest began; and finished the tithing in the seventh month, when their harvest was ended, (Exod. xxiii. 16.)

Ver. 8. And when Hezekiah and the princes came and saw the heaps, they blessed the Lord and his people Israel.] They gave thanks to God, who had given them such plenty of good things, and likewise given them a heart to offer so plentifully: and they commended the people, and prayed God to increase their store. For that is the meaning of blessing the people, praising their liberality, and praying God to reward it.

Ver. 9. Then Hezekiah questioned with the priests and the Levites concerning the heaps.] Asking them, as some understand it, what they meant to let them lie so carelessly, as if they were neglected, and did not lay them up in some safe place. But others think he means, how it came to pass, that there were still such great heaps left, and no more spent. Which the following answer seems to favour, though the next words incline to the former.

Ver. 10. And Azariah the chief priest, of the house of Zadok.] The head of the family of the priests, of the line of Zadok.

Answered him, and said, Since the people began to bring the offerings into the house of the Lord.] Which was from the very beginning of harvest.

We have had enough to eat, and have left plenty: for the Lord hath blessed his people; and that which is left is this great store.] His meaning seems to be, that they had not spared to make use of the plentiful provision which was brought to them; and had also laid up as much as they had room to receive, and all these heaps were still left.

Ver. 11. Then Hezekiah commanded to prepare chambers in the house of the Lord; and they prepared them.] To build new storehouses, besides those which Solomon had made; because there was not room enough wherein to lay all the offerings, and tithes, and other dedicated things.

Ver. 12. And brought in the offerings, and the tithes, and the dedicated things, faithfully: over which Cononiah the Levite was ruler, and Shimei his brother was the next.] As he took care they should all be faithfully laid up, so he set trusty persons to see that they were no less faithfully preserved, for their proper uses. Of which these two brethren were the chief.

Ver. 13. And Jehiel, and Azaziah, and Nahath, and Asahel, and Jerimoth, and Jozabad, and Eliel, and Ismachiah, and Mahath, and Benaiah, were overseers, under the hand of Cononiah and Shimei his brother.] These were inferior officers, under the command of the two forenamed brethren, who had the principal oversight, and these were assistant to them.

At the commandment of Hezekiah the king, and Azariah the ruler of the house of God.] For so it was ordered by the king, with the advice of Azariah, who was before mentioned (ver. 10.) as a chief person among the priests.

Ver. 14. And Kore, the son of Imnah the Levite, the porter towards the east.] At the entrance of the house of God.

Was over the free-will-offerings of God, to distribute the oblations of the Lord.] Unto the priests and Levites, to whose uses they were appropriated by God: or, as some think, to give out so much flour, oil, wine, frankincense, &c. as was necessary for the sacrifices.

And the most holy things.] So they called the burnt-offerings, and the offerings for sin, and the trespass-offerings, and the two lambs for peace-offerings, on the last day of the feast of tabernacles, as Beckius observes out of Maimonides.

Ver. 15. And next him were Eden, and Miniamin, and Jeshua, and Shemaiah, Amariah, and Shechaniah, in the cities of the priests, in their set office, to give to their brethren by courses, as well to the great as to the small.] These were to take care of those who stayed in their cities, while others came in their courses to wait at Jerusalem. None of which wanted the portion allotted to them, both for themselves and for their little children.

Ver. 16. Besides their genealogy of males, from three years old and upward, even unto every one that entereth into the house of the Lord, his daily portion for their service in their charges, according to their courses.] Though none of the Levites were permitted to come into the house of the Lord, to do service, till they were twenty years old; yet their males (as Mr. Selden observes from this place), who were three years old or more, were allowed to come into the temple with their parents; and in the distribution, the other infants being pretermitted, these were provided for. Kimchi here observes, that males under three years old were not capable of entering into the house of the Lord: but females, neither then, nor after they were older, were capable of this privilege.

Ver. 17. Both to the genealogy of the priests by the house of their fathers, and the Levites from twenty years old and upward, in their charges, by their courses.] These words twenty years old (as the same great person observes) relate not to the priests, but to the Levites: who, according to the law of Moses, were not obliged to their function, till they were thirty years old, Numb. iv. 3. But David, in the latter end of his reign, a little before the building of the temple, admitted them to officiate at the age of twenty years, 1 Chron. xxiii. 26, 27. (See Selden, de Succession. ad Pontif. lib. ii. cap. 4.)

Ver. 18. And to the genealogy of all their little ones, their wives, and their sons, and their daughters, through all the congregation.] The forenamed officers gave to every family their portion; not only to the priests, but to their wives and children: of which (it appears by these verses) an exact register was kept, according to which they made their distribution.

For in their set office they sanctified themselves in holiness.] Or rather, according to the Hebrew, For in faith, or with fidelity (some translate it in the margin in trust), they sanctified themselves in holiness; that is, attended upon their ministry at the house of God, nothing doubting they should be provided of all things necessary. For this seems to be a reason, why such care was taken of their wives and children, because their husbands were wholly given up to the service of God, and could not follow any other employment whereby to provide for the maintenance of their families.

Ver. 19. Also of the sons of Aaron the priests, which were in the fields of the suburbs of their cities, in every several city.] Care was taken of those that lived in the country, though at the greatest distance, as well as of those that lived in or near Jerusalem, or waited in their courses there. They that were not in waiting, but at home with their families, had provision made for them, as if they had been at the house of God.

The men that were expressed by name, to give portions to all the males among the priests, and to all that were reckoned by genealogies among the Levites.] The forenamed persons were entrusted with this business, to see that none wanted a maintenance.

Ver. 20. And thus did Hezekiah throughout all Judah, and wrought that which was good, and right, and truth, before the Lord his God.] Whatsoever he thought was pleasing to God, conformable to the law, and profitable for his people, he performed with integrity of heart.

Ver. 21. And in every work that he began in the service of the house of God, and in the law, and in the commandments, to seek his God, he did it with all his heart, and prospered.] Whatsoever he went about, either for the advancement of religion, or the good government of his people, he did it sincerely, and with great zeal; so that God prospered him both in peace and in war.

CHAP. XXXII.

Ver. 1. AFTER these things, and the establishment thereof.] After the reformation of religion, and the establishment of it, by settling the maintenance of the priests and Levites (whom he appointed, according to the ordinance of David, to attend in their courses), he prospered so, that he resolved to be subject no longer to the king of Assyria: who thereupon came and invaded his country, (2 Kings xviii. 7.)

Sennacherib king of Assyria came, and entered into Judah.] This was in the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah, 2 Kings xviii. 13.

And encamped against the fenced cities.] Many of which he took: God thinking fit to try the faith of Hezekiah, and, by disappointing Sennacherib, to get himself the greater glory.

And thought to win them for himself.] To conquer the whole country, even Jerusalem itself.

Ver. 2. And when Hezekiah saw that Sennacherib was come, and that he was purposed to fight against Jerusalem.] His success puffed him up, so that he designed, as plainly appeared, to besiege the capital city of the kingdom.

Ver. 3. He took counsel with his princes and his mighty men.] Though the prophet Isaiah had assured him of God's protection, he did not neglect to consult the best means of his preservation.

To stop the waters of the fountains which were without the city.] To fill them up with earth, that it might not be known there was any water there; which they turned another way, and by pipes and channels under ground brought it to Jerusalem.

And they did help him.] Assisted him in this work.

Ver. 4. So there was gathered much people together, who stopped all the fountains, and the brook that ran through the midst of the land.] That is Gihon, as Kimchi understands it; which some take to be Kidron. It was no easy thing to dry up this brook: but it is supposed the head of it was not far from the city, which being stopped up they diverted the current, and, by conveyance under ground, brought it into great pits within the city; which received the water for the use of the people.

For we read afterward (ver. 30.) of his stopping up a course of water, which was above; and bringing it down to this west side of the city.

Saying, Why should the kings of Assyria come, and find much water?] Water was scarce in this country; therefore they thought it prudent to distress their enemies by the want of it. He speaks of kings, in the plural number either because there were many kings that served under the king of Assyria, or because he was the great king, as he styled himself.

Ver. 5. Also he strengthened himself, and built up all the wall that was broken.] There was a great breach made in it by Joash king of Israel in the days of Amaziah: (chap. xxv.

23.) which, I suppose, was repaired in his son's days, who was a very powerful prince, (chap. xxvi. 9.) and therefore he speaks here of some other breach, which had been made since that time; and perhaps in the same place, where through neglect the wall might possibly be fallen down.

And raised it up to the towers.] It was broken down from the gate of Ephraim to the corner-gate (as we read in the forenamed places), where there were towers, for the defence of the gates, unto which he carried the wall: so that it was entirely raised up again.

And another wall without.] He compassed the city with another wall without the old one; for its stronger defence.

And repaired Millo in the city of David.] Some understand by Millo the wall that was about Zion, on the north part of the city: or the street within the city from the palace to the temple. Which he repaired, that is, fortified and made strong with a wall, to defend the entrance of it.

And made darts and shields in abundance.] Both offensive and defensive weapons; of which he took care there should be no want.

Ver. 6. And he set captains of war over the people, and gathered them together to him in the street of the gate of the city.] In the street of the principal gate, which was very large.

And spake comfortably to them, saying.] Encouraged them to stand by him, in defence of their city, religion, and liberties: which he assured them God would protect, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 7. Be strong and courageous, be not afraid nor dismayed for the king of Assyria, nor for all the multitude that is with him: for there be more with us than with him.] It is the part of a good commander to shew himself undaunted before his soldiers; but especially to persuade them, that, having a good cause, God is on their side: which the Targum in the next verse explains thus, The Word of the Lord our God is our helper. Which signifies, as Beckius there thinks, more persons than one in the holy Trinity.

Ver. 8. With him is an arm of flesh; but with us is the Lord our God, to help us, and to fight our battles. And the people rested themselves upon the words of Hezekiah king of Judah.] Relied on what he said, as if it had been spoken to them by God himself.

Ver. 9. After this did Sennacherib king of Assyria send his servants to Jerusalem (but he himself laid siege against Lachish, and all his power with him), unto Hezekiah king of Judah, and unto all Judah, that were at Jerusalem, saying.] See 2 Kings xviii. 17, &c. in which place, and in chap. xix. 10, &c. the following speech is set down more largely; which here is abridged.

Ver. 10. Thus saith Sennacherib king of Assyria, Whereon do ye trust, that ye abide in the siege of Jerusalem?] See 2 Kings xviii. 19. The last words seem to signify, that for fear of the king of Assyria, they durst not stir out of the gates of Jerusalem: for so we translate the last words in the margin, the strong hold of Jerusalem.

Ver. 11. Doth not Hezekiah persuade you to give over yourselves to die by famine and by thirst, saying, The Lord our God shall deliver us out of the hand of the king of Assyria?] See 2 Kings xviii. 22. He did not intend, it appears by this, to storm the city, but to keep them pent up till they were starved.

Ver. 12. Hath not the same Hezekiah taken away his high places and his altars, and commanded Judah and Jerusalem, saying, Ye shall worship before one altar, and burn incense upon it?] It is evident from hence, that the worship of one God alone was known to be the religion of the Jews. But Sennacherib would have had them believe, Hezekiah had dishonoured him by confining his worship and service to one narrow corner: which was before diffused and spread all over the city and country; and therefore would not help them. (See there, 2 Kings xviii. 22.)

Ver. 13. Know ye not what I and my fathers have done unto all the people of other lands? were the gods of the nations of those lands any ways able to deliver their lands out of mine hand?] If the Lord had a mind to help them, he would have them believe that he was not able: because no gods had been able to deliver those that worshipped them from his power.

Ver. 14. Who was there among all the gods of those nations, that my fathers utterly destroyed, that could deliver his people out of mine hand, that your God should be able to deliver you out of mine hand?] Upon this argument he enlarges himself very much in 2 Kings xviii. 32—35.

Ver. 15. Now therefore let not Hezekiah deceive you, nor persuade you in this manner, neither yet believe him: for no god of any nation or kingdom was able to deliver his people out of mine hand, and out of the hand of my fathers; how much less shall your God deliver you out of mine hand?] See 2 Kings xviii. 29, 30.

Ver. 16. And his servants spake yet more against the Lord God, and against his servant Hezekiah.] The Targum translates it, They spake perversely against the Word of the Lord God, &c. Which plainly declares, that paraphrast took the Word of God to be a Divine person, whose servant Hezekiah was.

Ver. 17. He wrote also letters to rail on the Lord God of Israel, and to speak against him, saying.] One of these letters is set down at large in 2 Kings xix. 9—14.

As the gods of the nations of other lands have not delivered their people out of mine hand, so shall not the God of Hezekiah deliver his people out of mine hand.] He insists upon this so often and so long, it being the most popular argument he could use.

Ver. 18. Then they cried with a loud voice, in the Jews' speech, unto the people of Jerusalem that were on the wall, to affright them, and to trouble them, that they might take the city.] By a surrender of it into their hand. (See 2 Kings xviii. 26, 27, &c.)

Ver. 19. And they spake against the God of Jerusalem, as against the gods of the people of the earth, which were the work of the hands of man.] They ignorantly fancied, there was no difference between the God of the universe, whom the Jews worshipped, and the gods of particular countries, who pretended to no power but only there: though in truth they had no power at all, being made by those that worshipped them.

Ver. 20. And for this cause Hezekiah the king, and the prophet Isaiah, the son of Amoz, prayed and cried to heaven.] See 2 Kings xix. 1, 2, &c. 25, 26, &c.

Ver. 21. And the Lord sent an angel, which cut off all the mighty men of valour, and the leaders and captains, in the camp of the king of Assyria.] With a vast number of common soldiers, as we read 2 Kings xix. 35. The Hebrew text no where mentions the name of angel, nor of the time of the year when this stroke was given, nor the kind of plague whereby they were destroyed: but the Targum saith, The Word of the Lord sent Gabriel to do this execution, who in the Passover night smote them with lightning. Which is related in the Babylonian Talmud, after the same manner, as Beckius observes upon the Targum.

One would think, that Artabanus had read or heard something of this sudden and dreadful overthrow, when he dissuaded Xerxes from invading Greece, being swoln with confidence that nothing could withstand him. "Dost thou not observe (saith he) how the highest and magnificent buildings are wont to be struck with thunder, when the lower escape? Φιλέει γὰρ ὁ Θεὸς τὰ ὑπερέχοντα πάντα κολούειν, for God loves to depress all things that are lifted up." And a little after, in the same speech, he admonishes him, Οὐ γὰρ ἐᾷ φρονέειν ἄλλον μέγα ὁ Θεὸς ἢ ἑαυτόν· for God doth not allow any other to think highly of themselves, but only himself. (Herodotus, lib. vii. cap. 10.)

So he returned with shame of face to his own land. And when he was come into the house of his god, they that came forth of his own bowels slew him there with the sword.] See 2 Kings xix. 37. And with him the Assyrian empire began to fall, and never recovered its former strength, though it still continued in great power. For the next year after Sennacherib's death the Medes revolted, being encouraged to it, no doubt, by this great defeat at Jerusalem: and by their example several other nations fell off from the Assyrians and asserted their liberty, as Hermannus Conringius hath observed out of Herodotus, in his Adversaria Chronologica, cap. 4. But still their monarchy continued, as appears by what follows in the next chapter of this book.

Ver. 22. Thus the Lord saved Hezekiah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, from the hand of Sennacherib the king of Assyria, and from the hand of all other, and guided them on every side.] That is, defended them from all their enemies; just as a shepherd doth his sheep, whom he leads into places of safety.

Ver. 23. And many brought gifts unto the Lord to Jerusalem, and presents to Hezekiah king of Judah.] His neighbours were so far from molesting him, that many came to worship God, and to do honour to Hezekiah, who was so highly in God's favour.

So that he was magnified in the sight of all nations from thenceforth.] That is, all the neighbouring countries, who heard of these things, had him in great esteem.

Ver. 24. In those days Hezekiah was sick to the death, and prayed unto the Lord: and he spake unto him, and he gave him a sign.] Or, as it is in the margin, wrought a miracle for him. See a large account of this in the twentieth chapter of the second book of the Kings, and my annotations there. Unto which this may be added, that Pliny saith, The application of a very fat fig to a hard swelling is a present remedy; "Carbunculi, si sine ulcere est, quam pinguissimum ficum imponi, pene singulare remedium est," (lib. xxiii. Nat. Histor. cap. 7.) But the schechin wherewith Hezekiah laboured (which we translate bile) was not of this sort: for the word signifies the worst kind of ulcers: and therefore there was nothing in this application of a lump of figs to lessen the wonder.

Ver. 25. But Hezekiah rendered not again according to the benefit done unto him.] In his deliverance from so powerful an enemy as he could not resist: and from such a dangerous disease, as was incurable, without the special hand of God.

For his heart was lifted up.] By the embassy sent to him from the king of Babylon, who came to inquire of the wonder done in the land. Which, together with the slaughter of Sennacherib's army, his shameful retreat, the presents which had been sent him from other countries, and the fame which he had got, made him have too high an opinion; though not of his power, which was very small; yet of his piety, which was very great. But instead of making him thankful, he grew so presumptuous of God's favour as to be forgetful of his benefits.

Therefore there was wrath upon him, and upon Judah and Jerusalem.] Who, it seems, were as insensible as himself of the mercies they had received: contenting themselves, that they were not idolaters, though they were not truly pious, and mindful of God's benefits.

Ver. 26. Notwithstanding Hezekiah humbled himself for the pride of his heart.] Upon the admonition which the prophet Isaiah gave him; and the severe sentence he pronounced against him, and his family.

(Both he and the inhabitants of Jerusalem).] Who were awakened by the same threatening.

So that the wrath of the Lord came not upon them in the days of Hezekiah.] But peace and truth were in his days, as he speaks, 2 Kings xx. 19.

Ver. 27. And Hezekiah had exceeding much riches and honour: and he made himself treasuries for silver, and for gold, and for precious stones, and for spices, and for shields, and for all manner of pleasant jewels.] All which he shewed to the king of Babylon's ambassadors, (2 Kings xx. 13.)

Ver. 28. Storehouses also for the increase of corn, and wine, and oil; and stalls for all manner of beasts, and cotes for flocks.] In the Hebrew the words are, for beast and beast; that is, every beast: as in Esther ix. 21. Year and year; that is, every year: and ver. 28. Generation and generation; i. e. every generation.

Ver. 29. Moreover he provided him cities, and possessions of flocks and herds in abundance; for God had given him substance very much.] The great riches of these countries consisted in abundance of cattle, of all sorts, as I have often observed.

Ver. 30. This same Hezekiah also stopped the upper water-course of Gihon.] He seems to speak of the same thing which is mentioned before, ver. 4. being a work of such great labour and art, that Ezra thought fit to make it memorable, by taking a more particular notice of it, among his great works. From the mention of the upper watercourse, Kimchi gathers, there were several streams of this torrent.

And brought it straight down to the west side of the city of David.] The rivulet, I suppose, had many windings before, and did not come straight down to the city, as now it was made to do.

And Hezekiah prospered in all his works.] It is likely, he contrived many other things for the benefit of the city of Jerusalem; none of which miscarried.

Ver. 31. Howbeit in the business of the ambassadors of the princes of Babylon, who sent unto him to inquire of the wonder that was done in the land.] Which is mentioned at large, 2 Kings xx. 10, 11. Isa. xxxviii. 7, 8. In the former of which places I have endeavoured to give an account of it. But Bochartus, I find, strongly opposes the opinion of the body of the sun's going back: in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 14. p. 4. where he observes, that the Scripture in both places speaks of the shadow's going back ten degrees; and then it is said, the sun went back, that is, the shadow of the sun, or the light of the sun, which succeeded to the going back of the shadow. And it must be confessed, that if the sun had gone back, it would not have been a miracle in Judea alone, but all the world over: and the king of Babylon needed not have sent to inquire about the wonder in that land, because it would have been a wonder in his land, and in all lands, as well as in Judea. And so it was, for I have observed there out of Herodotus, that in Egypt they knew something of the unusual motion of the sun: and, perhaps, they now observed it in Babylon, and only sent to inquire whether Isaiah foretold it, which was a great wonder. I have met also with one, who thinks, that the Babylonians being worshippers of the sun, it was part of Hezekiah's sin, that he did not take this occasion to persuade the ambassadors to worship God, who made and commanded the sun; and could stop the course of it when he pleased.

God left him, to try him, that he might know all that was in his heart.] God suffered him to behave himself according to his own inclinations, without any special motion from him; that Hezekiah might know he was not so strong as he imagined, if he were left to himself without God. But it is generally thought, the last words relate rather to God: who made proof of him, as he had done of many other good men, whether he would entirely obey him, or not. He tries none in that sense of which St. James speaks; viz. for an ill intent, or to lead men to destruction; but for a good end, to improve them, and bring them to salvation. Thus he tempted Abraham, Gen. xxii. 1. and the children of Israel, Exod. xv. 25. xvi. 5. and Ezekiel, and many others, that it might appear how they stood affected to him: which God, no doubt, knew, and now saw the pride and vanity that lurked in Hezekiah's heart: which was hid from every one but God himself, who now suffered him to discover it for his humiliation. For it was a greater crime to be again puffed up, as he had been before his dangerous sickness.

Ver. 32. Now the rest of the acts of Hezekiah, and his goodness, behold, they are written in the vision of Isaiah the prophet, the son of Amoz.] Who hath recorded his prayer, which he made to God in his sickness.

And in the book of the Kings of Judah and Israel.] See xxvii. 7.

Ver. 33. And Hezekiah slept with his fathers, and they buried him in the chiefest of the sepulchres of the sons of David.] Which was a part of that honour which they did him, mentioned in the next words; for he deserved it above all the kings which they had since the time of David.

And all Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem did him honour at his death.] Buried him, perhaps, with such solemnity and expenses as were made at the funeral of king Asa, chap. xvi. 14. Maimonides saith, they appointed a company of students in the law to sit at his sepulchre, and to mourn seven days together. (See Schickard, in his Jus Regium, p. 173.) But this I look upon as merely rabbinical.

And Manasseh his son reigned in his stead.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Ver. 1. MANASSEH was twelve years old when he began to reign, and he reigned fifty and five years in Jerusalem.] See 2 Kings, chap. xxi. 1. where his mother's name is set down, which is here omitted.

Ver. 2. But did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, like unto the abominations of the heathen, whom the Lord had cast out before the children of Israel.] The very same words are in the forenamed place, ver. 2. And here it follows, ver. 9. that he did worse than those abominable heathens; not only committing all the sins of his forefathers, but endeavouring to exceed them, and leave nothing undone wholly to subvert the worship of God.

Ver. 3. For he built again the high places, which Hezekiah his father had broken down, and he reared up altars for Baalim.] Imitated Ahab king of Israel, as it is explained there, 2 Kings xxi. 3.

And made groves, and worshipped all the host of heaven, and served them.] These groves, I suppose, were made about the temple, which was utterly forbidden, (Deut. xvi. 21.) being a heathenish rite, (Judg. vi. 25.) and mentioned by Isaiah (lxvi. 17.) among the abominable idolatries which they practised secretly in their gardens. Yet the Jews in aftertimes did plant trees about their proseuchæ, their oratories, or places of prayer, as Scaliger observes in his Fragmenta, at the end of his book de Emend. Temporum, p. 25. But they were not in the law touching the temple.

Ver. 4. Also he built altars in the house of the Lord.] In the court of the priests. (See 2 Kings xxi. 4.)

Whereof the Lord had said, In Jerusalem shall my name be for ever.] This was the greater profanation, because God had chosen this place to settle his presence in it.

Ver. 5. And he built altars for all the host of heaven, in the two courts of the house of the Lord.] In the court of the people of Israel, and in the court of the gentiles. (See there, ver. 5.)

Ver. 6. And he caused his children to pass through the fire in the valley of the son of Hinnom.] There is mention made only of his son in the book of the Kings, but here of his children, whom he consecrated to Moloch.

Also he observed times, and used enchantments, and used witchcraft, and dealt with a familiar spirit, and with wizards: he wrought much evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger.] He seems to have studied to find out what God had forbidden in his law, that he might practise it. (See there, 2 Kings xxi. 6.)

Ver. 7. And he set a carved image (the idol which he had made) in the house of God, of which God had said to David, and to Solomon his son, In this house, and in Jerusalem, which I have chosen before all the tribes of Israel, will I put my name for ever.] This verse and the next are the same with 2 Kings xxi. 7, 8. where see my annotations. I shall only add here, that this seems to have been an image of more than ordinary note, which he set up with a great deal of ceremony. For among the heathens, whom he imitated, images did not become gods, that is, were not made objects of worship, till being placed in the most holy part of their temples, there they were consecrated by being anointed and crowned by sacrifices, prayers, and adorations; and then setting up candles burning before them: all which was concluded with a festival, which sometimes was made anniversary. Many plain instances there are of this, particularly in Minutius Felix, who mentions the unction, coronation, adoration, and prayers, whereby they were consecrated.

Ver. 8. Neither will I any more remove the foot of Israel from out of the land which I have appointed for your fathers; so that they will take heed to do all that I have commanded them, according to the whole law, and the statutes and the ordinances by the hand of Moses.

Ver. 9. So Manasseh made Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem to err, and to do worse than the heathen, whom the Lord had destroyed before the children of Israel.] A most prodigious change, from the height of piety in his father's time into the sink of impiety in this: which strange vicissitude of things should admonish us not to be secure, as Victorinus Strigelius notes. Who being professor of theology at Heidelburg, left this remark in his lectures on this place near a hundred and forty years ago: "Now we have the word of God abundantly, in all wisdom; and pious princes patronise both those that preach, and those that learn the gospel. But this plenty of the word we now enjoy (I tremble to speak it, but I must speak it, because it will come to pass) shall be taken away: and that sad mournful time will come, when the public assemblies of the church shall be scattered, and a few pious souls shall meet with fear in a corner, to communicate among themselves the fragments of the heavenly doctrine, and give God thanks for those remainders;" which we have seen fulfilled in that country, and in France, and other places.

Ver. 10. And the Lord spake to Manasseh, and to his people.] By his servants the prophets. (See ver. 18.) The Jews say in Seder Olam Rabba, (cap. 20.) that Joel, Nahum, and Habakkuk, prophesied in his time; but he was so wicked, that they would not so much as mention his name in the beginning of their prophecies, which is not a good reason.

But they would not hearken.] Neither he nor his people regarded what they said.

Ver. 11. Wherefore the Lord brought upon them the captains of the host of the king of Assyria.] The royal family failing in Babylon, the king of Assyria (Esar-haddon) brought that kingdom under his yoke again, and held it thirteen years, as primate Usher observes in his Annals. And he hearing, from the ambassadors of Merodach-Baladan, what great treasures were in Jerusalem, and that Hezekiah was dead, and Manasseh had forsaken that God who did such great things for his father, sent an army against him which he could not withstand.

Which took Manasseh among the thorns.] In a thicket where he had hid himself, but was discovered.

And bound him with fetters.] With iron chains fastened to his wrists, or to his legs, as we understand it.

And carried him to Babylon.] Which the king of Assyria, it is likely, had made his seat, to secure his late conquests. This was in the twenty-second year of his reign, as the Jews compute in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 24. when they carried away with him the idol in Dan, according to Judg. xviii. 30. But however that be, it is very evident the Assyrian monarchy was not fallen by the defection of the Medes and other nations, which I before mentioned, but still continued in great power; Babylon itself, which rebelled at the same time with the Medes, being again subdued to its obedience, as appears by their sending Manasseh bound hither. So that they had not only Cœlo-Syria and Phœnicia, but Mesopotamia and Chaldea under their dominion, as Conringius observes, in the book beforenamed, upon the foregoing chapter, ver. 21. How long their power continued the Scripture doth not tell us; but Manasseh, after his return from his captivity, seems to have been a free prince, subject unto none, maintaining forces in all his fenced cities, (ver. 14. of this chapter.)

Ver. 12. And when he was in affliction, he besought the Lord his God, and humbled himself greatly before the God of his fathers.] This was three-and-thirty years before his death, as the Jews make account, in the book beforementioned. But both Kimchi and Abarbinel confess that this relies upon a weak foundation, as doth the other thing, that he was carried away in the twenty-second year of his reign.

Ver. 13. And prayed unto him: and he was entreated of him, and heard his supplication, and brought him again to Jerusalem into his kingdom. Then Manasseh knew that the Lord he was God.] So true it is that "vexatio dat intellectum," trouble and vexation give understanding, and make men know God and themselves. Which is not universally true; for some are far from being brought to a right sense by their miseries: as Ahaz, this king's grandfather, was never without some sore affliction or other, and yet never relented. But though R. Johadan was so charitable as to think that Manasseh had his part in the other world, yet the doctors in the title Sanhedrin (cap. 11. sect. 1.) exclude him from any portion in it, and say he was only restored to his kingdom, but not to life eternal. For this is the doctrine they there lay down, There were three kings, and four private men, who have no portion in eternal life: the three kings are Jeroboam, Ahab, and Manasseh; the four private men, Balaam, Doeg, Ahithophel, and Gehazi. But they have no ground for this sentence pronounced upon Manasseh, but the wickedness of his successor; from whence they argue the father's repentance was not sincere. The folly of which sufficiently appears from this history of him and his father Hezekiah.

Ver. 14. Now after this he built a wall without the city of David, on the west side of Gihon, in the valley, even to the entering in at the fish-gate, and compassed about Ophel, and raised it up a very great height, and put captains of war in all the fenced cities of Judah.] He provided for the safety of his kingdom, and in the first place built a wall for the defence of Jerusalem; which some think was that which his father made, (chap. xxxii. 5.) which he repaired and strengthened, after it had been thrown down, perhaps by the king of Assyria's forces, when they carried him captive. The fish-gate was the gate where they sold fish (as the Targum expounds it), which was brought from Joppa. Concerning Ophel, see xxvii. 3.

Ver. 15. And he took away the strange gods, and the idol out of the house of the Lord, and all the altars that he had built in the mount of the house of the Lord, and in Jerusalem, and cast them out of the city.] He had profaned the house of the Lord, but had not shut up the doors as Ahaz did; and therefore he is said only to have purged it from idols, but not to have opened it, as Jacobus Capellus observes.

Here particular notice is taken of the idol mentioned ver. 7. which confirms what I have noted there.

Ver. 16. And he repaired the altar of the Lord, and sacrificed thereon peace-offerings and thank-offerings.] For now he was sensible there was no other God but the Lord, who had wonderfully delivered him out of captivity, and restored him to his kingdom, when he implored his mercy.

And commanded Judah to serve the Lord God of Israel.] This was a proof of his true repentance, that he endeavoured to bring his people back to the service of God, whom he had misled (ver. 9.) to the worship of idols. But, as Kimchi notes, he was not able to do so much good as he had done mischief, for the people continued their inclination to idolatry, and neglected the study of the law of God. For in Josiah's reign (which presently followed) it was matter of great surprise that they found the book of the law, when they were repairing the temple: the copies of it, as the Jews think, having been destroyed in the time of Manasseh and Amon. But it is not credible, which were preserved in the hands of the ten tribes, and without which the church could not have been reformed.

Ver. 17. Nevertheless the people did sacrifice still in the high places, yet unto the Lord their God only.] This was an error so rooted, that very good kings could not correct it, such as Asa and Jehoshaphat, in whose days the people worshipped the true God but in an unlawful place, as they now did.

Ver. 18. Now the rest of the acts of Manasseh, and his prayer unto his God, and the words of the seers that spake to him in the name of the Lord God of Israel, behold, they are written in the book of the Kings of Israel.] So Judah is now called, who with Benjamin were all that were left of the children of Jacob, who was named Israel. But these books here mentioned are not those which we now have, but others that were lost in the captivity.

Ver. 19. His prayer also, and how God was entreated of him.] He mentions his prayer again; because, I suppose, he made more than one. As if he had said, how he continued to pray till God was entreated of him.

And all his sins, and his trespass, and the places wherein he built high places, and set up groves and graven images, before he was humbled.] This is one of the places which plainly prove (as I have often noted) that ascherim (which we translate groves) signifies not the groves themselves, but the images or statues which were set up in them. For groves are planted, not set up or erected, as it is here said of Manasseh, that he set up groves: that is, dedicated and consecrated, as that word signifies among Greek and Roman writers. (See xxxiv. 1. 2 Kings xiv. 23. Jer. xvii. 2.)

Behold, they are written among the sayings of the seers.] Or of Hosai (as we translate it in the margin), who was a prophet, it is likely, in those times, by whom many memorable things in this reign were recorded: particularly his prayer, which he recorded, as Isaiah did the prayer of Hezekiah his father.

Ver. 20. So Manasseh slept with his fathers, and they buried him in his own house: and Amon his son reigned in his stead.] See 2 Kings xxi. 18. It is likely he left it in his last will, that he would be buried privately, as not worthy to lie by his ancestors.

Ver. 21. Amon was two-and-twenty years old when he began to reign; and reigned two years in Jerusalem.] As the sons of Jeroboam, and of Baasha, and of Ahab, reigned two years and no longer.

Ver. 22. But he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, as did Manasseh his father: for Amon sacrificed to all the carved images which Manasseh his father had made, and served them.] See 2 Kings xxi. 20, 21.

Ver. 23. And humbled not himself before the Lord, as Manasseh his father had humbled himself.] He followed him in his sin, but not in his repentance.

But Amon trespassed more and more.] Some of the Jews say, that he burnt the book of the law: others, that he lay with his own mother. But the great sin which the Holy Scriptures charge him with, is his idolatry, which he more and more introduced, and never repented of it.

Ver. 24. And his servants conspired against him, and slew him in his own house.

Ver. 25. But the people of the land slew all them that had conspired against king Amon: and the people of the land made Josiah his son king in his stead.] These two verses are the very same with those 2 Kings xxi. 23, 24. (See there.)

CHAP. XXXIV.

Ver. 1. JOSIAH was eight years old when he began to reign; and he reigned in Jerusalem one-and-thirty years.

Ver. 2. And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, and walked in the ways of David his father, and declined neither to the right hand nor to the left.] These two verses are the same with 2 Kings xxii. 1, 2. only there the name of his mother is set down, which here is omitted.

Ver. 3. For in the eighth year of his reign, while he was yet young, he began to seek after the God of David his father.] He gave very early proofs of his pious inclinations; for when he was but sixteen years old, and had newly taken on him the administration of affairs, he began to worship God publicly, and propounded David to himself for his pattern.

And in the twelfth year he began to purge Judah and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved images, and the molten images.] When he was twenty years old, he began to bring others to the true religion, by reforming abuses in the worship of God. For now he had got more authority, and therefore destroyed idolatrous worship, which he was inclined to do before, and had it in his mind when he was a mere youth. This is not so distinctly noted in the book of the Kings, where nothing is recorded of him till what he did in the eighteenth year of his reign. And this is the more remarkable, because he began the reformation here spoken of before Jeremiah began to prophesy, which was not till the next year, in the thirteenth of king Josiah. (See Jer. i. 2.)

Ver. 4. And they brake down the altars of Baalim in his presence.] I have elsewhere observed that Baalim were demi-gods, as Mr. Mede truly calls them.

And the images that were on high above them he cut down.] The Hebrew word chamamim, which we translate images, as most think, hath some relation to the sun; because it comes from a word that signifies heat. And Aben Ezra translates it houses made for the worship of the sun. The LXX. sometimes translate it εἴδωλα, sometimes βδελύγματα, but do not tell us what idols and abominations these were.

Jo. Geusius thinks it was the idol called Thammuz, by which name Osiris, Jupiter Ammon, or the sun, was understood. And, indeed, the worship of all the host of heaven is mentioned together with the worship of Baalim, in the idolatry which Manasseh committed, chap. xxxiii. 3.

And the groves, and the carved images, and the molten images, he brake in pieces.] Here again ascherim signifies the idols in the groves; for the groves themselves were not broken in pieces, but cut down.

And made dust of them, and strowed it upon the graves of them that had sacrificed unto them.] To declare his detestation of the smallest remainders of them.

Ver. 5. And he burnt the bones of the priests upon their altars, and cleansed Judah and Jerusalem.] Whereby he polluted these altars, and made them abominable, and purged the nation from their idolatry, which was very great. For it is likely these were not Levitical priests, but priests made by their idolatrous kings, either of other nations, or such as they could draw in of their own nation (after the manner of Jeroboam), to officiate to their strange gods.

Ver. 6. And so did he in the cities of Manasseh, and Ephraim, and Simeon, even unto Naphtali.] Though Shalmaneser had carried away the main body of the ten tribes from their own land, yet there remained a great many of the poor people behind, as appears from this place, and from ver. 9. 33.

With their mattocks round about.] Some translate it mauls, others forks, or such-like instruments.

Ver. 7. And when he had broken down the altars and the groves, and had beaten the graven images into powder, and cut down all the idols throughout all the land of Israel, he returned to Jerusalem.] For it appears by the book of the Kings more fully, that he went himself in person through the whole country to see this work done, which otherwise might have been performed negligently.

Ver. 8. Now, in the eighteenth year of his reign.] When he was twenty-six years old he proceeded further, having disposed the people to offer freely towards the reparation of the house of God, as it here follows.

When he had purged the land, and the house.] That is, the house of God.

He sent Shaphan the son of Azaliah, and Maaseiah the governor of the city, and Joah the son of Joahaz the recorder, to repair the house of the Lord his God.] Here is a more perfect narrative of the reparation of the temple than was given in the book of the Kings, where only Shaphan is mentioned as sent to Hilkiah; but here two other men of great authority are joined with him, and ordered to see the work set forward.

Ver. 9. And when they came to Hilkiah the high-priest, they delivered the money that was brought into the house of God, which the Levites that kept the doors had gathered of the hand of Manasseh and Ephraim, and of all the remnant of Israel, and of all Judah and Benjamin; and they returned to Jerusalem.] These last words import, that these Levites (having received what was given at the door of the tabernacle which they kept) travelled all the country over, to collect what money they could gather from well-disposed people, who contributed to this work. Which money the three forenamed persons received from them when they returned to Jerusalem: and, besides this, Shaphan alone seems to have been sent to Hilkiah, to sum up the money that had been offered at the temple for this use, (2 Kings xxii. 4.)

Ver. 10. And they put it in the hand of the workmen that had the oversight of the house of the Lord.] Who were appointed to take care of the work, and to see it done.

And they gave it to the workmen that wrought in the house of the Lord, to repair and mend the house.] The overseers gave it to the artificers mentioned in the next verse, who were to buy materials, and employ them in the reparation.

Ver. 11. Even to the artificers and builders gave they it, to buy hewn stone, and timber for couplings, and to floor the houses which the kings of Judah had destroyed.] It seems both the outside and inside, the floor and the roof, were run to ruin by long neglect, since the days of Joash, when the temple was last repaired: which the Jews (in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 24.) make account was two hundred and eighteen years.

Ver. 12. And the men did the work faithfully.] So that no account was taken of them.

And the overseers of them were Jahath and Obadiah, the Levites, of the sons of Merari; and Zechariah and Meshullam, of the sons of the Kohathites, to set it forward; and other of the Levites, all that could skill of instruments of music.] That is, all those who were well skilled in music, and performed their part in the service of the temple: which is here mentioned to signify that the principal Levites were set over this work to see it well done.

Ver. 13. Also they were over the bearers of burdens, and were overseers of all that wrought the work in any manner of service.] There being great numbers of them, they might well inspect every person that was employed in this work.

And of the Levites there were scribes, and officers, and porters.] These overseers were deputed to several employments; for which none so fit as the Levites, who understood all manner of things belonging to the house of God: being to do constant service there.

Ver. 14. And when they brought out the money that was brought into the house of the Lord.] And thereupon had begun the reparation of the house.

Hilkiah the priest found a book of the law of the Lord given by Moses.] The word given is not in the Hebrew: which must be applied not to the book, but to the law of the Lord given by Moses. For we cannot certainly from hence conclude, that this was the very authentic book which Moses laid up by the ark; (see 2 Kings xxii. 8.) because in the Hebrew it is said the book of the law of the Lord by the hand of Moses. Which doth not signify the book was written by his own hand, but that the law therein contained was delivered to the people by the ministry of Moses. So the phrase, by the hand, is used in very many places, Exod. xxxv. 29. Lev. x. 11. xxvi. 45. Numb. iv. 37. 45, &c. (See 2 Kings xviii. 8. and in this book, xxxv. 6.)

Ver. 15. And Hilkiah answered and said to Shaphan the scribe, I have found the book of the law in the house of the Lord. And Hilkiah delivered the book to Shaphan.] Who read it, 2 Kings xxii. 9.

Ver. 16. And Shaphan carried the book to the king, and brought the king word back again, saying, All that was committed to thy servants, they do it.] When he came to give an account to the king, how he had executed his command, (ver. 8, 9, &c.) he delivered the book to him.

Ver. 17. And they have gathered together the money that was found in the house of the Lord, and have delivered it into the hand of the overseers, and to the hand of the workmen.] See 2 Kings xxii. 9.

Ver. 18. Then Shaphan the scribe told the king, saying, Hilkiah the priest hath given me a book. And Shaphan read it before the king.

Ver. 19. And it came to pass, when the king had heard the words of the law, that he rent his clothes.] These two verses are word for word in 2 Kings xxii. 10, 11. where I have explained them. I shall only here add, that Jacobus Capellus thinks, the reading of the law, on every sabbath and festival (which was divided for that purpose into several sections), was as old as the time of Joshua; but was neglected in the reign of wicked kings, particularly in that of Ahaz. If it were again restored by Hezekiah (which is uncertain), it was again abolished by Manasseh; and perhaps not renewed when he repented: howsoever, discontinued again by Amon. So that both priests and people, omitting the reading of the law, both publicly and privately (for the public omission caused a private neglect), no wonder, that upon finding the book of the law, and hearing it read, they were startled at it; as if one were risen from the dead, (Histor. Sacra et Exotica, ad A. Mundi 3372.)

Ver. 20. And the king commanded Hilkiah, and Ahikam the son of Shaphan, and Abdon the son of Micah, and Shaphan the scribe, and Asaiah a servant of the king's, saying.] He that is called here Abdon, is in 2 Kings xxii. 12. called Achbor: otherwise there is no difference between this verse and that.

Ver. 21. Go, inquire of the Lord for me, and for them that are left in Israel and in Judah, concerning the words of the book that is found: for great is the wrath of the Lord that is poured out upon us, because our fathers have not kept the word of the Lord, to do after all that is written in this book.

Ver. 22. And Hilkiah, and they that the king had appointed, went to Huldah the prophetess, the wife of Shallum, the son of Tikvath, the son of Hasrah, keeper of the wardrobe (now she dwelt in Jerusalem in the college); and they spake to her to that effect.

Ver. 23. And she answered them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Tell ye the man that sent you to me,

Ver. 24. Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring evil upon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curses that are written in the book which they have read before the king of Judah:

Ver. 25. Because they have forsaken me, and have burned incense unto other gods, that they might provoke me to anger with all the works of their hands; therefore my wrath shall be poured out upon this place, and shall not be quenched.

Ver. 26. And as for the king of Judah, who sent you to inquire of the Lord, so shall ye say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, concerning the words which thou hast heard,

Ver. 27. Because thine heart was tender, and thou didst humble thyself before God, when thou heardest his words against this place, and against the inhabitants thereof, and humbledst thyself before me, and didst rend thy clothes, and weep before me; I have even heard thee also, saith the Lord.

Ver. 28. Behold, I will gather thee to thy fathers, and thou shalt be gathered to thy grave in peace, neither shall thine eyes see all the evil that I will bring upon this place, and upon the inhabitants of the same. So they brought the king word again.

There is little difference in the words between these verses and 2 Kings xxii. 14, 15, &c. and none in the sense. He that is called there Harhas, is here called Hasrah (some pronouncing his name one way, and some another). And the Targum translates those words, (ver. 27.) Thou didst humble thyself before God, &c. in this manner: Thou didst humble thyself before the Word of the Lord, when thou didst hear his words against this place. Which plainly suppose the Word to be a Divine Person, who spake to Moses, and gave him the law.

Ver. 29. Then the king sent and gathered together all the elders of Judah and Jerusalem.] See 2 Kings xxiii. 1.

Ver. 30. And the king went up into the house of the Lord, and all the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and the priests, and the Levites.] In 2 Kings xxiii. 2. it is said, the priests and the prophets went up. The Levites are omitted there, as the prophets are omitted here: but both make up a complete narrative of the persons that went up to the house of the Lord: For among the priests and Levites there were some prophets, such as Jeremiah, Zephaniah, and others.

And all the people, great and small; and he read in their ears all the words of the book of the covenant that was found in the house of the Lord.] One cannot think that Josiah and all the nation were wholly strangers to the words contained in this book (though perhaps they seldom had read it), who considers that Jeremiah and other prophets were now living, who were very conversant in this book, and instructed the people out of it. But they did not sufficiently attend to the words of it; and therefore Josiah gathered a solemn assembly on purpose, that they might hear it read, and be moved to observe that which most affected them. But it is not to be supposed that the whole book was all read at one time, but by parcels at several times, that they might consider and weigh it. Especially that passage in Deut. xxviii. 38. where Moses foretold the captivity of Samaria, and afterward of Judah and their king: which, Kimchi thinks, Hilkiah might bid Shaphan take special notice of, and read it to the king, which (if it be true) no doubt, he remarked to the people, that, if it were possible, they might be brought to repentance, and prevent the great calamities which were threatened to them.

Ver. 31. And the king stood in his place, and made a covenant before the Lord, to walk after the Lord, and to keep his commandments, and his testimonies, and his statutes, with all his heart, and with all his soul, to perform the words of the covenant which are written in this book.] See 2 Kings xxiii. 3.

Ver. 32. And he caused all that were present in Jerusalem and Benjamin to stand to it. And the inhabitants of Jerusalem did according to the covenant of God, the God of their fathers.] He did not compel them, but they offered themselves freely, upon his persuasion, to renew their covenant with God, and promised to be firm to it: which, perhaps, at that time they really resolved; though they soon revolted.

Ver. 33. And Josiah took away all the abominations out of all the countries that pertained to the children of Israel.

This is more largely related in 2 Kings xxiii. 4—6. and the following verses.

And made all that were present in Israel to serve, even to serve the Lord their God.] He persuaded them to perform all acts of religious worship unto God, and unto none else.

And all his days they departed not from following the Lord, the God of their fathers.] But though he suppressed all external idolatry, yet in their hearts they strongly inclined to it, and often practised it, as appears from Jer. iii. 10. xxv. 3, 4, &c.

CHAP. XXXV.

Ver. 1. MOREOVER, Josiah kept a Passover unto the Lord in Jerusalem.] This was in the eighteenth year of his reign, immediately after he had made a glorious reformation, by abolishing all idolatry. And accordingly it is related next to that in 2 Kings xxiii. 21—23. but very briefly, as the other is very largely.

And they killed the passover on the fourteenth day of the first month.] At the time prescribed by the law, Exod. xii. 6. For there was no need, it seems, to adjourn it till the second, as they did in the days of Hezekiah.

Ver. 2. And he set the priests in their charges, and encouraged them to the service of the house of the Lord.] To do their duty in their several places, so that nothing might be omitted, which was required to be done at this great festival.

Ver. 3. And said unto the Levites that taught all Israel, which were holy unto the Lord.] That is, the Levites were holy unto the Lord. And therefore may be rendered, and were holy, &c. i. e. peculiarly dedicated to this service of ministering to the priests, and instructing the people.

Put the holy ark in the house which Solomon, the son of David king of Israel, did build.] Jarchi thinks that Manasseh, or his son Amon, had removed the ark from its place, as other enormous things had been done by such wicked kings (2 Kings xvi. 14. xxviii. 24. of this book), which may give a more probable sense of those words, xxxiii. 23. that Amon trespassed more and more, than that which some of the Jews mention: for it was a great addition to his sin, if he displaced the ark. Other Jews, indeed, interpret it after another manner, and make a fable out of these words, as Const. L'Empereur observes upon Codex Middoth, p. 97. and Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, p. 91. But nothing is more natural than to think that Hilkiah himself had removed the ark while the temple was repairing, there being defects in the most holy place as well as other parts of it: and it was not fit to let the ark be exposed to the workmen. Yet Jacobus Capellus thinks it better to say, the word tenu ought not to be translated put, but keep, or look after, the ark in the house which Solomon built. For now, that they were eased of carrying it on their shoulders, they ought to employ themselves more carefully in all other offices about it; ad A. Mundi 3374.

It shall not be a burden upon your shoulders.] That is, hereafter: for they were to carry it to a settled place, there to remain; and then they would be obliged no further to bear it on their shoulders, as they had done before it was fixed in the temple.

Serve now the Lord your God, and his people Israel.] Serve God in singing, and playing upon instruments, when the sacrifices of God's people are offered, and you shall be excused from your former burdens.

Ver. 4. And prepare yourselves by the houses of your fathers, after your courses, according to the writing of David king of Israel.] See 1 Chron. xxiii. xxiv. and the following chapters.

And according to the writing of Solomon his son.] See 2 Chron. viii. 14.

Ver. 5. And stand in the holy place.] In the court of the priests, where they were wont to stand when they ministered unto God.

According to the divisions of the families of the fathers of your brethren the people.] Who were to bring for every family a lamb, as Moses commanded, Exod. xii. 3.

And after the division of the families of the Levites.] Who were appointed to kill the lamb for them.

Ver. 6. So kill the passover, and sanctify yourselves, and prepare your brethren.] That they might be capable to eat of it.

That they may do according to the word of the Lord by the hand of Moses.] Who commanded it to be eaten in one house, Exod. xii. 46. He seems to require, that as the rest of the tribes came according to their families, into which they were divided; so the Levites would give them a good example, and come according to their families.

Ver. 7. And Josiah gave to the people, of the flock, lambs and kids.] For the lamb might be taken either from the sheep or from the goats, (Exod. xii. 5.)

All for the Passover-offerings, for all that were present, to the number of thirty thousand.] That the people might be at no charge: at least thirty thousand families were provided for, at the king's charge.

And three thousand bullocks: these were of the king's substance.] These bullocks were for offerings upon the seven days of unleavened bread which followed the Passover.

Ver. 8. And his princes gave willingly unto the people, to the priests, and to the Levites.] As Josiah provided paschal lambs for the people, so some great men provided not only for them, but for the priests and the Levites, that they also might offer without charge.

Hilkiah, and Zechariah, and Jehiel.] It appears by these words, that the princes here mentioned were not rulers of the people, but the chief of the priests. For Hilkiah was the high-priest; and the other two were the heads of the two great families of the priests, Eleazar and Ithamar: who are called the captains of the host, as I observed upon 1 Chron. xxv. 1. (See my annotations there.) This is a little more largely and distinctly expressed by Bertram, in his Republica Judaica, cap. 15. where he saith, Zechariah was the chief among the second priests of the race of Eleazar, who was properly called Nagid, the captain of the temple: as Jehiel was the most illustrious person among the second priests, who were the progeny of Ithamar, and was properly called Pakid; and was set over the Gershonites and Merarites, as Zechariah was over the Kohathites.

Rulers of the house of God.] Who were the same with those who in the New Testament are called the στρατηγοὶ of the temple, who governed the rest of the priests. (So Bertram, de Republica Judaica, p. 296. 300.)

Gave unto the priests for the Passover-offerings two thousand and six hundred small cattle.] That is, lambs and kids.

And three hundred oxen.] That through the whole festival they might be able to rejoice with their brethren.

Ver. 9. Conaniah also, and Shemaiah, and Nathaneel, his brethren, and Hashabiah, and Jeiel, and Jozabad, chief of the Levites.] Who were men of estates, as well as in great offices among their brethren.

Gave unto the Levites for Passover-offerings five thousand small cattle, and five hundred oxen.] That they might be provided for as well as the priests, to make it a time of universal joy.

Ver. 10. So the service was prepared, and the priests stood in their place, and the Levites in their courses, according to the king's commandment.] All things were disposed for the offering the paschal sacrifice; the priests standing in their place, and the Levites attending them.

Ver. 11. And they killed the passover.] That is, the Levites killed the lamb, and gave the blood to the priests.

And the priests sprinkled the blood from their hands.] For they alone could perform this part of the service.

And the Levites flayed them.] That the priests might have nothing to do, but to sprinkle the blood of every one of them: which took up a great deal of time. (See xxix. 34.)

Ver. 12. And they removed the burnt-offerings, that they might give according to the divisions of the families of the people, to offer unto the Lord, as it is written in the book of Moses.] It seems, some of the lambs were given by Josiah for burnt-offerings: and these they dispatched as fast as they could, that they might give the paschal lamb to every family according to their divisions, after it had been offered to the Lord. For this was the principal offering upon this day.

And so they did with the oxen.] All of which were not given for peace-offerings, but some for burnt-offerings: which they also offered as fast as they could, that they might not hinder the paschal lamb from being offered.

Ver. 13. And they roasted the passover with fire, according to the ordinance.] See Exod. xii. 8, 9.

But the other holy offerings sod they in pots, and in caldrons, and in pans.] Though the paschal lamb was to be roasted; yet the other eucharistical sacrifices which attended it (as the Targum expounds it) might be boiled in water.

And divided them speedily among all the people.] Gave every one of the people a portion of the oxen that were offered for peace-offerings: and did it so speedily, that they had time to take care of themselves, as it here follows.

Ver. 14. And afterward they made ready for themselves, and for the priests: because the priests the sons of Aaron were busied in offering burnt-offerings and the fat until night; therefore the Levites prepared for themselves, and for the priests the sons of Aaron.] This is a great instance of the zeal and diligence of the priests, for whom the principal persons among them had made a large provision; but they did not eat of the paschal lamb nor of the peace-offerings till night, being employed in offering burnt-sacrifices, and burning the fat till that time: against which the Levites prepared for them and for themselves.

Ver. 15. And the singers, the sons of Asaph, were in their place, according to the commandment of David, and Asaph, and Heman, and Jeduthun the king's seer; and the porters waited at every gate: they might not depart from their service; for their brethren the Levites prepared for them.] This seems to import, that the singing and music continued till all the sacrifices were offered, that is, till night; and none were suffered to depart from the service, the porters standing at every gate to hinder them, if they attempted it. And their brethren, who were not singers, took care to provide for them their portion, when they had done.

Ver. 16. So all the service of the Lord was prepared the same day to keep the Passover, and to offer burnt-offerings upon the altar of the Lord, according to the commandment of king Josiah.

Ver. 17. And the children of Israel that were present kept the Passover at that time, and the feast of unleavened bread seven days.] These two verses are a summary account of what went before, that the whole solemnity was performed in every part of it, according to the king's direction.

Ver. 18. And there was no Passover like to that kept in Israel, from the days of Samuel the prophet.] We do not read in the book of Samuel of any Passover kept in his days; therefore the book wherein this was recorded is lost, as many other books of the prophets are.

Neither did all the kings of Israel keep such a Passover as Josiah kept, and the priests and the Levites, and all Judah and Israel that were present, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem.] The last clause shews wherein his Passover went beyond all other. David and Solomon were greater kings than he, and in several respects kept greater festivals; the number of people, while the ten tribes were united to the other two, being greater, and the multitude of sacrifices also greater: but in this Josiah excelled them all, that being nothing so rich, he was notwithstanding so liberal, as to provide all the sacrifices for the priests, the Levites, and the people, at this feast.

Ver. 19. In the eighteenth year of the reign of Josiah was this Passover kept.] In the same year wherein he repaired the house of God, and the book of the law was found and brought to him; which, it is likely, put him in mind of this duty; chap. xxxiv. 8.

Ver. 20. After all this, when Josiah had prepared the temple.] Some time after the temple was repaired, and made fit for the service of God, and they expected great happiness to ensue such pious works, there was an unexpected change: which is here noted, to teach us not to be confident, nor rashly enterprise any thing, remembering the vicissitude of all earthly things.

Necho king of Egypt.] Whom the Targum calls Pharaoh the Lame, and so Kimchi, who saith he was lame in his feet, and thence called by the name of Claudus, as the Romans would have expressed it: who, from the like disposition of their bodies, gave names to their emperors; such as Crassus, Barbarosa, and others, as Beckius observes. This lameness proceeded from some wound he had received, for Necho signifies wounded.

Came up to fight against Carchemish by Euphrates.] The city Carcusium stood upon that river, and belonged to the Assyrians, with whose king Necho came to fight, (2 Kings xxiii. 29.)

And Josiah went out against him.] See what I have noted there; unto which I shall here add, that by this it seems probable Josiah was in friendship with the king of Assyria, to whose assistance he seems to have voluntarily gone with his forces, by giving a diversion to the Egyptians. Certain it is, the Assyrian empire was not yet fallen; for in Josiah's days the prophet Zephaniah foretells the destruction of Nineveh, (chap. ii. 13, &c.) Now Josiah reigned in the time of Cyaxarus king of the Medes, by whom Nineveh was destroyed, as Herodotus tells us. But it was then in a flourishing condition, for Phraortis, the predecessor of Cyaxarus, not contented with the kingdom of the Medes, but invading the Assyrians, after he had subdued the Persians, was defeated, and lost a vast army before Nineveh: which Hermannus Conringius thinks might possibly move Josiah to court the king of Assyria's favour, by opposing himself to the king of Egypt when he came to invade him. But a most judicious person in this kind of learning (whom I have often consulted) thinks this all wrong; and that though Nineveh was not yet destroyed, yet the empire was, in the eighteenth year of Josiah; from which some governor got some little part, and kept Nineveh till it was destroyed by Nabopolassar, in the first year of his reign. Therefore I should have said Josiah was a friend of the king of Babylon, rather than of the king of Assyria. But I must leave those that are better skilled than I am in these matters to judge of them.

Ver. 21. But he sent ambassadors to him, saying, What have I to do with thee, thou king of Judah? I come not against thee this day, but against the house wherewith I have war.] He had no controversy with him, and therefore prays him not to meddle in this war.

For God commanded me to make haste.] And therefore desires him not to give him any stop in his expedition. Some think he only pretended this, because he knew Josiah had a great reverence to God, and in obedience to him might desist from his purpose: and the Targum, with some of the Jews, thinks he calls his own idol by the name of God; though Kimchi thinks he speaks of the true God; who perhaps admonished him in a dream, as he did Abimelech, or sent him such a message by the prophet Jeremiah (as Grotius supposes), many of whose prophecies are directed to foreign nations: or, perhaps, he meant, that he felt a strong impulse unto this undertaking, which he took to be from God.

Forbear thee from meddling with God, who is with me, that he destroy thee not.] Of which there was great danger, if he opposed the Divine command.

Ver. 22. Nevertheless Josiah would not turn his face from him, but disguised himself that he might fight with him.] And not be known to be the king of Judah.

And hearkened not unto the words of Necho from the mouth of God.] The Targum thinks that Josiah regarded not what Necho said, because he thought he spake only from his idol, for he could not imagine that the God of Israel had spoken to him. But these words import the contrary, and therefore Josiah should at least have inquired of God, whether it was his mind that he should not oppose Necho.

And came to fight in the valley of Megiddo.] A place in the tribe of Manasseh, (Josh. xvii. 11.) So that Josiah may seem to have come against him, because he passed through his country without his leave: but I rather think, as I said before, he was in the interests of the king of Assyria. I observed upon 2 Kings xxiii. 29. that Herodotus tells the same story, but mistakes the name of Megiddo, and calls it Magdolim; which was a great city in Egypt, better known to him than the cities in Syria or Phœnicia. He also adds, that after this battle the king of Egypt took the great city in Syria called Cadytus: which Herm. Conringius thinks was the name of Jerusalem among the old Egyptians: (Adversaria Chronolog. cap. 15.) I think Jacobus Capellus hath well observed (in his Hist. Sacra et Exotica), that the Egyptians, being a vain people, concealed from Herodotus, when he came to consult the affairs of their country, many things that were true, and imposed upon his belief many things that were false. For example, they did not tell him a word of the victory which Nebuchadnezzar got over Pharaoh-Nechoh at Euphrates; but gloried in this victory over the Syrians: ad A. Mundi 3425.

Ver. 23. And the archers shot at king Josiah: and the king said to his servants, Have me away; for I am sore wounded.] His disguise did not secure him; for still he appeared, I suppose, as a great commander, at whom the enemy would sooner aim than at common men.

Ver. 24. His servants therefore took him out of that chariot, and put him in the second chariot that he had.] As all great captains have led horses, that if one fail they may mount another: (which was the custom in wars in ancient time, as Bochart shews in his Hieroz. par. i. cap. 2. 9.) so when they fought in chariots they had an empty one following them, into which they might go if the other proved unserviceable or inconvenient.

And they brought him to Jerusalem, and he died, and was buried in one of the sepulchres of his fathers: and all Judah and Jerusalem mourned for Josiah.] After the example of the prophet Jeremiah. For as bad as they shewed themselves afterward to be, they had some sense of the great worth of this prince.

Ver. 25. And Jeremiah lamented for Josiah; and all the singing-men and singing-women spake of Josiah in their lamentations to this day.] Whensoever they bewailed any calamity, they mentioned that as the greatest that had befallen them.

And made them an ordinance in Israel.] That they should never forget this fatal stroke, after which they never saw good days. This statute was made by the supreme authority, and was approved by the prophet Jeremiah, who joined in this lamentation; which warrants Christian kings and princes to appoint days for the yearly commemoration of great calamities, or great deliverances.

And, behold, they are written in the Lamentations.] Josephus in his tenth book of the Antiquities of the Jews, chap. 6. imagines the book of the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which now remains in the Bible, contains the mournful ditties sung at Josiah's funeral, and in aftertimes; which opinion St. Jerome follows; at least in those words Lament. iv. 20. R. Solomon thinks Josiah was bewailed: but it is manifest all this is a mistake; for that book was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, which is lamented in it, and the words now mentioned plainly relate to Zedekiah, not to Josiah; who was not taken but killed. Therefore the Lamentations here mentioned are lost, which were written immediately after Josiah was slain.

Ver. 26. Now the rest of the acts of Josiah, and his goodness, &c.] That is, his piety, or (as we translate it in the margin) his kindnesses, that is, his great love to his people, of which there are great instances in the foregoing part of this history.

According to that which was written in the law of the Lord.] Which he made his rule in all that he did.

Ver. 27. And his deeds, first and last, behold, they are written in the book of the Kings of Israel and Judah.] It seems the Israelites, who were left in the land of Samaria, continued to keep records of what was done in the land of Judah itself.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Ver. 1. THEN the people of the land took Jehoahaz the son of Josiah, and made him king in his father's stead in Jerusalem.] Not by right of succession, but by a faction of the people.

Ver. 2. Jehoahaz was twenty and three years old when he began to reign; and he reigned three months in Jerusalem.] See 2 Kings xxiii. 30, 31.

Ver. 3. And the king of Egypt put him down at Jerusalem, and condemned the land in a hundred talents of silver, and a talent of gold.] He heard, it is possible, that he meditated revenge for the death of his father, and therefore deposed him; and also set a great fine upon the people who joined with him. (See 2 Kings xxiii. 33.)

Ver. 4. And the king of Egypt made Eliakim his brother king over Judah and Jerusalem, and turned his name to Jehoiakim.] As a mark he was made king by him, and owed his dignity to his favour. So Pharaoh changed the name of Joseph; and Nebuchadnezzar, the names of Daniel and his three companions.

And Necho took Jehoahaz his brother, and carried him to Egypt.] See 2 Kings xxiii. 34.

Ver. 5. Jehoiakim was twenty and five years old when he began to reign; and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem: and he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord his God.] See 2 Kings xxiii. 36, 37.

Ver. 6. Against him came up Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon.] The first words against him are emphatical; for when he came up before, he did not come up properly against Jerusalem, but against Pharaoh-Nechoh. And therefore it is said, not that he came up against that city, but merely that he "came up into the land," (Jer. xxxv. 11.) when he made Jehoiakim his servant three years. So that his coming up had no other effect but to make him tributary to Nebuchadnezzar.

And bound him in fetters, to carry him to Babylon.] See 2 Kings xxiv. 1, &c. The Targum expounds it, He put brazen chains upon his hands and fetters upon his legs. But he did not carry him to Babylon, for Nebuchadnezzar altered his mind, and permitted him to reign at Jerusalem as his tributary; though he carried away, as it follows, some of the vessels of the temple, and also certain choice persons, as we read in the first of Daniel.

Ver. 7. Nebuchadnezzar also carried of the vessels of the house of the Lord to Babylon, and put them in his temple at Babylon.] He carried away a great many in the next king's reign, (2 Kings xxiv. 13, 14.) but it seems he began to do it in this. And they were so hardened, as to believe those false prophets, who assured them these vessels should shortly be brought again from Babylon, and give no credit to Jeremiah, who told them they prophesied a lie; for these vessels should be so far from being brought from Babylon, that all the remaining vessels should be carried after them, and there be till the day when God visited them. (See Jer. xxvii. 16, 17. 21, 22.)

Ver. 8. Now the rest of the acts of Jehoiakim, and his abominations which he did, and that which was found in him, behold, they are written in the book of the Kings of Israel and Judah.] There was a book, it is likely, that had this title; but what was said there to be found of him, is not here mentioned. The Targum saith, the iniquity that was found in him. But what was that iniquity? To this they answer in the Talmud, that he had the name of an idol in his forehead; or, as others say, there were found in his body certain marks and impressions in honour of idols. So St. Jerome, He had made those marks in his body, which God had forbidden in Lev. xix. 28. (See our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. de Leg. et Rit. Hebr. cap. 14. sect. 2.) But there are those that think it is meant of the innocent blood that he shed, (2 Kings xxiv. 4.) But that was the sin of Manasseh; therefore the plainest meaning is, that he was found guilty of disloyal intentions against the king of Babylon, which he concealed a great while, but at last they were discovered, (2 Kings xxiv. 1.)

And Jehoiachin his son reigned in his stead.

Ver. 9. Jehoiachin was eight years old when he began to reign.] In 2 Kings xxiv. 8. it is said, that he was eighteen years old when he began to reign. See my annotations on that place: unto which may be added, that Abarbinel thinks there is no difference between these two places; but that the word for eight is governed by another that is wanting, signifying ten. But the common solution is, that when his father had reigned one year, he made his son joint sovereign with him, that the people might be settled in their affection to him before he left the throne, which was ten years after. So long he reigned with his father, and eight years alone, which made eighteen years in all. (See Buxtorf, in his Vindiciæ Hebr. Veritatis, par. ii. cap. 2. p. 408.) But there are those who take the meaning to be, that he was eight years old, when he (that is, his father) began to reign: or, as our primate Usher thinks, it was the eighth year, not of his age, but of the captivity of Babylon, to which some principal persons were obnoxious, (Chronologia Sacra, pag. ult.) But some great men think here is an error of the copyist, for he was eighteen years old.

And he reigned three months and ten days in Jerusalem: and he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord.] It seems Nebuchadnezzar repented of his making him king; being afraid, as Kimchi thinks, that by the evil counsel of his courtiers, he would be persuaded to rebel, after the example of Jehoiakim. Jacobus Capellus thinks the people set him up to be their king; and therefore he resolved to dethrone him, sending his servants against him, and then coming himself and taking Jerusalem. (See 2 Kings xxiv. 10, 11.)

Ver. 10. And when the year was expired, king Nebuchadnezzar sent and brought him to Babylon, with the goodly vessels of the house of the Lord, and made Zedekiah his brother king over Judah and Jerusalem.] See 2 Kings xxiv. 11, 12. For God had threatened none of Jehoiakim's seed should sit upon the throne of David. They might be set upon his throne, as the same Capellus observes, but not remain or continue possessed of it. "Sedere enim dicuntur, non transitoria, sed quæ aliquamdiu pedem figunt," ad

Ver. 11. Zedekiah was one-and-twenty years old when he began to reign; and reigned eleven years in Jerusalem.] See 2 Kings xxiv. 18.

Ver. 12. And he did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord his God, and humbled not himself before Jeremiah the prophet, speaking from the mouth of the Lord.] From the mouth of the Word of the Lord, saith the Targum: which shews, that by the Word here he meant a Divine person. It is a wonderful thing, that having seen so many of the people carried away captive, together with their king Jehoiakim, they should not at all relent, but go on in those ways which had led others to destruction. But so incorrigible were this people, that Ezekiel tells us, they who were carried away captive (among whom he was one) persisted in their rebellion, and were not at all amended. His whole book is full of complaints of their impenitence. And in the thirteenth chapter he tells us, they still entertained false prophets (unto whom they hearkened rather than to Ezekiel), who saw visions of peace for Jerusalem, when there was no peace; as he there speaks, ver. 16. that is, made the people believe Jerusalem should not be taken; and so hardened their hearts in their obstinate wickedness.

Ver. 13. And he also rebelled against king Nebuchadnezzar, who made him swear by God.] That he would be true and faithful to him.

But he stiffened his neck, and hardened his heart from turning unto the Lord God of Israel.] His wickedness was so great, that God gave him up to commit this further crime of perjury, to his utter ruin, (2 Kings xxiv. 20.)

Ver. 14. Moreover, all the chief of the priests and the people transgressed very much, after all the abominations of the heathen; and polluted the house of the Lord, which he had hallowed in Jerusalem.] There was such an universal corruption, and that to such an abominable height, that there was no hope of their growing better, they being perfectly ripe for utter destruction.

Ver. 15. And the Lord God of their fathers sent to them by his messengers, rising up betimes, and sending.] To rise betimes signifies in Scripture to do a thing with care, diligence, and affection: for good husbands, especially fathers of families (from whom this expression is borrowed), were wont to get up early to look after their business, and to quicken and encourage their servants to their duty. Such was the compassion and care of God for his people, that he gave them seasonable, timely, and early admonitions to their duty, and notice of their danger, before it was too late.

Because he had compassion on his people, and on his dwelling-place.] To this compassion they owed a succession of prophets in every king's reign, as I have before noted, who most earnestly called upon them to reform. Yet, if they did in a good king's reign grow something better, they immediately revolted as soon as he was dead, and a bad one came in his place. Such a strange propension they had to idolatry: which is the more wonderful, when we consider, that this nation, which was so prone to idolatry, when they had so many prophets among them to admonish them against it, were not at all inclined to it, when they had no more any prophets to instruct them, nor any miracles wrought among them; that is, after their return from the captivity of Babylon, when prophecy in a little time ceased; and yet they were steadfast in the service of God, according to the law of Moses. The best account that I am able to give of this is, that before the captivity sufficient care was not taken for the building of synagogues for the teaching of the law, if there were any at all; for we find no mention of them in these books: whereas they abounded in every place after the captivity; insomuch, that the Jews say, there were several hundreds in Jerusalem alone, wherein the law was read and taught, which was a most powerful means to keep them constant to the religion they professed: for, as Josephus reports, by this means the people came to be so acquainted with their laws, that if any person asked any of them concerning them, ῥᾷον ἂν εἴποι πάντα, ἢ τούνομα τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ, he would more readily tell every thing, than his own name.

Ver. 16. But they mocked the messengers of God, and despised his words, and misused his prophets.] As the corruption was universal, so they were incorrigible; not only rejecting, but despising, and setting at nought, the means of their cure.

Until the wrath of the Lord arose against his people, till there was no remedy.] Till the implacable wrath of God came upon them; there being no hope they would repent, and be healed, but they must die and perish.

Ver. 17. Therefore he brought upon them the king of the Chaldees, who slew their young men with the sword in the house of their sanctuary.] Unto which, it is likely, they fled for safety, after the manner of all nations, who took their holy places to be inviolable: but they found no protection there; the Chaldees being a rough nation, and having no regard to them.

And had no compassion upon young man or maiden, old man, or him that stooped for age; he gave them all into his hand.] To kill them, or sell them for slaves; as he thought good.

Ver. 18. And all the vessels of the house of God, great and small.] Which are numbered in the next book, Ezra i. 9—11.

And the treasures of the house of the Lord, and the treasures of the king, and of his princes; all these he brought to Babylon.] The former treasures, by a special providence of God, were preserved, and restored in the reign of Cyrus to the house of the Lord: but the other, it is likely, were looked upon as spoil, and spent by the king and his great men.

Ver. 19. And they burnt the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the palaces thereof with fire, and destroyed all the goodly vessels thereof.] See 2 Kings xxv. 9, 10. But it is a very absurd supposition of some, who think that all the sacred books were now also burnt, and restored again by Ezra after the captivity out of his memory. For who can believe, that among all the priests, and prophets too, that were carried captive, none of them should take care to carry a Bible with them? Jeremiah also remaining in the land, we may be confident was not without it. It is plain also, that Daniel had his prophecy, and the books of Moses, in Babylon, (Dan. ix. 2, 3.) And Josephus says that Cyrus was shewn the prophecy of Isaiah, wherein his name was expressly mentioned: which shews, they had copies of these books in their captivity. But this extravagant fable was brought upon the stage by the apocryphal Esdras, (chap. xiv.) and was not known till the beginning of the third century, when that author, half Jew and half Christian, lived.

Ver. 20. And them that had escaped from the sword carried he away to Babylon, where they were servants to him and his sons until the reign of the kingdom of Persia.] Which gave them liberty to return to their country. Such was the law of war in ancient times; all the people of a city or country that were conquered became slaves to the conqueror; and appertained to the public or private persons who had taken them, according to the laws settled in every nation for the dividend of the booty. Thus we find at the sacking of Troy, all that remained alive were made slaves, even queen Hecuba, and her daughters. The Greek and Roman histories are full of such examples.

Ver. 21. To fulfil the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah, until the land had enjoyed her sabbaths: for as long as she lay desolate she kept sabbath.] Because the Jews, among other precepts, had violated that of letting their land rest from ploughing and sowing every seventh year, God gave their land a long sabbath, or rest, for no less than ten times seven years; which Jeremiah threatened, chap. xxv. 9. 12. xxix. 10. If it be true, that they had neglected this law for the space of four hundred and thirty years; but had ploughed their ground, &c. in the seventh, as well as in all other years; then the judgment of God upon them was very remarkable, in making their ground rest, and be free from tillage, just as long as it should have been if they had observed his law: for in the space of four hundred and thirty years, there ought to have been sixty and five years of rest and intermission. (See Gulielmus Vorstius, upon David Ganz's Tzemuch David, p. 212.)

To fulfil threescore and ten years.] These years ended in the first or second year of Cyrus; but when they began is variously disputed. Hermannus Witsius hath lately argued strongly, that it was in the fourth year of Jehoiakim: for then Jeremiah said, The whole land shall be a desolation, and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years, chap. xxv. 11. which is further explained, ver. 17, 18. Which is the opinion also of Hermannus Conringius, in his Adversaria Chronologica, cap. 14. and of Johannes Vorstius, in his Exercitatio Secunda de Captivitate Babylonica; and thus our Usher, ad A. Mundi 3394. Though other great men date these seventy years from the captivity of Zedekiah. (See Scaliger, de Emend. Temporum, lib. vi. p. 575.)

Ver. 22. Now, in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia (that the word of the Lord, spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah, might be accomplished), the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus king of Persia, that he made the proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying,

Ver. 23. Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, All the kingdoms of the earth hath the Lord God of heaven given me; and he hath charged me to build him a house in Jerusalem, which is in Judah: who is there among you of all his people? the Lord his God be with him, and let him go up.] These two verses, which conclude this book, begin the next, where I will explain them; and only take notice here, that thus the Targum translates this proclamation: "Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, All the kingdoms of this earth hath the Word of the Lord God of heaven delivered unto me; and he commanded me to build him a sanctuary in Jerusalem," &c. Which evidently shews, this paraphrast believed the Word dwelt in the sanctuary.

THE BOOK OF EZRA.

IT is generally thought by all sorts of writers, that Ezra himself wrote this book which bears his name. And there is the less doubt of it, if he wrote the foregoing book: for he begins this book as that ended; which is an argument they had the same author: it being an ancient way of writing, as Grotius observes out of Polybius, who concludes one book, and begins the next with the same words. But the learned Huetius is of opinion, that Ezra did not write the first six chapters of this book, but some other person: for it is evident they were written in the time of Darius, when the author speaks of himself as then at Jerusalem, (chap. v. 3, 4. 9.) Whereas Ezra went up from Babylon in the reign of Artaxerxes, (chap. vii. 1.) and then it is manifest wrote the four remaining chapters, as appears from chap. vii. 27, 28. ix. 5. x. 1. Therefore, when the Talmudists and other Hebrew doctors say Ezra wrote this book, they are to be understood (he thinks) to speak of the latter part of it.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW, in the first year of Cyrus king of Persia.] This is that famous Cyrus, who, a hundred and forty years before the temple was destroyed, and two hundred years before he was born, was mentioned by name in the prophecy of Isaiah, as designed by God for the restoring his people, (Isa. xliv. ult. xlv. 1. 4.) Which prophecy, it is probable, Daniel shewed to Cyrus, which made him set forth the following edict: which was not put forth in the first year of his empire, for then the Jews were not his subjects, but the first year after his conquest of Babylon, where the Jews then lived in captivity. (See Scaliger, in his Isagoge, lib. iii. p. 260. and De Emend. Temporum, lib. vi. p. 576.)

(That the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremiah the prophet might be fulfilled).] Who foretold, that, after seventy years were accomplished, the king of Babylon and the Chaldeans should be destroyed, and the people of Judah restored to their own land, (see chap. xxv. 12. xxix. 10.)

The Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus king of Persia, that he made a proclamation throughout all his kingdom, and put it also in writing, saying.] God, who had so long ago designed him for this work, suggested these thoughts to him, and excited him to prosecute them; which he did, not only by causing his will and pleasure to be proclaimed, but to be put in writing, that none might mistake his meaning.

Ver. 2. Thus saith Cyrus king of Persia, The Lord God of heaven.] It is an observation of Mr. Mede, that as, before the captivity, when they spake of God they called him the Lord of hosts; so the constant style of the holy books after the captivity, is the God of heaven. As here, and chap. vi. 10. vii. 21. But it is a question, whether Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes, penned these writings themselves, wherein they proclaimed the God of the Jews to be the Lord God of heaven: or, whether they were drawn up by some of the Jews that attended upon them. It seems likely to me, that God, who raised up the spirit of Cyrus to be a peculiar instrument of the freeing his people from slavery, did enlighten his mind to understand that there was but one only God whom the Jews worshipped, and who spake in those holy books which were shewn him. And Artaxerxes might call the law of Moses the law of the God of heaven, knowing the Jews worshipped no other God, whose law this was.

Hath given me all the kingdoms of the earth.] That is, all those large dominions which the Assyrians and Babylonians had enjoyed.

And he hath charged me to build him a house at Jerusalem, which is in Judah.] So he understood from Isa. xlv. 13. where God saith of Cyrus, he shall build my city, of which the temple was the principal part: and more plainly, chap. xliv. 28. he shall say to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built; and to the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid. Josephus hath thus paraphrased upon these words, Ἐπεί με ὁ Θεὸς τῆς οἰκουμένης ἀπέδειξε Βασιλέα, &c. Because the greatest God hath constituted me the king of the world, I believe him to be he whom the people of Israel adore. For he foretold me king by his prophets, and that I should build his temple at Jerusalem, in the land of Judea.

Ver. 3. Who is there among you of all his people? &c.] Not of the Jews only, but of Israel also, who were under his government, the Assyrians and Medes being his subjects. And so Josephus (as I observed before) says, that Zerubbabel sent the edict of Cyrus into Media, to the rest of the ten tribes: to whom he not only makes a promulgation of liberty to go to their own country, but desires them to go, and prays God to be with them and prosper them in building God's house, whom he acknowledges to be the true and only God. This was a marvellous encouragement to them.

Ver. 4. And whosoever remaineth in any place where he sojourneth.] This seems to relate to such as were desirous to go up with their brethren, but were forced to stay behind for want of necessaries to support them in so long a journey.

Let the men of his place help him with silver, and with gold, and with goods, and with beasts.] He therefore requires his officers to furnish them with such things as they needed.

Besides the free-will-offering for the house of God that is in Jerusalem.] Which he supposed the richer sort of Jews would readily make to assist their poor brethren; though they themselves being well settled in Babylon, did not think fit to stir till they saw how these would succeed.

Ver. 5. Then rose up the chief of the fathers of Judah and Benjamin, and the priests, and the Levites, with all those whose spirits God had raised up.] There were some of other tribes besides Judah and Benjamin that went up, (1 Chron. ix. 3.) though these were the principal, who all needed a special motion from God to quicken and encourage them to this enterprise; the difficulties being so great which they were to encounter in a long journey, and their country lying waste when they came thither; this made those who had got possessions in Babylon to choose to stay there.

To build the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem.] This was the design, which people of great piety cheerfully undertook, that the public worship of the true God might be restored, whom they now worshipped only in private.

Ver. 6. And all they that were about them strengthened their hands with vessels of silver, with gold, with goods, and with beasts, and with precious things.] Such was the authority of the king, and such was the influence of God upon their hearts, that all their neighbours encouraged them to this work, and enabled them to undertake this journey to Jerusalem.

Besides all that was willingly offered.] Their brethren freely offered them their assistance, though they did not think fit to go along with them.

Ver. 7. Also Cyrus the king brought forth the vessels of the house of the Lord, which Nebuchadnezzar had brought forth out of Jerusalem, and had put them in the house of his gods.] Where by a singular providence they had been preserved till this time, being looked upon as sacred things, which Nebuchadnezzar would not turn to his own private use, but dedicated to his gods. Some think the ark was among the sacred things which Cyrus caused to be restored; but it should first be proved that it was carried away from Jerusalem to Babylon, which now here appears to be true. The argument they bring for it is, that in the second temple sacrifices were offered as in the first, and all solemn days observed, especially the great day of expiation, when the law ordained the blood should be sprinkled before the mercy-seat, which could not be done when there was none; and there was none, if there was no ark. But, as the Jews universally acknowledge, this was one of the five things wanting in the second temple; so, unless the Divine Glory had been there also, the ark would have signified little. Therefore it is more likely, that by the absence of these, God would signify, he was withdrawing his presence from that house of stone, to dwell in the temple of Christ's body: who offered himself to God, and thereby put an end to those figurative sacrifices.

Ver. 8. Even those did Cyrus king of Persia bring forth by the hand of Mithredath the treasurer.] This was a name frequent among the Persians, derived from their god Mithra: as Cyrus himself had his name (Hesychius saith) from the sun, which in their language was called Κῦρος.

And numbered them unto Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah.] Which was another name for Zerubbabel, mentioned chap. iii. 2. 8. v. 14. 16. For it was common in the time of the captivity for the great men of Judah to have two names: one of their own country, which was domestic; another of the Chaldeans, which was used at court. (Dan. i. 7.) Nehemiah had two names: and this of Sheshbazzar seems to have been a good omen of their flourishing condition; being compounded of two words, signifying fine linen and gold. On the contrary, Zerubbabel was a name importing the misery of the people of Israel at that time; for it is as much as an exile, or stranger, in Babylon, where he was born. Thus pious men, even in the midst of the honours they had at court (for, Josephus saith, Zerubbabel was one of the guard of the king's body), were admonished not to forget their brethren, but sympathize with them in their miseries.

Ver. 9. And this is the number of them: thirty chargers of gold, a thousand chargers of silver, nine-and-twenty knives.] See Dr. Lightfoot, of the Temple, p. 233, 234.

Ver. 10. Thirty basons of gold, silver basons of a second sort four hundred and ten, and other vessels a thousand.

Ver. 11. All the vessels of gold and of silver were five thousand and four hundred.] Here seems to be some difficulty: for all the vessels that are specially named, make no more in number than two thousand four hundred and ninety-nine. To which many think this a sufficient answer, that it is said in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 18. Nebuchadnezzar carried away all the vessels, both great and small. Now, in the account that is here given, the larger vessels only, which were of greater bigness and price, are mentioned: but the gross sum comprehends all, both great and small, and amounts to the number of five thousand and four hundred. But Tremellius solves this, by translating the last words of the former verse otherwise than we do; not of other vessels a thousand, but other vessels by thousands, viz. almost three thousand, wanting one hundred: which our Mr. Mede judges a true translation, in his Daniel's Weeks, book iii. p. 700.

All these did Sheshbazzar bring up with them of the captivity that were brought up from Babylon unto Jerusalem.] Which restoration of the Jews to their own land seems to be a greater miracle than the first conquest of it: for Joshua did that by force of arms; but these exiles recovered their country without any force at all; and were settled in it, notwithstanding many great impediments to hinder it.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. NOW these are the children of the province that went up out of the captivity.] Some by the province understand Babylon; in which these people were most of them born, and had all lived a long time. But I think it more likely to be meant of Judea, which was made a province when it was conquered, and Gedaliah constituted the governor of it; and in this book is called the province of Judea, chap. v. 8.

Of those which had been carried away, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away unto Babylon.] Their parents and ancestors had been carried away by him, and they in them.

And came again unto Jerusalem and Judah, every one unto his city.] See Jer. xxxii. 15. Nehem. xi. 3. Their land and their cities had been laid so desolate, and had been so long neglected, and were infested also by such bad neighbours, that it was a great piece of generosity in these men to return thither: and their names are recorded to the eternal honour of them, and of their posterity; they being the first planters of this country, after it had been laid waste.

Ver. 2. Which came with Zerubbabel: Jeshua, Nehemiah, Seraiah, Reelaiah, Mordecai, Bilshan, Mispar, Bigvai, Rehum, Baanah.] These were their heads, who undertook to conduct them: among whom Zerubbabel was the prince, or leader in chief; as Jeshua was high-priest, who is mentioned next to him. Nehemiah, who follows after him, is not the same, whose book comes after this: for he did not go now, but afterward; or, if he did, he returned to Babylon again. (See our famous Reynolds, in his Censure of the Apocryphal Books, prælect. cxi..cxviii.) Nor is it likely, that this Mordecai was the same with him that was Esther's cousin, but some other person; there being another of that name mentioned in the book of the Chronicles. (See the same Reynolds, prælect. cxlvii.)

The number of the men of the people of Israel.] They who were called the children of the province before, are now called the people of Israel: for from him they were derived, though most of them were of the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 3. The children of Parosh, two thousand a hundred seventy and two.] He begins first to reckon up the families that went up; of which this was one of the largest, descended from Parosh, who was their ancestor.

Ver. 4. The children of Shephatiah, three hundred seventy and two.] This was another family, descended from this man. The same is to be said of the rest.

Ver. 5. The children of Arah, seven hundred seventy and five.] So many gave in their names in Babylon, that they intended to return into Judea: but it appears by Nehem. vii. 10. that there came no more thither than six hundred fifty and two: therefore it is supposed, that the rest altered their minds, or died by the way. The same must be said of several other differences between this account and that in Nehemiah.

Ver. 6. The children of Pahath-Moab, of the children of Jeshua and Joab, two thousand eight hundred and twelve.] Here seems to be two families joined together, one from Pahath-Moab, the other from Jeshua-Joab (as the other may be translated), which both together make the greatest body of those that went up: and six more added themselves; for in Nehem. vii. 11. they are said to have been two thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

Ver. 7. The children of Elam, a thousand two hundred fifty and four.

Ver. 8. The children of Zattu, nine hundred forty and five.

Ver. 9. The children of Zaccai, seven hundred and threescore.

Ver. 10. The children of Bani, six hundred forty and two.

Ver. 11. The children of Bebai, six hundred twenty and three.

Ver. 12. The children of Azgad, a thousand two hundred twenty and two.

Ver. 13. The children of Adonikam, six hundred sixty and six.

Ver. 14. The children of Bigvai, two thousand fifty and six.

Ver. 15. The children of Adin, four hundred fifty and four.

Ver. 16. The children of Ater of Hezekiah, ninety and eight.

Ver. 17. The children of Bezai, three hundred twenty and three.

Ver. 18. The children of Jorah, a hundred and twelve.

Ver. 19. The children of Hashum, two hundred twenty and three.

Ver. 20. The children of Gibbar ninety and five.] Or, as it is in Nehem. vii. 25. the children of Gibeon; these being the citizens of that city. For this is not the name of a man, but of a place; and so are several that follow: which hath made some think, that the foregoing are not the names of men, but of cities, or countries, the people of which are called the children of such places; which is frequent in the Scripture language, where we read of the children of Zion, the children of Egypt, the children of the East, &c.

Ver. 21. The children of Beth-lehem, a hundred twenty and three.] These were such as belonged to that city; unto which they went up, (ver. 1.)

Ver. 22. The children of Netophah, fifty and six.] This was a town near to Beth-lehem.

Ver. 23. The men of Anathoth, a hundred twenty and eight.] A famous place in the tribe of Benjamin, where the prophet Jeremiah was born. But there are those who think it not improbable, that these were cities in the country of Babylon; which the Jews had built, and called by the names of those cities in their own country, from whence they were banished; of which they were desirous to preserve a remembrance. Thus the Spaniards at this day have cities in America, called Corduba, Granada, Carthagena, &c. that they may not suffer the memory of their ancient country to perish, when they were removed to a far distant land. But I see no ground for this.

Ver. 24. The children of Azmaveth, forty and two.] Or, of Beth-Azmaveth, as it is called Nehem. vii. 28.

Ver. 25. The children of Kirjath-arim, Chephirah, and Beeroth, seven hundred and forty and three.

Ver. 26. The children of Ramah and Gaba, six hundred twenty and one.] These seem to have been cities in the tribe of Benjamin: and so, it is likely, were the foregoing, and some of those that follow.

Ver. 27. The men of Michmas, a hundred twenty and two.

Ver. 28. The men of Beth-el and Ai, two hundred twenty and three.

Ver. 29. The children of Nebo, fifty and two.

Ver. 30. The children of Magbish, a hundred fifty and six.

Ver. 31. The children of the other Elam, a thousand two hundred fifty and four.] There is another Elam mentioned ver. 7. which argues the former to be the name of a town; from which the very same number of persons went up that there did from this.

Ver. 32. The children of Harim, three hundred and twenty.

Ver. 33. The children of Lod, Hadid, and Ono, seven hundred twenty and five.] These were three towns in the tribe of Benjamin, which make it probable Harim was so likewise.

Ver. 34. The children of Jericho, three hundred forty and five.

Ver. 35. The children of Senaah, three thousand and six hundred and thirty.] It is uncertain whether this be the name of a person, or of a place; but the greatest number of persons went from hence that did from any of the forementioned.

Ver. 36. The priests.] Having numbered the people that went from Judah and Benjamin, he proceeds now to the tribe of Levi; and first mentions the priests.

The children of Jedaiah, of the house of Jeshua, nine hundred seventy and three.] He is mentioned in 1 Chron. xxiv. 7. as a principal person among the priests. (See Dr. Lightfoot, p. 916.)

Ver. 37. The children of Immer, a thousand fifty and two.] He is mentioned also in 1 Chron. xxiv. 14. as head of one of the twenty-four courses of priests.

Ver. 38. The children of Pashur, a thousand two hundred forty and seven.] He is mentioned also 1 Chron. ix. 12.

Ver. 39. The children of Harim, a thousand and seventeen.] See 1 Chron. xxiv. 8. where he is mentioned as head of another course of the priests.

Ver. 40. The Levites: the children of Jeshua, and Kadmiel, of the children of Hodaviah, seventy and four.] See Nehem. vii. 43.

Ver. 41. The singers: the children of Asaph, a hundred twenty and eight.

Ver. 43. The Nethinims.] These are generally taken to be of the race of the Gibeonites; who being given to the service of the temple were called Nethinims, which imports as much as given. But this is a mistake, the Nethinims being those whom David gave to help the Levites, as I have observed before.

The children of Ziha, the children of Hasupha, the children of Tabbaoth.] It is not said how many came from each family: but it appears there were several families of them, and their whole number is mentioned in ver. 58.

Ver. 44. The children of Keros, the children of Siaha, the children of Padon.

Ver. 45. The children of Lebanah, the children of Hagabah, the children of Akkub.] The number of these families, and those that follow, is not set down particularly; but they are all comprehended in that sum mentioned ver. 58.

Ver. 46. The children of Hagab, the children of Shalmai, the children of Hanan.

Ver. 47. The children of Giddel, the children of Gahar, the children of Reaiah.

Ver. 48. The children of Rezin, the children of Nekoda, the children of Gazzam.

Ver. 49. The children of Uzza, the children of Paseah, the children of Besai.

Ver. 50. The children of Asnah, the children of Mehunim, the children of Nephusim.

Ver. 51. The children of Bakbuk, the children of Hakupha, the children of Harhur.

Ver. 52. The children of Bazluth, the children of Mehida, the children of Harsha.

Ver. 53. The children of Barkos, the children of Sisera, the children of Thamah.

Ver. 54. The children of Neziah, the children of Hatipha.

Ver. 55. The children of Solomon's servants.] These were a distinct people among the Jews; but it is uncertain who they were. Some take them to have been originally descended from slaves, whom Solomon took in war, and who afterward became proselytes. But there was no war in his days; therefore others think they were such of other nations as came to serve Solomon in servile work during the building of the temple; who being proselyted, he deputed them to the perpetual conservation and reparation of it; as Joshua had done the Gibeonites, to be hewers of wood and drawers of water there. Or, they were some of the relics of the Canaanites, who delivered up themselves to Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 20, 21. Whosoever they were, it appears from ver. 55. of this chapter, that they had the same employment with the Nethinims about the temple, or something like it; for they are numbered together with them.

The children of Sotai, the children of Sophereth, the children of Peruda.] These, and they that follow in the two next verses, are the families of the forenamed persons.

Ver. 57. The children of Shephatiah, the children of Hattil, the children of Pochereth of Zebaim, the children of Ami.

Ver. 58. All the Nethinims, and the children of Solomon's servants, were three hundred ninety and two.] This makes it probable, that the Nethinims and the children of Solomon's servants (as I said before), were employed in the same or the like employment; being both mentioned together: to whose honour it must be observed, that, though they were not of the children of Israel, and were despised by them (there being decrees made by the Sanhedrin, as the Jews tell us, that they should not marry with the Gibeonites, who they fancy are here meant), yet they were more forward to return to Jerusalem, and build the house of the Lord (where they were to serve in lower ministries), than the Levites themselves. For there were greater numbers of them returned than of the Levites and singers, as appears by comparing this verse with ver. 40, 41.

Ver. 59. And these were they which went up from Telmelah, Tel-harsa, Cherub, Addan, and Immer; but they could not shew their father's house, and their seed, whether they were of Israel.] These are names of some cities in Chaldea, or Mesopotamia, from whence many went along with them to Judea: and, as some think, they were Jews or proselytes who were carried captive by Shalmaneser into Assyria. Now these could not shew the families from whence they were derived, and so could not obtain any certain possession in Judea; as the rest did, who knew to what family and city they belonged.

Ver. 60. The children of Delaiah, the children of Tobiah, the children of Nekoda, six hundred fifty and two.] These were persons who could not make out their pedigree; and yet were desirous to live among the people of God, and see his worship restored.

Ver. 61. And of the children of the priests: the children of Habaiah, the children of Koz, the children of Barzillai (which took a wife of the daughters of Barzillai the Gileadite, and was called after their name).] This person, whosoever he was, thought it so great an honour to be descended from such a noble family as that of Barzillai, that he chose to be called by that name, which he preferred before his own in the family of the priests: by which vain ambition he lost his title to the priesthood, because he could not make out his pedigree from the priests, but from Barzillai.

Ver. 62. These sought their register among those who were reckoned by genealogy, but they were not found.] The words may be more plainly translated out of the Hebrew, in this manner, These being numbered among the priests (or, reckoned in the priestly genealogy) sought the register, the record of it in writing, but could not find it. The Jews were so careful to keep the priesthood pure, that they preserved an exact account of the parents, the kindred, and the quality of every priest; because there were some women the priests might not marry, whose children were accounted impure; as Mr. Selden hath shewn at large, lib. ii. de Success. ad Pontific. cap. 2. p. 213. and cap. 3. p. 215. But when the city and temple were burnt, and the people carried away in a tumultuous, confused manner into Babylon, many tables of genealogy perished, and could not be recovered.

Therefore were they, as polluted, put from the priesthood.] Not permitted to perform the office of priests; because it did not appear that they were legally descended from priests.

Ver. 63. And the Tirshatha.] Some think (particularly Jacobus Capellus), that by the Tirshatha is here meant Zerubbabel: it being a general name, they suppose, for all chief governors. So Nehemiah is called, chap. viii. 9. x. 1. whom others therefore will have to be here meant; who was a kind of judge (as the Persian word signifies), and gave the sentence which here follows, when he came to Judea: which was a good while after this first company arrived there. Others interpret it, the king's commissioner; for Zerubbabel was no more. (See J. Reynolds, in his Censure of the Apocryphal Books, prælect. cxviii.)

Said unto them, that they should not eat of the most holy things.] That is, they should not partake of the sacrifices offered for sin, nor of the right shoulder of peace-offerings, nor of the shew-bread; which were all most holy, and the portion of the priests alone. This shews that Tirshatha, whosoever he was, had great power and authority; who could lay such a restraint upon those that had been held for priests.

Till there stood up a priest with urim and with thummim.] Till the Lord himself should shew (when he vouchsafed such a high-priest as was in the first temple), whether they were of the line of Aaron or not. He doth not quite reject and exclude them, but left them their claim; yet would not admit them to enjoy that which was the sole right of the priests: which he could not determine whether it belonged to them; but the oracle being ceased, waited till God, who knew all things, should declare it. Thus careful they were to distinguish families, that strangers might not come to inherit among God's people; and especially that the priesthood might not be invaded by any who were unqualified for it. (See Buxtorf, in his Historia Urim et Thummim, p. 323. 327.)

It is evident from this place, that the urim and thummim were either lost or burnt with the temple; and whether they were after this restored, that is, whether any priest with this authority was raised up after the captivity was ended, we are no where informed. If there was, it was only (as Dr. Jackson well speaks, book i. on the Creed, chap. 11.) to give this people a farewell of God's extraordinary speaking to them, either by priests or by prophets, till Christ came. Josephus confesses, that revelation by urim and thummim did cease two hundred years before his time: but more probably this, as other kinds of prophecy, and many extraordinary tokens of God's power and presence

(sometimes most frequent in this nation), did cease with that generation which returned from captivity, or immediately after the finishing the second temple: as if, during all that time (to use the words of that great man beforementioned), God had appointed a fast, or vigil, as an introduction to the fulness of time; wherein (as Joel prophesied, ver. 28.) God would pour out his Spirit upon all flesh; upon the gentile, as well as the Jew, (Mal. i. 11.) For this cause God imposed this long fast upon the Jews, that he might humble them, and teach them, that he was not their God alone, but of the gentiles also. The Jews generally acknowledge there was no urim and thummim under the second temple: and even they that say there was (because it was necessary the high-priest should have his garments complete), yet say, there was no answer from God given by it; which is as much as to say, there was none at all. (See Buxtorf, Hist. Urim et Thummim, cap. 5.)

Ver. 64. The whole congregation together was forty and two thousand three hundred and threescore.] This was but a small number in comparison with that vast multitude which came out of Egypt, yet more than double to that number which was carried away captive by Nebuchadnezzar. But here occurs a small difficulty (like that in the end of the foregoing chapter); for if we put together the several sums beforementioned, they amount to no more than twenty-nine thousand eight hundred and eighteen; so there wants above twelve thousand to make up this number of forty thousand three hundred and threescore. But where shall we find them? say the Jews, in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 29. To which they there answer, that they were of the rest of the tribes of Israel, who came up with those of Judah and Benjamin: or they might be Levites, or other Israelites, who could not make out their descent. Which is a very solid answer, for there is no doubt but many of their brethren of the ten tribes incorporated themselves with the two tribes in captivity, and took the advantage of returning with them: which may be the meaning of those words in the first chapter, ver. 5. "Then rose up the chief of the fathers of Judah and Benjamin, with all them whose spirit God had raised to go up:" that is, saith Diodate, all those of other tribes, according to 1 Chron. ix. 3.

Ver. 65. Besides their servants and their maids, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred thirty and seven.] Though all that returned were not Jews, but some of the ten tribes joined with them; yet they did not amount, slaves and all, to fifty thousand. Now what is this number to what they were in Jehoshaphat's time, when Judah had in it two hundred thousand fighting men?

And there were among them two hundred singing-men and singing-women.] Whether these were now become servants is not certain; but it seems to be manifest from 1 Chron. xxv. 5, 6. that women, as well as men, sung in the house of the Lord.

Ver. 66. Their horses were seven hundred thirty and six; their mules, two hundred forty and five.] Their poverty appears, as by the small number of servants that attended them, so by the little parcel of cattle which they had to carry them.

Ver. 67. Their camels, four hundred thirty and five; their asses, six thousand seven hundred and twenty.] Most of the people therefore travelled on foot, for these would but suffice to carry their baggage (as we speak), or little more.

Ver. 68. And some of the chief of the fathers, when they came to the house of the Lord which is at Jerusalem.] That is, to the place in which the temple stood, unto which it seems their pious affections carried them, as soon as they came to Jerusalem.

Offered freely for the house of God, to set it up in his place.] Made a new offering besides that which they brought out of Babylon from their brethren there, mentioned chap. i. 4. 6. By this it appears, that the Jews were not made such poor slaves in Babylon as wrought for their lords and masters, but had liberty to trade and get riches for themselves; some of them being advanced to considerable offices in the king's court: otherwise they could not have been able to offer such sums as are mentioned in the next verse. And the like contribution, though not so large, was made for the support of the second company that went up from Babylon, as Josephus tells us, lib. xi. cap. 4. where he saith, the Jews in Babylon gave their brethren who were going to their own country, a hundred pound of gold, and five thousand of silver. But most of these rich men continued still in Babylon, being well settled there, and in a thriving condition: insomuch that R. Eliezer was wont to say (as he is quoted by a converted Jew), "The bran only returned to Judea, the fine flour still remained in Babylon." (See Jer. xxix. 4, 5. 28.) But this is a conceit advanced to elude the prophecies which belong to their return from Babylon, and apply them to their present captivity from the Romans.

Ver. 69. They gave after their ability, unto the treasure of the work.] Which was presently erected, according to the ancient pattern in David's time, (1 Chron. xxvi. 20.)

Threescore and one thousand drams of gold, and five thousand pounds of silver, and one hundred priests' garments.] Garments, as well as gold and silver, were wont to be laid up in treasures, as appears by our Saviour's words, "Lay up for yourselves treasures, where neither moth nor rust do corrupt," Matt. vi. 20. Moths do not corrupt silver and gold, but only garments. (See Job xxvii. 16.)

Ver. 70. So the priests, and the Levites, and some of the people, and the singers, and the porters, and the Nethinims, dwelt in their cities.] They are here set down in that order wherein they are reckoned from ver. 36. and the good order is observed that was among them, every one going to the city where his ancestors dwelt; and so did all Israel, as well as Judah and Benjamin, (chap. vi. 16, 17.) Thus the foundation of this poor commonwealth was laid in a marvellous concord, there being no strife nor contention among them that came up, though of different orders and qualities; but they had one heart and soul, like the first Christians, without which unity no people can be preserved. And that it may be cherished, they must avoid those things that destroy it, which are (as Joh. Wolfius here observes) principally φιλαυτία and πολυπραγμοσύνη, self-love, and meddling in other men's matters.

And all Israel in their cities.] When the ten tribes were carried captives by Shalmaneser into Assyria, they were not carried away entirely, but some of every tribe left, who, with Judah and Benjamin, were afterward carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, and now restored by Cyrus. By this our primate Usher explains what we read afterward, (chap. vi. 17, 18.) that they offered twelve he-goats, according to the number of the children of Israel; (ad A. Mundi 3468.) and, indeed, there were some relics of the ten tribes till their last destruction, (Acts xxvi. 7.)

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. AND when the seventh month was come, and the children of Israel were in the cities, the people gathered themselves together as one man to Jerusalem.] We are no where told in what month they began their journey from Babylon. But from chap. vii. 9. we understand it was a journey of four months from thence to Jerusalem; so that we may safely conclude they came out in the spring-time in the first or second month, and having spent a short time in settling themselves in their several cities, the seventh approached, or drew nigh (so it must be understood, and should be rendered), in which was the first feast that fell out after they came into Judea; which they assembled themselves unanimously to celebrate at Jerusalem.

Ver. 2. Then stood up Jeshua the son of Jozadak, and his brethren the priests.] He was the high-priest, called Joshua in Haggai i. 1.

And Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and his brethren.] He is called there the governor of Judah, being appointed by the king of Persia to that office. And he is there put before Joshua, as here he is put after: the viceroy and the high-priest being "Pares dignitate aut suppares," as Bochartus speaks. (See below, ver. 8. chap. iv. 3. v. 2.)

And builded the altar of the God of Israel, to offer burnt-offerings thereon.] Which were the most ancient offerings of all others.

As it is written in the law of Moses, the man of God.] Where, in the very beginning of the book of Leviticus, there is an order for the burnt-sacrifices before any other.

Ver. 3. And they set the altar.] Before they began to lay the foundation of the temple; for they would not have sacrifices wanting while it was building.

Upon his bases.] That is, in the place, some think, where it anciently stood. Which was done, Maimonides saith, by the authority of the prophets, who were then among them. Here the reader must remember what I have observed upon 1 Chron. ix. 11. 21. 23. that till the temple could be built, they erected a tabernacle wherein the service of God was performed, as it was before Solomon's temple was built. But I noted there, ver. 18. that it did not stand on Mount Moriah, but on Mount Zion; and therefore the altar was also there, and not in the place where it anciently stood, till the temple was finished.

(For fear was upon them, because of the people of those countries).] The particle ki, which we translate for, signifies although: and so it had been better rendered here, Although they were in great fear of their evil neighbours, yet notwithstanding they would not desist from restoring the worship of God. But if we take it as we translate it, the meaning is plain that they were the more zealous to restore the worship of God, that they might upon all occasions flee to him for succour against their enemies, of whom they were in dread.

And they offered burnt-offerings thereon unto the Lord, even burnt-offerings morning and evening.] Which is called in the law of Moses the continual burnt-offering, Exod. xxix. 38—42. Numb. xxviii. 3. 6.

Ver. 4. They kept also the feast of tabernacles, as it is written.] See Exod. xxiii. 16. The seventh month was so remarkable for many solemnities appointed to be held in it, that I cannot think they kept only the feast of tabernacles. For on the very first day of the month there was to be a holy convocation, (Numb. xxix. 1, &c.) on which they began to offer sacrifice, as it is said here, ver. 6.: and on the tenth day was another holy convocation, which was the most solemn in all the year, being the great day of atonement, (Numb. xxix. 7.) With these, I suppose, they began; and especially on the tenth day begged pardon of God for their sins, which had cast them out of their land; and then proceeded on the fifteenth day to thank God for their restoration, by keeping the feast of tabernacles.

And offered the daily burnt-offerings by number, according to the custom, as the duty of every day required.] On every day of the feast, which lasted seven days, there were special sacrifices appointed by the law, and in great numbers; as may be seen Numb. xxix. 13. 17, &c. which put this poor people to great expenses; but their piety now was such, that they valued nothing so much as the service of God.

Ver. 5. And afterward offered the continual burnt-offerings, both of the new moons, and of all the set feasts of the Lord that were consecrated, and of every one that willingly offered a free-will-offering unto the Lord.

Ver. 6. From the first day of the seventh month began they to offer burnt-offerings unto the Lord: but the foundation of the temple of the Lord was not yet laid.] The meaning of these two verses is, that holy rites of sacrificing were restored, and so were kept and continued ever after in their several seasons, on the new moons, and other festival solemnities. And they began with the morning and evening burnt-offering, which was never to be omitted, but in every solemnity was to have the precedence, and be offered in the first place. (See Numb. xxviii. 3, 4, &c.)

Ver. 7. They gave money also unto the masons, and to the carpenters.] To prepare materials for the building.

And meat, and drink, and oil, unto them of Zidon, and to them of Tyre.] Who wanted these things more than money, as appears by the history of Solomon's building, (1 Kings v. 10.)

To bring cedar-trees from Lebanon to the sea of Joppa.] As they had done in the days of Solomon, (1 Kings v. 9.)

According to the grant that they had of Cyrus king of Persia.] Who commanded, I suppose, those of Tyre and Zidon to assist them.

Ver. 8. Now, in the second year of their coming unto the house of God at Jerusalem.] That is, to the place where the house of God formerly stood.

In the second month.] All the time before this, in the latter end of the last year, was spent, it is probable, in removing the rubbish, and preparing the ground for laying the foundation, as much as the winter would permit: which was not a season to begin the work, but after the Passover, I presume, they entered upon it.

Began Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Jeshua the son of Jozadak, and the remnant of their brethren, the priests and the Levites, and all they that were come out of the captivity unto Jerusalem.] Here Zerubbabel is put before Jeshua, as ver. 2. Jeshua was put before him: whereby we learn they were of equal dignity, in the account of the Jews. For Zerubbabel was not a king, but a governor of the province of Judea, under the king of Persia, as Nehemiah was; (chap. v. 14, 15.) under whom there were princes and rulers, that is, the heads of families; (chap. ix. 2.) and below them there were captains of thousands, &c. and other subaltern officers; (chap. x. 8. 14.) and after all, in the fourth place, the great congregation: which Bertram makes account was the government of the Jews, after their return from the captivity. (See him, de Repub. Jud. cap. 13. where he undertakes to make out the four orders from Nehem. v. 7, &c.)

And appointed the Levites, from twenty years old and upward, to set forward the work of the house of the Lord.] For since the time of David, they were thought fit at twenty years of age to attend the service of God in his house.

Ver. 9. Then stood Jeshua with his sons and his brethren.] Not Jeshua the high-priest beforementioned, but another Jeshua, who was a Levite, mentioned chap. ii. 40.

Kadmiel and his sons, the sons of Judah, together.] Who is called there Hodaviah.

To set forward the workmen in the house of God.] They being made overseers of the work.

The sons of Henadad, with their sons, and their brethren the Levites.] These were afterward added to the forenamed, as their assistants.

Ver. 10. And when the builders laid the foundation of the temple of the Lord, they set the priests in their apparel with trumpets, and the Levites, the sons of Asaph, with cymbals, to praise the Lord.] While the sacrifices, I suppose, at the same time were offered, they sung praise to God with such instruments as they had; which were only cymbals, for it is like they had not yet got harps and lutes. The apocryphal Esdras saith, they laid the foundation in the new moon; but Calvisius thinks it more probable to have been laid the day after, the new moon being a festival.

After the ordinance of David king of Israel.] See 1 Chron. xvi. 7. xxv. 1.

Ver. 11. And they sang together by course.] That is, answered one to another; for from hence was derived the manner of praying and praising God in the Christian service alternatively, as Mr. Mede observes, book i. discourse xvi. where he notes how the seraphims cried one to another, saying, "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts," &c. Isa. vi. 3.

In praising and giving thanks unto the Lord; because he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever towards Israel.] Thus many of the Psalms of David begin, cvii. cxxviii. and cxxxvi. which last psalm, it is probable, was now sung entirely, in every verse of which these words are repeated, his mercy endureth for ever.

And all the people shouted with a great shout, when they praised the Lord, because the foundation of the house of the Lord was laid.] That is, every one expressed their thankfulness and joy, in such manner as they were able; the priests and Levites with singing and music, and the people with shouting, which is a natural expression of joy, and as acceptable as the most artificial composures.

Ver. 12. But many of the priests and Levites, and chief of the fathers, who were ancient men, that had seen the first house.] As many of them might have done, it not being above threescore (or, as some compute, sixty-one) years since it was burnt. And some of them lived long after this, which was the first year of Cyrus: for some prolonged their days (as Huetius observes) till the second year of Darius Hystaspes, which was eighteen years after the first of Cyrus.

When the foundation of this house was laid before their eyes, wept with a loud voice; and many shouted aloud for joy.] The younger sort shouted, but many of the ancient people disturbed their acclamations with howlings. For though the temple was intended to be built as large as the former, upon the same foundation; yet there were not such goodly stones to lay for the foundation, as there were for Solomon's, (1 Kings vii. 9, 10.) nor could they hope to build it so magnificently as he had done, nor was there any appearance of the Divine glory, or of a priest with urim and thummim, and such-like things: which indeed were sad, but ought not to have made them weep so loud, and interrupt the public joy. Thankfulness for small beginnings would better have become them, than complaints that their condition was no better.

Ver. 13. So that the people could not discern the noise of the shout of joy from the noise of the weeping of the people.] There was a great confusion among them by these contrary passions, which was very lamentable when God had been so very good to them all.

For the people shouted with a loud shout, and the noise was heard afar off.] Notwithstanding which, the young people continued to shout as loud as they could, and made the noise of their joy be heard farther off than the others' weeping was.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. NOW, when the adversaries of Judah and Benjamin.] These were the Samaritans, who were grieved at their return, (ver. 10.)

Heard that the children of the captivity builded the temple unto the Lord God of Israel.] They being neighbours were soon informed, not only of their return from captivity, but of their building the temple.

Ver. 2. Then they came to Zerubbabel, and to the chief of the fathers, and said unto them, Let us build with you.] This people, no doubt, were desirous to partake of the privileges which were granted to the Jews by the king of Persia: and so not only offered their assistance towards the building of the temple, but would have been one people with them. So the following words import.

For we seek your God, as ye do; and we do sacrifice unto him.] They pretend to be of the same religion with them, which is the greatest bond of union: but in truth they were not; for though they worshipped God, yet they joined other feigned gods with him, and therefore could not be admitted into communion with them at the temple.

Since the days of Esar-haddon king of Assur, which brought us up hither.] The same with him mentioned 2 Kings xix. 39. who brought a second colony, after that brought by Shalmaneser when he first conquered them, to people the country better; and sent a priest also to instruct them, from whom they pretended to have received God's true religion.

Ver. 3. But Zerubbabel, and Jeshua, and the rest of the chief of the fathers, said unto them, You have nothing to do with us to build a house unto our God.] They knew them very well what they were; viz. a mixed people, not purely of the seed of Israel, and of a medley religion, not worshipping God purely; and therefore they would have nothing to do with them. And, indeed, they soon discovered their hypocrisy by writing against the work, which they would have hindered by making divisions if they had been among them.

But we ourselves together will build unto the Lord God of Israel, as king Cyrus the king of Persia hath commanded us.] They resolve to admit no other people to join with them, but to pursue the grant which king Cyrus had made to them alone, and to none other. These were the two reasons why they rejected them, because they were not of the same people, and the king of Persia had granted this licence to build the temple only to the Jews.

Ver. 4. Then the people of the land.] That is, the forenamed Samaritans.

Weakened the hands of the people of Judah.] Discouraged them in their undertakings by false reports and slanders, and, perhaps, by threatenings.

And troubled them in building.] Laid all the impediments they could in their way, by hindering materials or provisions from coming to them, or by enticing away their workmen, or such-like means.

Ver. 5. And hired counsellors against them, to frustrate their purpose.] They bribed some of the council of the king of Persia to obstruct the work; a frequent mischief in courts, as Grotius notes: or, perhaps, there were some of the officers of the king of Persia in Samaria, Syria, and Judea, whom they corrupted to cross this design.

All the days of Cyrus king of Persia.] Who being engaged in war with the Lydians and Scythians, could not attend such affairs as this; but it went on slowly: which his son Cambyses regarded not at all, being no friend of the Jews, nor of religion.

Even until the reign of Darius king of Persia.] Till Darius the son of Hystaspes, who, killing the magi (who after Cambyses had possessed themselves of the kingdom), was made king; and marrying Artossa the daughter of Cyrus, and loving her very much, confirmed the decree of Cyrus, and followed his steps that he might stand the safer himself. It is a great controversy indeed between learned men, whether this Darius, or Darius Nothus, be here meant: and there are strong arguments on both sides, which it is an immense labour to examine, with the objections against them. It hath been lately done in brief by a judicious writer, who after all is constrained to conclude with a non liquet. But yet he thinks the most weighty reasons incline to Darius Hystaspes. (See Hermannus Witsius, Miscellanea Sacra, lib. i. cap. 20.)

Ver. 6. And in the reign of Ahasuerus.] Who this was is very uncertain; there being many who think, that after Cyrus this was nomen gentilitium (as they call it), the name of all their kings (as Pharaoh was of all the kings of Egypt), who were called Xerxes, or Artaxerxes (from Ahasuerus, as Grotius thinks), besides the name they had before they came to the crown. Some therefore say this was Cambyses, (so primate Usher, ad A. M. 3476.) others Darius Hystaspes, others Artaxerxes Mnemon, or Longimanus; whose disputes are very long about this matter, but leave one no more satisfied than before he began to read them.

In the beginning of his reign, wrote they unto him an accusation against the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem.] Importing that they intended to set up for themselves, and not to depend upon the king of Persia.

Ver. 7. And in the days of Artaxerxes.] Who is before called Ahasuerus; which is supposed to be his Chaldee name, as Artaxerxes was his Persian. But Dr. Alix, who had examined these things, looks upon it as absurd to suppose Ahasuerus to have been the name of all the Persian kings, and takes this Artaxerxes to have been the son of Xerxes, viz. Artaxerxes Longimanus.

Wrote Bishlam, Mithredath, Tabeel, and the rest of their companions, unto Artaxerxes king of Persia.] These men first drew up the letter, which they intended to send to the king, being governors, I suppose, under him, on this side of Euphrates; such as the Greeks call tetrarchs.

And the writing of the letter was written in the Syrian tongue, and interpreted in the Syrian tongue.] The meaning may be, that they sent a brief address to the king in the Syrian tongue, and expounded their business more largely to some of his counsellors in the same tongue. Or, by the first we may understand the letter or characters, and by the other the words: so that the meaning is, it was wrote both in Syrian characters, and in Syrian words. For sometimes a letter or other writing is sent in the character of one language, and in words of another; as Chaldee and Syrian words are wrote in the Hebrew characters, and we ofttimes write Hebrew words in the English characters. But this letter was wrote, and was to be read in the same language.

Ver. 8. Rehum the chancellor, and Shimshai the scribe, wrote a letter against Jerusalem to Artaxerxes the king.] These two were principal persons in these countries; who either joined with the other three beforementioned in the same letter, or wrote another letter of the same import.

In this sort.] Containing the same complaint against the Jews.

Ver. 9. Then wrote Rehum the chancellor, and Shimshai the scribe, and the rest of their companions; the Dinaites, the Apharsathchites, the Tarpelites, the Apharsites, the Archevites, the Babylonians, the Susanchites, the Dehavites, and the Elamites.] These nine nations came out of Assyria, Persia, Media, Susiana, and other provinces of that vast empire; who with one consent joined in this letter or petition. For, perhaps, the king being loath to do any thing hastily upon the motion of that letter mentioned ver. 8. sent to have the opinion of all these nations, or the principal persons among them; and of all other on this side the river Euphrates, as it here follows.

Ver. 10. And the rest of the nations whom the great and noble Asnapper brought over, and set in the cities of Samaria, and the rest that are on this side the river.] Some take Asnapper to be another name for Shalmaneser, or for Esar-haddon, who sent these colonies hither. But it is more reasonable to think he was some great commander, who was entrusted by one or both of those kings to conduct them, and bring them over (the river Euphrates), and see them settled in these countries.

And at such a time.] Which was expressed, no doubt, in the letter; but here it is only noted in general, that the year and the day were mentioned, when it was subscribed.

Ver. 11. This is the copy of the letter that they sent unto him, even unto Artaxerxes the king: Thy servants, the men on this side the river, and at such a time.] This was the title of their letter: the letter itself followeth.

Ver. 12. Be it known unto the king, that the Jews, which came up from thee to us, are come unto Jerusalem, building the rebellious and the bad city, and have set up the walls thereof, and joined the foundations.] This was a mere calumny; for they attempted no such thing as to build the walls of Jerusalem. But they speak in ambiguous words (as Huetius observes) concerning the building of this city; which in one sense was true. For they built houses, without which it could not be inhabited; but they did not go about to encompass it with walls, to defend the city against the incursions of their enemies; which was not begun till a great while after. They are fallacious words therefore, whereby they imposed upon the king's belief, when they say, they set up the walls thereof: for they only set up the walls of their houses, not of their city. And there is a demonstration they did no more; for when it is said there was an order from the king, that this city should not be built, and accordingly the work was stopped, it is thus expressed, (ver. 24.) then ceased the work of the house of God, which is at Jerusalem. It is not said, The work of building the walls of the city ceased (for they were about no such thing), but the work of the house of God, which was all they did. Thus wicked men compass their ends by lies and fallacies; with which they prepossess men's minds against the truth. As for their calling it a rebellious and bad city, there was some colour for it; their latter kings having rebelled against the king of Babylon. And besides, the laws and customs of the Jews were such, as would not permit them to conform to the manner of other nations; which made their neighbours have an ill opinion of them, as an unsociable people.

Ver. 13. Be it known now unto the king, that if this city be builded, and the walls set up again, then will they not pay toll, tribute, and custom.] They pretend the Jews would be no longer in subjection, if their city was built; but set up for themselves, as a free people. By the first of these words Grotius understands that which every head paid to the king, which we call poll-money; by the second, the excise (as we now speak) that was upon commodities and merchandise; and by the last, the rent which their land paid. But a late learned man thinks, the first word rather signifies that part which every man paid out of his estate, according as it was valued; the second, that which was paid for every head; and the third, that which was paid upon the highways, by every traveller who brought in wares, or carried them out. (Herman. Witsius, in his Miscell. par. ii. Exerc. xi. n. 20.)

And so thou shalt endamage the revenue of the kings.] They pretend to study nothing but the profit of the king; and that neither he nor his successors might lose any of the duties owing to the crown.

Ver. 14. Now, because we have maintenance from the king's palace.] In the Hebrew it is, we are salted with the salt of the palace; i. e. received their salary from the king, as Junius translates it. For it seems, they received their stipend in salt (from whence it was called a salary), which the son of Sirach mentions among the things necessary to human life, (Eccles. xxxix. 31.) And Homer calls it a Divine thing, because, as Plutarch expounds him, it seasons all food, and gives a relish to it. (See Dr. Cudworth, of the Lord's Supper, p. 68.)

And it was not meet for us to see the king's dishonour.] It did not become them who received maintenance from the king to see him wronged any way.

Therefore have we sent and certified the king.] Which they would have him think was the sole cause of their writing, to inform him in the truth.

Ver. 15. That search may be made in the book of the records of thy fathers.] In the chronicles of the kings that had reigned before him; whom they call his fathers, because they were his predecessors in that kingdom, wherein he now reigned. This search shews, this letter was written a long time after the edict of Cyrus.

So shalt thou find in the book of the records, and know, that this city is a rebellious city, and hurtful unto kings and provinces, and that they have moved sedition within the same of old time; for which cause was this city destroyed.] They mix some truth with abundance of falsehood: for this city could not be rebellious in old time, being subject to none; till, in latter times, it was conquered by Nebuchadnezzar, against whom they rebelled.

Ver. 16. We certify the king, that if this city be builded again, and the walls thereof set up, by this means thou shalt have no portion on this side the river.] This was a most groundless suggestion, that they should either be able to conquer all the neighbouring countries, as far as Euphrates, or draw them all into a rebellion with them against the king.

Ver. 17. Then sent the king an answer unto Rehum the chancellor, and to Shimshai the scribe, and to the rest of their companions that dwell in Samaria, and unto the rest beyond the river, Peace, and at such a time.] This was a matter of such concern, that the king dispatched a speedy answer to be communicated to all the people, mentioned ver. 9, 10.

Ver. 18. The letter which ye sent unto us hath been plainly read before me.] It was read, in all likelihood, before the king in council.

Ver. 19. And I commanded, and search hath been made.] In the public records. (See chap. v. 17. vi. 1, 2. Esther ii. 23. vi. 1.)

And it is found, that this city of old time hath made insurrection against kings, and that rebellion and sedition have been made therein.] One instance or two of it, in latter times, served to fasten this odious character upon them; as if they had been always guilty of these crimes.

Ver. 20. There have been mighty kings also over Jerusalem, which have ruled over all countries beyond the river.] Such, indeed, were David and Solomon; who, as their records shewed, ruled over all countries on this side Euphrates.

And toll, tribute, and custom, was paid unto them.] As now they were to the king of Persia: which seemed to justify what this people suggested in their letter, ver. 16. only they wanted such mighty kings as they then had, and were never likely to have such again.

Ver. 21. Give ye now commandment to cause these men to cease, and that this city be not builded.] He gave no order about the temple, but only about the city; which he was made to believe they were fortifying.

Until another commandment shall be given from me.] He kept his ears open, like a good king, to further information; which if he should have different from theirs, he might give other orders. For this was not a law of the Medes and Persians that could not be revoked; but only an edict, depending wholly upon the will and pleasure of the king, which he might have reason to alter hereafter.

Ver. 22. Take heed now that ye fail not to do this: why should damage grow to the hurt of the kings?] By their negligence, if they permitted them to proceed to fortify Jerusalem. It is very observable, that in neither of their letters, nor in the king's answer, there is not one word of the command which Cyrus gave; nor any thing said of the building of the temple: which was the great thing in which they were employed; and the building of which could be no damage to the king. But though we do not know by what trick the decree of Cyrus was now smothered, yet their silence about it proves (as the forenamed Dr. Alix suggests to me) that this complaint was moved neither in the time of Darius the First, who lived in the court of Cyrus, and married his daughter, nor of Xerxes his son, as Josephus thinks (taking Xerxes for Artaxerxes), but in the beginning of Artaxerxes Longimanus; who began to reign seventy-one years after the first of Cyrus, in which the edict was published.

Ver. 23. Now, when the copy of king Artaxerxes' letter was read before Rehum, and Shimshai the scribe, and their companions, they went up in haste to Jerusalem unto the Jews.] So they of the captivity are now called, though there were many Israelites among them; because they chiefly consisted of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin. But it must be noted, that all Israel (as this author speaks, chap. ii. ult.) are included under the name of Jews. For liberty was granted to them all by the edict of Cyrus (which cannot be noted too often), in virtue of which they might return when they pleased. But the holy writers mention only those who returned in a body: after which the prophets admonish those who remained in captivity to return to their own land; as we see in the book of Zechariah.

And made them to cease by force and power.] They threatened, I suppose, to force them to desist, if they did not presently obey the king's order; which was only that the city should not be built: but the temple being a part of it, they would have it understood that it was comprehended in this order.

Ver. 24. Then ceased the work of the house of God which is at Jerusalem.] It did not quite cease; for when the Jews understood that this edict did not prohibit the building of the temple, but only of the city, they went on with their work again without asking any leave; since they knew Artaxerxes did not forbid it. But it went on so slowly, that in a manner it ceased, till the beginning of the reign of Darius, as it here follows.

So it ceased unto the second year of the reign of Darius king of Persia.] They that take Darius Nothus to be here meant, are pressed with very great difficulties. For, from the first year of Cyrus, who gave order for the building of the temple, till the sixth year of Darius Nothus, in which they suppose it was finished, there were at least a hundred and thirteen years, as Scaliger and Calvisius make account: but as others think, a hundred and seventeen; and, according to Cocceius, a hundred forty and two. Now all this time Zerubbabel was in the government of Judea, and Jeshua in the high-priesthood: but so long an authority in church or state was never heard of in any age; and they must have lived some time before and after, and consequently they must be of a vast age: and therefore so long a space was not between the beginning and the conclusion of this work. Besides, Haggai supposes (chap. ii. 4.) that some remembered the glory of the first house, and compared it with the glory of the second: which, if this was in the sixth year of Darius Nothus, they must be at least a hundred and fourscore years old; which is not likely. Several solutions are given to this, which do not satisfy those who believe Darius Hystaspes is here meant: whose second year was the eighteenth after the first of Cyrus, as Huetius reckons: and this is the most ancient opinion. But it is built only upon the authority of Josephus, who was followed by many after the second century: but before, they took this Darius to be Darius Ochus, as Dr. Alix assures me, who thinks the long life of Zerubbabel and Jeshua is no objection against it; but is to be looked upon as an extraordinary effect of the Divine goodness, for the re-establishment of the commonwealth, and of the worship of God: as the life of Jehoiada was prolonged for the same reason, (2 Chron. xxiv. 15.)

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. THEN the prophets, Haggai the prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo.] The grandchild of Iddo; for his father's name was Berachiah.

Prophesied unto the Jews that were in Judah and Jerusalem in the name of the God of Israel, even unto them.] Or rather against them, as the Hebrew words may be interpreted: for they reproved them because they did not build the temple. They both prophesied in the second year of Darius, as appears by the beginning of their prophecies: one in the sixth month, the other in the eighth. This second year of Darius, as Dr. Alix observes to me, was a sabbatic year, from which there were seven weeks, or forty-nine days, as well for the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, which was in the twentieth of Artaxerxes, as for settling a right policy in church and state, which was finished by Nehemiah, the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes, which was also a sabbatic year. And from this second of Darius, whom God gave order by these precepts to set upon this work, he thinks, is the true beginning of the sixty-two weeks, (spoken of, Dan. ix.) till the appearing of the Messiah.

Ver. 2. Then rose up Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Jeshua the son of Jozadak, and began to build the house of God which is at Jerusalem.] It had been begun a good while ago, but went on very slowly, till these great men, excited by the prophets, set the work forward.

And with them were the prophets of God helping them.] Calling upon them to labour strenuously in the work: for God was with them, to protect, defend, and prosper them, (Haggai i. 13, 14. ii. 4.)

Ver. 3. At the same time came to them Tatnai, governor on this side the river, and Shethar-boznai, and their companions.] These were men in authority under the king of Persia, who managed the public affairs in these countries; but seem to have been of a better spirit than Rehum, and the rest mentioned in the foregoing chapter; who, it is likely, were either dead, or put out of their places by this new king.

And said thus unto them, Who hath commanded you to build this house, and to make up this wall?] They fairly question them by what authority they built the temple, and the wall about it: for they do not mean the wall of the city, which was not building.

Ver. 4. Then said we unto them after this manner, What are the names of the men that make this building?] Many take these to be still the words of Tatnai, and his companions. But it is more natural to take them for the answer of the Jews: who not only told them by what authority they built the temple, but also gave them the names of those who were the great undertakers of the work; after which, it is likely, they inquired, ver. 10. But then the word What, is not the note of an interrogation, but is to be translated, We said unto them after this manner, What were the names, &c. From which place Huetius argues, that he who wrote this chapter was now present when this question was asked, and answer made to it; and therefore Ezra was not the writer: for this was in the second year of Darius, and he did not come to Jerusalem till the seventh year of Artaxerxes, called Longimanus, (chap. vii. 1. 8.)

Ver. 5. But the eye of their God was upon the elders of the Jews, that they could not cause them to cease, till the matter came to Darius.] By the favour and good providence of God, the king's ministers in those parts became their friends, so far, as not to prohibit them to go on with their work; but referred the matter to the consideration of Darius himself; to whom they make a very fair and honest report of the case.

And then they returned answer by letter concerning this matter.] The matter being laid before Darius, they received answer from him by letter what should be done in it.

Ver. 6. The copy of the letter that Tatnai, governor on this side the river, and Shetkar-boznai, and his companions the Apharsachites, which were on this side the river, sent unto Darius the king.] The Apharsachites were one of the nations mentioned before in the former letter to Artaxerxes, (chap. iv. 9.) of which, perhaps, these two great men were.

Ver. 7. They sent a letter unto him, wherein was written thus: Unto Darius the king, all peace.] They seem to write with greater affection than the former did, wishing the king all prosperity and happiness, which the other did not, but only called themselves his servants, (chap. iv. 11.)

Ver. 8. Be it known unto the king, that we went into the province of Judea, to the house of the great God.] So the Jews spake, to distinguish their God from all others, who were the gods only of small countries, every one of which had their particular gods.

Which is builded with great stones.] The Talmudists, Jarchi, and Kimchi, and others, translate it marble stones, and the LXX. choice stones.

And timber is laid in the walls, and this work goeth fast on, and prospereth in their hands.] It was advanced so far, and such diligence was used, that if a stop were not put to it, it would be speedily finished.

Ver. 9. Then asked we those elders, and said unto them, Who commanded you to build this house, and to make up these walls?

Ver. 10. And we asked their names also, to certify thee, that we might write the names of the men that were the chief of them.] They made a very diligent inquiry, that they might give the king a perfect account of the matter, and he might the better judge of it.

Ver. 11. And thus they returned us answer, saying, We are the servants of the God of heaven and earth, and build the house that was builded these many years ago, which a great king of Israel builded and set up.] They own their religion which was of very ancient standing; their God having been worshipped many ages ago in this house which was built by Solomon.

Ver. 12. But after that our fathers had provoked the God of heaven unto wrath, he gave them into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, the Chaldean, who destroyed this house, and carried the people away into Babylon.] They give them a short account how it came to be destroyed for their sins, and how they were punished on that account.

Ver. 13. But in the first year of Cyrus the king of Babylon, the same king Cyrus made a decree to build this house of God.

Ver. 14. And the vessels also of gold and silver of the house of God, which Nebuchadnezzar took out of the temple that was in Jerusalem, and brought them into the temple of Babylon, those did Cyrus the king take out of the temple of Babylon, and they were delivered unto one whose name was Sheshbazzar, whom he had made governor.

Ver. 15. And said unto him, Take these vessels, go, carry them into the temple that is in Jerusalem, and let the house of God be builded in his place.

Ver. 16. Then came the same Sheshbazzar, and laid the foundation of the house of God which is in Jerusalem: and since that time even until now hath it been in building, and yet it is not finished.] These last words shew it had gone on very slowly and negligently ever since the first of Cyrus, they being in a poor condition, and hindered in the work by the Samaritans; after which the people grew sluggish, being set upon building their own houses, which they carried on with greater earnestness, than the house of God, as Haggai reproves them. However, in these last verses, the Jews gave Tatnai a faithful account of the whole matter; and he very worthily represented it to the king, as they informed him, without any addition or diminution of his own. For he did not accuse them of building the walls of Jerusalem; which shews, he and his companions were not their enemies; but impartially wrote what they affirmed to be true.

Ver. 17. Now therefore, if it seem good to the king, let there be search made in the king's treasure-house, which is there at Babylon.] Where the records of the kingdom were kept very carefully, as treasures use to be.

Whether it be so, that a decree was made of Cyrus the king to build this house of God at Jerusalem, and let the king send his pleasure to us concerning this matter.] It is likely the elders desired the records might be searched and examined, whether they said true or not; and accordingly, the governors reported their desires to the king, as a speedy way to be satisfied about this matter. For these do not seem to be like the Samaritans in the foregoing chapter, who endeavoured to obstruct the work, but were only desirous to be informed of the truth of what the Jews pretended, that so the building of the temple might either be permitted or prohibited, according as the king found the grant of Cyrus to be.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. THEN Darius the king made a decree, and search was made in the house of the rolls, where the treasures were laid up in Babylon.] In the house where the records of the kingdom were kept; but by what follows, it appears that in Babylon they found nothing.

Ver. 2. And there was found at Achmetha, in the palace that is in the province of the Medes, a roll, and therein was a record thus written.] They searched therefore at Achmetha, which was afterward called Ecbatana, where the kings of Persia sometimes kept their courts: and there was found a volume concerning the affairs of Judea, wherein was the following record. This argued a great goodness in Darius, that he did not presently decree against them, because nothing that they alleged was found in Babylon; but caused a search to be made in another place, where he knew records were preserved.

Ver. 3. In the first year of Cyrus the king.] This, perhaps, was the inscription of the following memorial.

The same Cyrus the king made a decree concerning the house of God at Jerusalem, Let the house be builded, the place where they offered sacrifices, and let the foundations thereof be strongly laid; the height thereof threescore cubits, and the breadth thereof threescore cubits.] Or rather, the length thereof, as these last words may be translated. They had liberty to make it of these dimensions if they pleased, but no bigger: and these exceeded the proportions of Solomon's temple, if we suppose it to have been thirty cubits in height, except the porch, which was a hundred and twenty. But I have shewn elsewhere, that it is probable all the temple of Solomon was in length a hundred and twenty cubits, and this house was but half so high. This Josephus saith, who saw this second temple, (lib. xv. Archæolog. cap. 14.) Ἐνδεῖ δ' αὐτῷ πρὸς τὸ μέγεθος εἰς ὕψος ἑξήκοντα πήχεις, &c. It wanted (speaking of this temple) to make it great, sixty cubits in height; for so much higher was the first temple which Solomon built.

Ver. 4. With three rows of great stones, and a row of new timber; and let the expenses be given out of the king's house.] He ordered it to be built at his own charge, for so he saith God commanded him, (chap. i. 2.) "God hath charged me to build him a house at Jerusalem." Yet we do not find that the Jews made use of his bounty, as Pellicanus observes, because they would not provoke too much the envy of the Samaritans, who were angry at his kindness to them. And therefore they carried on the work at their own cost, till Darius now commanded they should have what they desired out of his revenue, to finish what they had begun.

Ver. 5. And also let the golden and silver vessels of the house of God, which Nebuchadnezzar took forth out of the temple which is at Jerusalem, and brought unto Babylon, be restored, and brought again to the temple which is at Jerusalem, every one to his place, and place them in the house of God.] Thus far the decree of Cyrus is recited, which justified the truth of all the allegations of the Jews in the foregoing chapter. Now follows the decree of Darius thereupon.

Ver. 6. Now therefore, Tatnai, governor beyond the river, Shethar-boznai, and your companions the Apharsachites, which are beyond the river.] It is most likely that he set down in his letter to these men the forementioned decree of Cyrus, as it was found in the records, and then gave the following command.

Be ye far from thence.] Come not near Jerusalem to give them any hinderance or disturbance.

Ver. 7. Let the work of this house of God alone.] Obstruct not the work, but rather further it.

Let the governor of the Jews, and the elders of the Jews, build this house of God in his place.] In the place where it stood before. Zerubbabel is constantly called the governor of the Jews, never their king, (Hag. i. 1. 14. ii. 2. 21.) and so some of his successors, (Mal. i. 9.) For in Babylon, as Josephus relates, he was σωματοφύλαξ, a keeper of the king's body, and τῶν αἰχμαλώτων Ἰουδαίων ἡγεμών, the captain of the captive Jews; who in one word was called Αἰχμαλωτάρχα. Therefore he was appointed by Cyrus, and afterward by Darius, to govern the province of Judea in the king's name, and at his charge to see the temple built at Jerusalem. But learned men give no credit to what Josephus says of his great office in Babylon.

Ver. 8. Moreover I make a decree what ye shall do to the elders of these Jews.] Whose names they had given in to him, (chap. v. 10.)

For the building of this house of God.] As he had ordered they should not be hindered, so he made a further order that they should give them assistance in what they were about.

That of the king's goods, even of the tribute beyond the river, forthwith expenses be given unto these men, that they be not hindered.] That the work might not stop for want of money to go forward, which he ordered to be paid them without delay.

Ver. 9. And that which they have need of, both young bullocks, and rams, and lambs, for the burnt-offerings of the God of heaven.] So he had learned to call the God of Israel, after the example of Cyrus, who acknowledges God had made him so great, as he had Darius.

Wheat, salt, wine, and oil.] For meat-offerings to attend upon the burnt-offerings.

According to the appointment of the priests which are at Jerusalem.] This was a great honour done to God's ministers, who might have whatsoever they desired for his service.

Let it be given them day by day without fail.] That the morning and evening burnt-sacrifices might never fail to be offered every day.

Ver. 10. That they may offer sacrifices of sweet savours unto the God of heaven, and pray for the life of the king, and of his sons.] From this place principally Mr. Mede proves at large, that sacrifices were a rite of supplication unto God; such ones, namely, whereby the supplicant came not with a naked petition, but presented something unto his God, whereby to find favour in his sight, and obtain his petition: whence we find Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, where they pitched their tents, to have built an altar also (which was a place for sacrifice), and there called upon the name of the Lord. And by this place it appears, that the sacrifices and oblations presented by gentiles were not refused by the Jews, when they desired their prayers to God for them. The Hebrew doctors indeed say, that all such sacrifices were eucharistical, not hilastical, that is, sacrifices of thanksgiving or acknowledgment to God (being burnt-offerings), not sacrifices of expiation, or sin-offerings.

So Maimonides, in his treatise of sacrifices, "All the eucharistical sacrifices of the gentiles were burnt-offerings." There is a memorable passage in Josephus (lib. ii. de Bello Judaico, cap. 31.) concerning Eleazar the priest, who, being admonished to admit the sacrifices and oblations of the gentiles, acknowledged that their ancestors adorned the temple with gifts offered by the gentiles, always accepting τῶν ἔξωθεν ἐθνῶν δωρεὰς καὶ θυσίας, the gifts and sacrifices of external nations.

The king and his sons.] Here it must be noted, that Darius the First had no sons, but Darius the Second had, viz. Artaxerxes Mnemon, and Cyrus the younger, who were great men, and reigned in some manner with him. Artaxerxes Mnemon (as Dr. Alix makes account) was thirty-five years old in the second year of Darius; and Cyrus (who was slain in a battle against his brother) was a little younger.

Ver. 11. Also I have made a decree, that whosoever shall alter this word, let timber be pulled down from his house, and, being set up, let him be hanged thereon.] To make the decree more valid and better observed, he added this penalty; that if any acted contrary to it, a beam should be taken out of his own house, and, being set up, he should be hanged thereon. But Lud. de Dieu observes, that there is no construction in these words, which we render, being set up; therefore he would have them translated after the LXX. and standing, let him be beat upon it; whipped, as we say, at a post, as the manner was among the Persians and other nations. Only among the Jews they that were beaten did not stand, but lay down, (Deut. xxv. 2.) But if a greater punishment be here meant, then he makes the first words refer to the wood, and the latter to the man, in this manner, and from above let it fall upon him. That is, the stake, being lifted up, shall be struck into his body, and come out at his fundament; which was a cruel punishment among the eastern people, and still continued there.

And let his house be made a dunghill for this.] The pulling down of a beam from his house, supposes the pulling down of the house, which he orders should not be built again, but the place where it stood be made a dunghill. Thus the Romans pulled down the houses of very wicked men for their greater disgrace; of Sp. Cassius, for instance, and of Ovidius Pollio.

Ver. 12. And the God that hath caused his name to dwell there, destroy all kings and people that shall put to their hand to alter and to destroy this house of God which is at Jerusalem.] He was touched with such a sense of the greatness of the God of the Jews, that he prays, He who had all power in heaven and earth, would not only punish all those kings over whom he had no power (not being his subjects), who went about to obstruct this work, but destroy both them and their people.

I Darius have made a decree; let it be done with speed.] He concludes as he began, that forthwith this decree should be executed, (ver. 8.)

Ver. 13. Then Tatnai, governor on this side the river, Shethar-boznai, and their companions, according to that which Darius the king had sent, so they did speedily.] They were as punctual in executing his decrees as he desired, and that without any delay.

Ver. 14. And the elders of the Jews builded, and they prospered through the prophesying of Haggai the prophet, and Zechariah the son of Iddo.] Who directed and encouraged them in their work; representing to them, it is likely, the wonderful goodness of God, who had inclined the heart of the king of Persia to be so highly favourable to them.

And they builded, and finished it, according to the commandment of the God of Israel, and according to the commandment of Cyrus, and Darius, and Artaxerxes king of Persia.] If this Darius was he called Hystaspes, then it was Artaxerxes Longimanus his successor that is here meant; who, though he found the temple built, yet sent Ezra to beautify it, and to see things done there according to their law, (chap. vii. 12. 21. 27.) But some think him to be Artaxerxes Mnemon, who reigned with his father many years, and lived till he was ninety-four years old. (Plut.)

Ver. 15. And this house was finished on the third day of the month Adar, which was in the sixth year of the reign of Darius the king.] Now they did in four years more than they had done in many years before. For, partly by their own poverty, and partly by the corruption of the courtiers of Persia, who hindered the necessary supplies; and partly by the envy of the Samaritans, who retarded them by their false accusations, and by their interest in the governors of Syria; and partly by the sluggishness of the Jews, and their inclination to mind their own private interest more than the public good, the work went on so slowly, that not only the prophets reprehended them for it, but God punished them severely by scarcity of provision, as we read in the prophet Haggai: but now, by the favour of this king, and by the zeal of God's prophets, it went on apace, and was speedily finished.

Ver. 16. And the children of Israel, the priests, and the Levites, and the rest of the children of the captivity, kept the dedication of this house of God with joy.] By the children of Israel are to be understood not only the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin (who were the chief), but all those of other tribes, many of which, from the time of Cyrus to the second of Darius, were come to their own country, though we have not a particular account of their names. This appears from the next verse. All these, together with the priests and Levites, agreed to dedicate this house with festival joy. Thus the temple at first was dedicated, (1 Kings viii. 2. 2 Chron. vii. 4, &c.) That is, after it was built, being designed only for sacred uses, now they shewed, by an example, how it should be used, which is the proper and simple sense of the word dedicate, as Selden explains it, (lib. iii. de Synedr. cap. 13. sect. 5.) But the Hebrew doctors observe, that by these sacrifices now offered, there was no new sanctity given to the place, but the old only restored.

Ver. 17. And offered at the dedication of this house of God a hundred bullocks, two hundred rams, four hundred lambs.] A hecatomb was the noblest sacrifice among the heathen, of which we find often mention in their books; and with that the Jews began the dedication of the temple: to which they made many additional offerings, some of which were peace-offerings, on which they feasted, as the hundred bullocks, I suppose, were whole burnt-offerings.

And for a sin-offering for all Israel, twelve he-goats, according to the number of the tribes of Israel.] For it appears by many places before recited, that though the ten tribes were carried captive by Shalmaneser, yet many of them remained in their country, and were carried away by Nebuchadnezzar, together with Judah and Benjamin, with whom they returned out of Babylon, as many others of the ten tribes did, who were carried away at the taking of Samaria. (See chap. ii. of this book, ver. 70. 2 Chron. xxxi. 5. 10, 11. xxxiv. 7. 9. xxxv. 3. 17. Ezra viii. 35. Acts xxvi. 7.)

Ver. 18. And they set the priests in their divisions, and the Levites in their courses, for the service of God which is at Jerusalem, as it is written in the book of Moses.] Where directions are given for their service, Numb. iii. 6. viii. 9, 10.

Ver. 19. And the children of the captivity kept the Passover upon the fourteenth day of the first month.] As was enjoined Exod. xii. 6. The Jews had the free exercise of their religion in Babylon (as I shall observe more largely afterward), where they circumcised their children, and also made proselytes; but the children of the captivity signified those who were come back from it, and ate the passover, which they could not have done if they had not been circumcised.

Ver. 20. For the priests and the Levites were purified together, all of them were pure, and killed the passover for all the children of the captivity, and for their brethren the priests, and for themselves.] They had time to purify themselves between the day wherein the temple was perfected, and the day wherein this feast was to be kept, there being above a month between.

Ver. 21. And the children of Israel, which were come again out of captivity, and all such as had separated themselves unto them from the filthiness of the heathen of the land, to seek the Lord God of Israel, did eat.] That is, all proselytes, who had entirely made themselves subject to the law of Moses; for others might not eat of it, but they might, (Exod. xii. 48, 49.) Now, as Pellicanus observes, there were many proselytes who quite forsook their heathenish religion, and were brought to the knowledge and worship of the true God, by the favour of Cyrus and Darius, kings of Persia. They had kept the Passover before this, being in the place which God chose, and having an altar where they might sacrifice; but it was not a quiet and settled time, and they had much occasion to be among the heathen; and so, it is likely, could not easily purify themselves to eat of it, as they did now.

Ver. 22. And kept the feast of unleavened bread seven days with joy: for the Lord had made them joyful, and turned the heart of the king of Assyria unto them, to strengthen their hands in the work of the house of God, the God of Israel.] God filled their hearts with joy, by turning the heart of the king, who now reigned over all the kingdoms which were formerly under the power of the Assyrians, who had grievously oppressed them, as the Persians who came in their stead now highly favoured them; who having conquered Babylon, were called the kings of Assyria. For we find in these books, the king of Persia, after that conquest, is called by the name of the king of Babylon, (see Nehem. xiii. 6.) as the same king of Persia is here called the king of Assyria: for the kings formerly called by these names were possessed of vast dominions over many large provinces; which the Persian kings enjoying, they retained the ancient names of the former kings. For, as Joh. Vorstius observes, in his Dissert. de Quatuor Monarchiis, sect. 9. the kingdom of Babylon was not extinguished by little and little, but all at once: Cyrus possessed himself of it entirely, simul et semel; and, adding a vast dominion to the small one he had before, was called the king of those dominions which he conquered.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. NOW after these things, in the reign of Artaxerxes king of Persia.] The same Artaxerxes, I suppose, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 14. But R. Solomon and Aben Ezra fancy he was Darius beforenamed.

Ezra the son of Seraiah, the son of Azariah, the son of Hilkiah.] He was descended from Seraiah, but not immediately begotten by him; for Seraiah perished when Jerusalem was taken by the Chaldeans: (2 Kings xxv. 18. 21.) at which time Ezra, it is likely, was not in being; but he was his grandson, or great-grandson, and his descent is mentioned from him, because he was an eminent person, who flourished before the destruction of the temple, whereas his father or grandfather lived obscurely in their captivity. (See 1 Chron. vi. 15.)

Ver. 2. The son of Shallum, the son of Zadok, the son of Ahitub.

Ver. 3. The son of Amariah, the son of Azariah, the son of Meraioth.] In this genealogy there are six generations omitted, between Azariah and Meraioth (as before there were some between Seraiah and Ezra), which are to be supplied out of 1 Chron. vi. 7, &c. which Kimchi, as I there observed, thinks was done for brevity's sake. For Ezra being author of that book, which was written first, and then of this, might think it needless to repeat all that he had there said at large.

Ver. 4. The son of Zerahiah, the son of Uzzi, the son of Bukki.

Ver. 5. The son of Abishua, the son of Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the chief priest.] See 1 Chron. vi. 4, 5.

Ver. 6. This Ezra went up from Babylon.] Not only by the king's leave and his commission, but with great authority, as appears from the end of this verse, and from ver. 25.

And he was a ready scribe in the law of Moses, which the Lord God of Israel had given.] He calls himself a scribe (as Buxtorf notes in his Tiberias), not from writing and describing, but from declaring and explicating, those things that are contained in the Scripture. For as sepher signifies a book, so sopher signifies one skilful and learned in that book, an interpreter and teacher out of it. And there being no book comparable to the book of the law, therefore sopher became a name of great dignity, and signified one that taught God's law, and expounded it to his people. Thus, in the New Testament, Γραμματεῖς, the scribes, were those that instructed the people. For when our Saviour is said to have taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes, it plainly shews that they were teachers, though not with such authority. See Jer. viii. 8. where the word scribe is thus used.

And he calls himself a ready scribe, because he was expert in the law, and understood it thoroughly, both in all things belonging to the priesthood, and to the civil power; in which he was so well versed, that he could give a ready account of any part of it. And it is thought by some, he gathered together the most perfect copies of the law, and put out an accurate edition of it, with all the prophetical books, and such poems as had any sacred authority among them, adding the history of following times. But Josephus saith nothing of it, and therefore it is looked upon by others as a Jewish chimera, who attribute many other things to him without ground.

And the king granted him all his request.] Some think to rebuild Jerusalem, of which there is no mention any where: therefore he only granted him power, as he desired, to do such things as are mentioned below, (ver. 14, 15, &c.)

According to the hand of the Lord his God upon him.] For God was so favourable to him, as to incline the king to give a gracious answer to his petition. And, indeed, these kings of Persia were so exceeding kind to the Jews, that, in a grateful remembrance of the favour they shewed them, in permitting them to build the temple again, and assisting them in it, they caused a figure of the city and palace of Shushan (where the kings of Persia resided) to be made in brass, in the east gate of the temple, which looked towards Persia; as we read in the Talmud, in the treatise called Middoth.

Ver. 7. And there went up some of the children of Israel.] Of the ten tribes, or such Jews as remained still in Babylon, after leave given them by Cyrus to return into their own country.

And of the priests, and the Levites, and the singers, and the porters, and the Nethinims, unto Jerusalem, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes the king.] This was the second company that went up to Jerusalem, consisting of such-like persons as went up first with Zerubbabel, Jeshua, and others, (chap. ii. 2. 70.) For hearing the temple was rebuilt, and the worship of God restored, we may very well think many went along with Ezra, who had not such a strong motive to go in the first of Cyrus.

Ver. 8. And he came to Jerusalem in the fifth month, which was in the seventh year of the king.

Ver. 9. For upon the first day of the first month began he to go up from Babylon, and on the first day of the fifth month came he to Jerusalem.] On the first day of the first month they went from Babylon to the river Ahava, where they spent three days in taking a view of the people that accompanied him, (chap. viii. 15.) After eight days more, part of which they had spent in fasting and prayer, they went forward, (chap. viii. 21, 22. 31.)

According to the good hand of his God upon him.] He had great reason to acknowledge the favour of God to them in conducting them safe to Jerusalem; for it was a long way thither, and a difficult journey, and they had many impediments (going with wives and children, flocks and herds), and were not without enemies to waylay them, whom he boasted he did not fear, but relied on the Divine protection, as he told the king, chap. viii. 22.

Ver. 10. For Ezra had prepared his heart to seek the law of the Lord, and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments.] He was intent upon this business, on which he had set his heart, as we speak, bending his thoughts and studies this way. For so the Hebrew word cun (which we translate prepare) signifies, to establish, confirm, and make things fixed and immoveable. And first, he set himself to seek the law of the Lord, that is, to inquire into it, and search after the will of God therein contained, that he might understand it himself: and then, like a good man, he set his heart to do what God commanded, and put in practice what he knew to be his duty, whereby he was the better qualified to teach others what he knew and did himself, which was the next thing which he diligently attended. This was the right method of doing good, in which Nehemiah tells us he proceeded, (chap. viii. beginning.) Some think statutes and judgments are the same thing, comprehending all the precepts of Moses; but others take them to have a distinct meaning: the first signifying the ceremonial law about the Divine worship; and the second, the moral precepts concerning common honesty and civil life.

Ver. 11. Now, this is the copy of the letter that the king Artaxerxes gave unto Ezra the priest, the scribe, even a scribe of the words of the commandments of the Lord, and of his statutes to Israel.] Here Ezra declares that he was no ordinary doctor of the law, but of eminent rank among them, who had studied the law thoroughly, and was able in every case to determine what was to be done: or (as some understand the latter part of this verse), he was perfectly skilled in the words or language wherein the law was written (which in the captivity many perhaps had forgotten), and in the sense of every law. But this, I think, is not to be supposed, that they had forgotten their own language.

Ver. 12. Artaxerxes, king of kings.] For he had several kings who were subject to him.

Unto Ezra the priest, a scribe of the law of the God of heaven.] So Ezra, I suppose, was wont to be styled by the Jews, who never spake of him, but as a man of greater dignity and honour than others.

Perfect peace, and at such a time.] On such a year and day, as was mentioned in the date of the letter.

Ver. 13. I make a decree, that all they of the people of Israel, and of his priests and Levites, in my realm, which are minded of their own free-will to go up to Jerusalem, go with thee.] None might leave his country without the king's permission, which he here gives to all the Jewish nation who were so disposed.

Ver. 14. Forasmuch as thou art sent of the king, and of his seven counsellors.] By whose advice this decree being made, it gave it the greater authority; for these were the principal men of the kingdom, as appears from the first of Esther, ver. 14.

To inquire concerning Judah and Jerusalem, according to the law of thy God.] By this composition he gave him authority to make inquisition in Judea, whether every thing there was done conformably to the law of Moses: that is, he granted to the Jewish nation an αὐτονομία, a liberty to live by their own laws, and to judge all causes according to them; and, in the conclusion, granted them also an αὐτοδικία, a power to sentence men according to their own law, (ver. 25, 26.)

Which is in thine hand.] He entrusted Ezra with this great power of being supreme inquisitor and judge, because he was so very well skilled in the law (which is meant by having it in his hand), which he had in such readiness, and was so very conversant in it, that he was able presently to determine and judge whether it were observed.

Ver. 15. And to carry the silver and the gold, which the king and his counsellors have freely offered unto the God of Israel, whose habitation is in Jerusalem.] This is an argument that they had a high opinion of the God of Israel, and desired his favour, though they did not worship him alone, but imagined other gods had some power, though not so great as he.

Ver. 16. And all the silver and gold that thou canst find in the province of Babylon, with the free-will-offering of the people, and of the priests, offering willingly for the house of their God which is in Jerusalem.] He gave them leave to carry away all the money they could procure (so the word we translate find is used in other places) in his own country of Babylon, as well as what the Jews, who had a mind to stay still there, should offer for the service of the temple at Jerusalem.

Ver. 17. That thou mayest buy speedily with this money bullocks, rams, lambs, with their meat-offerings, and their drink-offerings, and offer them upon the altar of the house of your God which is in Jerusalem.] That they might pray for the prosperity of the king and of his sons, as Darius ordered, chap. vi. 9, 10.

Ver. 18. And whatsoever shall seem good to thee, and to thy brethren, to do with the rest of the silver and gold, that do after the will of your God.] He authorizes Ezra to take other priests to his assistance, in disposing of the money that was not laid out in sacrifices; only he would have it employed to some sacred use.

Ver. 19. The vessels also that are given thee for the service of the house of thy God, those deliver thou before the God of Jerusalem.] He speaks of him as if he thought him a particular God, but afterward speaks of him as the God of heaven, as he had done before, ver. 12. which is a sign he took him to be the most high God, who had a special affection for Jerusalem, because he was there worshipped.

Ver. 20. And whatsoever more shall be needful for the house of thy God, which thou shalt have occasion to bestow.] Either for the reparation (if any was wanting), or for the adorning of the house. (See ver. 27.)

Bestow it out of the king's treasure-house.] Out of his exchequer, as we now speak.

Ver. 21. And I, even I, Artaxerxes the king, do make a decree to all the treasurers which are beyond the river.] All the receivers, and other officers employed about the king's revenue.

That whatsoever Ezra the priest, the scribe of the law of the God of heaven, shall require of you, it be done speedily.] This was a wonderful large concession, that he should have whatsoever he desired; and that they should not make him attend upon them, and wait long for it, but furnish him immediately.

Ver. 22. Unto a hundred talents of silver, and to a hundred measures of wheat, and to a hundred baths of wine, and to a hundred baths of oil, and salt without prescribing how much.] He limits all the other expenses, except salt; without which no sacrifice could be offered: and therefore, since he would not have any sacrifice hindered, he did not prescribe any measure of that; but left them to take as much as they found necessary.

Ver. 23. Whatsoever is commanded by the God of heaven, let it be diligently done for the house of the God of heaven.] Here Jacobus Capellus cries out in a kind of rapture, "O verba literis aureis regum palatus inscribenda, atque adeo stylo adamantino fidelium omnium animis insculpenda!" O words to be written upon the palaces of kings in golden letters, and engraven on the minds of all the faithful with a style of adamant! For they express an exceeding great sense of God, and of his supreme authority; and the regard that is due from the greatest kings and potentates to his most sacred commands, (Historia Sacra et Exotica, ad A. M. 3543.) The like is not easy to be found any where.

For why should there be wrath against the realm of the king and his sons?] As he was afraid there would be, if the worship and service of God was here neglected through his default. An argument he was possessed with a greater dread of God's just displeasure, than the kings of Judah themselves were generally before the captivity. The mention of the king and of his sons, shews, that this agrees to Artaxerxes Mnemon exactly; but not to Xerxes (who was in Greece in the seventh year of his reign), nor to Longimanus: but Artaxerxes Mnemon had then Ochus the husband of Esther, who was a great man, and some more. This remark I owe to the most learned Dr. Alix.

Ver. 24. Also we certify you, that, touching any of the priests and Levites, singers, porters, Nethinims, or ministers of this house of God, it shall not be lawful to impose toll, tribute, or custom, upon them.] The king's revenue arose out of these three imposts, as appears by chap. iv. 13. from all which burdens, which were very great, the king freed every one of God's ministers, that they might the more cheerfully attend his service. And this was confirmed by some succeeding princes, as Bertram observes, (de Republica Jud. p. 171.) which the first Christian kings piously imitated, as J. Wolfius notes, "that they who watched and prayed for the public good, might be free from all other cares."

Ver. 25. And thou, Ezra, after the wisdom of thy God that is in thine hand.] According as the law of God directed, in which he was very expert, (ver. 14.)

Set magistrates and judges, which may judge all the people that are beyond the river.] Such as Moses ordered, Deut. xvi. 18. Here seems to be the original of the Sanhedrin, which continued but weakly till the time of the Maccabees.

All such as know the laws of thy God; and teach ye them that know them not.] Men well acquainted with the laws of God, who were able to instruct others that were ignorant. No Jewish king could have given more pious instructions. And the same Jacobus Capellus in the place abovenamed thinks, that in this large power granted to Ezra, there was comprehended sufficient authority to build the walls of Jerusalem. But as the king did not expressly mention it, so the malignity of the Jews' enemies hindered it; and Ezra being now grown old, was unable to cope with them. But this is not a good reason, for he lived thirteen years after this, able to stand and read the law from six to twelve of the clock.

Ver. 26. And whosoever will not do the law of thy God, and the law of the king.] By the law of the king is meant this decree, which was now made in favour of the Jews; giving them authority to execute their own laws again. As for the imperial laws Ezra had nothing to do with them, nor were the Jews to be governed by them, but by their own laws; unless any matters could not be determined by the Divine laws: in that case they were to be judged by the king's law. So Joh. Vorstius understands these words disjunctively, (in his Dissert. de Synedriis Hebr. sect. 36.) that they should act according to the direction of the Divine law; or, if any thing fell out that could not be defined by that, then according to the prescription of the laws of the king.

Let judgment be executed speedily upon him, whether it be unto death.] The Romans never allowed the Jews the power of life and death, which the Persians did. So it is commonly thought; but the contrary is plain from the Acts of the Apostles, which shew they enjoyed that power, by their stoning St. Stephen.

Or to banishment, or to confiscation of goods, or to imprisonment.] That word which we translate banishment, signifies in the Chaldee (as we note in the margin of our Bibles) rooting out; and therefore is by some interpreted disinheriting, or excommunicating from their society; so that he should be an outlaw, as we speak, the highest degree of which was called shammathah. And thus our Mr. Thorndike observes, that this rooting out is the same with that which in chap. x. 8. is called being divided or separated from the congregation of the captivity; being, indeed, a kind of temporal outlawry, unto which is joined confiscation of goods. And thus the greater excommunication among Christians is every where a temporal punishment; viz. in respect of some temporal punishment attending it in Christian states: which in Christianity is accidental, by an act of those states; but in Judaism was essential, so long as those temporal advantages, which were essential conditions of the law, were not forfeited. And this without doubt is the same punishment that is called putting out of the synagogue. (See Rites of the Church in a Christian State, p. 28. and Review, p. 58. with Grotius, de Imper. Sum. Potest. cap. 9.) I only add, that from such sentence it was in vain for them to appeal to any of the king's courts: for by this decree all matters were to be tried and finally judged by their own law.

Ver. 27. Blessed be the Lord God of our fathers, which hath put such a thing as this in the king's heart, to beautify the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem.] To be so liberal in his gifts and privileges, as is before expressed, (ver. 15, 16, &c.)

Ver. 28. And hath extended mercy unto me.] These words plainly shew Ezra wrote this part of this book, if not the whole.

Before the king and his counsellors, and before all the king's mighty princes.] By whose advice and consent the large immunities beforementioned were granted to the Jewish nation.

And I was strengthened as the hand of the Lord my God was upon me; and I gathered together out of Israel chief men to go up with me.] Whose names follow in the next chapter. The marvellous kindness of the king in this grant to Ezra gave a great authority to him; and moved several of the greatest persons among the Jews still in Babylon, to resolve to accompany him to Jerusalem.

These two last verses are evidently the words of Ezra, acknowledging the Divine goodness to him, in giving him such favour with the king; whose words before are in the Syriac or Chaldee language; but these are in the Hebrew.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. THESE are now the chief of their fathers, and this is the genealogy of them that went up with me from Babylon, in the reign of Artaxerxes the king.] Whose names he sets down to preserve their memory to future generations.

Ver. 2. Of the sons of Phinehas; Gershom: of the sons of Ithamar; Daniel.] By the sons, he means the families of these two persons; two of which he particularly names, Gershom and Daniel: not Daniel the prophet, but some eminent person of Ithamar's family.

Of the sons of David; Hattush.] His family was so noble, because Christ was to spring from thence, that special notice was taken of it.

Ver. 3. Of the sons of Shechaniah, of the sons of Pharosh; Zechariah.] This Shechaniah is said to be the son of Pharosh, to distinguish him from another Shechaniah mentioned ver. 5.

And with him.] That is, with Zechariah.

Were reckoned, by genealogy of the males, a hundred and fifty.] It is not said how many there were of the other families: and we are not to think that none but males went up out of this family, and the rest that follow; for mention is made of their little ones, ver. 21. who had women, no doubt, to look after them.

Ver. 4. Of the sons of Pahath-Moab; Elihoenai the son of Zerahiah, and with him two hundred males.

Ver. 5. Of the sons of Shechaniah; the son of Jahaziel, and with him three hundred males.] This was a person of great note, of whose family there went up almost twice as many as did of any other family.

Ver. 6. Of the sons also of Adin; Ebed the son of Jonathan, and with him fifty males.

Ver. 7. And of the sons of Elam; Jeshaiah the son of Athaliah, and with him seventy males.] Concerning these, and the families that follow to ver. 15. there is little to be noted; but that out of them many went up with Zerubbabel in the reign of Cyrus (which appears by the account given in the second chapter), as now more went up with Ezra out of the very same families.

Ver. 8. And of the sons of Shephatiah; Zebadiah the son of Michael, and with him fourscore males.

Ver. 9. Of the sons of Joab; Obadiah the son of Jehiel, and with him two hundred and eighteen males.

Ver. 10. And of the sons of Shelomith; the son of Josiphiah, and with him a hundred and threescore males.

Ver. 11. And of the sons of Bebai; Zechariah the son of Bebai, and with him twenty and eight males.

Ver. 12. And of the sons of Azgad; Johanan the son of Hakkatan, and with him a hundred and ten males.

Ver. 13. And of the last sons of Adonikam, whose names are these, Eliphelet, Jeiel, and Shemaiah, and with them threescore males.] They are called the last sons, with respect to the first of them that went up with Zerubbabel. Or, these were the last that followed Ezra: which some look upon as a blot on Adonikam, that his family was the last that accompanied Ezra.

Ver. 14. Of the sons also of Bigvai; Uthai, and Zabbud, and with them seventy males.

Ver. 15. And I gathered them together to the river that runneth to Ahava.] This seems to be the name of a river, as well as of a town, which stood on the bank of Euphrates, there where this stream emptied itself into it. Some take it for Adiabene, a city so called from Adiava, ver. 31.

And there abode we in tents three days.] It is likely, that in the whole journey they lodged, not in cities and towns, but in tents, which they carried along with them; and could pitch where and when it was most commodious for them.

And I viewed the people.] Took an account of their number, and of what tribe they were.

And the priests, and found there were none of the sons of Levi.] That is, none who were not priests: of whom there were some, (ver. 2.)

Ver. 16. Then sent I for Eliezer, for Ariel, for Shemaiah, and for Elnathan, and for Jarib, and for Elnathan, and for Nathan, and for Zechariah, and for Meshullam, chief men.] Men of authority among the company, and the heads perhaps of several families.

Also for Joiarib, and for Elnathan, men of understanding.] These eleven persons he sent for to come to him, that he might employ them in a message to a place, where he knew there were a great many Levites; as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 17. And I sent them with commandment unto Iddo the chief.] Among the Levites, who dwelt at the place next mentioned, and there had the free exercise of their religion, as this and many other passages in this book plainly enough prove. And it is very probable, they had their synagogues (as they had afterward in their dispersion), or other places, where they met for religious worship. For we find the people resorting to Ezekiel in their captivity, and him preaching to them the word of God, in many places of his book, particularly chap. xxxiii. 30, 31, &c. And Ezra, in all likelihood, was an instructor among them, as Joiarib and Elnathan also were, and Iddo, to whom these were sent. By which means many proselytes were made, who left their own country, and came with them to Jerusalem, when they returned, (chap. vi. 21.)

At the place Casiphia.] Several are of opinion, and particularly Stephanus Morinus lately, that this place was in the country of the Caspii, a people who gave denomination to the Caspian Sea: where some of the Israelites were planted, who were carried captive by Shalmaneser, and still preserved their language and religion. But I look upon this as unlikely; the Caspian Sea and the country about it being too far off for Ezra to send thither these messengers: who rather went to a place in the province of Babylon, to which they went, and did a great deal of business, and returned in the space of twelve days. The truth is (as Dr. Alix observes) the Levites were not among the ten tribes, but in Chaldea: and, perhaps, some of them were transported into Parthia, where there was a city called Caspi, known to the old geographers.

And I told them what they should say unto Iddo, and to his brethren the Nethinims, at the place Casiphia.] Who, it seems, were better disposed than many of the Levites, to whom they ministered. But R. Solomon and others translate the words quite otherwise; He told them what they should say to Iddo and his brethren (or, to Achio), who were constituted in the place Casiphia. For it is plain they were not Nethinims, Iddo being called Harosh, a prince, or chief, that is, among the Levites: by whose authority Ezra expected some Levites, whom he wanted to accompany him to Jerusalem, should be sent to him, as they were. Now this cannot be said of the Nethinims; for none of them were chiefs, or presidents of the Levites, but their ministers or servants, as appears from ver. 20. and other places. Therefore the word Nethinim must here signify men appointed to live among the Jews of that place; or, who had their residence there.

That they should bring unto us ministers for the house of our God.] That is, Levites to attend upon the priests, as the Nethinims did upon the Levites.

Ver. 18. And, by the good hand of our God upon us.] God inclined their hearts to comply with his desire.

They brought us a man of understanding, of the sons of Mahli, the son of Levi, the son of Israel; and Sherebiah, with his sons and his brethren, eighteen.] They brought a man of understanding, viz. Sherebiah (so the words, I think, should be translated), with his sons and brethren, eighteen in number.

Ver. 19. And Hashabiah, and with him Jeshaiah of the sons of Merari, his brethren, and their sons, twenty.] These were eminent persons also, though not equal to Sherebiah, who is noted as a man of great knowledge.

Ver. 20. Also of the Nethinims, whom David and the princes had appointed for the service of the Levites, two hundred and twenty Nethinims.] Every one knows, that the Gibeonites were addicted by Joshua to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, for the service of God's house; but a great many of them being destroyed by Saul, there were not enough remaining to serve in those ministries. And therefore David (as Bertram thinks, in his book de Repub. Jud. p. 277.) appointed some other persons to the same employment; and afterward Solomon appointed more; who are called therefore Solomon's servants: all which, both Gibeonites and those who were added to them by David and Solomon, were known by the name of Nethinims, as much as to say, dedititii, or ascriptitii, men given, as the Hebrew word denotes: for, as the Levites were given to the priests, (Numb. viii. 16. 19.) so were these given to the Levites. And this is said to have been done by David and the princes, because David advised with the consistory about it, who are called the princes, 2 Chron. xxx. 2. xxxi. 8. (See Mr. Thorndike, Rites of the Church, p. 231.) But I have observed elsewhere, that these Nethinims were distinct from the Gibeonites, and of a higher rank in the service of God. (See 1 Chron. ix. 2.)

All of them were expressed by name.] I suppose Iddo sent the names of every one of them, though they are not all here mentioned.

Ver. 21. Then I proclaimed a fast there, at the river of Ahava, that we might afflict ourselves before our God, to seek of him a right way for us, and for our little ones, and for all our substance.] He being the leader of this colony, had authority from the king to command whatsoever he pleased for the good of it. And nothing was more necessary, than humbly and sorrowfully to acknowledge their offences against God, and beg his gracious pardon; and that he would prosper them in their journey, and direct them in the best way to bring themselves and all they had safe to Jerusalem: which was the end of this fast.

Ver. 22. For I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen to help us against the enemy in the way: because we had spoken unto the king, saying, The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him; but his power and his wrath is against all them that forsake him.] He might have obtained from the king any thing that he desired; but he had so openly declared, that he depended solely upon God for safe conduct, that he was ashamed to ask a guard of the king to secure them in their passage, from those enemies that he knew would waylay them; (ver. 31.) for the king not being much instructed in Divine matters, might imagine, that all were vain boasts which the Jews had made of the favour of God to them, and of the prophecies concerning their restoration: which made Ezra and others so confident, as only to desire leave to return to their own country; and as for a safe passage, they took no care, but to commit themselves to God, who would defend his own people that trusted in him. To ask therefore protection and defence from the king, would look as if they distrusted the power and favour of their God, concerning whom they had spoken so magnificently. But it was highly necessary they should beseech that of God, which they would not ask of the king; which they did by fasting and prayer.

Ver. 23. So we fasted, and besought our God for this; and he was entreated of us.] Gave them some assurance that their petitions should be granted. Some think, this fast lasted eight days, beginning after the three days mentioned above, ver. 15. For they began to go out of Babylon on the first day of the month, (chap. vii. 9.) and they stayed at Ahava three days to take a view of their company; and went from thence on the twelfth, (ver. 31.) And therefore they must either keep this fast eight days, or else they were seven days in coming from Babylon, and other places, to Ahava; where a general rendezvous, as we speak, was appointed. And this I take to be most probable, that they came out of Babylon on the first day, and expected at Ahava till all their company was got together, which was about the seventh day; and they all rested three days to make a complete muster of the whole number, and fasted one day; and so began to take their journey from Ahava on the twelfth.

Ver. 24. Then I separated twelve of the chief of the priests, Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and ten of their brethren with them.] With whom he might entrust the gifts that had been offered for the temple. These ten men, perhaps, were principal Levites, who were added to the two priests to take this charge upon them. (See ver. 29.)

Ver. 25. And weighed unto them the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, even the offering of the house of our God, which the king, and his counsellors, and his lords, and all Israel there present, had offered.] That they might have no excuse if they were any way embezzled.

Ver. 26. I even weighed unto their hand six hundred and fifty talents of silver, and silver vessels a hundred talents, and of gold a hundred talents.] Or, a hundred silver vessels, according to their talents; that is, every one a talent.

Ver. 27. Also twenty basons of gold of a thousand drachms, and two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold.] They were not worth their weight in gold; but they were of great value, being scarce and rare: as that metal called aurichalcum was; which might be the reason why there was no more than two of them.

Ver. 28. And I said unto them, Ye are holy unto the Lord; the vessels are holy also.] They being men consecrated to God's service, were bound above all others to be faithful in the discharge of their duty, especially being entrusted with holy things; which were therefore to be carefully delivered at Jerusalem, just as they were committed to their trust.

And the silver and the gold are a free-will-offering unto the Lord God of your fathers.] Which made them still more sacred.

Ver. 29. Watch ye, and keep them, until ye weigh them before the chief of the priests and the Levites, and chief of the fathers of Israel, at Jerusalem, in the chambers of the house of the Lord.] Where they were deposited, after they had given an account of them there, to the persons here mentioned; who received them by the same weight, that they were delivered unto those that brought them.

Ver. 30. So took the priests and the Levites the weight of the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, to bring them to Jerusalem, unto the house of our God.] This shews, that some of these twelve men (mentioned ver. 26.) if not ten of them were Levites, and not all priests.

Ver. 31. Then we departed from the river of Ahava.] Which run by that city into Euphrates.

On the twelfth day of the first month, to go unto Jerusalem.] To pursue their intended journey,

And the hand of our God was upon us.] To protect and strengthen them in so dangerous and long a journey.

And he delivered us from the hand of the enemy, and of such as lay in wait by the way.] There were not only many enemies who hated them, and were desirous to cut them off, but many robbers who watched for a booty, whom God either diverted some other way, or disheartened from attempting any thing against them; or, perhaps, directed them (as they prayed, ver. 21.) into some uncommon ways, in which people were not wont to travel, whereby they escaped their enemies.

Ver. 32. And we came to Jerusalem, and abode there three days.] Before they did any thing. For it was necessary to rest and refresh themselves awhile, after so tedious a journey, in which they spent above a quarter of a year. (See chap. vii. 9.) Their friends also, it is likely, came to visit them in these three days' time, and welcome them to Jerusalem.

Ver. 33. Now, on the fourth day was the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, weighed in the house of our God by the hand of Meremoth the son of Uriah the priest; and with him was Eleazar the son of Phinehas; and with them was Jozabad the son of Jeshua, and Noadiah the son of Binnui, Levites.] The names of Eleazar and Phinehas continued through many generations among the priests, because they were two very eminent persons in Aaron's family. And, as there were some Levites charged with this treasure to bring it to Jerusalem, so there were some of them who saw them discharge themselves of their trust.

Ver. 34. By number and by weight of every one: and all the weight was written at that time.] There was a public record made of it; and the persons forementioned, who brought the money and the vessels, were discharged by a public instrument, signed by them that received it. Or, perhaps, the meaning may be, that there was an inventory taken of the goods belonging to the temple, which the priests were charged withal, as the stewards of a family are wont to be with the goods belonging to it.

Ver. 35. Also the children of those that had been carried away, which were come out of the captivity.] That is, this company who came up from Babylon with Ezra.

Offered burnt-offerings unto the God of Israel.] To express their gratitude to God for their restoration.

Twelve bullocks for all Israel.] One for every tribe.

Ninety and six rams, seventy and seven lambs, twelve he-goats, for a sin-offering.] For all Israel, whether still remaining in Babylon, or returned to Jerusalem.

All this was a burnt-offering unto the Lord.] All the rest (except the he-goats) were a burnt-offering; whereby they acknowledged the Lord for their God.

Ver. 36. And they delivered the king's commissions unto the king's lieutenants, and to the governors on this side the river.] That they might know the king's pleasure, and what privileges he had granted them, which are recited in the foregoing chapter.

And they furthered the people, and the house of God.] Yielded obedience to the king's orders.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. NOW, when these things were done.] When he had shewn his commission, and it appeared that he had power to reform all abuses, and see the laws of Moses observed by all the Jews, (chap. vii. 14.)

The princes came to me, saying, The people of Israel, and the priests, and the Levites, have not separated themselves from the people of the lands.] Some of the great men came to him with a grievous complaint, that unlawful marriages were practised among them with those wicked nations whom God had forbidden them to mingle withal: which was the more to be lamented, because not only the people, but the priests themselves and the Levites, were guilty of this sin.

Doing according to their abominations.] This is commonly an expression, signifying worshipping of idols, which are called abominations in Scripture; but here signifies only imitation of the heathen in promiscuous marriages with any nation whatsoever, which would soon lead them to commit idolatry. For these words in the Hebrew run thus, Have not separated themselves from the people of the land, according to their abominations (the word doing is not there); which Mr. Mede rightly interprets, according to the several kinds of idolaters in the land round about them.

Even of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Jebusites, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Egyptians, and the Amorites.] By this it appears, that, as marriages with the seven nations of Canaan were expressly forbidden, (Deut. vii. 2, 3.) so Ezra thought that law extended to all other nations, who were not proselyted to the Jews' religion. And this is the common opinion of the Hebrew doctors, as Mr. Selden shews, lib. v. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 12. For even before the law of Moses, it seems to be thought unlawful, after they had received the covenant of circumcision, for the seed of Abraham to marry with other nations that were uncircumcised, (Gen. xxxiv. 14.)

Ver. 2. For they have taken of their daughters for themselves, and for their sons; so that the holy seed have mingled themselves with the people of those lands.] They are called a holy seed, because of the covenant of God with them, which made them a peculiar people, separated from all other nations.

Yea, the hand of the princes and rulers hath been chief in this trespass.] The case was the more dangerous, because the great men of the nation were the principal offenders, (chap. x. 18. 23.) whose example the people followed without fear of punishment. It is likely, those princes who informed Ezra of this enormous practice had endeavoured to reform them, but could not, because they were opposed by as great men as themselves. But we must not cast away all hope, though we cannot presently reform men's lives; the time may come when it may be done.

Ver. 3. And when I heard this thing, I rent my garment and my mantle.] Both his inner and upper garment; which was a token not only of very great grief and sorrow, but expressed his sense of the Divine displeasure. For the Jews rent their clothes when they apprehended God to be highly offended. (See Grotius upon Matt. xxvi. 65.) The Talmudists say, the high-priest rent his garments otherwise than other men, not above from the shoulders to the bottom, but below at his feet, and the skirts of his garments, upward.

And plucked off the hair of my head, and of my beard.] This was still a higher sign of exceeding great grief; for in ordinary sorrow they only neglected their hair, and let it hang down scattered in a careless manner; but this was used in bitter lamentations, even among the heathens. So Bochart observes out of many authors, particularly Homer, in several places. For example, speaking of Ulysses and his companions bewailing the death of Elpenor, he saith, Odyss. x.

Ἑζόμενοι δ' ἐνταῦθα γόων, τίλλοντο τε χαίτας.

They sitting down there howled and plucked off their hairs. (See Hieroz. lib. ii. cap. 35.) To shave the head or the beard was another thing; which the law forbade the Jews in their mourning for the dead, because it was a custom of their idolatrous neighbours, whose manners he would not have them imitate.

And sat down astonied.] With amazement that they should be so ungrateful to God, who had delivered them from captivity, and with an apprehension of their danger, there being so open a breach of the Divine law, which had formerly proved their ruin.

Ver. 4. Then were assembled unto me every one that trembled at the words of the God of Israel.] Which it is likely he read to them, and told them the importance of them.

Because of the transgression of those that had been carried away.] Into Babylon, but now were returned to their own land, little or nothing amended, either by their banishment or their restoration. He speaks not of those who were lately come back with him, but of those who came back with Zerubbabel, and of their children.

And I sat astonied until the evening sacrifice.] When the people used to meet together to worship God.

Ver. 5. And at the evening sacrifice I arose up from my heaviness.] Wherein he had sat ever since he heard of their foul transgression.

And, having rent my garment and my mantle.] He mentions that again, because he still continued and appeared in a mournful condition.

I fell upon my knees, and spread out my hands unto the Lord my God.] But put himself now into the posture of an humble supplicant to the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 6. And said, O my God, I am ashamed and blush to lift up my face to thee, my God: for our iniquities are increased over our head, and our trespass is grown up unto the heavens.] The sum of his confession and deprecation is this, which it may be useful to represent at once: That he was confounded when he thought of the greatness of their sins, which were ready to overwhelm them, and of the boldness and insolence of them beyond all measure; and that, though they had seen the Divine vengeance upon their forefathers (from whom they derived this impious disposition) in so terrible a manner, that they had not yet worn off the marks of his displeasure, (ver. 6, 7.) He had begun indeed to shew favour unto them; (ver. 8.) but this so much the more aggravated their wickedness, in that not very many years after he had been so gracious as to deliver a small handful of them, and given them a footing again in their own land, and in the holy place, and thereby had made them joyful, and given them life, as it were, from the dead, by restoring them to their liberty, they returned to their old provocations, and forgot both that they had been bondmen, and that God had been so kind to them in that bondage, as to make those whom they served to pity them, and give them leave to go to their own land, and build the house of their God, (ver. 8, 9.) What shall any one say for such a wretched people as this, (ver. 10.) who had no regard to their prophets, nor to Moses himself, who had charged them to have nothing to do with the people of Canaan, whom he intended to destroy, because they had defiled that land, but to separate themselves from them, and seek to root them out, which was the way to plant themselves firmly there for ever, (ver. 11, 12.) Can we expect less than utter destruction of this small remnant, when, after all the punishments he hath inflicted upon us for our sins, and his ceasing to punish us, and rescuing us in this manner from our captivity, we return to those sins which are so odious to him, because so expressly against his commandments? (ver. 13, 14.) if he deal so with us, we must acknowledge the justice of his proceedings. For when we remain a monument of his mercy, who are rescued (as is apparent) from our bondage, we are notwithstanding here before him in our offences so guilty, that we have nothing to plead for ourselves; we are not able to say one word to excuse our detestable ingratitude.

There cannot be a more pathetical supplication than this, taken altogether; several phrases of which it may be fit to explain.

For our iniquities are increased over our head.] A metaphor taken from deep waters, wherein men are drowned and ready to perish.

And our trespass is grown up unto the heavens.] This signifies, as I have expressed it in my paraphrase, the high presumption and insolence of their wickedness.

Ver. 7. Since the days of our fathers have we been in a great trespass unto this day, &c.] And therefore were punished unto this day, as the verse concludes. For many of their brethren were still in Babylon, or other countries, and they who returned were in danger to be undone for their continued sins.

Ver. 8. And to give us a nail in his holy place.] By nails or pins tents were fastened to the ground; therefore this signifies (as it is explained in the margin) a settled abode, after long banishment.

Ver. 9. To give us a reviving.] For Ezekiel compares them, when they were in Babylon, to the dry bones of dead men lying in their graves, (chap. xxxvii. 1, &c.)

And to give us a wall in Judah and Jerusalem.] From hence some infer, that the wall of Jerusalem, before Nehemiah came, was built as well as the temple. But the Hebrew word gedar should be otherwise translated; for it doth not properly signify a wall, but a hedge or fence, such as were made for the folds of sheep. Whereby Ezra expresses (as Huetius well notes) the singular care of God of them; who, being the Shepherd of Israel, had gathered together his scattered sheep, and brought them back into their ancient folds; wherein he preserved them safe, even when they had no wall to defend them, under the powerful protection of the king of Persia.

Ver. 10, 11, 12. These verses need no explication more than I have given in the paraphrase upon them.

Ver. 13. Our God hast punished us less than our iniquities deserve.] In the Hebrew the words are, hast withheld beneath our iniquities: that is, forborne to punish. For as, when God will no longer forbear, he is said to arise, and take vengeance: so here (as Lud. de Dieu observes), on the contrary, he is said to withhold himself below; that is, not to arise, but to wait patiently for their amendment.

Ver. 14. So that there should be no remnant nor escaping.] Not one of such a wicked nation left remaining, but all utterly extirpated.

Ver. 15. O Lord God of Israel, thou art righteous, &c.] Either the word righteous here signifies very merciful, which was the reason they were not destroyed as they deserved; or the next words must be translated, not for we remain, but though we remain escaped: that is, God's justice will not let us escape, though, for the present, he forbear to punish us.

Behold, we are before thee in our trespasses; for we cannot stand before thee because of this.] As this cannot be denied, so it cannot be defended or excused: but we must yield up ourselves to bear the punishment unto which thou wilt condemn us.

Thus he concludes this admirable representation of their condition; which is as much as if he had said, Unless we reform, I know not how to beg for mercy, but we must be undone, and that most justly. For he gives them no hope, intending to put them into a great terror and affrightment, and see how that would work upon their hearts. And we find in the next chapter (ver. 2.) it had this effect; that one stood up and spake in the name of all the rest, that they would renew their covenant with God, and put away these abominations (which was effectual repentance), and then they hope God would be merciful unto them.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. NOW, when Ezra had prayed, and when he had confessed, weeping and casting himself down before the house of God, there assembled unto him out of Israel a very great congregation of men, and women, and children: for the people wept very sore.] This prayer being made at the time of the evening sacrifice, (as we read before, chap. ix. 5.) when many assembled to worship God; and being uttered with great passion, and the highest expressions of grief and sorrow, it moved those very much who were present; especially to see such a person as Ezra, a priest of God, and a great ruler under the king of Persia, so dejected, full of fear, confusion, and astonishment: the report of which was presently carried through all Jerusalem, and, perhaps, to neighbouring places: which brought together a great number of people of all sorts, men, women, and children; who all made great lamentation, looking upon themselves as under the high displeasure of the Almighty.

Ver. 2. And Shechaniah the son of Jehiel, one of the sons of Elam, answered and said unto Ezra.] He seems to have been a good man, not being numbered among those that had trespassed; though several of his family were: even his own father, Jehiel, and several of his uncles, the sons of his grandfather Elam, (chap. v. 26.)

We have trespassed against our God, and have taken strange wives of the people of the land; yet now there is hope in Israel concerning this thing.] Ezra seemed to have given up all for gone, the more to awaken and affright them out of their sins; and therefore this person stands up to keep them from despair, and to propound a remedy, which he hoped would prove effectual. This he spake in the name of the rest; with the principal of which, perhaps, he had consulted.

Ver. 3. Now therefore let us make a covenant with our God to put away all the wives, and such as are born of them, according to the counsel of my lord, and of those that tremble at the commandment of our God; and let it be done according to the law.] That which was done contrary to the law of God was looked upon as null, and therefore these were accounted no marriages, and their children were no better than those we call bastards, and were not to be a part of the family, but to be put away with their mothers. St. Paul, indeed, allows the Corinthians to keep their pagan wives or husbands, because they had them before they were Christians; and there was no law of God or man against their marriages, as there was here a very strict law of God forbidding them. It may seem hard, indeed, that the children should be put away as well as their mothers; but they were unlawfully born, and must follow the condition of their mothers, and being educated in superstition, might corrupt other children: and therefore it was unlawful hereafter to marry with the children of these women, for they were reputed unclean, though their fathers were Israelites. Thus Maimonides reports the sense of the law to be, "A son begot of a gentile by an Israelite, is not to be accounted a son." If a son, indeed, were begot by a gentile of an Israelitish woman, the child was accounted an Israelite, for partus sequitur ventrem. But a child was of the same condition with his mother, and no regard was had to the father at all: so that if a child was begot by an Israelite, of a woman that was a slave, the child was a slave; but if, on the contrary, a woman of Israel had a child by one that was a slave, the child was as free as any other Israelite. (See Selden, in the place abovementioned, p. 616.)

But it is likely, when they put away these wives and children, they made some provision for them; for all was to be done according to the counsel of Ezra, and other good men, who feared God, and trembled to think his commandment was broke, and therefore judged they should be put away: but they prescribed the manner of it, how it should be done; which, it is probable, was not without some consideration of them.

Ver. 4. Arise.] For he lay prostrate upon the ground, (ver. 1.)

For this matter belongeth unto thee.] Who had the greatest skill in the law, and a full power from the king of Persia to see every thing done according unto it, (chap. vii. 14.) Now the renewing of the covenant for the observation of the law was to be done by the authority of the sovereign, as we see by the examples of Asa, Hezekiah, and Josiah: and therefore it is a great mistake (as Mr. Thorndike observes) to imagine the people could renew it, or any part of it, without the consent of the sovereign. From whence we may conclude, that Ezra having such a commission as is mentioned chap. vii. was established by the sovereign power, with an authority to execute the law against all transgressors.

We also will be with thee: be of good courage, and do it.] He promises his assistance, and the assistance of the principal persons: which might give him confidence of success.

Ver. 5. Then arose Ezra, and made the chief priests, the Levites, and all Israel.] All that were then present.

To swear, that they should do according to this word: and they sware.] He admonished them of their duty in the name of God, and then persuaded them to take a solemn oath (as they did) to put away their strange wives and children. For the commission given to Ezra supposing a full leave to the people to live according to the law, enabled him to govern them by it, yea, to swear them to observe it; for he might do whatsoever he found necessary to keep them in obedience.

Ver. 6. Then Ezra rose up from before the house of God.] This seems to signify, that he made them swear before he would rise up; that they, seeing his great humiliation before God, in the most doleful condition, might be moved to a more forward compliance.

And went into the chamber of Johanan the son of Eliashib.] That he might there consult with the princes and elders (ver. 8.) how to put this counsel in execution. This Eliashib was the high-priest who succeeded Joiakim, who succeeded Jeshua; who living a long time, his son Joiakim enjoyed the priesthood but a few years: and Eliashib lasted not long, but seems to have been dead (as Dr. Alix thinks) a little after the twentieth year of Artaxerxes Mnemon. (See Nehem. xii. 10.)

And when he came thither, he did eat no bread, nor drink water.] The word when is not in the Hebrew; therefore it had better be translated, till he came thither he had eaten nothing.

For he mourned because of the transgression of them that had been carried away.] And in time of mourning and sorrow they were wont to fast.

Ver. 7. And they made proclamation throughout Judah and Jerusalem unto all the children of the captivity, that they should gather themselves together unto Jerusalem.] This proclamation was issued forth by the counsel of the princes and elders mentioned in the next verse.

Ver. 8. And that whosoever would not come within three days.] This was a short time; but they were resolved to be speedy in the business, lest they that propounded it should cool, or any thing occur to hinder it.

According to the counsel of the princes and the elders.] It was a great power which the king of Persia entrusted Ezra withal; which he managed very discreetly: for he would not make the following decree by his own sole authority, without the advice of the Sanhedrin; which is generally thought to be meant by the princes and elders, viz. the high court of Jerusalem; for they that are here called princes, are ver. 14. called judges.

All his substance should be forfeited.] In the Hebrew, devoted. Which signifies, that his goods were to be so forfeited, as to become sacred to God; and so incapable to be restored to the former owner, being put into the treasury of God's house.

And himself separated from the congregation of those that had been carried away.] Excluded from their society, and all the benefits of their religion. (See chap. vii. 26.) This was a punishment inflicted by all nations on those who would not conform themselves to the laws; as Grotius observes, de Imperio Sum. Potest. circa Sacra, cap. 9. p. 242. edit. Hagæ, and Selden, de Synedr. lib. i. cap. 7. p. 146, 147. 150.

Ver. 9. Then all the men of Judah and Benjamin gathered themselves together unto Jerusalem within three days.] And all they of other tribes complied also with this proclamation, as appears from ver. 25. but these are alone mentioned, because they were the chief, and the others were mixed with them.

It was the ninth month, and the twentieth day of the month.] About a quarter of a year after Ezra and his company came to Jerusalem.

And all the people sat in the street of the house of God.] Some take this to be the street which led to the temple; but it was rather the court of the people where they worshipped; which lying open, and not being yet girt about with a wall, (as we may guess from Nehem. ii. 8.) is called a street.

Trembling because of this matter.] The offence they had committed against God, and the consequence thereof.

And for the great rain.] Which they took as a token of God's anger against them, because of their sin.

Ver. 10. And Ezra the priest stood up, and said unto them, Ye have transgressed, and have taken strange wives, to increase the trespass of Israel.] When they should have been bewailing their former sins, which cast them out of their land, they added new transgressions when they were restored to it.

Ver. 11. Now therefore make confession unto the Lord God of your fathers, and do his pleasure.] Confession of sin alone, without obedience to God's will and entire submission to him, is insufficient to reconciliation with him.

And separate yourselves from the people of the land, and from the strange wives.] There being no mention here made of their children, but only of their wives, it hath made some think that they kept their children, and by circumcision dedicated them to God, teaching them to renounce the infidelity of their mothers. For though Shechaniah propounded the putting away the children also, (ver. 3.) yet it may be thought that Ezra, to whom the matter was referred, mitigated the severity of it; because we do not read any thing of them, but only of the wives, when he came to order what should be done.

Ver. 12. Then all the congregation answered, and said with a loud voice, As thou hast said, so must we do.] They saw no other remedy, and therefore submitted to what he required, as the pleasure of God.

Ver. 13. But the people are many, and it is a time of much rain, and we are not able to stand without, neither is this a work of one day or two: for we have many that have transgressed in this thing.] They give very good reasons why for the present they should be dismissed, and more time taken to make inquisition after all the offenders, and examine them: and to shew they really desired the thing should be done, they propound a method, in the next verse, for the management of it.

Ver. 14. Let now our rulers of all the congregation stand, and let all them which have taken strange wives in our cities come at appointed times, and with them the elders of every city, and the judges thereof, until the fierce wrath of our God for this matter be turned from us.] They would have the great council at Jerusalem settled (for that is meant by let the rulers of all the congregation stand), and be ready to take cognizance of this matter; set days being appointed for the offenders in every city to be brought before them, by the elders and judges of those cities (that is, some delegates from the senate of that place), who should testify that they had seen the divorces made from their strange wives; for they were best able to know the circumstances of every person, and all his actions. And this they would have to continue, as long as there remained any thing to be done in this business; that the anger of God might be turned away from them. So De Dieu truly renders, I think, the last words of this verse:

How elders and judges differ, is a dispute among learned men. Sometimes they signify the same; but when they are mentioned together, it is reasonable to think their powers were distinct. And Campegius Vitringa seems to me to have given a good account of them; that by elders are meant the supreme senate in every city, who judged in all civil causes; and by judges (as distinct from the other) are meant judges of an inferior bench, by whom all money matters were tried. For though the senate might judge in all causes, yet it is reasonable to think they referred small matters to a lower court. This he gathers out of the Scriptures, and shews it is conformable to the traditions of the Talmudists. (De Synagoga Veter. lib. ii. cap. 9. p. 58. and see L'Empereur upon Bertram, de Repub. Jud. p. 395.)

Ver. 15. Only Jonathan the son of Asahel, and Jahaziah the son of Tikvah, were employed about this matter.] These were two priests, who were chosen to see all things done according to the foregoing resolution: that is, to appoint the time when the men of each city should come to bring in their names, and to acquaint the great council that these were elders and judges of the cities, who had seen their orders executed.

And Meshullam and Shabbethai the Levite helped them.] They were both of them Levites, as I take it, who were to assist the forenamed priests in so great a work.

Ver. 16. And the children of the captivity did so.] They who came up out of Babylon to their own country are constantly called the children of the captivity; to put them in mind of their servitude, and of their freedom from it.

And Ezra the priest, with certain chief of the fathers, after the house of their fathers, and all of them by their names, were separated.] Sequestered themselves from all other business, to attend wholly to the issue of this.

And sat down on the first day of the tenth month to examine the matter.] I cannot imagine what it was that they were set apart to examine, unless it was whether the persons beforenamed did their duty: for it is likely they brought the names of those who were found guilty (which here follow) unto Ezra and these assessors; who examined whether they found more than these, and of what quality and condition they were.

Ver. 17. And they made an end with all the men that had taken strange wives by the first day of the first month.] Three months therefore were spent in this disquisition, which shews it was very exact.

Ver. 18. And among the sons of the priests there were found that had taken strange wives; namely, of the sons of Jeshua, the son of Jozadak, and his brethren; Maaseiah, and Eliezer, and Jarib, and Gedaliah.] No wonder the people broke the law, when so many of those who were supposed to understand it best (viz. the priests) gave them such a foul example of lust and levity (as Pellicanus speaks), yea, some of the sons of the high-priest; which made the example more pernicious. Which may be the reason, as he conjectures, why Jeshua, the high-priest, was represented in a vision to Zechariah the prophet in filthy garments; because his family (sons and brethren) were defiled with this impurity. For, as Cicero saith, out of Plato, in a letter to Lentulus, "Tales plerumque cives reliqui esse solent, quales principes in civitate fuerint viri;" such the rest of the citizens are wont to be, as the great men in the city are.

Ver. 19. And they gave their hands that they would put away their wives.] Solemnly engaged, by making a covenant, or by an oath, that they would do what was enjoined. (See Ezek. xvii. 18.) But it may be expounded simply, they put their hand to the business; that is, did it effectually, and actually put away their strange wives.

And, being guilty, they offered a ram of the flock for their trespass.] More than that, they openly confessed their guilt, and made an offering for their offence; and hereby, perhaps, endeavoured to make some amends for their sin, by being the first that condemned themselves and reformed, and offered a trespass-offering: which, some think, all the rest made, after their example.

Ver. 20. And of the sons of Immer; Hanani and Zebadiah.

Ver. 21. And of the sons of Harim; Maaseiah, and Elijah, and Shemaiah, and Jehiel, and Uzziah.

Ver. 22. And of the sons of Pashur; Elioenai, Maaseiah, Ishmael, Nethaneel, Jozabad, and Elasah.] All these were priests, who were very deep in this guilt, and being public persons, led others fearlessly into it.

Ver. 23. Also of the Levites; Jozabad, and Shimei, and Kelaiah (the same is Kelita), Pethahiah, Judah, and Eliezer.] There were not so many Levites, as there were priests, in the transgression.

Ver. 24. Of the singers also; Eliashib: and of the porters; Shallum, and Talem, and Uri.] These seem to have been more modest; there being but one offender found among the singers, and but three among the porters.

Ver. 25. Moreover, of Israel: of the sons of Parosh; Ramiah, and Jeziah, and Malchiah, and Miamin, and Eleazar, and Malchijah, and Benaiah.] The Hebrews call all those Israel, who were not Levites, or dedicated to the service of the temple. Whence the court of Israel was that place wherein the men of Israel worshipped, as they were distinguished from the priests and Levites.

Ver. 26. And of the sons of Elam; Mattaniah, Zechariah, and Jehiel, and Abdi, and Jeremoth, and Eliah.] This Jehiel was Shechaniah's father, ver. 2. And yet, notwithstanding, though his father and kindred were guilty of this crime, which Ezra bewailed, he did not stick to speak his mind, how it should be punished. An admirable example of zealous integrity!

Ver. 27. And of the sons of Zattu; Elioenai, Eliashib, Mattaniah, and Jeremoth, and Zabad, and Aziza.] The two former, Parosh and Elam, with this Zattu, and all that follow to ver. 32. were of the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 28. Of the sons also of Bebai; Jehohanan, Hananiah, Zabbai, and Athlai.

Ver. 29. And of the sons of Bani; Meshullam, Malluch, and Adaiah, Jashub, and Sheal, and Ramoth.

Ver. 30. And of the sons of Pahath-Moab; Adna, and Chelal, Benaiah, Maaseiah, Mattaniah, Bezaleel, and Binnui, and Manasseh.

Ver. 31. And of the sons of Harim; Eliezer, Ishijah, Malchiah, Shemaiah, Shimeon.

Ver. 32. Benjamin, Malluch, and Shemariah.] Now follows an account of those of the other tribe.

Ver. 33. Of the sons of Hashum; Mattenai, Mattathah, Zabad, Eliphelet, Jeremai, Manasseh, and Shimei.

Ver. 34. Of the sons of Bani; Maadi, Amram, and Uel.

Ver. 35. Benaiah, Bedeiah, Chelluh.

Ver. 36. Vaniah, Meremoth, Eliashib.

Ver. 37. Mattaniah, Mattenai, and Jaasau.

Ver. 38. And Bani, and Binnui, Shimei.

Ver. 39. And Shelemiah, and Nathan, and Adaiah.

Ver. 40. Machnadebai, Shashai, Sharai.

Ver. 41. Azareel, and Shelemiah, Shemariah.

Ver. 42. Shallum, Amariah, and Joseph.

Ver. 43. Of the sons of Nebo; Jeiel, Mattithiah, Zabad, Zebina, Jadau, and Joel, Benaiah.] Some take Nebo for a place, of which the following families were citizens. But nothing of this is worth inquiring into.

Ver. 44. All these had taken strange wives.] There is no great number of them, in comparison with all that returned from captivity: but they seem to have been eminent persons, who would have spread the contagion, if a stop had not been put to it.

And some of them had wives by whom they had children.] There were some of them women that had brought them children, as the Vulgar translates it: which De Dieu shews is the plainest translation of these words. Here was a fair occasion to have spoken of the putting away their children as well as their wives, if that motion had been prosecuted: but nothing being here said of it, it makes me think, the observation is true which I made ver. 11. (See there.)

THE BOOK OF NEHEMIAH.

THAT Nehemiah himself was the author of this book there can be no reasonable doubt; for he saith as much in the beginning of it, and all along relates what he did in his own person, for the rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem, and other things. He lived in the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon, and came into Judea thirteen years after Ezra; unto whom the king of Persia gave great authority, as he had done to Ezra; God disposing his heart to have some Jews still about him in his court, for whom he had a kindness. After him, we do not find that the kings of Persia made any governor, but left things, it is probable, to the management of Jadua the high-priest, as Corn. Bertram thinks. (See de Republ. Judaica, p. 168. 173. 175.)

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. THE words of Nehemiah.] Or, as Pellicanus translates it, gesta (for so the Hebrew word often signifies), the things which Nehemiah did.

The son of Hachaliah.] We are no where told who this was, nor of what tribe: Eusebius and others say of the tribe of Judah.

And it came to pass in the month Chisleu.] Which answers to our November, and part of December.

In the twentieth year.] Not of Artaxerxes, but of Nehemiah's life. (See chap. ii. 1.)

As I was in Shushan the palace.] In the region of Elymais, where the Persian kings kept their court in winter, and, from its pleasant and beautiful situation, was called by heathen writers Susa, which signifies a lily; or (as Athenæus saith, lib. xii.) a rose. Stephanus Byzantinus gives this account of it: It was called Σοῦσα, ἀπὸ τῶν κρίνων ἃ πολλὰ ἐν τῇ χώρᾳ πεφύκει ἐκείνῃ, from the lilies that grew in abundance in that country. Our Dr. Hyde hath a peculiar fancy, that the Persians called it Sus, which signifies licorice; but the Jews, to compliment Ahasuerus, called it in these books by this name, of a better sound, which signifies a lily, (Hist. Relig. Vet. Pers. cap. 35. p. 414.)

Ver. 2. That Hanani, one of my brethren.] And, I suppose, one of his family.

Came, he and certain men of Judah.] Came from Jerusalem to Shushan, either about business, or finding things very hard with them in Judea.

And I asked them concerning the Jews that had escaped, which were left of the captivity, and concerning Jerusalem.] He inquired of the condition wherein they were who returned out of Babylon into Judea, and whether Jerusalem were again become a flourishing city; as it was natural for him to do, especially being a man that loved his nation exceedingly.

Ver. 3. And they said unto me, The remnant that are left of the captivity there in the province.] So Judea is called, Ezra v. 8. (See there.)

Are in great affliction and reproach: the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burnt with fire.] They answer to both parts of this inquiry, that the people were in great distress and contempt by their insolent neighbours, wherewith they were surrounded, and Jerusalem lay without any walls or gates to defend it from their injuries. He knew very well that it was burnt by Nebuchadnezzar, and the walls beaten down; therefore their meaning is, that the walls and gates lay as the Chaldeans left them after that devastation, and were not repaired, though the temple was built again.

Ver. 4. And it came to pass, when I heard these words, that I sat down.] Upon the ground, as the manner was, in great sorrow, and, perhaps, in ashes.

And wept, and mourned certain days, and fasted, and prayed before the God of heaven.] With his face towards Jerusalem.

Ver. 5. And said, I beseech thee, O Lord God of heaven.] In this style they all spake of God (as I observed, Ezra i.) after the captivity: signifying, as Conrad. Pellicanus observes, his sovereign dominion over all things that are contained within the compass of the heavens; the sun, moon, and stars, angels, and men, and all creatures.

The great and terrible God.] He is called great, not with respect to those petty gods that the heathen worshipped, who had no power at all, but with respect to all potentates either in heaven or in earth; and he is called terrible, because he is most humbly to be worshipped and reverenced by them all.

That keepeth covenant and mercy for them that love him, and observe his commandments.] Next, he celebrates his faithfulness and truth in performing his promises to those that plainly declare they sincerely love him, by keeping his commandments. These he never fails to bless, because they are faithful to him.

Ver. 6. Let thine ear now be attentive, and thine eyes open, that thou mayest hear the prayer of thy servant, which I pray before thee now, day and night, for the children of Israel thy servants, and confess the sins of the children of Israel, which we have sinned against thee: both I and my father's house have sinned.] A deep sense of our own unworthiness, is a good qualification for the mercy we beg of God. This Nehemiah expresses very sensibly, both here and in the next verse.

Ver. 7. We have dealt very corruptly against thee.] Some of the Jews expound it, We have despised and contemned thee.

And have not kept the commandments, nor the statutes, nor the judgments, which thou commandedst thy servant Moses.] But violated every one of them, to the high offence both of God and man.

Ver. 8. Remember, I beseech thee, the word that thou commandedst thy servant Moses, saying, If ye transgress, I will scatter you abroad among the nations.] Which they had seen fulfilled by the Assyrians and Chaldeans.

Ver. 9. But if ye turn unto me, and keep my commandments, and do them.] As he hoped some of them now did.

Though there were of you cast out unto the uttermost part of the heaven, yet will I gather them from thence, and will bring them unto the place that I have chosen to set my name there.] This promise made by Moses he hoped God would fulfil, as he had done the threatening. It is a very pious observation of Dr. Jackson, (book iii. chap. 17.) that Nehemiah framed this prayer to God, and directed his enterprise for the restoration of Jerusalem, by the rule of Moses, mentioned in Deut. xxx. 1—4. and he plainly found the truth of that prediction in the readiness of the king of Persia to grant his petition: which confirmed his belief of what Moses there saith, although a prophet by profession dissuaded his enterprise, as likely to prove dangerous to his person, (chap. vi. 10, 11.)

Ver. 10. Now these are thy servants and thy people, whom thou hast redeemed by thy great power, and by thy strong hand.] For nothing but the overruling power of God could have moved Cyrus to dismiss this whole nation out of captivity, and let them return to their own land. Or, as some think, he beseeches his compassion to them, because they were his peculiar people, redeemed out of the Egyptian bondage by many miracles.

Ver. 11. O Lord, I beseech thee, let now thine ear be attentive to the prayer of thy servant, and to the prayer of thy servants, who desire to fear thy name.] He was not alone in this petition for mercy, but there were many others, who would worship him sincerely. So the words are in the Hebrew, who will fear, or delight to fear, thy name.

And prosper, I pray thee, thy servant this day.] He prayed night and day, as he saith, ver. 6. But this was the prayer he made on that day when he went to wait upon the king.

And grant him mercy in the sight of this man.] He means the king, unto whom he pointed as it were with his finger, when he was going to attend upon him.

For I was the king's cup-bearer.] And perhaps, as he came into his presence, he secretly made this prayer to God in his own breast. Many of the Jews, by the singular favour of God, obtained considerable dignities in their captivity, as Daniel and his companions, Zerubbabel, and others: among whom was this good man, who was advanced to this place of cup-bearer, when he was but a youth, as our Rainoldus hath shewn, in his Censura, Lib. Apocryph. p. 1496.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AND it came to pass in the month Nisan, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes the king.] Which was almost four months after he heard of the desolate condition wherein Jerusalem lay; in all which time, I suppose, his turn of waiting did not come: so that he wanted opportunity to speak unto the king. Or, as others will have it, he and his friends retired all this time, and spent it in fasting and prayers

That wine was before him.] He was at dinner or supper, and he called for wine; which was ready for him.

And I took up the wine, and gave it unto the king.] After the manner that the cup-bearer was wont to do.

Now I had not been beforetime sad in his presence.] But always appeared cheerful and well-pleased, as young men so advanced use to be; and perhaps entertained the king at table with pleasant discourse.

Ver. 2. Wherefore the king said unto me, Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick?] There did not appear in his countenance any sign of indisposition of body.

This is nothing else but sorrow of heart.] Some inward trouble which grieved his spirit.

Then I was very sore afraid.] Lest the king should have a suspicion that he had any treasonable design in his thoughts, and intended to poison him, as it was easy for the cup-bearer to do: or rather, he was afraid he should not prevail in his suit; the court, it is likely, being full of such as would oppose it.

Ver. 3. And said unto the king, Let the king live for ever.] They that think he was afraid the king should be jealous of him, take the meaning to be, Let not the king fear I mean him any harm, but pray for his long life. But this was a common form of wishing the king long happiness, as appears from several places in Daniel, and hath no respect to that now mentioned.

Why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are consumed with fire?] Men naturally have a great love to the monuments of their ancestors, and are troubled to see the place where they are laid desolate. He did not speak a word of religion, or the Divine worship (as Grotius observes), for though Artaxerxes had a great affection for the Jews, and had their God in veneration (as appears by the edict he sent to Ezra thirteen years before), yet the company about him might not be so well disposed; but had the same affection and concern for their country and relations that he had, though they did not worship the same God.

Ver. 4. Then the king said unto me, For what dost thou make request?] This argues the king had a great kindness for him, that he so readily asked what he would have him do for him, to ease him of his trouble.

So I prayed to the God of heaven.] In his mind he silently beseeched God to guide his tongue, and to bow the king's heart to grant his request.

Ver. 5. And I said unto the king, If it please the king, and if thy servant have found favour in thy sight.] It was a bold request he was going to make, and therefore, before he mentions it, he submits it to the king's will and pleasure; and acknowledges he had no merit, but depended wholly upon the king's kindness; unto whom, perhaps, he might have performed some acceptable service.

That thou wouldest send me unto Judah, unto the city of my father's sepulchres.] This might lead Eusebius and others to think Nehemiah was of the tribe of Judah, because his ancestors dwelt in Jerusalem, and were there buried.

That I may build it.] Build the walls of it, and make it a city again; whereas now it was but an open town.

Ver. 6. And the king said unto me (the queen also sitting by him).] Which was not usual, as historians say, but is noted here as a thing extraordinary; because it is likely she favoured him, and promoted the grant of his request.

For how long shall thy journey be? and when wilt thou return?] This is another argument of the kindness he had for him; that he would not lose his service, nor be long without it.

So it pleased the king to send me; and I set him a time.] He having told the king how long he desired to be absent from his duty, the king permitted him to go. How long that was, is not certain. But it is not likely it was for twelve years; (mentioned chap. v. 14. xiii. 6.) but rather he asked leave for a year, or perhaps for half so much: which made him so quick in dispatching the building of the wall, which he finished in two-and-fifty days, (chap. vi. 15.) After which, it is likely, he returned to Shushan, according to his appointment: and the king sent him back as his governor for twelve years; his presence being very serviceable, or perhaps necessary there, for the better ordering of that province, to the king's content.

Ver. 7. Moreover, I said unto the king, If it please the king, let letters be given me to the governors beyond the river, that they may convey me over, till I come into Judah.] Give him a safe conduct, and furnish him with necessaries in his journey through their several provinces, where they had authority.

Ver. 8. And a letter unto Asaph the keeper of the king's forest.] I suppose he means the forest of Lebanon; from whence he might be furnished with materials for his building. Here the word pardes signifies differently from what it doth in other places where it is used; which are but two besides this, Eccles. ii. 5. Cant. iv. 13. where it signifies a most pleasant garden, planted with all sorts of trees. And this forest, it seems, was so sweet and pleasant a place, that it deserved to be called by the same name.

That he may give me timber to make beams for the gates of the palace which appertained to the house.] The Vulgar Latin, by the palace, understands the tower of the house; and so Pellicanus, portas templi, the gates of the temple. For though the temple itself was built, yet the several courts seem not to have been walled about, nor the gates to the temple made. For, that it should be meant of the gates of the king's palace, which was near the temple, is altogether unlikely; there being no occasion to build a palace for the king of Persia; and no other king could be intended.

And for the wall of the city, and for the house that I shall enter into.] He desired leave to build a convenient house for himself, and for those that should be future governors.

And the king granted me, according to the good hand of my God upon me.] The hand is sometimes taken (as Drusius observes) in an ill sense, for inflicting punishments, (Ruth i. 13. Jer. xv. 17.) for we strike others with the hand: and sometimes in a good sense, for helping and assisting others; for we extend favours to men with our hand. Thus he explains Psal. lxxxviii. 6. cut off from thy hand; that is, fallen from thy grace and favour. Pindar, he observes, thus uses the hand of God for his help and aid, Olymp. x. Θεοῦ σὺν παλάμᾳ, by the hand of God; which the scholiast interprets, Τῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ δυνάμει καὶ βοηθείᾳ, by the power and help of God, (Miscellanea, cent. i. cap. 85.) Thus Nehemiah is to be here understood; by the Divine favour, which inclined the king to do what he desired; which he calls God's good hand.

Ver. 9. Then I came to the governors beyond the river, and gave them the king's letters. (Now the king had sent captains of the army and horsemen with me).] This the king did over and above what he desired; which procured him the greater respect from the governors, when they saw the care the king took for the safety of his person.

Ver. 10. When Sanballat the Horonite.] He seems to have been a petty prince of Moab; or some great man of that country. For Horonaim was an eminent city there, (Isa. xv. 5. xlviii. 3. 5. 34.)

And Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite.] He had been a slave of that country; but now advanced to some authority (perhaps to be a governor of a province) in these parts. The mention of these two great men shews, that the nations of Moab and Ammon were restored as well as the Jews, according to the Divine oracles; and were well known, that their destruction by the people of God might be the more observable; which was in the time of the Maccabees, who subdued those nations, according to the predictions of several prophets.

Heard of it, it grieved them exceedingly that there was come a man to seek the welfare of the children of Israel.] With such authority from the king, and in such favour with him; as appeared by the letters he brought with him, and the guard that attended him, and the diligence of the several governors, through whose provinces he passed, to serve him.

Ver. 11. So I came to Jerusalem, and was there three days.] In which he rested himself, and received the visits of his friends, as Ezra had done, chap. viii. 32.

Ver. 12. And I arose in the night.] At the end of those days, it is likely, for he was resolved to make no delay.

I and some few men with me.] In whom he most confided.

Neither told I any man what my God had put in my heart to do at Jerusalem.] He, being a courtier, had learned to hold his peace, and observe when it was a fit time to speak, and to whom. For he would not trust to every body, knowing there was much falseness in men's hearts; and secrecy was necessary to keep his designs from being betrayed.

Neither was there any beast with me, save the beast that I rode upon.] They all went on foot besides himself, that there might be the less noise, and no notice taken of what he did. What beast it was on which he rode, whether horse or mule, is not worth the inquiry: it is likely a mule, on which great men were wont to ride in those countries.

Ver. 13. And I went out by night, by the gate of the valley.] This valley is mentioned again, chap. iii. 13. but whereabout it was, is not remembered, but only that it lay before the well called the Dragon-well.

Even before the Dragon-well.] So called, either from the silent sliding of the water (as a serpent creeps) from the fountain Siloam; or, from a dragon (as Bochartus thinks) which haunted this place since the city lay desolate; for serpents delight in such places, especially near fountains of water.

And to the dung-port.] Out of which dung was wont to be carried out of Jerusalem, when it was before inhabited.

And viewed the walls of Jerusalem which were broken down, and the gates thereof were consumed with fire.] Trying (as Conradus Pellicanus reasonably conjectures) whether the foundation was still sound, and would support a new wall laid upon it; or whether it was rotten, and must be laid again.

Ver. 14. Then I went on to the gate of the fountain.] Either of Siloe, or of Gihon. The wall was not so broken down, but some part of it still remained, and the place where the gates were was known. (See chap. iv. 6, 7. vi. 1.)

And to the king's pool.] Which is generally supposed to be that which Hezekiah made, (2 Chron. xxxii. 3. 30.)

But there was no place for the beast that was under me to pass.] Being full of rubbish, or of water.

Ver. 15. Then went I up in the night by the brook.] The same night he went by the brook Kidron.

And viewed the wall, and turned back, and entered by the gate of the valley, and so returned.] He seems not to have gone round about the whole city; for there were several other gates which are not here mentioned: but having seen in what condition so many parts of the wall were, by which he judged of the rest, he turned back into the city, and entered at the same gate from whence he went out, (ver. 13.)

Ver. 16. And the rulers knew not whither I went, or what I did.] These rulers (Conradus Pellicanus thinks) were gentiles, for they are distinguished from the Jews in the following words, and from other rulers among them; and therefore were the officers of the kings of Persia, who had hitherto obstructed the work.

Neither had I as yet told it to the Jews, nor to the priests, nor to the nobles, nor to the rulers.] To any of the people of the Jews, for he had not so much as acquainted the priests, nor the nobles, nor any that had authority among them, with his intentions.

Nor to the rest that did the work.] Whom he intended hereafter to employ in the work: or, he told none of those that went with him to view the ruins what his design was.

Ver. 17. Then said I unto them, Ye see the distress that we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste, and the gates thereof are burnt with fire.] Not long after he took a fit opportunity to represent to them their low condition; and to let them understand what he intended, and had power to undertake.

Come, and let us build up the wall of Jerusalem, that we be no more a reproach.] Exposed to the scorn and insults of the people round about them.

Ver. 18. Then I told them of the hand of my God which was good upon me; as also the king's words that he had spoken unto me.] He acquainted them how favourable God had made the king to him, and all the discourse he had with him, and the commission which he had received from him.

And they said, Let us rise up and build. So they strengthened their hands for this good work.] When they heard of the favour of God, and of the king.

Ver. 19. But when Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, and Geshem the Arabian, heard it.] It is probable, Geshem was the king's deputy in Arabia, as the two former were in Moab and Ammon. But others take them rather to have been all three great men among the Samaritans.

They laughed us to scorn, and despised us.] As men that made a vain attempt, which they would never be able to accomplish.

And said, What is this thing that ye do? will ye rebel against the king?] This was the most odious calumny they could invent, that they intended to set up for themselves, and be no longer the king's subjects.

Ver. 20. Then answered I them, and said unto them, The God of heaven, he will prosper us.] We have authority for what we do from a higher power than yours.

Therefore we his servants will arise and build: but you have no portion, nor right, nor memorial, in Jerusalem.] Do not you trouble yourselves about this matter; who have no part, either in the labour, or the merit, or the fame of it: for you are not of our religion; and therefore may mind your own business, and not meddle with ours.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. THEN Eliashib the high-priest rose up, with his brethren the priests.] Now he shews by whom, and in what order, the wall was built: which was begun by Eliashib, the grandchild of Jeshua the high-priest; (as we read chap. xii. 10.) who with his brethren gave a noble example, in being the first that went about the work, and built the gate here mentioned.

And they built the sheep-gate.] Which was at the south side of the city, in that part of the valley which looked towards the city of David and the temple. The sheep used to enter in here which were to be sacrificed; and therefore, I suppose, the priests undertook this part of the work as most proper for them. Dr. Lightfoot hath taken a great deal of pains to find in what quarter these gates were; to whom I refer the reader in his Chorog. Century of the Land of Israel, chap. 26.

They sanctified it, and set up the doors of it.] When they had completed it, they blessed it by solemn prayers, and perhaps by sacrifices; as the first-fruits of this pious work: for we do not read that any other part, but this which they built, was sanctified. Some think this was done because of the relation that this gate had to sacred uses; but it was rather such a ceremony as was imitated by other nations, when they begun their walls; which they commended to the protection of their gods. Some translate it, they made it an excellent structure: others, they cleansed it from the rubbish, and the profanation which the Babylonians had brought upon it; restoring it to its ancient splendour. But our translation, I think, is best; for it being the priest's work, it became them to bless and sanctify it.

Even unto the tower of Meah they sanctified it, unto the tower of Hananeel.] They sanctified the rest of the wall, which they built as far as the tower of Meah on one side, and the tower of Hananeel on the other. But Pellicanus thinks, that Meah is not the name of a tower, but signifies a hundred; and makes the sense to be, They not only built the sheep-gate, but a hundred cubits of the wall to a tower so far off from the gate, and also to the tower of Hananeel. This sheep-gate some think is the same with the Προβατικὴ, mentioned John v. 2. which being the first that was built by the priests of God, and particularly commended to his blessing, had that singular gift bestowed upon the neighbouring pool, that it should miraculously heal those that first entered into it every day; and that from this time it had this virtue. Afterward they dedicated the whole wall, as we read chap. xii. 27.

Ver. 2. And next unto him builded the men of Jericho. And next to them builded Zaccur the son of Imri.] Whom some take for a principal person in Jericho.

Ver. 3. But the fish-gate did the sons of Hassenaah build.] This was a gate which looked towards the sea; from whence fish was wont to be brought, and sold here.

Who also laid the beams thereof, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.] They made a complete piece of work of this gate; to which they gave the last finishing; which was not done universally till after some time. (See chap. vi. 1. vii. 1.)

Ver. 4. And next unto them repaired Meremoth the son of Urijah, the son of Koz. And next unto them repaired Meshullam the son of Berechiah, the son of Meshezabeel. And next unto them repaired Zadok the son of Baana.] These repaired the wall till they came to the old gate; for there was no other gate till they came there.

Ver. 5. And next unto them the Tekoites repaired.] The people of the city of Tekoa carried on the wall with those three beforenamed.

But their nobles put not their necks to the work of their Lord.] They were either proud, and would not stoop to this work; or they were negligent, and cared not whether it were done or not. By their Lord some understand the leader and head of the whole family, who was active in it; others Nehemiah; and some God himself, whose work this was; unto which, therefore, well-disposed persons, though ever so great, put their necks; that is, laboured hard, not refusing to carry burdens, &c.

Ver. 6. Moreover the old gate repaired Jehoiada the son of Paseah, and Meshullam the son of Besodeiah.] Some think it was called the old gate, because there were some remains of it from the times of the Jebusites, yea, of Melchisedec, by whom it was at first built.

They laid the beams thereof, and set up the doors thereof, and the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.] They imitated those mentioned ver. 3. as several others did, (ver. 13—15.)

Ver. 7. And next unto them repaired Melatiah the Gibeonite, and Jadon the Meronothite, the men of Gibeon and of Mizpah, unto the throne of the governor on this side the river.] These, and they that follow in the next verse, repaired as far as to the wall of the broad street. And among these was a great man, whose name was Chisse (so Pellicanus translates the word we render the throne), a petty prince in Syria, under the king of Persia; who, being proselyted, joined in this work.

Ver. 8. Next unto him repaired Uzziel the son of Harhaiah, of the goldsmiths. Next unto him also repaired Hananiah the son of one of the apothecaries; and they fortified Jerusalem unto the broad wall.] These were two eminent persons; one among the goldsmiths, the other among the perfumers; who did not build the wall, because it was very good in this place; but only fortified it, and made it strong. Near to this was the broad street of the city, where there was a market-place for the selling of commodities.

Ver. 9. And next unto them repaired Rephaiah the son of Hur, the ruler of the half-part of Jerusalem.] There were two principal overseers of the work, on the two sides of the city: this, as some think, in that part which was in the tribe of Judah; and the other, (ver. 12.) in that which was in the tribe of Benjamin. (See chap. iv. 19.)

Ver. 10. And next unto them repaired Jedaiah the son of Harumaph, even over against his house. And next unto him repaired Hattush the son of Hashabniah.] The first of these repaired against his house; because that lay most convenient for him to bestow his cost upon it; and thereby he consulted his own safety, together with the public good.

Ver. 11. Malchijah the son of Harim, and Hashub the son of Pahath-Moab, repaired the other piece, and the tower of the furnaces.] The words we translate the other piece, are the second measure. But what the first was we cannot tell, and therefore are ignorant of the second: perhaps, half as much as the former had repaired. The tower of the furnaces is mentioned again, chap. xii. 38. as near to this place. (See there.)

Ver. 12. And next unto him repaired Shallum the son of Halohesh, the ruler of the half-part of Jerusalem.] There was another part mentioned before, ver. 9.

He and his daughters.] Who are generally thought either to be heiresses, or rich widows; who piously contributed to this work.

Ver. 13. The valley-gate repaired Hanun, and the inhabitants of Zanoah; they built it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof, and a thousand cubits on the wall unto the dung-gate.] This was called the valley of Jehoshaphat, which lay between the city and the Mount of Olives; through which the brook Kidron ran, from the north to the south. The gate which led to this was the east gate; which was repaired, together with more of the wall than any others repaired, by these persons here mentioned.

Ver. 14. But the dung-gate repaired Malchiah the son of Rechab, the ruler of part of Beth-haccerem: he built it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof.] He was a great man, who commanded part of a city, which had its name from the vineyards that were there, as Pellicanus probably conjectures.

Ver. 15. But the gate of the fountain repaired Shallum the son of Col-hozeh, the ruler of part of Mizpah; he built it, and covered it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks thereof, and the bars thereof, and the wall of the pool of Siloah by the king's garden.] This man also was a great benefactor, being a considerable person, as the former was.

And unto the stairs that go down from the city of David.] Which stood upon the high hill of Zion; from whence they descended by steps to Jerusalem.

Ver. 16. After him repaired Nehemiah the son of Azbuk.] Of the same name, but not of the same family with the writer of this book.

The ruler of the half-part of Beth-zur, unto the place over against the sepulchres of David.] Where David had a sepulchre for himself, and for his successors in the kingdom.

And to the pool that was made.] This is supposed to be the place mentioned 2 Kings xx. 20.

And unto the house of the mighty.] There the king's guard were lodged, who were all mighty men of valour. But we can only guess at the sense of these words.

Ver. 17. And after him repaired the Levites, Rehum the son of Bani. Next unto him repaired Hashabiah, the ruler of the half-part of Keilah, in his part.] In his street (as Pellicanus renders it), or with the men of his part or country where he was ruler.

Ver. 18. After him repaired their brethren.] Other Levites.

Bavai the son of Henadad, the ruler of the half-part of Keilah.] Of the other half of the city.

Ver. 19. And next to him repaired Ezer the son of Jeshua, the ruler of Mizpah, another piece.] Or rather, one piece; because another is mentioned in the next verse.

Over against the going up to the armoury.] There is such a place mentioned in the forest, (Isa. xxii. 8.) which Solomon it is likely made; but this was in Jerusalem, then well known, and one of the most noted places in the city, because here all warlike provision was laid up.

At the turning of the wall.] At some corner, where the wall turned another way.

Ver. 20. After him Baruch the son of Zabbai earnestly repaired the other piece.] With great zeal, as if he was ashamed the work went on so slowly; or that they should repair only one piece, and leave the other undone.

From the turning of the wall.] From the place beforementioned.

Unto the door of the house of Eliashib the high-priest.] Who had the honour to begin this good work, (ver. 1.)

Ver. 21. After him repaired Meremoth the son of Urijah, the son of Koz, another piece, from the door of the house of Eliashib, even to the end of the house of Eliashib.] He carried on the work from the place where the other left off, from the entrance of the house to the end of it; which being the house of a great man, we may suppose very large.

Ver. 22. And after him repaired the priests, the men of the plain.] Near to Jerusalem, chap. xii. 28.

Ver. 23. After him.] There was some eminent priest who engaged others with him, as Eliashib had done his brethren, (ver. 1.)

Repaired Benjamin and Hashub over against their house. After him repaired Azariah the son of Maaseiah, the son of Ananiah, by his house.] These were some of the tribe of Benjamin, settled in Jerusalem, who repaired over against their own doors, as far as their houses extended.

Ver. 24. After him repaired Binnui the son of Henadad, another piece, from the house of Azariah unto the turning of the wall, even unto the corner.] This, in all likelihood, was another of the tribe of Benjamin, who carried on the wall from the place where Azariah ended.

Ver. 25. Palal the son of Uzai, over against the turning of the wall, and the tower which lieth out from the king's high house, that was by the court of the prison. After him Pedaiah the son of Parosh.] There are so many turnings of the wall mentioned, that none can now give an account of them, nor of the king's high house (which some take to have been a house built for that prospect). The court of the prison is often mentioned in the book of the prophet Jeremiah.

Ver. 26. Moreover, the Nethinims dwelt in Ophel, unto the place over against the water-gate towards the east, and the tower that lieth out.] Not only the priests and Levites, but the meanest persons that belonged to the house of God, inferior officers, contributed to this work. And the water-gate, it is likely, was that at which these lower ministers brought in water for the use of the temple: near to which Ophel was, which seems to have been a great tower, (2 Chron. xxvii. 3.) The tower which lay out I can give no account of; but the next verse tells us where it was.

Ver. 27. After them the Tekoites repaired another piece, over against the great tower that lieth out, even unto the wall of Ophel.] The people of this place are mentioned before, ver. 5. whose nobles, perhaps, who at the first withdrew themselves from this work, lent their help, now that they saw every body engaged in it.

Ver. 28. From above the horse-gate repaired the priests, every one over against his house.] It was called the horse-gate, as some think, because they went through it to water their horses at the brook Kidron: or, there was a place for the standing of horses.

Ver. 29. After them repaired Zadok the son of Immer over against his house. After him repaired also Shemaiah the son of Shechaniah, the keeper of the east gate.] It is uncertain whether he speaks of the east gate of the city, or of the temple: but whichsoever it was, it seems to have been a principal gate, and therefore committed to the custody of an eminent person.

Ver. 30. After him repaired Hananiah the son of Shelemiah.] Some copies read after me; as if Nehemiah in modesty concealed his own work, and only intimated that he did something himself: but ours is the right reading.

And Hanun the sixth son of Zalaph, another piece.] He had more zeal, it is likely, than his elder brethren, and therefore is here particularly noted as a worthy man, of less estate, but of more virtue than the rest of his family.

After him repaired Meshullam the son of Berechiah over against his chamber.] Which he had, I suppose, in the temple.

Ver. 31. After him repaired Malchiah the goldsmith's son, unto the place of the Nethinims, and of the merchants, over against the gate Miphkad, and to the going up of the corner.] It seems the Nethinims had a part of the city assigned them for their habitation, which was among the merchants: near to whom there was a house of correction (as some think the word Miphkad imports), where they visited (as the Hebrews speak), that is, punished, men for their faults.

Ver. 32. And between the going up of the corner unto the sheep-gate.] There they began, (ver. 1.) and there they ended: which shews that they left not off till they had compassed the whole city with a wall, and that it was but one (as Pellicanus observes), not two or three, which was sufficient to preserve them from the incursions of their enemies.

Repaired the goldsmiths and the merchants.] Some will have these to have been their names, taken at first from their professions.

No man can think (as the same Pellicanus notes) that the names of them that repaired the walls of Jerusalem were set down so diligently, as here they are, without some rational cause for it. And the reason was, because it was a work of great virtue to love and to do honour to their country; a work of piety to restore the holy city; a religious thing to defend the true worshippers of God, that they might serve him in quietness and safety; and a courageous thing, in the midst of so many enemies, to go on with this work in a pious confidence of the power of God to support them. The names, therefore, of such persons deserved to be preserved and transmitted to future generations, as a most noble example to them.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. BUT it came to pass, that when Sanballat heard that we builded the wall, he was wroth, and took great indignation, and mocked the Jews.] Though he boiled inwardly with anger, yet he seemed to contemn that which he feared, and scoffed at the Jews.

Ver. 2. And he spake before his brethren and the army of Samaria.] By his brethren are meant the commanders-in-chief in those parts; who mustered, I suppose, all their forces in Samaria, as if they intended to invade the Jews, and hinder the work they were about.

And said, What do these feeble Jews?] But first he exposes them to scorn, as a people that had no power.

Will they fortify themselves? will they sacrifice? will they make an end in a day?] He heard there were so many hands at work, as if they meant to build the wall, and keep a feast, and dedicate it by sacrifice, all in one day; and so takes an occasion to laugh at their foolish diligence, and the haste they made, as if they could begin and end at once.

Will they revive the stones out of the heaps of the rubbish which are burnt?] He represents it as impossible they should repair the wall, unless they could make the broken pieces, which were also mouldered, to become whole stones again.

Ver. 3. Now Tobiah the Ammonite was by him.] One of his brethren, mentioned in the verse beforegoing.

And he said, Even that which they build, if a fox go up, he shall even break down their stone wall.] Foxes abounded in that country, especially about Jerusalem, since its devastation, (Lament. v. 18.) At the wall of which Tobiah jeered, saying, It was so low that those creatures might leap over it; and so weak, that they might throw it down, or break through it. This opinion, it is likely, made them neglect to interrupt them in their building till it was too late.

Ver. 4. Hear, O our God; for we are despised: and turn their reproach upon their own head.] He beseeches God to take such notice of their scoffs, that, as they now despised his people, so they themselves might be laughed to scorn, and had in derision.

And give them for a prey in the land of captivity.] And carry them far away from the captives into some other land.

Ver. 5. And cover not their iniquity, and let not their sin be blotted out from before thee.] This seems something harsh, that he should pray they might never be forgiven; but he spake by the spirit of prophecy, as David did in Psal. cix. they being of such a malicious and implacable spirit against God and his people, that he foresaw they would never be capable of his mercy, but be utterly destroyed by him. And, indeed, there were several oracles upon which this prayer was grounded, and it was confirmed by the destruction of these nations by the Maccabees and their successors.

For they have provoked thee to anger before the builders.] By scoffing at them, and discouraging them in the work, which was for God's honour, and for the safety of his people. And therefore it highly provoked him that these men should set themselves with such spite against it.

Ver. 6. So built we the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof.] Till it was raised to the half of its height.

For the people had a mind to work.] Were very much set upon it, and went about it cheerfully, notwithstanding their jeers and contempt.

Ver. 7. But it came to pass, that when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and the Arabians, and the Ammonites, and the Ashdodites.] Some of these people were never mentioned before; and therefore this shews, that Sanballat endeavoured to draw all the neighbouring nations into a confederacy against the Jews.

Heard that the walls of Jerusalem were made up, and that the breaches began to be stopped.] It seems the Chaldeans had not entirely thrown down the walls, but contented themselves to make wide breaches and gaps in them.

Then they were very wroth.] So incensed, that it moved them to take the following resolution.

Ver. 8. And conspired all of them together to come and to fight against Jerusalem, and to hinder it.] The last words in the Hebrew are, to make an error in it; that is, to put them by the work, or to make them not know which way to turn themselves.

Ver. 9. Nevertheless we made our prayer unto our God, and set a watch against them day and night, because of them.] They committed themselves to the protection of the Almighty, whose servants they were, keeping a constant watch, that they might not be surprised, for they knew them to be very vigilant to do mischief.

Ver. 10. And Judah said, The strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed.] They had wrought so long and so hard, that some of the Jews told him the labourers were quite spent.

And there is much rubbish; so that we are not able to build the wall.] There was still a great deal of rubbish remaining, more than they were able to remove; and therefore they must desist, at least for the present, from building the wall.

Ver. 11. And our adversaries said, They shall not know, neither see, till we come in the midst among them, and slay them, and cause the work to cease.] They pretended also to have intelligence, that the forenamed enemies did not intend to appear with an army before Jerusalem, but to march so secretly, that they should have no notice of their approach till they saw them in the city, and put them to the sword.

Ver. 12. And it came to pass, that when the Jews which dwelt by them came, they said unto us ten times.] But there were some Jews who were neighbours to that people that found out their designs, and came to inform them of it a great many times: for ten times signify a great many in Scripture. (See Gen. xxi. 7.)

From all places whence ye shall return unto us they will be upon you.] The words in the Hebrew are no more than these, from all places whence they return unto us (there being no words answering to those, they will be upon you); if any words be added, they should be they informed us of our danger.

Ver. 13. Therefore set I in the lower places behind the wall.] Where the wall was not yet raised to its just height, (ver. 6.)

And on the higher places.] Where it was completely finished.

I even set the people after their families, with their swords, their spears, and their bows.] With such weapons as they were furnished withal.

Ver. 14. And I looked, and rose up.] When he saw how they were disposed, he rose up and made this speech to them.

And said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, Be not ye afraid of them: remember the Lord, which is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons and your daughters, your wives and your houses.] All was at stake, therefore he exhorts them to be valiant, trusting in God, who was stronger than all their enemies.

Ver. 15. And it came to pass, when our enemies heard that it was known unto us, and God had brought their counsel to nought, that we returned all of us to the wall, every one unto his work.] When they heard their plot was discovered, and they had no hope to surprise us, but we were ready to receive them, they laid aside their designs, and we went on with ours.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, from that time forth, that the half of my servants wrought in the work, and the other half of them held both the spears, the shields, and the bows, and the habergeons.] But, lest their enemies should imagine they were secure, and had quite laid aside their arms, and so might resume their enterprise, he ordered, that while half of his own servants wrought upon the walls, another half should stand by with weapons ready to put into their hands, if there were occasion.

And the rulers were behind all the house of Judah.] The rest, I suppose, followed this example; and the rulers stood at their backs to encourage them, and put them forward in their work.

Ver. 17. They which builded on the wall, and they that bare burdens, with those that laded, every one with one of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon.] That is, they were well appointed for both, to build and to fight. For it is a figurative speech; it not being possible for them to work if both hands had not been at liberty. And the next verse saith, their swords were by their sides.

Ver. 18. For the builders, every one had his sword girded by his side, and so builded.] This expounds the foregoing words.

And he that sounded the trumpet was by me.] To give the alarm, if need should be, and so call them unto him for orders. It appears by this, that he was continually with them while they wrought.

Ver. 19. And I said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, The work is great and large, and we are separated upon the wall, one far from another.] In several quarters of it, some of which were at a good distance from others.

Ver. 20. In what place therefore ye hear the sound of the trumpet, resort ye thither unto us: our God shall fight for us.] For while they lay scattered, they could not oppose their enemies successfully; but being united with him, and under his direction and conduct, he bids them not doubt of God's protection.

Ver. 21. So we laboured in the work: and half of them held the spears.] For the use of every man, if there should be occasion.

From the rising of the morning till the stars appeared.] All the day long, from break of day till it was quite night.

Ver. 22. Likewise at the same time said I unto the people, Let every one with his servant lodge within Jerusalem, that in the night they may be a guard to us, and labour in the day.] It is likely, that many of them at night went into the suburbs, or neighbouring villages, and lodged there; but he would have them all lodge in Jerusalem, for the greater security of the city in the night, and that they might be more ready to work in the morning.

Ver. 23. So neither I, nor my brethren, nor my servants, nor the men of the guard which followed me, none of us put off our clothes.] He, and his kindred, and family, and guard, gave them a noble example; for none of them put off their clothes when they went to bed, but lay in them, that they might be more ready to fight if any assault was made on the city.

Saving that every one put them off for washing.] These last words are variously expounded by interpreters, and the fewest approve of our translation. Rabbi Solomon repeats the word not; They put not off their clothes, no, not for washing. The Hebrew word is water, which some here take for the water of the feet, as the Hebrews speak, and make the sense to be, no, not when they made water. De Dieu, quite contrary, except only to make water. But it is a more simple sense, Every man had his sword ready when he made water. So the word schicho may be rendered, as we translate it in the margin, every man went with his weapon for water. But Grotius follows our translation, and takes these words for an exception to what went before: and the plain meaning is, they put off their garments only for those ablutions, which the law required, or custom had introduced.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. AND there was a great cry of the people, and of their wives, against their brethren the Jews.] At this time there was a grievous complaint of the poor against their rich brethren: for though they were cured of their idolatry by their captivity, yet they were not cured of their other sins, but loved strange women, as we read before in the book of Ezra; and were so covetous, that they oppressed the poor and needy; and this at a time when their enemies threatened the destruction of them all. But this was the more heinous crime, because the twentieth of Artaxerxes, wherein this was done, began about the end of a sabbatic year (as Dr. Alix observes), which raised the cry of the poor to a greater height against their creditors, who exacted their debts of them contrary to the law, (Deut. xv. 3.) which was read to them publicly in such a year, (Deut. xxxi. 12.) For it was of such moment, that it moved Nehemiah to make the Jews take a solemn oath that they would observe this law, and release all the debts that were owing to them in this year, (chap. x. of this book, ver. 31.)

Ver. 2. For there were that said, We, our sons, and our daughters, are many.] They had numerous families.

Therefore we take up corn for them, that we may eat, and live.] They had no way to keep them from starving, but by buying corn for them at unreasonable rates; which the rich demanded when they saw them in such necessity, that they must pay what they asked or die.

Ver. 3. Some also there were that said, We have mortgaged our lands, vineyards, and houses, that we might buy corn, because of the dearth.] There had been a great scarcity for want of rain; which God denied, because they minded building their own houses more than his, as we read Haggai i. 9—11. Now the effects of such droughts caused among the people great scarcity of provisions, in which the rich had no compassion on their poor brethren, but forced them to sell all they had for bread.

Ver. 4. There were also that said, We have borrowed money for the king's tribute, and that upon our lands and vineyards.] They do not complain that they were constrained to borrow money, but that they could not have it without taking it up on usury, as it appears from ver. 7. which was contrary to the law of God; (Exod. xxii. 25, &c.) otherwise they could not have paid their tribute to the king of Persia, who laid it upon all his subjects every where, (Ezra iv. 13. vii. 24.)

Ver. 5. Yet now our flesh is as the flesh of our brethren, our children as their children.] They represent very pathetically that there was no difference between them and their brethren, but that they were poor, and the other rich; for they were all Jews of the same stock, from the same original, all alike circumcised; so that by nature, and by the favour of God, they were every way the same, and therefore ought to enjoy the same freedom that they and their children did.

And, lo, we bring into bondage our sons and our daughters to be servants.] In case of great necessity this was lawful, Exod. xxi. 7. But they were very void of compassion, who forced their brethren to do a thing so much against nature.

And some of our daughters are brought unto bondage already.] Some of the tender sex, who were least able to endure hardship, they had been already forced to part withal.

Neither is it in our power to redeem them; for other men have our lands and vineyards.] Their condition was very lamentable, for none would lend them money freely; and to pay their usury, they were forced to sell their children, whom they had not power to redeem, because their lands were mortgaged to those oppressors: so that they were in a worse condition than when they were in Babylon, being not in so much danger to be devoured by their cruel neighbours (who sought their destruction), as by their barbarous friends and neighbours.

Ver. 6. And I was very angry when I heard their cry and these words.] It could not but move his indignation, to hear them complain one of another; but much more when he heard the reason.

Ver. 7. Then I consulted with myself.] It is not safe to do any thing in a fit of anger; but coolly to consider and deliberate what is fit to be done.

And I rebuked the nobles, and the rulers.] Whom he did not fear to reprove severely, when he found them in fault.

And said unto them, You exact usury every one of his brother.] And that a very heavy one; such as was used among the heathen, called centesima, the hundredth part, (ver. 11.) which was twelve per cent.

And I set a great assembly against them.] That he might put them to the greater shame. For this great assembly I take to be the whole body of the people, with their judges, as Bertram observes, de Repub. Jud. p. 171. (See Ezra x. 8. 14.)

Ver. 8. And I said unto them, We, after our ability.] Either he speaks of himself in the plural number, as great men are wont to do; or he means, he, with Ezra, and such-like lovers of their country, had done what follows.

Have redeemed our brethren the Jews, who were sold unto the heathen.] Had done their utmost to deliver the Jews out of the captivity of Babylon; whereby they were restored both to their own country, and to their liberty. And perhaps they had with their own money procured the freedom of such as were slaves to some of the Babylonians; who would not part with them, when they desired to go to Jerusalem, unless they were paid the price of them, being their own proper goods.

And will you even sell your brethren?] For that they might expect, since their parents could not redeem them.

Or shall they be sold unto us?] Must I redeem them out of your hands, as I have helped to redeem some out of Babylon?

Then they held their peace, and found nothing to answer.] There was such an express law of God against them, (Deut. xxiii. 19.) that they had nothing to reply; and therefore were silent, because they could neither deny the fact, nor were able to justify it.

Ver. 9. And I said, It is not good that ye do.] This encouraged him to proceed in his reprehension; and to tell them that they had committed a great sin. For that is the meaning of it is not good: a soft form of speech, used when they mean it is very bad; Prov. xvi. 29. and many other places.

Ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God.] Being so lately delivered by him from oppression, and having so many enemies about them, to observe what they did.

Because of the reproach of the heathen our enemies?] Who might justly upbraid them with inhumanity; and thereupon reproach their religion.

Ver. 10. I likewise, and my brethren, and my servants, might exact of them money and corn.] As a reward of their care and diligence in the public service.

I pray you, let us leave off this usury.] But what then would become of the poor people, who were too much oppressed already? And therefore he beseeches them to leave off this usury; seeing he and his rather waved their own right, than demanded any thing for their labour and toil in the discharge of their offices.

Ver. 11. Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their olive-yards, and their houses.] Though they had lent money upon the security of those lands, &c. yet, since they were the possessions of the poor, who were reduced to great straits, and could not pay them, he beseeches them to restore them, and that without delay.

Also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine, and the oil, that ye exact of them.] The hundredth part was an usury then practised in those countries, as afterward among the Romans; which was the hundredth part of what was lent every month; so that every year they paid the eighth part of the principal: thus it is commonly said. But Salmasius hath observed, that in the eastern countries there were never any laws to determine what interest should be taken for money lent for a day, or a week, or a month, or a year (for there were all these sorts of usury), but every one was left to demand what he pleased; and according to what was agreed they paid for what was borrowed: therefore we cannot certainly tell whether this was heavy or light usury. But among the Greeks and Romans there was a measure set (as he notes in his book de Fœnore Trapezitico), and Ἑκατοστή, the hundredth part, was among the Greeks the lowest usury; though it was more or less in several ages, as he there shews, and in his book de Modis Usurarum; where he notes the difference between the Greeks and Romans in this matter, cap. 6. p. 230, &c.

Ver. 12. Then said they, We will restore them.] They readily consented to restore their lands, vineyards, and houses.

And will require nothing of them.] Demand no interest for the money.

So will we do as thou sayest.] They so entirely agreed to what he desired, that it made a kind of jubilee among the people: for, no doubt, there was great joy when this was done.

Then I called the priests, and took an oath of them, that they should do according to this promise.] While they were in this good mind he called the priests, and made them swear in their presence, who were witness to it, that they would keep their word.

Ver. 13. Also I shook my lap, and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labour, that performeth not this promise, even thus be he shaken out, and emptied.] He prayed God that they might lose all they had, who did not make good their promise; and predicted their poverty by an external sign, as the manner of the prophets was to do. For, folding up the skirts of his garment, and then scattering them abroad, he represented how God would cast them out of their possessions, and the fruit of their labours, who did not observe this oath.

And all the congregation said, Amen, and praised the Lord.] God so wrought upon the people's hearts, that even they who had been guilty of taking usury, consented to this imprecation, and wished the same mischief to themselves, if they did not do as he required. And, which was more, they praised God, who had given them such a governor, and put into them this good mind, to submit unto him.

And the people did according to this promise.] Made an immediate restitution of what had been mortgaged to them, and released them of their obligation for money.

Ver. 14. Moreover, from the time that I was appointed to be their governor in the land of Judah, from the twentieth year even unto the two-and-thirtieth year of Artaxerxes the king, that is, twelve years.] All which time he was not in Judea; but he ordered him, who was his deputy, in his absence, to do as he did.

I and my brethren.] He and his domestics; or those who, as I said, he deputed in his room.

Have not eaten the bread of the governor.] Taken the allowances which were made to the governors, appointed by the kings of Persia, to provide them a table. Which it was but reasonable they should have; that they who did the public business should be maintained at the public charge. But he would not do that which was lawful, when he saw it would be burdensome to his countrymen, and therefore lived upon his own estate which he had in Judea, and upon the salary which he had as cup-bearer to the king of Persia; in whose service, it is likely, he had enriched himself before he came to Jerusalem.

Ver. 15. But the former governors, that had been before me, were chargeable unto the people, and had taken of them bread and wine, besides forty shekels of silver.] Who these were he doth not say, but spares their names, it being sufficient to declare he did not imitate them, whosoever they were. Nor doth he relate how much bread and wine they exacted, but only that they had besides forty shekels of silver every day, I suppose, to make provision of other things for their table. But from these words Scaliger concludes, that before Nehemiah and Ezra there had been other governors placed over them by the kings of Persia. And if we may believe the Jewish Annals, compiled by the author of Seder Olam Zuta, the first governor, Zerubbabel, returning from Jerusalem to Babylon, died there; and was succeeded in his government of Judea by his son Meshullam, and after him by his grandson Chananiah.

Yea, even their servants bare rule over the people.] They connived at the exactions of their servants, who demanded what they pleased.

But so did not I, because of the fear of God.] It was not vain-glory that made him thus generous, but his love to God, and to his country: for he loved religion better than riches; and took not his own due, that the people might serve God more cheerfully.

Ver. 16. Yea, also I continued in the work of this wall.] And all this while he took as much pains as any of them, in building the wall of Jerusalem.

Neither bought we any land.] Which they might have done of the poor at an easy price, if they had desired wealth; but they would not make any advantage to themselves of other men's necessities.

And all my servants were gathered thither unto the work.] They were constantly employed also in the same work, and received no pay for their labour, though it could not be done without neglect of his private business.

Ver. 17. Moreover, there were at my table a hundred and fifty of the Jews and rulers, besides those that came unto us from among the heathen that are about us.] This was the greater expense, because they were not inferior people that were entertained at his table, but persons of quality among the Jews and strangers who came about business, and, perhaps, brought him intelligence concerning the state of the neighbouring heathen, and of their designs.

Ver. 18. Now, that which was prepared for me daily was one ox, and six choice sheep; also fowls were prepared for me, and once in ten days store of all sorts of wine.] This shews that he kept a noble house, as we speak; and, indeed, it was very becoming a great man to entertain great persons, both of his own country and strangers, with magnificence.

Yet for all this required I not the bread of the governor, because the bondage was heavy upon this people.] They could not without great hardship maintain themselves.

Ver. 19. Think upon me, my God, for good, according to all that I have done for this people.] He expected his reward only from God, who he hoped would shew him the same kindness that he had done for his people. There is no reason to think he speaks too much of himself, and his own worthy acts; for it was no more than was necessary in such a state of things, that posterity might be furnished with an excellent example of extraordinary virtue; and no more than St. Paul was constrained to speak of himself in his Epistle to the Corinthians; of whom he would take nothing, that he might stop the mouths of false apostles, and covetous people. (See chap. xiii. 22.)

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass, when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and Geshem the Arabian, and the rest of our enemies.] Mentioned chap. iv. 7.

Heard that I had builded the wall, and that there was no breach left therein (though at that time I had not set up the doors upon the gates).] Not upon all of them, though some had been set up at the charge of particular persons, (chap. iii. 3. 6. 13, &c.)

Ver. 2. That Sanballat and Geshem sent unto me, saying, Come, let us meet together.] Either to consult about the common good of their several provinces wherein they governed (of which perhaps they pretended they were to give an account to their master), or to establish a friendship and good correspondence one with another, or some such purpose.

In some one of the villages in the plain of Ono.] A place in the tribe of Benjamin, chap. xi. 35. 2 Chron. viii. 12. (See there.)

But they thought to do me mischief.] He would not trust them, suspecting they intended to kill him; of which, perhaps, he had received some private intelligence.

Ver. 3. And I sent messengers unto them, saying.] He shewed so much respect to them, as not to return an answer by those whom they sent to him, but dispatched a messenger of his own to them.

I am doing a great work, so that I cannot come down: why should the work cease, whilst I leave it, and come down to you?] He did not know any business they could have with him of such great concernment, as that which he had in hand; and therefore he would not put a stop to it to confer with them. This was one reason, but not the only one for his refusal.

Ver. 4. Yet they sent unto me four times after this sort.] They were restlessly bent upon his destruction, and therefore importuned him often to give them a meeting. For they thought, I suppose, if they did not take this opportunity to overthrow what he had done, before he set up the doors upon the gates, they should never be able to enter the city afterward.

And I answered them after the same manner.] He still persisted constantly to give no other answer; whereby they might understand he was resolved to finish the work.

Ver. 5. Then sent Sanballat his servant unto me, in like manner, the fifth time.] There is no mention of Tobiah in all the foregoing negotiation, and now Geshem is left out; and Sanballat alone sent him a message, pretending, it is likely, special respect and kindness unto him, in informing him what was laid to his charge. Certain it is, he was the great contriver and manager of all the mischief intended against him.

With an open letter in his hand.] Before the message was delivered by word of mouth, but now by letter; yet open, that every one might see of what he was accused.

Ver. 6. Wherein was written, It is reported among the heathen.] The report was spread among the nations thereabout.

And Gashmu.] The same, I suppose, with Geshem, mentioned ver. 1.

Saith it.] Undertakes to prove it.

That thou and the Jews think to rebel: for which cause thou buildest the wall, that thou mayest be their king, according to these words.] That he might establish his authority, and reign over them, according to the common report.

Ver. 7. And thou hast also appointed prophets to preach of thee at Jerusalem, saying, There is a king in Judah.] This was cunningly suggested, that he might not think there was any prophet on his side: as indeed there was, for he had corrupted Shemaiah, as it presently follows.

And now shall it be reported to the king according to these words. Come now therefore, and let us take counsel together.] How they should wipe off this suspicion, if it should be put into the king's mind, as he told him it certainly would.

Ver. 8. Then I sent unto him, saying.] In an open letter, I suppose, that every body might see it.

There are no such things done as thou sayest.] Nothing done to give a jealousy of a rebellion; nor any prophet that encouraged it.

But thou feignest them out of thine own heart.] He had invented this report to defame Nehemiah, without any ground for it.

Ver. 9. For they all made us afraid, saying, Their hands shall be weakened from the work, that it be not done. Now therefore, O God, strengthen my hands.] Their business was to contrive false stories, to put the Jews in fear; being confident they would be discouraged by such reports, as some were. Therefore he beseeches God to strengthen him that he might support others.

Ver. 10. Afterward I came unto the house of Shemaiah the son of Delaiah, the son of Mehetabeel.] Who was a prophet, (it appears from ver. 12.) whom, it is likely, Nehemiah took to be his friend, and therefore went to consult and advise with him at his house.

Who was shut up.] Out of fear he pretended; and by this action would have had Nehemiah to understand what he himself should do for his own security: for it was the manner of the prophets to instruct the people by actions and signs, as well as by words. But others think he shut himself up, that is, retired, as a holy man, from the affairs of the world, to spend his time in meditation and prayer in some of the chambers of the temple; whither he advised Nehemiah to retire, and to take sanctuary there from the great dangers to which he was exposed.

And he said, Let us meet together in the house of God, within the temple, and let us shut the doors of the temple: for they will come to slay thee.] By the temple he means the outward court of it, where he had a chamber; whither, as a friend in whom Nehemiah confided, he prayed him to come, that they might meet and consult together how to preserve Jerusalem, and where he might be safe himself from his enemies; who could not easily enter in there, it being a strong place, and besides privileged by its holiness, unto which even heathens, perhaps, might have such regard as not to violate it; whereas the gates of Jerusalem were not yet in such a condition as to keep them out. By this means he hoped Nehemiah would become contemptible, when the people saw his cowardice; and the Jews would be disheartened, as much as their enemies took courage. And, perhaps, he intended, with some priests, his confederates, to seize on him, and deliver him into the hands of Sanballat: at least, it would give some countenance to the calumny he had raised, of his affecting to be king; because he fled from his work, and durst not stand upon his integrity. Shemaiah also might think hereby to draw him in to offend God, by coming into that court where the priests only might come, and where it is supposed this prophet now was.

Yea, in the night will they come to slay thee.] I take the meaning to be, Even this very night will they fall upon thee; therefore consult thy safety, by fleeing hither.

Ver. 11. And I said, Should such a man as I flee?] Who am a governor, and ought to give a good example of undaunted courage; and have professed to put great confidence in God; and hitherto been marvellously preserved by him, and assisted in his undertaking.

And who is there, that, being as I am, would go into the temple to save his life? I will not go in.] There might have been colour for this advice, if Jerusalem had been an open place, without any walls, without armed men in it, or that had no courage to defend it: but they had appeared on the walls to defend it, (chap. iv. 13.) and being so well appointed, he was resolved still to rely on God, and on their fidelity and valour; and not be so base as to desert them, till they deserted him; which they might well do, if they saw him flee from them for fear.

Ver. 12. And, lo, I perceived that God had not sent him; but that he pronounced this prophecy against me.] Not to secure him, but to betray him; as he plainly discovered in a little time: which shewed, there was no such danger, as this false prophet pretended.

For Tobiah and Sanballat had hired him.] Tobiah was not idle all this time, but it is likely invented this plot, to bribe this man to be a false prophet: which, perhaps, was discovered to Nehemiah by some undoubted prophets of God, who were on their side.

Ver. 13. Therefore was he hired, that I should be afraid, and do so, and sin.] That they might draw him in to offend God, by distrusting his care of him; and dishonour himself by base cowardice.

And that they might have matter for an evil report, that they might reproach me.] As a man guilty of what they accused him.

Ver. 14. My God, think thou upon Tobiah and Sanballat, according to these their works.] Their calumnies, and malicious contrivances, and foul practices, which he hoped God would take a time to punish.

And on the prophetess Noadiah, and the rest of the prophets, that would have put me in fear.] The wicked temper of this people is very wonderful, who had already got false prophets among them, both men and women, whom Nehemiah did not think fit as a judge to punish, but left them to the judgment of God. Nor do we read that he informed the king of Persia of the foul dealings of these men (which certainly he would have punished), but prayed God to reward them after their deeds: for he would have all know that he depended wholly upon the power of God to enable him to perfect this work, and not upon the help of human force.

Ver. 15. So the wall was finished in the twenty and fifth day of the month Elul, in fifty and two days.] Which may seem incredible to those who do not reflect what a great number of people (who were not hired, but voluntarily) engaged in this work, and how full they were of zeal, and that the foundation of the wall was not razed by the Chaldeans; nay, there were some pieces of it standing, only great gaps being made in it. And other histories acquaint us with the like diligence; particularly Arrianus and Curtius relate, that Alexander the Great built the walls of Alexandria (which was seven miles in compass) in the space of twenty days.

Ver. 16. And it came to pass, that when all our enemies heard thereof, and all the heathen that were about us saw these things.] When they heard how all the designs of their enemies were disappointed, and saw Jerusalem was built, and flourished.

They were much cast down in their own eyes: for they perceived that this work was wrought of our God.] Being finished in so short a time, beyond all expectation, and in the midst of great fears and sad apprehensions.

Ver. 17. Moreover, in those days the nobles of Judah sent many letters unto Tobiah, and the letters of Tobiah came unto them.] To add to all the other wickedness of this nation, there were false brethren among their great men, who held a correspondence with their most pestilent enemies against Nehemiah.

Ver. 18. For there were many in Judah sworn unto him.] Against the interest of their country, and of their religion; to such a height of impiety were many arrived.

Because he was the son-in-law of Shechaniah the son of Arah; and his son Johanan had taken the daughter of Meshullam the son of Berechiah.] So dangerous were marriages with foreigners, which Ezra therefore had great reason to make void; for by these alliances they were engaged in wicked designs against their country.

Ver. 19. Also they reported his good deeds before me.] To such an impudence were they arrived, that they highly commended him as a very worthy man in the presence of Nehemiah, who knew so much of his wickedness.

And uttered my words to him.] Or informed him of all that Nehemiah did. For so we translate in the margin, matters, not words.

And Tobiah sent letters to put me in fear.] Still continued such practices as are mentioned ver. 6. that, if it were possible, they might put him into such fear, as would move him to do something to disgrace himself.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass, when the wall was built, and I had set up the doors, and the porters, and the singers, and the Levites, were appointed.] The porters were to attend the gates; but what the Levites and the singers had to do there is not easily resolved: perhaps they were to be ready against the time that the wall should be dedicated, which is mentioned chap. xii.

Ver. 2. That I gave my brother Hanani.] Who was the man that came from Jerusalem to Shushan, to acquaint him with the deplorable condition of the city, and implore his help, (chap. i. 2.)

And Hananiah the ruler of the palace.] So the house where Nehemiah dwelt is called, because he was governor for the king, and a kind of viceroy, who did all the king's business, and here gave audience to all people, as the king was wont to do in his palace.

Charge over Jerusalem.] He made Hanani, I suppose, principal governor over Jerusalem, and Hananiah was his assistant and deputy.

(For he was a faithful man, and feared God above many).] He saith nothing of Hanani, who was well known to be zealous for God and for his country, by the journey he took to Shushan (which I before mentioned); but he gives the reason why he joined Hananiah with him, because he knew he might be trusted, being a man of conscience, who acted out of religious principles, which a great many in those days did not. The reason why he took this care for the city, it is likely, was, because he himself was returning to Shushan, to give the king an account of the state of affairs in Judea; and therefore placed such men in Jerusalem as he knew would faithfully secure it in his absence.

Ver. 3. And I said unto them, Let not the gates of Jerusalem be opened until the sun be hot.] Till it had been risen a good while, that they might see clearly round about them, and that all the people might be ready in case of any danger.

And while they stand by, let them shut the doors, and bar them.] And at night he charges them to stand by and see the gates shut and barred in their presence. Or, as some expound it, they should not suffer any man to stir till they shut the gates, lest through carelessness they should chance to be left open. So De Dieu renders the words, While the standers-by shut the gates, hold them fast; that is, he gave them power to keep all there present, and not let them go away till this was done.

And appoint watches of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, every one in his watch, and every one to be over against his house.] The gates being shut, he charges them to set the watch in proper places; every one keeping watch in that part which was next to his own house.

Ver. 4. Now the city was large and great.] And therefore required many watches.

But the people were few therein.] In comparison with the bigness of the city.

And the houses were not builded.] That is, not all that had been in former times, but a great deal of ground still lay waste.

Ver. 5. And my God put into mine heart to gather together the nobles, and the rulers, and the people.] Whatsoever good motion came into his mind he ascribed it to God, and not to his own prudent consideration, though that was employed in this business. For without God we can do nothing, who ought therefore to be in all our thoughts.

That they might be reckoned by genealogy.] That, by knowing of what family they were, and where they formerly dwelt, he might recall those of them whose habitations had heretofore been in Jerusalem, to come and settle there again, now that the wall was built, and they might dwell there in safety.

And I found a register of the genealogy of them which came up at the first, and found written therein.] The words following:

Ver. 6. These are the children of the province, that went up out of the captivity, of those that had been carried away, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away, and came again to Jerusalem and to Judah, every one unto his city.] These are the very words which we read in the second chapter of Ezra, ver. 1, &c. from whence he seems to have transcribed them, and added something to them.

Ver. 7. Who came with Zerubbabel, Jeshua, Nehemiah, Azariah, Raamiah, Nahamani, Mordecai, Bilshan, Mispereth, Bigvai, Nehum, Baanah: the number, I say, of the men of the people of Israel was this.] He that is here called Azariah, is called there Saraiah; and there are some other small differences in the names, but all the same, only here Nahamani is added.

Ver. 8. The children of Parosh, two thousand a hundred seventy and two.] I shall not transcribe all this genealogy, concerning which I have nothing to observe, but that in some few things it differs from that in Ezra. (See my annotations on Ezra ii. 5.) There are also some families named here which are not in Ezra, as in ver. 22. 48—52. which are all omitted in Ezra. For it must be considered, that one of these accounts was taken by Ezra in Babylon, the other by Nehemiah in Judea: and therefore it is no wonder that a greater number are sometimes mentioned in Nehemiah than in Ezra; for in the first account that was taken of them, many were ignorant of their genealogy; but before the last, the book of their genealogy was found: and yet in the whole number the two accounts agree, though in the particular sums they vary. Compare ver. 66. of this chapter with the second of Ezra, ver. 64. of which Dr. Lightfoot gives this account in his Chronicle of the Times of the Old Testament, p. 146. "The matter is to be conceived and apprehended thus: That Nehemiah found that list and catalogue of those that came up in the first of Cyrus, as it was taken then; and that he called over the names of the families as they lay in order there: he observed the order of that list in calling and listing them; but he took the number of them, as they were now when he numbered them. And some families were now more in number than they were when that first was made, and some were less; and some that were in that list were not to be found now: for some had more of the same stock come out of Babel since the first numbering; and some that had come up at first, and were then numbered, were now gone back." And so he observed, by comparing that list and the present number, how the plantation in Judea had gone forward or backward, increased or decayed, since the first return.

Ver. 65. And the Tirshatha said unto them, that they should not eat of the most holy things till there stood up a priest with urim and thummim.] It is the opinion of Jacobus Capellus, that Zerubbabel is here meant by the Tirshatha, (Ezra ii. 63.) Whosoever he was, he expresses his hope that God might in time restore the urim and thummim (as he had done the nation), and so give answer about obscure and difficult matters, as he had done in former ages. But till then these priests were not admitted to partake of the most holy things, because it did not appear by good proof that they were of the family of the priests, and not to appear, and not to be, are the same thing in law. But the Talmudists, as the same person observes, interpret these words as if it had been said, Till the dead rise, or till the Messiah come. For after the first temple was destroyed, "the cities of the Levites, with their suburbs, were wanting, and so were urim and thummim, and the kings of the house of Judah." (See his Historia Exot. et Sacra, ad A.M. 3557.)

Ver. 70. And some of the chief of the fathers gave unto the work: the Tirshatha gave to the treasure a thousand drachms of gold, fifty basons, five hundred and thirty priests' garments.

Ver. 71. And some of the chief of the fathers gave to the treasure of the work twenty thousand drachms of gold, and two thousand and two hundred pounds of silver.

Ver. 72. And that which the rest of the people gave was twenty thousand drachms of gold, and two thousand pounds of silver, and threescore and seven priests' garments] The offering mentioned in these three verses was made by different persons from those who are said to have offered in Ezra ii. 68, 69. and therefore no wonder the gold and silver, and other things offered, were different.

Ver. 73. So the priests, and the Levites, and the porters, and the singers, and some of the people, and the Nethinims, and all Israel, dwelt in their cities.] These are the very same words with those in the second chapter of Ezra, and the last verse; and in both places it is said all Israel dwelt in their cities. Which, though it be chiefly to be understood of Judah and Benjamin, yet it is evident some of the ten tribes did return with them, according to those prophecies, Jer. l. 4. Zech. viii. 13. And, indeed, there were many of the Israelites that did live in the tribe of Judah before the captivity, (2 Chron. x. 17. xi. 16.)

And when the seventh month came, the children of Israel were in their cities.] When all the business beforenamed was over, the people were sent back, by Nehemiah's direction, to their several cities unto which they belonged: where they remained till the seventh month came; which was five days after the wall was finished, on the twenty-fifth day of the sixth month, (chap. vi. 15.)

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. AND all the people gathered themselves together as one man.] In this month was the first great feast that fell out after the building of the wall; as it was just after their first company returned to Jerusalem from Babylon, (Ezra iii. 1.)

Into the street that was before the water-gate.] Which gate is mentioned before, chap. iii. 26. the street before which being very capacious, they all might meet there; for the court of the temple was not large enough to contain such a multitude.

And they spake unto Ezra the scribe.] This, no doubt, is the same person mentioned in the foregoing book; who had been at Babylon, it is thought, since his first coming into Judea, and was now returned; beholding with great joy the wall of Jerusalem built, as before he had seen the temple.

To bring the book of the law of Moses, which the Lord had commanded to Israel.] They called to mind that place in Deuteronomy, chap. xxxi. 10, 11, &c. where God requires the law to be read publicly every seventh year in the feast of tabernacles, which was appointed to be kept in this month. This, no doubt, Ezra was ready to perform; but such was the forward zeal of the people at this time, that they prevented him by their pious entreaties, that he would observe that law.

Ver. 2. And Ezra the priest.] So he is called, as before the scribe; both of these titles being put together in the foregoing book.

Brought the law before the congregation, both of men and women.] For the city being restored and reinhabited, the next thing that was proper to be done was to instruct them in those laws whereby they were to live.

And all that could hear with understanding.] That were not mere children.

Upon the first day of the seventh month.] Which was not the feast wherein the law was to be read; but, as Pellicanus well observes, all this month was in a manner holy, so that they continued employed in these holy exercises till the end of the two-and-twentieth day, which was the conclusion of the feast of tabernacles.

Ver. 3. And he read therein before the street that was before the water-gate, from the morning until mid-day.] In the Hebrew the words are, from the light; that is, from the break of day (as we speak), or the sunrising, until noon. Then, I suppose, they went to take some repast, it being a festival, and a day of great rejoicing, "a memorial of blowing with trumpets," Lev. xxiii. 24. on which he thought good to begin the reading of the law, that he might do more than they desired, if they spake to him of reading it on the feast of tabernacles.

Before the men and the women, and those that could understand: and the ears of all the people were attentive unto the book of the law.] This is a general account of what he did: the particulars follow.

Ver. 4. And Ezra the scribe stood upon a pulpit of wood, which they had made for the purpose.] To raise him higher than the people; that he might be the better seen and heard by them all; whence, in the Hebrew, it is called a tower of wood: but was not like our pulpits, which contain no more than one person; but large and long, that many persons might stand in it, as appears by what follows. Vitringa hath lately described it largely in his book de Synagoga Veteri, p. 184, &c.

And beside him stood Mattithiah, and Shema, and Anaiah, and Urijah, and Hilkiah, and Maaseiah, on his right hand; and on his left hand, Pedaiah, and Mishael, and Malchiah, and Hashum, and Hashbadana, Zechariah, and Meshullam.] It is evident by these words, that six persons stood on his right hand, and seven on his left, in the same pulpit, being in all fourteen.

Ver. 5. And Ezra opened the book in the sight of all the people (for he was above all the people).] He being in the very middle of the pulpit, and the forenamed persons on each side of him.

And, when he opened it, all the people stood up.] Out of reverence to the holy word of God. (See Judg. iii. 20.)

Ver. 6. And Ezra blessed the Lord, the great God: and all the people answered, Amen, amen.] He seems to have used the words, wherein David ordered them to bless, 1 Chron. xvi. 36. where all the people answered, Amen; as they do here with great affection. But the Jewish doctors pretend, that in the temple the people never answered Amen, but said, Blessed be the name of his glorious kingdom, for ever and ever. So Vitringa notes in his book de Synagoga Veteri, p. 1096. and our Mr. Thorndike observed the same long before, in his Religious Assemblies, p. 230.

With lifting up their hands; and they bowed their heads, and worshipped the Lord with their faces to the ground.] Which were all postures in prayer, and in thankful acknowledgments to God.

Ver. 7. Also Jeshua, and Bani, and Sherebiah, Jamin, Akkub, Shabbethai, Hodijah, Maaseiah, Kelita, Azariah, Jozabad, Hanan, Pelaiah, and the Levites, caused the people to understand the law.] It is thought by some, that these persons expounded to the people what had been read to them; for the same persons did not read, they imagine, and make them understand what was read. But Stephanus Morinus hath observed very well, that it is not likely that Ezra was a mere reader, and Levites the doctors and expositors of the law before Ezra and Nehemiah. It is far more likely that Ezra began to read; and that when he was weary, some of those who stood by him on each side went on where he left off; for it was too much for one man to read from morning to mid-day. And he also instructed these Levites, if there was any difficulty, to make the people understand what was read.

And the people stood in their place.] Listening both to what was read, and what was delivered as the explication of it.

Ver. 8. So they read in the book.] That is, Ezra and his assistants read not all the book of the law, but only Deuteronomy, as they do at this day.

In the law of God distinctly.] With a clear voice and distinct pronunciation.

And gave the sense, and caused them to understand the reading.] Ezra, and the other persons directed by him, gave the sense, and made them understand what was read. So the last words are commonly expounded. But Isaac Casaubon, in an epistle of his to Suffridus Calignon, (Epist. dcx.) disputes at large, that all the Jews take the meaning to be, that the people in their captivity having disused the Hebrew tongue, and been accustomed to the Chaldee, Ezra and his companions rendered the Hebrew words exactly into the Chaldee language. And to put all out of doubt, that this is their sense, he observes, that the Jews at this day retain this custom (which they received from Ezra) in their synagogues, to read the same portion of Scripture, first in Hebrew, and then in Chaldee; as he himself was witness at Frankfort. And he justifies those who take these words, caused them to understand the reading, to signify, expounded the Scripture. Though the word micra be no where so used in the Bible, to signify the Scripture, neither doth it signify reading. And another learned man thinks the Hebrew words may be most exactly translated, "Dabant intelligentiam per ipsam Scripturam;" they gave the sense by the Scripture itself. But there is not good warrant to assert this. And the discourse of Casaubon is grounded on a tradition of the Jews, which hath no better foundation than this; that they had forgot their language in Chaldea, and therefore they read the law in that tongue, which they understood better than their own. But if this were true, why did the prophets write in Hebrew after their return from captivity? And this very book shews the contrary, chap. xiii. 23, 24. where the Jews' language appears to have been spoken by the people. Nor is the custom of reading the Targum after the law very ancient, nor generally used in their synagogues.

Ver. 9. And Nehemiah, which is the Tirshatha, and Ezra the priest the scribe, and the Levites, that taught the people.] Who had instructed them in their duty out of the law that had been read to them.

Said unto all the people, This day is holy unto the Lord your God; mourn not, nor weep. For all the people wept, when they heard the words of the law.] They bewailed the ignorance wherein they lived; and the many violations of the law, whereof they had been guilty. Just as Josiah did when he heard the words of the law read out of a book found unexpectedly, (2 Chron. xxii.)

Ver. 10. Then he said.] That is, the Tirshatha gave this command, who was the principal person among those forenamed, having the same authority that Zerubbabel had. (See chap. vii. 65.)

Go your way.] Now that it was noon, it was time for them to refresh themselves.

Eat the fat, and drink the sweet.] Make a feast, and provide as good cheer as you are able, according to the manner on their festival days.

And send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared.] It did not become religious people only to make much of themselves; but he would have them out of their fulness to feast their poor brethren, that they might rejoice with them.

For this day is holy unto our Lord.] Being the first new moon in the year, and the feast of blowing with trumpets, (Lev. xxiii. 24.) And nothing was more unsuitable to such festivals than mourning and lamentation; for they were appointed to be solemnities for mirth and gladness; and are therefore called the days of your gladness, in Numb. x. 10. And in Psal. xcii. 4. for the sabbath, the Psalmist saith, "Thou Lord hast made me glad through thy works; I will triumph in the works of thy hands:" expressing the subject of his gladness, the remembrance of the creation of the world, upon that day celebrated.

Neither be you sorry.] Inwardly grieved.

For the joy of the Lord is your strength.] Joy in the Lord for the great things he had done for them in restoring them to their own land, building the temple, and the walls of Jerusalem, was never more becoming than upon a festival day, which afforded other matter of joy. And beside, it would make them cheerfully perform the rest of their duty, and fortify them against troubles and adversities; nay, it was the way to remove them, or to keep them off: for when the service of God was their delight, he promised to keep off those plagues which were threatened in the law against transgressors, and to give them all the blessings they could desire.

Ver. 11. So the Levites stilled all the people, saying, Hold your peace, for the day is holy; neither be ye grieved.] What Nehemiah had said to as many as could hear him, the Levites said to the rest of the people: going about, and persuading them to lay aside their heaviness, and make it a good day.

Ver. 12. And all the people went their way to eat, and to drink, and to send portions, and to make great mirth.] As all nations were wont to do upon their festival days. There being very few among the Greeks, wherein they made lamentations; but they rather exceeded all bounds of decency in their jollity upon sacred solemnities, being wont, besides music and dancing (which were very proper), to entertain one another with jests and scoffs, and unbecoming laughter; as the illustrious Spanhemius shews, in his observations upon Callimachus's hymn, in Lavacrum Palladis, ad Versum 324.

Because they had understood the words that were declared unto them.] This was an extraordinary reason for their mirth, that they were illuminated in Divine knowledge, and understood the will of God better than they did before.

Ver. 13. And on the second day were gathered together the chief of the fathers of all the people, the priests, and the Levites, unto Ezra the scribe, even to understand the words of the law.] This was no festival day, but so desirous were they to be acquainted with the law (of the knowledge of which he had given them a taste), that they came again this day to beg further instruction. Which, it is evident from hence, Ezra gave them, not the priests and the Levites, who came to be instructed by him as well as the people.

Ver. 14. And they found written in the law which the Lord had commanded by Moses, that the children of Israel should dwell in booths in the feast of the seventh month.] It is probable that he read to them particularly the duties belonging to this month, wherein they were assembled, in which they found the feast of tabernacles was to be observed; and therefore they came to him for direction how it was to be kept, that they might obey the precept. And first he informed them that they must dwell in booths: which Maimonides shews how it is to be understood in his Seder Zeraim, where he explains the tradition of the ancients, who believed, that when God gave a precept he also gave the exposition of it, which he pretends was preserved by their wise men; which is a vain fancy of the Jews, to support the credit of their traditions. But the book Cosri thinks these words [they found it written] are to be understood of the common people; for the better sort understood well enough that such festivals were to be observed, and had not forgotten any of the precepts, (par. iii. sect. 63.)

Ver. 15. And that they should publish and proclaim in all their cities, and in Jerusalem, saying.] Then he tells them that proclamation should be made in all their cities, beginning in Jerusalem, that this feast ought to be observed on such a day, (Lev. xxiii. 4. 34.)

Go forth unto the mount, and fetch olive-branches, and pine-branches, and myrtle-branches, and palm-branches, and branches of thick trees, to make booths, as it is written.] The nearest mount to Jerusalem was the Mount of Olives, where it is likely all these trees grew. But the word shaman, which we translate olive-branches, our famous Dr. Castell thinks signifies citrons, which is not material, they being such branches as the mount afforded.

Ver. 16. So the people went forth, and brought them, and made themselves booths, every one upon the roof of his house.] Which by the law was to be built flat, (Deut. xxii. 8.)

And in their courts, and in the courts of the house of God, and in the street of the water-gate, and in the street of the gate of Ephraim.] They durst not make them without the walls of the city, for fear of their enemies.

Ver. 17. And all the congregation of them that were come again out of the captivity made booths, and sat under the booths.] They not only made them, but left their houses, and dwelt in them all the days of the feast.

For since the days of Jeshua the son of Nun unto that day had not the children of Israel done so: and there was very great gladness.] This is scarce credible, as Mr. Medo speaks, that for a thousand years none of the good kings in Israel should observe this festival, at least in this main circumstance of dwelling in booths. But so he thinks it was, and that this horrible omission of this feast alone foresignified the Jews would not acknowledge Christ, whom this signified to be Emanuel, God dwelling in our flesh. (See book i. discourse xlv. p. 354.) But I think this is not the meaning, that this festival had never been observed since Joshua's time; for we read in the foregoing book, that it was kept at their return from Babylon. But the meaning is, that the joy had never been so great as it was now since that time: for which there was a special reason, as the Jews observe in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 30. for they rejoiced in the days of Joshua, that they had got possession of the land of Canaan; and now they rejoiced that they were restored to it, and quietly settled in it, after they had been cast out of it.

Ver. 18. Also day by day, from the first day unto the last day, he read in the book of the law of God: and they kept the feast seven days; and on the eighth day was a solemn assembly, according unto the manner.] There was a command that the law should be read on this feast, as I observed above, (Deut. xxxi. 10—12.) but not that it should be read every day. This was the effect of their great zeal to be instructed in the law of God, which made them desire to hear it on the second day of this month, which was a festival: (ver. 13.) and perhaps the eighth day, on which a solemn assembly was appointed, (Lev. xxiii. 26.) they continued the same holy exercise. But that seems contrary to this verse, which speaks only of seven days.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. NOW, in the twenty and fourth day of this month, the children of Israel were assembled with fasting, and with sackclothes, and earth upon them.] The feast being over, which ended upon the twenty-second day (all which time mourning was forbidden, as contrary to the nature of the feast, which was to be kept with joy), they now return to that which they were about before, (chap. viii. 9. 12.) and spent this whole day in humbling themselves before God for their sins. The reason why they did not immediately after the feast of tabernacles keep this fast, was (as Josephus Scaliger conjectures), because the twenty-third day was another festival, made by the constitution of the elders, by the same authority wherewith afterward they appointed the feast of Purim, mentioned in the book of Esther. It was called the festival of the law, still observed by the Jews on the twenty-third day of this month, because then they make an end of reading the law, which they begin again every year the next sabbath after. Now this being a day of joy, as other festivals were, on which they were forbidden to mourn, they deferred their mourning till this solemnity also was past, and then they fell to weeping again, as they did when they first heard the law read.

Ver. 2. And the seed of Israel separated themselves from all strangers, and stood and confessed their sins, and the iniquities of their fathers.] Who had been guilty of taking strange women to be their wives; for which Ezra had severely censured them, and constrained them to put them away. But so depraved were some among them, that it seems they transgressed again in this matter, as they did in other things, who confessed their own guilt, and the guilt of those that were before them, and, as a token of their true repentance, separated themselves from these strangers. Which they did in such a manner, that they stood at a distance from them, to shew that they renounced them. For so the word stood is to be taken in this place, not for a posture of prayer, wherein they confessed their sins; for, appearing in sackcloth, and with earth on their heads, it is more likely they lay down and bewailed themselves, as the manner was in such cases. And accordingly the Levites called upon them (ver. 5.) to stand up; which supposes that they lay on the ground, or fell on their knees, and were not standing when they spake unto them.

Ver. 3. And they stood up in their place, and read in the book of the law of the Lord their God.] That is, the Levites stood up in a place built for them, like that whereon Ezra stood: (chap. viii. 4.) for otherwise they could not have been heard when they read.

One fourth part of the day; and another fourth part they confessed, and worshipped the Lord their God.] They read the law and confessed (that is, praised God, ver. 5.) interchangeably. For in one fourth part of the day, that is, from the first hour to the third, they did the one, and from thence to the sixth hour (that is, till twelve o'clock) they did the other. Then they began the former again till the ninth hour, and from thence till the evening they spent their time in the other.

Ver. 4. Then stood up upon the stairs, of the Levites.] Or, upon the scaffold (as the margin translates it), which raised them above the people, that they might all see and hear.

Jeshua, and Bani, Kadmiel, Shebaniah, Bunni, Sherebiah, Bani, and Chenani, and cried with a loud voice unto the Lord their God.] They most earnestly beseeched him to be merciful to them.

Ver. 5. Then the Levites, Jeshua, and Kadmiel, Bani, Hashabniah, Sherebiah, Hodijah, Shebaniah, and Pethahiah said, Stand up and bless the Lord your God for ever and ever.] After the Levites beforenamed had cried to God for mercy (the people, I suppose, begging it on their knees), another company of Levites bade the people stand up, and praise the Lord, and give him thanks as long as they had any being.

And blessed be thy glorious name, which is exalted above all blessing and praise.] The Levites, it is likely, praised him in these words, acknowledging that the noblest creatures could not reach his superexcellent perfections, and all the people repeated the same words after them.

Ver. 6. Thou, even thou, art Lord alone: thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth, and all things that are therein, the seas, and all that is therein, and thou preservest them all.] As they confess the Lord to be the only God, so they attribute two things to him; that he is the Creator and the Conservator of the universe; for having made it, no doubt he takes care of every part thereof.

And the host of heaven worshippeth thee.] Sometimes the stars, and sometimes the angels, are called the host of heaven. The latter seems to be here meant; for the other are mentioned before, when he saith, the heavens with all their host. Concerning the heaven of heavens, see in Solomon's prayer, 1 Kings viii. 27.

Ver. 7. Thou art the Lord the God, who didst choose Abram, and broughtest him forth out of Ur of the Chaldees, and gavest him the name of Abraham.] Here follows a compendious history of the affairs of the Hebrew nation, in this confession of God's benefits, and their ingratitude. Which Nehemiah and Ezra, it is likely, composed in the form of a prayer, and delivered it to the Levites, whom they ordered to speak it distinctly before the whole congregation from their several scaffolds, which were conveniently placed in several parts of the assembly, that they might be heard.

Ver. 8. And foundest his heart faithful before thee.] In many instances, especially in that great trial of his faith and obedience, when he required him to offer up his only son to him, (Gen. xxii. and see also Gen. xv. 6. xvii. 5, &c.)

And madest a covenant with him, to give the land of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Jebusites, and the Girgashites, to give it, I say, to his seed, and hast performed thy words; for thou art righteous.] True to his word in faithfully fulfilling his promises. (See Gen. xv. 7. 18. xvii. 2. 4. 7, &c.)

Ver. 9. And didst see the affliction of our fathers in Egypt, and heardest their cry by the Red Sea.] They pass by all God's providences over Isaac and Jacob, to come to that which God had done for them since they were a nation; that is, since he had made good his covenant with Abraham, to multiply his seed as the stars of heaven; at which time he foretold him of the grievous affliction of his seed in Egypt, (Gen. xv. 5. 13.) from which he graciously delivered them, they here acknowledge, and completed their deliverance at the Red Sea.

Ver. 10. And shewedst signs and wonders upon Pharaoh, and on all his servants, and on all the people of his land.] Which are recorded in the book of Exodus, chap. vii. viii. &c.

For thou knewest that they dealt proudly against them.] Intending to make them their slaves for ever, as, for the present, they treated them with the utmost contempt and cruelty, (Exod. v. 17, 18.)

So didst thou get thee a name, as it is this day.] See Exod. ix. 16.

Ver. 11. And thou didst divide the sea before them, so that they went through the midst of the sea on the dry land.] See Exod. xiv. 21, 22.

And their persecutors thou threwest into the deeps, as a stone into the mighty waters.] So that they sunk down, and rose up no more to persecute them. The Hebrew word signifies the strong or rough waters. And so Bochartus observes out of many Greek authors, that that sea is called, and said, in short, to be κατὰ πάντα φοβερὸν, in all regards formidable or terrible. In his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 13.

Ver. 12. Moreover, thou leddest them in the day by a cloudy pillar, and in the night by a pillar of fire, to give them light in the way wherein they should go.] Concerning which, see Exod. xiii. 21.

Ver. 13. Thou camest down also upon Mount Sinai, and spakest with them from heaven, and gavest them right judg- ments and true laws, good statutes and commandments.] This seems to relate, in the beginning of the verse, to the ten commandments, spoken by the mouth of God himself; but the latter part comprehends all the law delivered by him to Moses in the mount, (chap. xxi.—xxiii.)

Ver. 14. And madest known unto them thy holy sabbath.] The Scripture mentions the sabbath as a singular gift bestowed upon the Jewish nation, (Exod. xvi. 29.) It being a sign between him and them, that he was their God, who sanctified, that is, separated them out of all other people to be his peculiar people; that is, the worshippers of the Creator of the world, whom they acknowledged to be the Lord their God, while the heathen worshipped the sun, moon, and stars, and other creatures, as their gods, Exod. xxxi. 13. and Ezekiel xx. 12. 20. in which the prophet tells us, that God intended, by this, to shew that he had chosen Israel, as I said, to be his peculiar people above all other nations, and that they had no other God.

And commandedst them precepts, statutes, and laws, by the hand of Moses thy servant.] Which are those beforementioned, which were not spoken by God himself, but delivered by him to Moses in the mount, who was his faithful servant, and delivered nothing but what he received from God's own mouth. The observation of which is often pressed upon them as an acknowledgment of him to be their Creator, who brought them out of the land of Egypt.

Ver. 15. And gavest them bread from heaven for their hunger, and broughtest forth water for them out of the rock for their thirst.] See Exod. xvi. 14, 15. xvii. 6.

And promisedst them that they should go in to possess the land which thou hadst sworn to give them.] Which he set before them, and bade them go and possess it, as Moses tells them, Deut. i. 8.

Ver. 16. But they and our fathers dealt proudly, and hardened their necks, and hearkened not to thy commandments.] A famous instance of this there was, when they refused to go up and possess the land, to the borders of which he had brought them: (Numb. xiv. 1, 2, &c.) and afterward more insolently rebelled against Moses and Aaron, who had been their conductors through the wilderness, (Numb. xvi. 3.)

Ver. 17. And refused to obey, neither were mindful of thy wonders that thou didst among them; but hardened their necks.] Their ingratitude was the greater, because these wonders were not done among other nations, but were peculiar to them; which our Saviour makes a very high aggravation of the sins of their posterity, (Matt. xi. 21.)

And in their rebellion appointed a captain to return to their bondage.] See Numb. xiv. 4. where they consulted about it, and it seems came to this resolution, that they agreed upon a captain to lead them back to Egypt: or their resolving to do it was the same with the actual appointment of a captain, as it was in the case of Abraham's offering his son.

But thou art a God ready to pardon, gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and forsookest them not.] This was the character God gave of himself to Moses, (Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7,) which he made good to all generations. (See Psal. cxlv. 8.)

Ver. 18. Yea, when they had made them a molten calf, and said, This is thy god that brought thee up out of Egypt, and had wrought great provocations.] This was the highest provocation, considering how lately he had spoken to them from heaven not to make a graven image, and how many cautions he had afterward given them against it.

Ver. 19. Yet thou, in thy manifold mercies forsookest them not in the wilderness.] But gave them an early instance of his clemency.

The pillar of the cloud departed not from them by day, to lead them in the way; neither the pillar of fire by night, to shew them light, and the way wherein they should go.] Which testified that, notwithstanding their provocation, God was still among them, and continued his gracious presence with them, of which this was a glorious token, as Moses told them, Numb. xiv. 14.

Ver. 20. Thou gavest also thy good Spirit to instruct them.] The spirit of prophecy, which was upon Moses, God imparted to seventy other persons, that the people might be better governed, (Numb. xi. 16, 17.)

And withheldest not thy manna from their mouth.] But continued it till they came to Canaan; or else they might have been starved. (See Josh. v. 12.)

And gavest them water for their thirst.] When the whole congregation deserved to perish, according to their own wish, that they had died when their brethren died before the Lord, (Numb. xx. 3.)

Ver. 21. Yea, forty years didst thou sustain them in the wilderness, so that they lacked nothing: their clothes waxed not old, and their feet swelled not.] See Deut. viii. 4.

Ver. 22. Moreover, thou gavest them kingdoms and nations, and didst divide them into corners.] Some translate the last words, Thou didst divide them by angles; that is, he parted those kingdoms among them as by a line. But others understand it of the people dispossessed by the Jews, whom he drove into corners.

So they possessed the land of Sihon, and the land of the king of Heshbon, and the land of Og king of Bashan.] Most of the inhabitants of which he destroyed, and the rest fled and hid themselves in corners. But it must be observed, that Heshbon being the city of Sihon, (Numb. xxi. 26.) the first words should be rendered, the land of Sihon, even the land of the king of Heshbon.

Ver. 23. Their children also multipliedst thou as the stars of heaven, and broughtest them into the land concerning which thou hadst promised to their fathers, that they should go in to possess it.] See Gen. xv. 5.

Ver. 24. So the children went in and possessed the land; and thou subduedst before them the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, and gavest them into their hands, with their kings, and the people of the land, that they might do with them as they would.] These words express the easy conquest they made of the whole country.

Ver. 25. And they took strong cities.] The walls of Jericho falling down flat before them.

And a fat land.] A fruitful country flowing with milk and honey.

And possessed houses full of all goods, wells digged, vineyards, and olive-yards, and fruit-trees in abundance.] They were enriched with the estates of the people whom they destroyed, having houses ready built, and well furnished, together with all sort of trees planted to their hands.

So they did eat, and were filled, and became fat.] They wanted nothing, but rather had superfluity of all worldly blessings.

And delighted themselves in thy great goodness.] Their highest pleasure indeed ought to have been in their thoughts how good God was unto them; but the meaning of these words is no more than this, That God had bestowed so many blessings upon them, that they took great pleasure in the enjoyment of them.

Ver. 26. Nevertheless they were disobedient, and rebelled against thee, and cast thy law behind their backs.] The pleasant life they led in the good land God gave them made them wanton, and forgetful of God and of his laws, which they regarded not at all.

And slew thy prophets, which testified against them to turn them to thee.] We read of many prophets slain by Jezebel, 1 Kings xviii. 4. xix. 10.

And they wrought great provocations.] By abominable idolatries.

Ver. 27. Therefore thou deliveredst them into the hand of their enemies, who vexed them: and in the time of their trouble, when they cried unto thee, thou heardest them from heaven; and, according to thy manifold mercies, thou gavest them saviours, who saved them out of the hand of their enemies.] The whole book of Judges verifies this, that God delivered them for their sins unto the Moabites, the Canaanites, and divers other enemies, who grievously domineered over them; but when they cried to God for help, he was so gracious as to send such great men as Barak, Gideon, and others, to be their saviours, that is, deliverers from their tyranny.

Ver. 28. But after they had rest, they did evil again before thee.] No sooner did they begin to prosper, and the judge that saved them was dead, but they revolted from God, who had been so good to them.

Therefore leftest thou them in the hand of their enemies, so that they had the dominion over them.] God so abandoned them, that he let the Philistines rule over them forty years, (Judg. xiii. 1.) unto which, perhaps, this passage relates.

Yet when they returned, and cried unto thee, thou heardest them from heaven; and many times didst thou deliver them, according to thy mercies.] For nothing else could move him to it; they being through all generations unconstant and unsteadfast in their obedience.

Ver. 29. And testifiedst against them, that thou mightest bring them again unto thy law.] By many remarkable punishments he testified how highly he was displeased with them, that he might reform them.

Yet they dealt proudly.] Which one would have expected should have humbled them; but they grew more bold and obstinate in their sins.

And hearkened not unto thy commandments, but sinned against thy judgments (which if a man do, he shall live in them).] That is, be a happy man.

And withdrew the shoulder, and hardened their neck, and would not hear.] Withdrawing the shoulder is a metaphor (I have observed before) taken from refractory oxen, that draw back, and will not submit to the yoke.

Ver. 30. Yet many years didst thou forbear them.] Before he suffered them to be carried captive out of their own land.

And testifiedst against them by thy Spirit in thy prophets.] Whom he raised up (I have observed elsewhere) in every age, in every king's reign, to tell them their duty, and reprove them for their sins.

Yet would they not give ear: therefore gavest thou them into the hand of the people of the lands.] At last he delivered them into the hands of the Chaldeans, as we read 2 Chron. xxxvi. 15, 16. who are called the people of the lands, because they had got possession of all the countries thereabout, which God put under their power, as he had done other countries beyond Euphrates.

Ver. 31. Nevertheless, for thy great mercies' sake, thou didst not utterly consume them, nor forsake them.] But left them a remnant of the poorer sort in the land, and shewed favour to the captives in the land of Babylon.

For thou art a gracious and merciful God.] To which alone they owed their preservation from utter destruction.

Ver. 32. Now therefore, our God, the great, the mighty, and the terrible God, who keepest covenant and mercy.] Thus he began his address to God before he came from Shushan. (See chap. i. 5.)

Let not all the trouble seem little before thee that hath come upon us, on our kings, on our princes, and on our priests, and on our prophets, and on our fathers, and on all thy people, since the time of the kings of Assyria unto this day.] For those kings first began to invade their country, and carried away the ten tribes, (2 Kings xv. 19. xvii. 3. 5, &c.) After which, calamities came upon Judah, their good king Josiah being slain, Manasseh carried to Babylon before the great captivity.

Ver. 33. Howbeit thou art just in all that is brought upon us; for thou hast done right, but we have done wickedly.

Ver. 34. Neither have our kings, our princes, our priests, nor our fathers, kept thy law, nor hearkened unto thy commandments, and the testimonies wherewith thou didst testify against them.

Ver. 35. For they have not served thee in their kingdom, and in thy great goodness that thou gavest them, and in the large and fat land which thou gavest before them, neither turned they from their wicked works.] In these three verses they acknowledge the justice of God, in all the punishments he had inflicted on them, though heavy, and of long continuance. For from the highest to the lowest they had done all wickedly, and would not be reclaimed.

Ver. 36. Behold, we are servants this day; and for the land that thou gavest unto our fathers, to eat the fruit thereof, and the good thereof, behold, we are servants in it.] God had, indeed, marvellously restored them to their own country; yet the marks of his displeasure for their sins still remained very visible: for they were but servants unto others, not owners and proprietors of the lands which God had given to their fathers. Out of which they had been cast for their wickedness, and had not yet perfectly recovered it, but laboured for their lords and masters.

Ver. 37. And it yieldeth much increase unto the kings whom thou hast set over us because of our sins.] For their land paid a great tribute to the kings of Persia, out of the profit of it, (Ezra vi. 8. vii. 24. and in this book, chap. v. 4.)

Also they have dominion over our bodies, and over our cattle, at their pleasure.] For their bodies were liable to be pressed to serve in the king's wars, or in his works; and their cattle subject to them, when they had occasion to send post about the king's business.

And we are in great distress.] Though they were permitted to live by their own laws (as we read in the book of Ezra), which was a great privilege, yet they lay under those public burdens, and were compelled to bear them. By which we may learn how vain their proud boasts were in John viii. 33. that they were never in bondage to any man; when they had long been slaves in Egypt, and lately in Babylon, and after they came from thence, as they here complain; and even they paid tribute to the Romans when they made those brags to our Saviour.

Ver. 38. And because of all this we make a sure covenant, and write it; and our princes, Levites, and priests, seal unto it.] In consideration of which, they resolved to renew their covenant with God of better obedience; which they promised under their hands and seals, as the only remedy to procure perfect deliverance. And, to make it more effectual, they seem to declare this in the presence of God, at the conclusion of the foregoing confession and prayer.

It signified little, indeed, as Pellicanus observes, what such an untoward people promised; for what regard would they have to their own hand-writing, who regarded not the ten commandments, written on tables of stone by the finger of God? But it was very useful, that there should be a public instrument to convince them of their impiety, and that they might be publicly confounded when they proved perfidious deserters, by shewing them their engagements, under their own hands, to future fidelity.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. NOW those that sealed were Nehemiah the Tirshatha, the son of Hachaliah, and Zidkijah.] Nehemiah was the governor of the country under the king of Persia, and therefore the principal prince among them, who led the way to the rest; who are not mentioned, unless we suppose Zidkijah to have been a prince; for they that followed were priests.

Ver. 2. Seraiah, Azariah, Jeremiah.] I need not transcribe the rest of the names to the eighth verse, at the end of which it is said these were the priests, that is, the chief of them, for there are but twenty and one of them in all; and there is no mention of Ezra the priest among them; of which it is hard to give an account, unless we suppose him to be now gone to Babylon: which must be very lately; for he was at Jerusalem in the beginning of the seventh month; (chap. viii. 2.) though on the twenty-fourth day of it, when they fasted and prayed, we do not find him named throughout the whole ninth chapter; yet at the feast of the dedication he was come to Jerusalem again, (chap. xii. 36.) Some therefore think he was now hindered by sickness from being present at this sealing.

Ver. 9. And the Levites: both Jeshua the son of Azaniah; Binnui of the sons of Henadad; Kadmiel.

Ver. 10. And their brethren, &c.] There are fourteen Levites mentioned in these and the following verses, to ver. 14. which, perhaps, were all the Levites that were then present; or rather were the principal Levites, who were not priests: for some of these are mentioned before, as chosen to expound the law to the people, and to make public prayers to God, (chap. viii. 7. ix. 4, 5.)

Ver. 14. The chief of the people; Parosh, &c.] It had been tedious to make all the people subscribe and seal the writing; therefore the principal persons did it in the name of the rest, whose names, in number forty and three, are here recorded till ver. 28.

Ver. 28. And the rest of the people, the priests, the Levites, the porters, the singers, the Nethinims, and all they that had separated themselves from the people of the lands unto the law of God, their wives, their sons, and their daughters, every one having knowledge, and having understanding.] All that did not subscribe and seal, because they were too many, yet gave their consent to what the forenamed persons did. And not only the men, but their wives, and their children who were arrived at years of discretion, engaged themselves, as follows in the next verse.

Ver. 29. They clave to their brethren, their nobles.] They declared they were of the same mind with those that had sealed, and owned by word of mouth what they had set their hands unto; and said, it was their act, as much as their nobles' and brethren's, from whom they would not depart.

And entered into a curse, and into an oath, to walk in God's law, which was given by Moses the servant of God, and to observe and do all the commandments of the Lord our God, and his judgments and his statutes.] And more than that, they added an oath, whereby they obliged themselves to observe the law; and an imprecation upon themselves, wishing all the curses written in the law might fall upon them, if they did not do as the law required in all things.

Ver. 30. And that we would not give our daughters unto the people of the land, nor take their daughters for our sons.] Besides their general promise, they specify those things that were most difficult; as, not marrying with strangers, observing the sabbath, bringing oblations for the use of the temple, &c. The first thing here specified was of great importance; and they solemnly engaged to perform it: for though both Ezra and Nehemiah had found them guilty of breaking this law, yet they were so prone to offend in this thing, that it seems, notwithstanding all they could do, some continued to violate it.

Ver. 31. And if the people of the land.] That is, their heathen neighbours.

Bring ware, or any victuals, on the sabbath-day to sell, that we would not buy it of them on the sabbath.] We do not find any express law forbidding them to buy what was offered to be sold on the sabbath-day; but they obliged themselves not to do it, that the rest might be better observed. For none would come to sell, when there were no chapmen for their commodities.

Or on the holy-day.] That is, on all days of rest from their labours, such as the Passover, the feast of tabernacles, and others.

And that we would leave the seventh year.] That is, let their land rest every seventh year, and leave the fruit of it, which grew up of itself, for the poor, as the law required, (Lev. xxv. 4, &c.)

And the exaction of every debt.] That is, remit in that year the debts which the poor owed them, (Deut. xv. 2, &c.)

Ver. 32. Also we made ordinances for us, to charge ourselves yearly with the third part of a shekel for the service of the house of our God.] We do not find this enjoined any where by an express law; but reason required it at this time; and therefore they obliged themselves to it by an ordinance of the elders, that the service of God at the temple might be maintained by this small duty, which was laid upon every one.

Ver. 33. For the shew-bread, and for the continual meat-offering, and for the continual burnt-offering, of the sabbaths, of the new moons, for the set feasts, and for the holy things, and for the sin-offerings, to make an atonement for Israel, and for all the work of the house of our God.] There was a treasury formerly in the house of God, out of which all these things were supplied: and when it was exhausted by the many great sums which were sent out of it to foreign princes in the days of Hezekiah, that prince maintained the burnt-offerings at his own charge, (2 Chron. xxxi. 3.) But both these failing for the present, there was this oblation made to furnish all the things here mentioned, and every thing else that was necessary for the service of God. And, no doubt, many good people dedicated things to the same use; whereby the expenses were well maintained.

Ver. 34. And we cast the lots among the priests, the Levites, and the people, for the wood-offering, to bring it into the house of our God, after the houses of our fathers, at times appointed, year by year, to burn upon the altar of the Lord our God, as it is written in the law.] They determined, by casting of lots, how much wood every one should bring in for his share, to maintain their fire continually upon the altar to burn the sacrifices; and in what order it should be brought (what family, that is, should begin first, and what should follow next), and at what times of the year. For there was another solemn feast (beside those I mentioned before), called the feast of the wood-offering, which took its original from hence; and, as Scaliger observes, was kept on the twenty-second day of the month Ab. But Mr. Thorndike observes, out of the Mischna, (in his Religious Assemblies, p. 269.) that it was held nine days in several months, whereof a great part fell in that month; and is meant by these words, at times appointed, year by year. The Talmudists also say, that every family, on the day when they brought in the wood, sacrificed a voluntary burnt-offering, called the korban of wood, as Petrus Cunæus observes, in his book de Republica Hebræorum, lib. ii. cap. 13. where he notes also, that herein Josephus differs from the Talmudists; that he mentions but one day of the feasts, which he calls ξυλοφορία: which was such a solemn festival, (as Maimonides saith, in his Furniture of the Temple, chap. 6.) that none might mourn on this day, nor fast, nor do any work.

Ver. 35. And to bring the first-fruits of our ground, and the first-fruits of all fruit of all trees, year by year, unto the house of the Lord.] According to the command, Exod. xxiii. 19. Lev. xix. 23. (See below, ver. 39.)

Ver. 36. Also the first-born of our sons, and of our cattle (as it is written in the law), and the firstlings of our herds, and of our flocks, to bring to the house of our God, unto the priests that minister in the house of our God.] The law which gave all the firstlings to God is in Exod. xiii. the beginning, and ver. 11, 12. and God gave them all to Aaron the priest, in Numb. xviii. 15, 16.

Ver. 37. And that we should bring the first-fruits of our dough, and our offerings.] See Lev. xxiii. 17. Numb. xv. 19, 20. It was to be so large, that it is called a gift in Deut. xviii. 4.

And the fruit of all manner of trees, of wine, and of oil, unto the priests, to the chambers of the house of our God.] See Numb. xviii. 12, &c.

And the tithes of our ground unto the Levites, that the same Levites might have the tithes in all the cities of our tillage.] See Lev. xxvii. 30. Numb. xviii. 21.

Ver. 38. And the priest the son of Aaron shall be with the Levites, when the Levites take tithes: and the Levites shall bring up the tithe of the tithes unto the house of our God, to the chambers, into the treasure-house.] As the people gave the tithes of their land to the Levites, so the Levites gave a tithe to the priests. And when the people brought them to the Levites, one of the priests was appointed to be present to inspect them, and to see that, without fraud, they tithed the tithes; that is, set out the tenth part of the tithes they had received for the priests, which was brought to the chambers, wherein it was deposited for the priests in God's house.

Ver. 39. For the children of Israel and the children of Levi shall bring the offering of the corn, of the new wine, and the oil.] See Deut. xii. 6. 11.

Unto the chambers, where are the vessels of the sanctuary, and the priests that minister, and the porters, and the singers.] Where other holy things were kept, and where God's ministers attended, for whose use they were designed, and were to be brought thither at their own charge. These chambers were in the court of the priests: but L'Empereur thinks the court of the people likewise might have such places in it, wherein these things were bestowed, being more than the other could contain. For (as the Jews observe) though the priests had a court proper to themselves, into which none might come but they alone, yet they were not excluded from the court of Israel; and if there was not room enough to receive all the things forementioned, there were receptacles under ground, besides the upper room mentioned Jer. xxxv. 4.

And we will not forsake the house of our God.] They promise, according to their covenant and oath, to be no more so negligent in these matters as they had been; and accordingly they did fulfil this promise, as we read chap. xii. 44, 45. unto the end.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. AND the rulers of the people dwelt at Jerusalem.] Their neighbours were so enraged to see the walls at Jerusalem built again, and were so restless in their designs to keep this city from rising to its former splendour, that it terrified many of the Jews from coming to dwell there, thinking themselves more safe in the country, where their enemies had no pretence to disturb them. The rulers, therefore, of the people came and settled themselves at Jerusalem, that they might invite and encourage others to come and inhabit it; and several persons, as the next verse intimates, did come and offer themselves freely to dwell with them there.

The rest of the people also cast lots, to bring one of ten to dwell in Jerusalem the holy city, and nine parts to dwell in other cities.] But though the rulers were settled here, and some followed their example, and all that formerly belonged to Jerusalem were ordered to return, (chap. vii. 4, 5.) yet still there was room for more citizens; and the city, considering how large it was, being very empty, they consulted to make it populous, by compelling every tenth man in Judah and Benjamin to quit his present habitation in the country, and come and dwell there; leaving the rest to dwell where they pleased. For which end they cast lots, that among ten men it might be known whom God chose to come thither; and the lot falling by a Divine appointment upon such a person, rather than another, no doubt, he removed the more contentedly to this city.

Ver. 2. And the people blessed all the men that willingly offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem.] Beside those who were chosen by lot, it seems there were some that voluntarily chose to go and live there; whom the people highly commended and praised, beseeching God to bless and prosper them: for indeed they were worthy to be honoured as men that sought the welfare of their country, the glory of God, the restoring of their nation, the defence of their city, and had a zeal for the Divine service performed there.

Ver. 3. Now these are the chief of the province.] Of those Jews that came from Babylon into the province of Judea.

That dwelt in Jerusalem.] Whose names are mentioned ver. 4, &c.

But in the cities of Judah dwelt every one in his possession in their cities, to wit, Israel, the priests, and the Levites, and the Nethinims, and the children of Solomon's servants.] But those that dwelt in the other cities of Judah, he would not reckon in this catalogue; whom he comprehends under the name of Israel, the priests, the Levites, the Nethinims, and Solomon's servants. By Israel he means all the people of the ten tribes, as well as Judah and Benjamin, who were the chief; but he calls them Israel, because those of Judah and Benjamin dwelt at Jerusalem, the rest of Israel were in the other cities of Judah.

Ver. 4. And at Jerusalem dwelt certain of the children of Judah, and of the children of Benjamin.] For these were the tribes that anciently possessed Jerusalem; which stood partly in the one, partly in the other tribe. Therefore, in some places of Scripture, Jerusalem is reckoned as belonging to the children of Judah, (see Josh. xv. 63. Judg. i. 8.) and sometimes in the same words to the children of Benjamin, (Judg. xviii. 20. xxi. 28.) and here to both. But what part of the city belonged to the one, and what to the other, is not agreed among learned men. Pineda hath represented the several opinions about it at large, in his book de Rebus Solomonis, lib. v. cap. 5.

Of the children of Judah; Athaiah the son of Uzziah, the son of Zechariah, the son of Amariah, the son of Shephatiah, the son of Mahalaleel, of the children of Perez.] These were all of that family of Pharez, the son of Judah. If the names of these persons mentioned in this chapter be compared with the names of those who came back with Zerubbabel, it will appear, that they were the fourth, fifth, and sixth generation from Zerubbabel; which is a demonstration, that Nehemiah did not come to Jerusalem in the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, but of Artaxerxes Mnemon. For this observation I am beholden to my worthy friend Dr. Alix.

Ver. 5. And Maaseiah the son of Baruch, the son of Colhozeh, the son of Hazaiah, the son of Adaiah, the son of Joiarib, the son of Zechariah, the son of Shiloni.] These were all of the same family, as the next verse informs us.

Ver. 6. All the sons of Perez that dwelt at Jerusalem, were four hundred threescore and eight valiant men.] Who seem to me to have offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem, and help to defend it by their valour, whose chiefs were Athaiah and Maaseiah.

Ver. 7. And these are the sons of Benjamin; Sallu the son of Meshullam, the son of Joed, the son of Pedaiah, the son of Kolaiah, the son of Maaseiah, the son of Ithiel, the son of Jesaiah.

Ver. 8. And after him Gabbai, Sallai.] These two and Sallu (beforenamed) were the chief men among them.

Nine hundred twenty and eight.] There were almost as many more of Benjamin as of Judah (who were but four hundred sixty and eight); for though Mount Zion was in the tribe of Judah, yet the city of Jerusalem was in the tribe of Benjamin; which made them have a great desire to see it inhabited, and inflamed the minds of the most valiant, who were best able to defend it, to come and live there.

Ver. 9. And Joel the son of Zichri was their overseer; and Judah the son of Senuah was second over the city.] The former of these was the governor of the city; and the other was his deputy; who is called secondary, because he was next to him in the discharge of that office. Who is he, as Bertram thinks, that is called in the second book of Maccabees, chap. iii. 4. προστάτης τοῦ ἱεροῦ, the prefect of the temple; and by Josephus, Antiq. xiv. 11. ὑποστρατηγὸς ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις, the under governor in Jerusalem. (See his Repub. Jud. p. 163.)

Ver. 10. Of the priests; Jedaiah the son of Joiarib, Jachin.] Now he comes to speak of the tribe of Levi; many of which it was necessary should dwell there, to attend the house of God. And first he begins with the priests, who were his chief ministers.

Ver. 11. Seraiah the son of Hilkiah, the son of Meshullam, the son of Zadok, the son of Meraioth, the son of Ahitub, was the ruler of the house of God.] This Seraiah was such a chief man among the priests, as he that is mentioned in 2 Chron. xix. 11. (See there.) Some take him to be the same with him that is called in the New Testament στρατηγὸς τοῦ ἱεροῦ, which we translate the captain of the temple.

Ver. 12. And their brethren that did the work of the house were eight hundred twenty and two.] Who discharged all the offices of the priests in the temple.

And Adaiah the son of Jeroham, the son of Pelaliah, the son of Amzi, the son of Zechariah, the son of Pashur, the son of Malchiah.

Ver. 13. And his brethren, chief of the fathers, two hundred forty and two; and Amashai, the son of Azareel, the son of Ahasai, the son of Meshillemoth, the son of Immer.

Ver. 14. And their brethren, mighty men of valour, a hundred twenty and eight.] Some of the priests were noted to be men of great courage, who, when there was occasion, fought for their country, especially to defend the house of God.

And their overseer was Zabdiel, the son of one of the great men.] Or, as the margin, the son of Haggedolim, was set over these valiant men; being descended (it is supposed by some) from some of the great men among the priests; as the word Haggedolim imports.

Ver. 15. Also of the Levites; Shemaiah the son of Hashub, the son of Azrikam, the son of Hashabiah, the son of Bunni.] After the priests he gives an account of the Levites; among whom this person, and the two other mentioned in the next verses, were the chief.

Ver. 16. And Shabbethai and Jozabad, of the chief of the Levites, had the oversight of the outward business of the house of God.] There were a great many things to be done without the temple, as well as within, to prepare for the service of it; particularly, to gather the third part of a shekel, which every one was to give to make provision for it, (chap. x. 32.) which work was committed to these men. Though Bertram (de Republica Judaica, p. 160. 363.) thinks this may be the meaning, That they were judges and officers in the country, where their presence was necessary, when there were but few to discharge such outward business in Israel, as it is called in 1 Chron. xxvi. 29.

Ver. 17. And Mattaniah the son of Micha, the son of Zabdi, the son of Asaph, was the principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer.] He was the precentor (as we call him in our choirs) who began to sing the hymn at morning and evening sacrifice; which seems to be that in 1 Chron. xvi. 7, 8, &c. in the latter part of which they pray to God, as in the former they give thanks.

And Bakbukiah the second among his brethren, and Abda the son of Shammua, the son of Galal, the son of Jeduthun.] The first of these seems to have supplied the place of Mattaniah when he was absent.

Ver. 18. All the Levites in the holy city were two hundred fourscore and four.] Who certainly attended there; unless we suppose, with Bertram, that they went forth some time about some outward business, which they were required to dispatch.

Ver. 19. Moreover, the porters: Akkub, Talmon, and their brethren that kept the gates, were a hundred seventy and two.] Who had the custody of the gates of the temple.

Ver. 20. And the residue of Israel, of the priests and the Levites, were in all the cities of Judah, every one in his inheritance.] He had said before that the rest of Israel dwelt in their own cities, (ver. 3.) and now he saith, that so did the rest of the priests and the Levites dwell in the cities anciently appointed for them.

Ver. 21. But the Nethinims dwelt in Ophel.] Which was a place upon the wall of Jerusalem, or a tower near it. (See chap. iii. 26. 2 Chron. xxvii. 3.)

And Ziha and Gipsa were over the Nethinims.] Two persons of their own body, I suppose, who were appointed to see them do their duty.

Ver. 22. The overseer also of the Levites at Jerusalem was Uzzi the son of Bani, the son of Hashabiah, the son of Mattaniah, the son of Micha.] He was set over the Levites, to govern them, and see them discharge their offices in an orderly manner. The LXX. translate it Ἐπίσκοπος, and so doth the Vulgar; for he was supervisor of those below him.

Of the sons of Asaph, the singers were over the business of the house of God.] They were ordered to look after the reparation of the temple; for which they had the more leisure, both because they did not come in their courses to Jerusalem, as others did, but were settled there; and were to attend at the temple only at certain hours, after which they might look after other business.

Ver. 23. For it was the king's commandment concerning them, that a certain portion should be for the singers' due for every day.] Beside the forenamed reasons, they had great encouragement from the king, who ordered them a certain portion for their maintenance every day. Some are of opinion, that this was king David, who first appointed them to attend in a settled course; but it is more likely it was the king of Persia, who out of his munificence made them a daily allowance for their better support; they that sang hymns to their gods being persons much valued in all countries: and if David made any provision for them, it being lost, most likely was not yet restored.

Ver. 24. And Pethahiah the son of Meshezabeel, of the children of Zerah the son of Judah.] We had the children of Pharez named before, who settled at Jerusalem, (ver. 6.) and now it appears that some of the posterity of his brother did the same; for here is one man mentioned who was of great authority under the king of Persia, as it here follows.

Was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people.] The king appointed him to receive all petitions from the people, and by him returned them answers. This seems the plain sense, according to our translation. But some translate it, not at the king's hand, but on the king's part, that is, he heard all causes in civil matters between the king and the people; as, about his tribute, or any grievance of which they complained. And Bertram thinks it appears by the very context, that he was appointed by the king (so at his hand, or by his hand, may be understood) to see all things supplied which the people were bound to furnish for the temple: or rather, as Pellicanus thinks, to see that what the king allowed for public sacrifices to be made for him, and for his family, (Ezra vi. 10.) was duly paid out of the treasury of the province.

Ver. 25. And for the villages, with their fields, some of the children of Judah dwelt at Kirjath-arba, and in the villages thereof, and at Dibon, and in the villages thereof, and at Jekabzeel, and in the villages thereof.] He gives no account of the families that dwelt in the country, as he doth of those that settled in Jerusalem, but only mentions the towns wherein they dwelt, which formerly had been walled cities, but now open villages, wherein houses were built, but not their walls.

Ver. 26. And at Jeshua, and at Moladah, and at Beth-phelet.] In this and in the following verses unto ver. 31. he mentions the other towns wherein the children of Judah dwelt, who did not come to inhabit at Jerusalem.

Ver. 27. And at Hazar-shual, and at Beer-sheba, and in the villages thereof.

Ver. 28. And at Ziklag, and at Mekona, and in the villages thereof.

Ver. 29. And at En-rimmon, and at Zareah, and at Jarmuth.

Ver. 30. Zanoah, Adullam, and in their villages, at Lachish, and the fields thereof, at Azekah, and in the villages thereof. And they dwelt from Beer-sheba unto the valley of Hinnom.] It appears by this account that some of these great towns or cities without walls had little villages about them, but others had only fields and no villages in them, the country being as yet but thinly peopled.

Ver. 31. The children also of Benjamin from Geba dwelt at Michmash, and Aija, and Beth-el, and in their villages.] Geba had formerly been an eminent place in this tribe, and so was Beth-el.

Ver. 32. And at Anathoth, Nob, Ananiah.

Ver. 33. Hazor, Ramah, Gittaim.

Ver. 34. Hadid, Zeboim, Neballat.

Ver. 35. Lod, and Ono, the valley of craftsmen.] We read of Lod and Ono before in the first book of Chronicles. (See chap. viii. 12.)

Ver. 36. And of the Levites were divisions in Judah, and in Benjamin.] The rest of the Levites who were not settled at Jerusalem were distributed among the people of Judah and Benjamin, who dwelt in the forenamed towns, whom they taught and instructed in religion and good manners.

We read also 1 Chron. ix. 3. that some of the children of Ephraim and Manasseh dwelt at Jerusalem; but, I suppose, they were so few, that they are not here remembered; or, perhaps, they removed to some other place when Jerusalem continued without walls.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. NOW these are the priests and the Levites that went up with Zerubbabel the son of Shealtiel, and Jeshua.] The chief of the priests, as they are called ver. 7. whom he thought fit to mention here, because he intended to describe the dedication and consecration of the city, where the ministry of the priests and Levites was to be employed.

Seraiah, Jeremiah, Ezra.] If this was the same Ezra that wrote the foregoing book, or part of it, then he went back to Babylon after his coming up to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel, and came again instructed with a large power in the seventh year of Artaxerxes: but there are many reasons to prove he was not the same.

Ver. 2. Amariah, Malluch, Hattash.] He that is here called Malluch is called Melicu, ver. 14. and such differences are in some of the following names, which are repeated ver. 15, 16, &c. It being common among the Jews (as I have noted upon the book of Chronicles) to vary in the pronunciation of names, and sometimes to give two names.

Ver. 3. Shechaniah, Rehum, Meremoth.] The first of these is called Shebaniah, ver. 14. and the other two, in ver. 15. are called Harim and Meraioth.

Ver. 4. Iddo, Ginnetho, Abijah.] The second of these is called Ginnethon, ver. 16. which is a small difference. And Abijah was the head of the course of priests from whom Zechariah, the father of John the Baptist, sprung, as Bertram thinks, de Rep. Jud. cap. 18. p. 311.

Ver. 5. Miamin, Maadiah, Bilgah.] The first of these is called Miniamin, and the next Moadiah, ver. 17. which are likewise very small variations.

Ver. 6. Shemaiah, and Joiarib, Jedaiah.

Ver. 7. Sallu, Amok, Hilkiah, Jedaiah.] The first of these is called Sallai, ver. 20.

These were the chief of the priests.] Heads of the courses of the priests which David instituted, and were restored after their return from captivity, though as yet not so many as they had been before. (See Ezra vi. 18.)

And of their brethren, in the days of Jeshua.] Who was the high-priest at the return from captivity. The meaning seems to be, that they were not only heads of all those who were under them, but the chief of the heads, who were properly their brethren.

Ver. 8. Moreover the Levites: Jeshua, Binnui, Kadmiel, Sherebiah, Judah, and Mattaniah, which was over the thanksgiving, he and his brethren.] They were appointed to see the psalm of thanksgiving sang every morning and evening at the burnt-sacrifice.

Ver. 9. Also Bakbukiah and Unni, their brethren, were over against them in the watches.] That is, these ministered in their courses as the others did, and kept their stations over against them in their turns of attendance, which are called their watches, or wards. (See ver. 24.)

Ver. 10. And Jeshua begat Joiakim, Joiakim also begat Eliashib, and Eliashib begat Joiada.

Ver. 11. And Joiada begat Jonathan, and Jonathan begat Jaddua.] In these two verses is an account of the succession of the high-priests, from the return of the captivity till the time that they began to bear the greatest sway in the Jewish nation. For this Jaddua is commonly thought to be that Jaddus the high-priest who went to meet Alexander the Great, in his pontifical habit, as he came from the conquest of Tyre and Gaza, and procured great privileges for the Jewish nation. Now this being granted, the Scripture history ends, as Grotius observes, where the very light of times (as he speaks), that is, the affairs of Alexander, begins: from which time all things in history are clear, the affairs of the Jews being recorded by many Greek writers (several of whom are now perished), as appears by St. Jerome upon Daniel.

Ver. 12. And in the days of Joiakim were priests, the chief of the fathers: of Seraiah, Meraiah; of Jeremiah, Hananiah.

Ver. 13. Of Ezra, Meshullam, &c.] As he had mentioned those who were chief of the priests in the days of Jeshua, so now he thinks fit to mention the sons of every one of them who officiated in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua, either as assistants to their fathers, or succeeding them when they were dead. He begins with those three named ver. 1. and so proceeds in order to give an account of the rest, which reaches to ver. 22. and need not be transcribed.

Ver. 22. The Levites, in the days of Eliashib, Joiada, and Johanan, (called Jonathan, ver. 11.) and Jaddua, were recorded chief of the fathers; also the priests, to the reign of Darius the Persian.] This is thought by many to be that Darius whom Alexander conquered, till whose time there were records kept of the principal families of the Levites, in the days of those four high-priests, as well as of the priests already mentioned.

Ver. 23. The sons of Levi, the chief of the fathers, were written in the book of the Chronicles, even until the days of Johanan the son of Eliashib.] As there had been a register of them in the public records before that time from Jeshua to Johanan. Some think this refers to 1 Chron. ix. 14, &c.

Ver. 24. And the chief of the Levites: Hashabiah, Sherebiah, and Jeshua the son of Kadmiel, with their brethren over against them, to praise and to give thanks, according to the commandment of David the man of God.] These were particularly appointed for this office, which was of great importance.

Ward over against ward.] In their turns, one coming on when another went out, to attend in their courses, which are called wards.

Ver. 25. Mattaniah, and Bakbukiah, Obadiah, Meshullam, Talmon, Akkub, were porters, keeping the ward at the thresholds of the gates.] Of the house of God, where they attended and performed their office; or, as some will have it, at the treasuries, as in the margin of our Bibles.

Ver. 26. These were in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua, the son of Jozadak, and in the days of Nehemiah the governor, and of Ezra the priest, the scribe.] It is impossible to give a certain account why these are so particularly registered in this book; but we may be sure there was some great reason for it in those days: perhaps, that it might demonstrate their care to employ the best men in all offices for which they were fit; and that they took special care to preserve a faithful record of those who were to serve God as his ministers, as long as they were a nation; which they have not a long time been, and so all distinctions among them are confounded.

Ver. 27. And at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem they sought the Levites out of all their places, to bring them to Jerusalem, to keep the dedication with gladness, both with thanksgivings, and with singing, with cymbals, psalteries, and with harps.] As Solomon and all the children of Israel dedicated the house of the Lord when it was built, (of which see 1 Kings viii. 2 Chron. vii.) so now Nehemiah, having set things in good order, thought it meet to dedicate the city, whose wall was built, and gates set up, (ver. 30.) as a place in which God had chosen to dwell, by settling his house here. And therefore they assembled to beseech his blessing and protection upon this city; which being made strong, and well defended, they hoped to serve God in his house there with greater quietness and security.

The Jewish doctors are of opinion, that the oracle being wanting in the temple, this dedication gave no new sanctity, but only restored it to the old; for it was still the holy city, as it is called twice in the foregoing chapter of this book, chap. xi. 1. 18. See Selden, lib. iii. de Synedriis, cap. 13. sect. 6. where he observes, that it being said here it was dedicated with a song (for so it is in the Hebrew), there was some particular song of dedication, which had been formerly used, which was now sung upon this occasion. And some think, that ever after this time they made a yearly commemoration of this dedication, as they conceive there was of Solomon's dedication of the temple. For the heathen, who imitated the Jews (whose temple Solomon built two hundred and sixty-three years before Rome was built), were wont so to do. But Selden thinks Hospinianus rightly judges, that the Maccabees kept the first anniversary dedication, chap. 14. sect. 7. and upon another account.

Ver. 28. And the sons of the singers gathered themselves together, both out of the plain country round about Jerusalem, and from the villages of Netophathi.

Ver. 29. Also from the house of Gilgal, and out of the fields of Geba and Azmaveth.] These were the places where they had settled their habitations; from whence, upon Nehemiah's summons, they came to be present and assist at this solemnity.

For the singers had builded them villages round about Jerusalem.] That they might be the more ready to attend the service of God, when there should be occasion.

Ver. 30. And the priests and the Levites purified themselves.] With certain ablutions and expiations, that especially which is mentioned in Numb. xix. where a water of separation is prescribed to purify all uncleanness, ver. 9, &c. which is called the water of purifying, Numb. viii. 7.

And purified the people, and the gates, and the wall.] By sprinkling, I suppose, the same water upon them, and by prayers, and sacrifices.

Ver. 31. Then I brought up the princes of Judah upon the wall, and appointed two great companies of them that gave thanks.] So the LXX. translate the Hebrew words shethe tothoth gedoloth, δύο περὶ αἰνέσεως μεγάλους, two great for praise; that is, two great choirs, as the Vulgar translates it, which most versions follow. But our great Selden thinks the words should be translated, two eucharistical sacrifices, prepared for the altars, which were proper to the present business. The Spanish Jews translate the words, two grand processions, (lib. iii. de Syned. cap. 13. sect. 6. p. 210. and see Dr. Hammond upon Psal. xxiv. annot. p. 139.)

Whereof one went on the right hand upon the wall towards the dung-gate.] We add those words, whereof one, because of the other mentioned ver. 38. but in the Hebrew the words are, going on the right, &c.

Ver. 32. And after them went Hoshaiah, and half of the princes of Judah.

Ver. 33. And Azariah, Ezra, and Meshullam.] Not Ezra the scribe, who was in a more honourable place, (ver. 36.)

Ver. 34. Judah, and Benjamin, and Shemaiah, and Jeremiah.

Ver. 35. And certain of the priests' sons with trumpets; namely, Zechariah the son of Jonathan, the son of Shemaiah, the son of Mattaniah, the son of Michaiah, the son of Zaccur, the son of Asaph.

Ver. 36. And his brethren, Shemaiah, and Azarael, Milalai, Gilalai, Maai, Nethaneel, and Judah, Hanani, with the musical instruments of David the man of God, and Ezra the scribe before them.] They, in this verse and the former, were priests; and therefore Ezra, who was an eminent priest, led them up at the head of them.

Ver. 37. And at the fountain-gate, which was over against them, they went up by the stairs of the city of David.] See chap. iii. 15.

At the going up of the wall, above the house of David, even unto the water-gate eastward.

Ver. 38. And the other company of them that gave thanks went over against them, and I after them, and the half of the people upon the wall, from beyond the tower of the furnaces, even unto the broad wall;

Ver. 39. And from above the gate of Ephraim, and above the old gate, and above the fish-gate, and the tower of Hananeel, and the tower of Meah, even unto the sheep-gate: and they stood still in the prison-gate.

Ver. 40. So stood the two companies of them that gave thanks in the house of God, and I, and the half of the rulers with me.] The great man beforementioned translates the first words, So stood the two eucharistical sacrifices in the house of God.

The order wherein they thus marched, in a pompous manner, round about the city, now seems a little obscure: but the sense of the whole description is this; That they being met together in the same place, half of the rulers went upon the wall on the right hand, accompanied with several priests and Levites, and Ezra the scribe at the head of them, (ver. 36.) and the other half took the left hand, and walked upon the wall in the same order, accompanied with Nehemiah, who brought up the rear of them, (ver. 38.) and at length both parts of this chorus met in the temple; and there they stood still, and completed their praises and thanksgivings, and offered sacrifices, as it here follows. Where all the people walked it is not certain, but only that half of them went with Nehemiah upon the wall; the rest, it is likely, walking below, because the wall could not contain them.

Ver. 41. And the priests; Eliakim, Maaseiah, Miniamin, Michaiah, Elioenai, Zechariah, and Hananiah, with trumpets.

Ver. 42. And Maaseiah, and Shemaiah, and Eleazar, and Uzzi, and Jehohanan, and Malchijah, and Elam, and Ezer: and the singers sang loud, with Jezrahiah their overseer.] It doth not appear that they sounded the trumpets or sang while they were in the procession, but the song and the music began when they came to the house of God.

Ver. 43. Also that day they offered great sacrifices, and rejoiced.] Feasting, I suppose, upon the eucharistical sacrifices which were then offered.

For God had made them rejoice with great joy.] By restoring the holy city to such a secure condition, that they praised the Lord there without fear of disturbance.

The wives also and the children rejoiced.] It was an universal joy.

So that the joy of Jerusalem was heard even afar off.] The singers sang with such loud voices, and had so many loud instruments, the women and children also shouting, that they might be heard at a great distance: or, the meaning may be, that the report of it was spread into far-distant countries.

Ver. 44. And at that time were some appointed over the chambers for the treasures, for the offerings, for the first-fruits, and for the tithes, to gather into them, out of the fields of the cities, the portions of the law for the priests and Levites.] By the treasures, he means those places where the oblations, first-fruits, tithes, (which they had promised to pay duly, chap. x. 31, &c.) were laid up, and preserved for the use of the priests and Levites. Of which, that they might not be defrauded, a certain officer was at this time appointed, to see they were brought in according to the law, and to take care that every one had his portion.

For Judah rejoiced for the priests and for the Levites that waited.] They were so glad to see such a great concourse of them, (ver. 27, &c.) and that they performed their duty upon this occasion to the general satisfaction of all that were present, that their hearts were enlarged in love to them, which moved them to take care they should never want the provision appointed by God for them.

Ver. 45. And both the singers and the porters kept the ward of their God, and the ward of the purification.] These and other ministers (who also were Levites) did their duty so carefully, that they were much in the people's favour. For the singers kept the ward of their God, that is, sang orderly in their courses, and praised God; and the porters kept the ward of purification, that is, duly observed the orders about purification, in not suffering any unclean person or unclean thing to come into the house of God.

According to the commandment of David, and of Solomon his son.] Who had regulated all things belonging to the duty of these persons. (See 1 Chron. xxv. xxvi.)

Ver. 46. For in the days of David and Asaph of old there were chief of the singers, and songs of praise and thanksgiving unto God.] There were other famous men joined with Asaph, viz. Heman and Jeduthun; but he was the principal person whom David employed in this regulation. And this verse gives the reason why the Levites and the singers performed their duty so accurately; because, from the time of David, who constituted their orders and offices, there were some great men who presided over them, and were careful both to instruct them in their duty, and keep them to it.

Ver. 47. And all Israel, in the days of Zerubbabel, and in the days of Nehemiah, gave the portions of the singers and the porters every day his portion.] Those men that were appointed to look after the treasures, mentioned ver. 44. did their duty so well, that these inferior officers, much less the rest of the Levites and priests, never wanted what was due unto them, but had it every day while Zerubbabel and Nehemiah governed.

And they sanctified holy things unto the Levites, and the Levites sanctified them unto the children of Aaron.] The people separated and set apart the tenth part of their crop for the use of the Levites; and the Levites separated from their tithes the tenth part of them for their priests. For the people had no right to the tenth part, but it was holy, that is, to be separated from the rest for God's ministers, the Levites; and the Levites had no right to the tenth part of their tithes which they had received from the people, but it was to be set apart (which is called sanctified) for the children of Aaron, that is, the priests.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. ON that day they read in the book of Moses in the audience of the people; and therein was found written, that the Ammonite and the Moabite should not come into the congregation of God for ever.] This was not done upon the day of the dedication of the wall of the city, but upon some day after Nehemiah was returned to Jerusalem from Persia, whither he went to wait upon the king, (ver. 6.) For it is not likely that the people, who were so well affected to the ministers of God, as we read in the foregoing chapter, should so soon forget and neglect them; or that those who were appointed to look after their concerns, (chap. xii. 44.) should be turned out of their office immediately, or lay aside all care of them: for it is apparent, from ver. 10. of this chapter, their dues were not paid them when Nehemiah was not there to look after them. But when he was returned, all this was amended, and other abuses corrected: he continuing the public reading of the law, at stated times, probably on the great festivals, when all the people met together, (such as those mentioned chap. viii.) upon some day of which that portion of Scripture was read, in Deut. xxiii. 3. which forbids the admission of the Ammonites and Moabites into the congregation of the Lord; the meaning whereof see in my annotations there. I will only add here, that they who by the congregation of God, in this place, understand the public assemblies for Divine worship, are very much mistaken: for no man, of any nation, was forbidden to come and pray to God at the temple, but men of every nation, who would become proselytes, were admitted into their communion; and if they would be circumcised, had like privileges with all other Israelites, even to eat the passover, (Exod. xii. 48, 49.) They therefore, that think the meaning is, they should be excluded from all public offices, interpret it better: but that is not the truth neither; for it is to be understood of marrying with them, as I have shewn in the explication of that law.

Ver. 2. Because they met not the children of Israel with bread and with water, but hired Balaam against them, that he should curse them: howbeit our God turned the curse into a blessing.] See upon Deut. xxiii. 4, 5.

Ver. 3. Now it came to pass, when they had heard the law, that they separated from Israel all the mixed multitude.] Who were born of strangers, whom the law would not allow to partake of the rites of marriage with Israelites.

Ver. 4. And before this.] That is, before this separation was made.

Eliashib the priest.] There were several of this name in those times, and some of them priests, (Ezra x. 6. 24. 26. 37.) But this seems to have been the high-priest, mentioned chap. iii. 1. for his family was much corrupted, as appears from ver. 28. of this chapter.

Having the oversight of the chamber of the house of our God.] Here the singular number is used for the plural; for he had not the oversight of one chamber only, but of all the chambers, as the following verses, 5. 9. shew. But this may seem to indicate, that Eliashib was not high-priest, it being below him to be set over the chamber (as the phrase is in the Hebrew), though the high-priest, no doubt, had an inspection over them all.

Was allied unto Tobiah.] An Ammonite, as he is often called in this book; with whom he ought to have contracted no affinity, by suffering his grandson to marry with Sanballat's daughter; who was the fast friend of Tobiah, and the great enemy of the Jews. We read also in Ezra that several of the priests had married strange wives; and among the rest, some of the sons of the high-priest are there mentioned.

Ver. 5. And he had prepared for him a great chamber.] By breaking down the partitions, it is likely, between several little chambers, where holy things were laid, he prepared one great room for his reception.

Where aforetime they laid the meat-offerings, the frankincense, and the vessels, and the tithes of the corn, the new wine, and the oil (which was commanded to be given to the Levites, and the singers, and the porters), and the offerings of the priests.] All the offerings that belonged to the ministers of God (and the vessels wherewith they ministered), which there had been great care taken should be brought into these chambers, (the latter end of chap. x.) were now all profanely thrown out to make room for this man.

Ver. 6. But in all this time was not I at Jerusalem.] They took this boldness in Nehemiah's absence; and were the more audacious, because many of the nobles of Judah (it is likely) favoured this Tobiah, and were his friends, as they had been heretofore, (chap. vi. 17, 18.)

For in the two-and-thirtieth year of Artaxerxes king of Babylon came I unto the king.] He was governor twelve years in this province; but did not continue all that time in Judea: for he sometimes stepped to Babylon, to give an account of his management to the king, who, it is likely (as I before observed), would not dispense with so long an absence from his attendance to his office at court. (See upon chap. ii. 6. v. 41.)

And after certain days.] In the Hebrew the words are at the end of days, that is, at the end of the year. For so the word jamim [days] often signifies in Scripture, Exod. xiii. 10. Lev. xxv. 29. (See below, ver. 15.)

Obtained I leave of the king.] To return to Jerusalem: from whence, it is probable, he heard of the forenamed disorders, and therefore once more begged leave to go thither, that he might redress them.

Ver. 7. And I came to Jerusalem, and understood of the evil that Eliashib did for Tobiah.] He was fully informed what evil had been committed, before he went about to reform it.

In preparing him a chamber in the courts of the house of God.] In the court of the Israelites, which was a sacred place, into which no stranger might enter.

Ver. 8. And it grieved me sore; therefore I cast forth all the household-stuff of Tobiah out of the chamber.] His indignation was raised, as well as his sorrow, to see such a profanation: first, in bringing a stranger into the place where only Israelites were to come; and he an Ammonite, one of the worst of the strange nations, and a greater enemy of the Jews than many of the Ammonites; for whose sake he had removed the holy things, and put Tobiah in their place, who brought his household-stuff along with him; and all this done by the high-priest, who ought to have opposed such an attempt, and, indeed, was the only man that could have hindered it, till Nehemiah came, whose authority, as governor under the king of Persia, was superior to his; by which he threw all his goods out of the chamber, and forced him also to depart. Here is no mention of his reprehending Eliashib, which is an argument, that he died after Nehemiah went from Jerusalem.

Ver. 9. Then I commanded, and they cleansed the chambers; and thither brought I again the vessels of the house of God, with the meat-offering and the frankincense.] He gave order, that the chambers, which had been thus profaned, should be restored to their former sanctity by the water of purification, mentioned in the nineteenth of Numbers; whereby things, as well as persons, were cleansed from their impurities. And when the chambers were thus prepared, he brought in again all the vessels, and other things, (mentioned ver. 5.) which had been thrown out to make room for Tobiah.

Ver. 10. And I perceived that the portions of the Levites had not been given them.] For either the people did not pay them well, when they saw they were not laid up for their proper use in the place appointed, or Eliashib employed them for the entertainment of Tobiah; which he might as well do, as bring him into the sacred place: into which when they were not brought, the people, not knowing what became of them, might keep them to themselves. (See Bishop Montague, of Tithes, p. 347.)

For the Levites and the singers that did the work were fled every one to his field.] This made those that attended the service at Jerusalem forsake the city, and betake themselves to their country concerns, where they might make provision for the sustenance of their families. And, indeed, it is a great artifice of the devil, as Wolfius here observes, by his instruments to defraud the ministers of religion of their necessary maintenance, that he may thereby abolish religion itself.

Ver. 11. Then contended I with the rulers, and said.] He earnestly expostulated with them, and reproved them.

Why is the house of God forsaken?] There was no account to be given of it, but the negligence of the magistrates; whom he awakens to their duty, by representing to them that God himself was highly affronted, by having none of his servants to attend him at his house.

And I gathered them together.] He recalled the Levites to Jerusalem out of the country; whither they were fled to look after their own estates.

And set them in their place.] Every one to his proper work and business.

Ver. 12. Then brought all Judah the tithe of the corn, and the new wine, and the oil, unto the treasuries.] When they saw these things were likely to go the right way, and be employed to their proper uses, they brought them to their proper place. For the people (as Conradus Pellicanus here notes) readily obey, if the magistrates and the priests be not remiss in their duty.

Ver. 13. And I made treasurers over the treasuries, Shelemiah the priest, and Zadok the scribe; and of the Levites, Pedaiah; and next to them was Hanan the son of Zaccur, the son of Mattaniah: for they were counted faithful; and their office was to distribute unto their brethren.] There had been some appointed heretofore unto this office, (chap. x. 44, &c.) but they not performing their trust, Nehemiah sought out some persons, here mentioned, who had the general reputation of being men of integrity; whose business it was to give every one of their brethren his portion.

Ver. 14. Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and wipe not out my good deeds that I have done for the house of my God, and for the offices thereof.] It is very natural here to observe, that to make provision for the maintenance of God's ministers, and of his worship and service, is a work of high esteem with God. For these are the good deeds (as appears by the foregoing verses) for which Nehemiah recommends himself to the Divine favour and remembrance. And therefore, what shall we think of the times wherein we live; when men account them the most religious to God-ward, who would unfurnish the house of God most, and who most rob his priests? This is the reflection which Mr. Mede made upon these words of Nehemiah, book i. discourse xxxiv.

Ver. 15. In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine-presses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses: as also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the sabbath-day.] The treading wine-presses, shews that he came back in the latter end of the year, (as I have explained in the end of days, ver. 6.) when he found them carrying in sheaves and wine, and all manner of burdens (that is, doing all manner of work), on the sabbath, as if it had been a common day.

And I testified against them in the day wherein they sold victuals.] Or, as Pellicanus translates it, I contested with them, that they should sell provisions on such days as they might be sold, and not on the sabbath.

Ver. 16. There dwelt men of Tyre also therein, which brought fish, and all manner of ware.] The city of Tyre was a place of great trade, and, lying on the sea, abounded with fish, which they brought from thence to Joppa, and so to Jerusalem. Tyre was nigh to Sidon, which had its name (as Justin saith, lib. xviii.) "ab ubertate piscium," from plenty of fish.

And sold on the sabbath unto the children of Judah, and in Jerusalem.] Not only in the country, but in the holy city, as Jerusalem was called, where holy assemblies were to be held, and God worshipped solemnly, on the sabbath.

Ver. 17. Then I contended with the nobles of Judah.] As I had done before, ver. 11. for they who did not correct abuses when it was in their power, were more in fault than they that committed them.

And said unto them, What evil thing is this that ye do, and profane the sabbath-day?] For if they had exercised their authority, the people durst not have done as they did.

Ver. 18. Did not your fathers thus? and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this city?] He bids them reflect and consider, that this was one of the crimes of which their fathers were guilty; for which God suffered them to be carried captive out of their land, and their city to be destroyed. (See Jer. xvii. 19—21, &c.)

Yet ye bring more wrath upon Israel, by profaning the sabbath.] This aggravated their guilt, that they would not beware of those sins which had been their ruin; and would bring greater judgments upon them, because they were not amended by what they had suffered.

Ver. 19. And it came to pass, that when the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark.] That is, when they who sat there could not see to do any thing, which was about sunsetting, the mountains about Jerusalem intercepting the light there sooner than in other places.

Before the sabbath.] In the evening of that day.

I commanded, that the gates should be shut, and charged that they should not be opened till after the sabbath; and some of my servants set I at the gates, that there should no burden be brought in on the sabbath-day.] It seems, he could not trust to the common porters of the gates; and therefore appointed some of his own family, who he knew would neither be careless nor corrupted, to see the gates were kept shut, and all traffic hindered.

Ver. 20. So the merchants, and sellers of all kind of ware.] Who came from Tyre and other places, (ver. 16.)

Lodged without Jerusalem once or twice.] In the open fields (as appears by the next verse), where, perhaps, they pitched their tents, and opened their packs, hoping to sell their wares on the sabbath to the country people, though they could not get admittance into Jerusalem.

Ver. 21. Then I testified against them, and said unto them, Why lodge ye about the wall?] He solemnly declared to them, and called God to witness, that he would not suffer them to lodge there any more.

If ye do so again, I will lay hands on you.] Seize their persons and their goods, and punish them as offenders.

From that time forth came they no more on the sabbath.] Such power have good magistrates; especially, when they are resolute. And it is very observable, that these being men of other nations, were not bound by the law of the sabbath, and did not transgress in breaking it; yet he would not permit them to make the Jews, who were under the obligation of the law, to break it; and thereby trouble the commonwealth of Israel, by drawing the people into sin. It is also observable, that though buying and selling was not a servile work, yet he thought this comprehended in those words, "Thou shalt do no manner of work."

Ver. 22. And I commanded the Levites, that they should cleanse themselves, and that they should come and keep the gates, to sanctify the sabbath-day.] He thought the Levites would be more reverenced than his servants; and therefore appointed them to this office of keeping the gates on the sabbath-day, that it might not fail to be sanctified as it ought to be. And they being also on that day to attend upon other offices which were holy, he commanded them also to cleanse themselves by some known purification, which might procure them the greater reverence. There was another reason why he joined the Levites with his servants to look after the gates on the sabbath-day; because he would have this watch continued, when he and his servants were gone from Jerusalem, till this evil custom was quite broken.

Remember me, O my God, concerning this also, and spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy.] He had beseeched God to remember his good deeds; (ver. 14.) but, to shew that he did not think there was any proper merit or worthiness in them, which required a reward as a debt in justice due unto them, he here explains himself, and desires to be rewarded, or rather pardoned, out of God's free goodness, according to the greatness or the multitude of his mercies.

Ver. 23. In those days also saw I Jews that had married wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab.] They had at this very time married strangers, as Pellicanus thinks; and by what Nehemiah did for their correction, one would think some were again revolted into that sin, which they had most solemnly renounced both before him and before Ezra, (chap. x. 30. Ezra x.) So hard is it to root out tares, which will be continually sprouting up again.

Ver. 24. And their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language, but according to the language of each people.] Whom they had married. For their mothers, with whom they were bred, spake to them in the language of their own country, and not in the language of the Jews; which it seems by this was very different from that of Ashdod, though they were neighbours to the Philistines. And so was the language of the Egyptians, and other countries thereabout, very different, as Bochartus observes in his Canaan, lib. ii. cap. 1. (See Scaliger, de Emend. Temp. lib. vi. p. 580.) But there doth not seem to have been such difference between the language of the Canaanites and the Hebrews in the time of Abraham; for he made use of no interpreters, that we read of, in his conversation with them. Yet it is probable, that by length of time these people had altered their language very much, which was preserved pure among the Jews.

Ver. 25. And I contended with them, and cursed them.] He expostulated with them, and denounced God's judgment against them; or, as Aben Ezra thinks, he excommunicated them, and cast them out of the society of God's people. But that was in use only when they could not punish offenders according to their law, which now they had power to do; and accordingly it follows, that he did inflict punishments upon them.

And smote certain of them.] Ordered the officers to beat some of the most notorious offenders, either with rods, or with scourges, according to Deut. xxv. 2.

And plucked off their hair.] Which was a great disgrace in those eastern countries; (see Isa. i. 6. Jer. xlviii. 37.) the hair being esteemed a great ornament, and a token one was a free-man. Therefore plucking off the hair was a putting them to shame, and making them look like vile slaves.

And made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their daughters unto your sons, or for yourselves.] He also took an oath of them that they would reform. But this he had done before; (chap. x. 29, 30.) and therefore, since the most sacred promises of amendment did not keep them fast to God, he also severely chastised them in the manner before related, that nothing might be wanting to make them better.

Ver. 26. Did not Solomon king of Israel sin by these things?] He argued also with them, and persuaded them to amend, from the example of the greatest men, who had been undone by such marriages, particularly king Solomon.

Yet among many nations was there no king like him, who was beloved of his God, and God made him king over all Israel: nevertheless, even him did outlandish women cause to sin.] As much as to say, If such a man as he, who excelled all men in wisdom, and was so highly in God's favour, that he preferred him before all his brethren to be king over all Israel, was not safe from seducement by strange women, how shall ye be able to preserve yourselves from their enticements?

Ver. 27. Shall we then hearken unto you to do all this great evil, to transgress against our God, in marrying strange wives?] That is, Would you have me connive at this wickedness, and so bring guilt upon myself, and ruin upon you?

Ver. 28. And one of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib the high-priest.] It is supposed that Eliashib died before Nehemiah returned from Persia, and Joiada his son succeeded him, one of whose sons had offended in this matter. He was his grandson.

Was the son-in-law to Sanballat the Horonite.] He is said by Josephus to be that Manasseh, who, by Sanballat's interest, procured leave to build a temple in Mount Gerizim, to which all the Jews that had married strange wives resorted, (lib. xi. cap. 8.) and, as Solomon Virga saith, in Schebet Judah, he made proclamation in all the countries round about, that whosoever would come to his temple, they should pay neither first-fruits nor tithes, but only make voluntary offerings; by which he gained many of the poor sort to him. (See Selden, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 15. p. 623.)

Therefore I chased him from me.] That he should not serve at the altar; which Josephus will have to be decreed by the great Sanhedrin, who, if he would have before them renounced that unlawful wife, and put her away, offered to continue him in the exercise of his priesthood. See Selden, de Succession. in Pontif. lib. ii. cap. 6. and lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 15. p. 649. where he observes, that Solomon Virga saith, he was put out of his ministry at the temple by an assembly of all the priests, who met together and expelled him. But there was no need of their authority, for Nehemiah himself chased him from him, that is, banished him from Judea, as Bertram expounds this phrase, in his de Repub. Jud. cap. 13. p. 165, &c.

Ver. 29. Remember them, O my God.] To punish them (that is, according to their deserts), as he desired God to remember him by rewarding him for the good he had done. But Rasi takes it for a prayer to God, to reform them and render them good for evil.

Because they have defiled the priesthood.] God required greater purity in the priests than in other Israelites, and in the high-priests especially, who might marry none but a virgin of his own people. (See Lev. xxi. 6, 7. unto ver. 16.)

And the covenant of the priesthood, and of the Levites.] There was a covenant made with Phinehas (Numb. xxv.) of an everlasting priesthood, which they had violated, because the covenant was mutual, binding them to observe the laws of the priesthood, as God engaged himself to preserve them in their office. What covenant was made with the Levites, I do not find; but I suppose the meaning is, they dishonoured the whole tribe of Levi, who were set apart for Divine ministries. For it is likely some of the Levites had transgressed in this matter, by the bad example of the priests. This great corruption of the priests seems to have been the occasion of God's sending Malachi, the last of the prophets, to correct it, after Ezra and Nehemiah had not been able to root out this corruption. And the covenant here mentioned, was that made in the twentieth of Artaxerxes, wherein they engaged to put away their strange wives. Thus Dr. Alix, whose judgment I prefer to my own, in this point.

Ver. 30. Thus cleansed I them from all strangers.] That is, both priests and Levites were separated from their strange wives.

And appointed the wards of the priests and the Levites, every one in his business.] To observe their courses of attendance at the house of God, and every one to perform there that business which was proper to him.

Ver. 31. And for the wood-offering, at times appointed, and for the first-fruits.] He commanded them to observe the decrees which had been passed some time ago, (chap. x. 34, 35.) Maimonides, in his treatise of the Manner of offering Sacrifices, chap. 14. gathers from these words, that it was lawful for any man, freely to vow either wine, or frankincense, or oil, or wood, to burn on the altar: for this, saith he, was a kind of sacrifice or offering, as Nehemiah here informs us.

Remember me, O my God, for good.] He concludes his book with a short prayer to God, wherein he commends himself, and all he had done, unto God's gracious acceptance. As it becomes all men, especially those who are employed in Divine things, if they have done any thing that is good, to remember it was by God's help and assistance, not by their own power; beseeching the Father of mercies, by his only-begotten Son, to make it serviceable to his church, and his own good. Thus Joh. Wolfius concludes his commentary upon this book.

BOOK OF ESTHER.

THERE is a great variety of opinions concerning the author of this book. Whom a great number of late interpreters, and some of the Hebrew doctors, take to have been Mordecai; which is the common opinion of the Latins, and of Clemens Alexandrinus among the Greeks; which, they think, is sufficiently warranted by those words in the ninth chapter, ver. 20, &c. where it is said, Mordecai wrote all these things, and sent letters unto the Jews, &c. This, they think, relates to this whole history, which he wrote as it is recorded in this book: but those words plainly relate only to the decree of observing the feast of Purim perpetually; which supposes they had been acquainted with the occasion and ground of it, before those letters came, as Huetius observes; who therefore is of the same opinion with the Talmudists in Baba Bathra, that this book was written by the men of the great synagogue. Which opinion he the rather embraces (though I see no ground at all for it), because it comprehends theirs who think Mordecai was the author, and theirs who ascribe it to Ezra, and theirs who think it was Joiakim the son of Jeshua the high-priest; for all these might well have been in that synagogue. Whoever was the author, Maimonides saith (in his More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 45.) their wise men openly declare, the book of Esther was dictated by the Holy Ghost; that is, as he explains it, by a motion or impulse (as he calls it) from the Spirit of God, who excited him to write this history, as by the same motion others indited psalms, and gave wholesome precepts, to regulate the lives of men. (See chap. x. 3.)

And that this history fell out after the captivity of Babylon was ended, and after the time of Darius the Mede, is very evident: for Shushan was not the royal city of the Medes, but of the Persians. Nor had the Medes so large a dominion, as from India to Ethiopia. But in what reign of the Persian kings these things fell out, is hard to determine. (See the last verse of this book.)

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass, in the days of Ahasuerus.] This was a Persian, but which of them is a great doubt; for learned men think several of them had this name. There are, I think, eight several opinions about him here mentioned. Our great primate Usher takes him to have been Darius Hystaspes; but he married the daughter of the great Cyrus, to confirm himself in his kingdom, and would not have so easily parted with her as Ahasuerus did with Vashti. The great Scaliger therefore thinks him to have been his successor Xerxes; whose wife's name being Amystris, he takes her for Esther, this name being in the Persian language Ham-Esther. But this hath been con-futed by many learned men, particularly by Jacobus Capellus; who observes, that this Amystris was the daughter of a powerful man among the Persians, whom Herodotus calls Otanes. Several other reasons he gives against this in his Historia Sacra et Exotica, ad A. M. 3640. 3650. where by good arguments he proves it was not Artaxerxes Longimanus, nor Darius Nothus, nor Artaxerxes Mnemon, but concludes, that it was the next king, Ochus, which agrees well with his Persian name, which was Achasch, to which Verosch being added as his surname, he was called by the Persians Achasch-Verosch, which the Greeks translated Ahasuerus.

(This is Ahasuerus which reigned from India even unto Ethiopia, over a hundred and seven-and-twenty provinces).] We are told by Herodotus, that Darius conquered India, (lib. iv. cap. 44.) And there might well be so many provinces between that and Ethiopia, whether we understand thereby the country beyond Egypt, or that near Arabia. Herodotus seems to direct us to the former, when he saith, That Darius found by his conquests, that Asia, in that eastern part of the world, was like to Lybia.

Ver. 2. That in those days, when the king Ahasuerus sat on the throne of his kingdom.] Enjoying peace and quietness throughout his large dominions. Some think, this phrase, when he sat on the throne of his kingdom, signifies when he began to reign. But this is confuted by ver. 3. which saith, in the third year of his reign he did what follows.

Which was in Shushan the palace.] This was a noble city, which Strabo calls Πόλιν ἀξιολογοτάτην, a most famous and highly-to-be-praised city; where Cyrus and the Persian kings, after the conquest of the Medes (whose country was remote), settled their royal seat, that they might not be far from Babylon. The country about it also was wonderfully fruitful, producing a hundred, and sometimes two hundred fold, as he writes, lib. xv. p. 727. 731. It was built, as Pliny saith, by Darius: (lib. vi. cap. 27.) or rather enlarged, by building there a most magnificent palace, as Ælian explains it; (lib. xiii. de Animal. cap. 59.) which Aristotle, in his book de Mundo, calls Θαυμαστὸν βασίλειον οἶκον, a wonderful royal palace, shining with gold, and amber, and ivory.

Ver. 3. In the third year of his reign, he made a feast unto all his princes and his servants.] By his servants are meant his subjects; who were called servants in the eastern countries. And it was the manner of the Roman emperors sometimes to feast all the people of Rome, as well as the senate.

The power of Persia and Media.] And first he speaks of the feast made for the great men, whom he calls the power of Media and Persia; men in power, as we now speak.

The nobles and princes of the provinces, being before him.] He explains who they were; the governors of provinces, and other noble persons, who were all then at his court. The word parthemim, which we translate nobles, some would have to be the corruption of the Greek word παράτιμος, honourable persons; and Junius, with others, deduce it from the Greek word πρῶτος. But the Greeks were not yet got among them; and therefore it is a Persian word, signifying governors, as R. Solomon expounds it: and Joseph Kimchi thinks they were such great men as governed that tract of land that lay upon the river Phrath, that is, Euphrates. But Hottinger will have it to be a compound word from par, which signifies high, and ram, which signifies spirit; as much as to say, high-spirited or heroic persons: which seems to me to be but an ingenious conceit.

What the occasion of this feast was, is variously conjectured. Some think, it was begun on his birth-day. The Targum saith, a great rebellion had been lately suppressed, which filled him with joy. But the next words seem to inform us, that it was to shew his magnificent greatness to all his subjects. For in those countries they delighted much in making great feasts; as we read afterward, that Alexander (when he was there) entertained τετρακοσίους ἡγεμόνας, four hundred captains, or great commanders, who all sat in silver chairs, &c. as Duris tells us in Athenæus, lib. i. Deipnosoph. cap. 14.

Ver. 4. When he shewed the riches of his glorious kingdom, and the honour of his excellent majesty, many days, even a hundred and fourscore days.] Which was for the space of six months; from the vernal to the autumnal equinox; which is a hundred fourscore and seven days. For Vashti kept a feast of seven days, at the end of his feast for the women of Susa, as Ochus did for the men, (ver. 7. 10.) Thus Jacobus Capellus. Some indeed will have it, that he was thus long in making preparation for this splendid entertainment, which did not last many days. But this custom is continued still to this day, of keeping an annual festival a hundred and eighty days, if we may give credit to Dr. Fryar, who lived lately in this country, and gives us an account of it in his Travels, (letter v. cap. 12. p. 348.)

Ver. 5. And when these days were expired, the king made a feast unto all the people that were present in Shushan the palace, both unto great and small, seven days.] Not only to the inhabitants of Shushan, but to all that were present in the city, out of all parts of his dominions, the Israelites not excepted, as the Targum saith.

In the court of the garden of the king's palace.] In the entrance of the royal palace; which was very spacious, and planted with all sorts of fruit-trees, and aromatics, as the Targum explains it.

Ver. 6. Where were white, green, and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to silver rings and pillars of marble.] How the Targum came to fancy that these hangings, being spread from one tree to another, were tied to them with silken purple strings, I know not; for the text saith expressly, they were hanged on pillars of marble, set up, no doubt, for that purpose.

The beds were of gold and silver.] On which they sat, or rather lay, at their meat. The beds themselves were of melitim (as Jonathan expresses it), of the softest wool; that is, the Milesian, which is the best in the world, as Bochartus hath observed out of many authors, in his Phaleg. lib. i. cap. 8. But the bedsteads were of gold and silver; that is, studded with gold and silver, or overlaid with plates of them, as the manner was; as Dietericus shews in his Antiq. Biblicæ, p. 388.

Upon a pavement of red, and blue, and white, and black marble.] In the Hebrew, Upon a pavement of bahat, and ses, and dar, and sochereth, which signify several sorts of stones, as Bochartus hath proved beyond contradiction: but what stones are here meant is not easy to resolve, nor is it of much moment to know. He hath spent a large chapter to prove that dar signifies a pearl; which, though very precious, it is not incredible was used in this Persian luxury, among other stones, to adorn this pavement. Which he justifies by many good arguments; and shews there are examples of such profuseness in other histories, (Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 8.) Drusius also hath said a great deal about sochereth, to which I refer the learned reader, Miscellanea, cent. i. cap. 74.

Ver. 7. And they gave them drink in vessels of gold (the vessels being diverse one from another), and royal wine in abundance, according to the state of the king.] There was a great variety of wines, it is likely, as well as great plenty; and great variety of vessels to drink in, different from all that they had seen. So Drusius translates those words in the parentheses, variantia diversa vasa, as the Jews are said, chap. iii. 8. to have laws different from all other people, where there is the same word. (Miscellanea, cent. i. cap. 16.) Strabo saith, these princes were so luxurious, that they had their wine from Syria, called chalybonium; and the water they drank with it, from Eulæus, it being πάντων ἐλαφρότατον, the lightest of all other waters.

Ver. 8. And the drinking was according to the law; none did compel.] The plainest translation seems to be, the drinking according to custom, none did compel. It was customary to compel men to drink more than they had a mind to do; but this prince left every man to his liberty, that no man should incur any displeasure if he did not drink what others would impose upon him. But Drusius thinks the word dath never signifies a custom.

For so the king had appointed to all the officers of his house, that they should do according to every man's pleasure.] Which made the feast most acceptable, when every one drank for his own pleasure, and not for other men's. And such had been the custom of the ancient Persians, who (as Xenophon tells us) were very sparing in eating and drinking, though in his time they were grown extremely riotous. But nothing was more barbarous than their pressing men to drink beyond their inclinations; which the son of Sirach expresses by the word βλίβειν, (Ecclus. xxxi. 37.) it being no less inhuman to force a man to drink when he is not thirsty, than to deny him drink when he is ready to perish with thirst. According to an ancient saying of Sophocles in Athenæus, lib. x. Τὸ πρὸς βίαν πίνειν, ἴσον κακὸν τῷ δίψᾷν βίᾳ. To compel a man to drink by force, is as bad as to compel him to endure thirst for want of drink.

Ver. 9. Also Vashti the queen made a feast for the women.] I have before said, it is not likely (as primate Usher thinks) that this was Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, whom Darius Hystaspes married: for the reason of that match being to strengthen himself in the kingdom, he would not have so lightly parted with her. Jacobus Capellus thinks, by the addition of the word Par to her name, she was called by the Persians Par-Vashti, which by the Greeks is pronounced Parysatis, the mother of Artaxerxes Mnemon. But she could not be the wife of Ochus, who was his son.

In the royal house which belonged to king Ahasuerus.] Where she entertained the wives of the princes, and other women; not in the open air, as the men were, but more privately, as was fit for women, who were not wont to eat together with men.

Ver. 10. On the seventh day.] Which was in the conclusion of this feast.

When the heart of the king was merry with wine.] Which made him a little forget himself, and not consider what became both his own state and that of the queen.

He commanded Mehuman, Biztha, Harbona, Bigtha, and Abagtha, Zethar, and Carcas, the seven chamberlains that served in the presence of Ahasuerus the king.] These eunuchs (as the word is translated in the margin) were men of principal authority in the court; where they had great offices about the king. And therefore he did her honour enough, in sending so many of them to wait upon her, and let her know his pleasure.

Ver. 11. To bring Vashti the queen before the king with the crown-royal, to shew the people and the princes her beauty; for she was fair to look on.] It is a very absurd conceit of the former Targum, who saith, he commanded her to be brought quite naked, that her comely proportions might be seen, as well as her face. And yet in Pirke Eliezer they are so bold as to say, it was the custom of the Persian kings to have their wives publicly dance before them naked. It was too much, she thought, that he should expose her countenance to be beheld, especially by all the people: which was contrary to the custom of that country; where they kept their wives very close from the sight of all men but themselves.

Ver. 12. But the queen Vashti refused to come at the king's commandment by his chamberlains.] Which she might do out of modesty, not pride: because, as I said, it was contrary to the custom; and the great men, inflamed with wine, might be provoked by her beauty (as Jacobus Capellus speaks) to lust after her.

Therefore was the king very wroth, and his anger burned in him.] It was the more immoderate, because his blood was heated with wine; which made his passion too strong for his reason. Otherwise he would not have thought it decent for the queen, nor safe for himself, to have her beauty (which was very great) exposed in this unusual manner. Josephus saith, he was the more enraged, because he sent more than once to her, but still she refused to come. Which is not probable; for though it would have become him to send again to know her reason for refusing, yet he persisting in his command, one would think she would have yielded obedience.

Ver. 13. Then the king said to the wise men, which knew the times.] What had been done in former days; or, what was fit to be done on all occasions: men well versed in ancient histories (as Vitringa explains it), and in the laws and customs of their country; who were able to give counsel in all dubious and perplexed cases, such as this was, which rarely happened. (De Synag. Veteri, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 8.)

(For so was the king's manner towards all that knew law and judgment.] It was his constant practice; and he did not forget this laudable custom even in his drink, to consult with his counsellors before he resolved any thing; who were skilled in the laws of their country, and could judge what advice was to be given in all cases.

Ver. 14. And the next unto him was Carshena, Shethar, Admatha, Tarshish, Meres, Marsena, and Memucan, the seven princes of Persia and Media.] These are called the king's seven counsellors in Ezra vii. 14. who took their original from Daniel, who, being in great power under Darius the Mede, and having a great hand in framing the government of that state, caused the Persian court (as Mr. Mede conjectures) to resemble that of heaven, ordaining seven chief princes to stand before the king, as seven great angels are said in Scripture to stand before the throne of God. (See book i. discourse x.)

Which saw the king's face.] Who were his principal ministers, and admitted into his presence; which was not allowed to every one, but only to the great men of the kingdom. (See Grotius upon Matt. xviii. 10.)

And which sat the first in the kingdom).] Next to the king; being his royal judges, who determined what was right among the Persians, and were the interpreters of the laws of the country. Of whom Herodotus makes mention, lib. iii. cap. 14. 31. and Plutarch, in Artaxerxes, as primate Usher observes.

Ver. 15. What shall we do unto the queen Vashti according to law, because she hath not performed the commandment of king Ahasuerus by the chamberlains?] These words make it plain, that the forenamed great persons were the supreme judges what was law; and that the king did not govern arbitrarily, by his own will and pleasure, but by the laws of the kingdom.

Ver. 16. And Memucan answered before the king and the princes.] He is the last of the seven princes, mentioned ver. 14. which inclines me to think, that the puny judge, as we now speak, delivered his opinion first (as they do here), and so they spake in order till they came to the first. And thus I find the latter Targum takes it, He was the least of them, and therefore gave his opinion first. But others take it quite contrary, that Memucan was the president of the council, or the king asked him first what he thought of the matter.

Vashti the queen hath not done wrong to the king only, but also to all the princes, and to all the people that are in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus.] He declared it to be a crime of such a dangerous nature, that it would have a mischievous influence upon the whole kingdom, if it were not severely punished.

Ver. 17. For this deed of the queen shall come abroad unto all women.] This transgression of the king's commandment (as Maimonides explains it, in More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 23.) will be known every where; for it could not be concealed, being a public affront to his majesty.

So that they shall despise their husbands in their eyes, when it shall be reported, The king Ahasuerus commanded Vashti the queen to be brought in before him, but she came not.] His opinion was, that then they would take upon them to disobey their husbands, and slight their commands, when they heard what Vashti had done, and was not punished for it.

Ver. 18. Likewise shall the ladies of Persia and Media say this day unto all the king's princes, which have heard of the deed of the queen.] He repeats it again, that it would have this effect immediately, especially on the great women, who, from this time forward, would take example by the queen, and say to their lords, Are you more honourable than Ahasuerus the king, whose wife would not come when she was sent for? So the latter Targum.

Thus shall there arise too much contempt and wrath.] Contempt in the wives, and wrath in their husbands, which would make great brawlings and contentions in all families.

Ver. 19. If it please the king, let there go a royal commandment from him, and let it be written among the laws of the Persians and the Medes.] He would not have a mere order given, but a law made, which, as it follows, should stand inviolable. The same Targum saith, that Memucan had married a wife, who, being richer than himself, was very proud, and would not speak to him but in her own language; and now he took this opportunity to be revenged of her, and make her do whatever he pleased.

That it be not altered.] This was cunningly done, saith the same Targum; for if she had recovered the king's favour, when his anger was over, this counsel might have cost him his head. But what made laws unalterable among them is uncertain. The Targum saith, because the king confirmed it by an oath, and then it became immutable: or, it was sealed, not only by the king, but by all the princes, as one would guess from Dan. vi. 8. 12. 15.

That Vashti come no more before king Ahasuerus; and let the king give her royal estate unto another that is better than she.] This was a very rigorous decree. But Drusius observes, that the Persians were inclined to be severe to their wives.

Ver. 20. And when the king's decree, which he shall make, shall be published throughout all his empire (for it is great), all the wives shall give to their husbands honour, both to great and small.] For none would dare to disobey, when they heard that the greatness of the queen could not preserve her from such a heavy punishment.

Ver. 21. And the saying pleased the king and the princes; and the king did according to the word of Memucan.] With whom all the other six judges concurred in their opinion.

Ver. 22. For he sent letters into all the king's provinces; into every province according to the writing thereof, and to every people after their language.] The meaning seems to be, that this decree was published in every province, after the manner that such things used to be proclaimed, and in their own tongue, that every one, women as well as men, might understand it.

That every man should bear rule in his own house; and that it should be published according to the language of every people.] The decree runs thus in the Hebrew, That every man should bear rule in his own house, and speak in the language of his people. It seems the Persians had yielded so much to their wives, that when they had married a stranger, they suffered her to bring her own language into the family. But this decree altered that custom, and allowed no other language to be spoken in the family but that of the man, and of the people among whom he lived. (See De Dieu.) And thus the former Targum, Every man shall rule in his own house, and compel his wife to speak in the language of her husband, and in the language of his people. Which, indeed, was a token of dominion; all conquerors endeavouring to bring in their own language into the country which they have conquered. The latter Targum hath only these words, that every man shall be honoured in his own house, and speak according to the language of his people; that is, give his commands in his own language, which every one was bound to learn.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. AFTER these things, when the wrath of king Ahasuerus was appeased, he remembered Vashti, and what she had done, and what was decreed against her.] When his anger was abated, and the wine gone out of his head, his ancient love began to revive to Vashti, whose beauty was exceeding charming; but then he remembered withal her undutiful behaviour, and the decree he had passed against her, which was irrevocable, so that he was in a great strait. Yet the latter Targum saith he called for the seven princes, who had given him the forenamed counsel, and said unto them, I am no longer angry at Vashti, but at you, who, from what I said in my drink, took occasion to destroy her; and thereupon commanded them all to be slain. For which there is no ground; but by what follows it appears to be a fable.

Ver. 2. Then said the king's servants that ministered unto him, Let there be fair young virgins sought for the king.] The same servants, in all likelihood, mentioned ver. 14. of the foregoing chapter, who continually attended him. And when they saw him afflicted, contrived by a new love to blot out the remembrance of the old.

Ver. 3. And let the king appoint officers in all the provinces of his kingdom, that they may gather together all the fair young virgins unto Shushan the palace.] The better to divert him, they propound that a great number of the most beautiful virgins that could be found should be brought from all parts to Shushan, that out of them he might take his choice which of them he would make his queen.

To the house of the women.] Or rather of the virgins; for the house of those who were women or wives was different from this, and under another governor, (ver. 14.)

Unto the custody of Hegai the king's chamberlain, keeper of the women.] Of the virgins, as Shaashgaz was of the women or concubines, (ver. 14.)

And let their things for purification be given them.] In this house, saith the former Targum, there was a place for bathing, and they were furnished with ointments and perfumes, and all other things necessary either for ornament or cleanliness; for the Hebrew word signifies both.

Ver. 4. And let the maiden which pleaseth the king be queen in the stead of Vashti. And the thing pleased the king; and he did so.] He approved of the advice, and gave order about it.

Ver. 5. Now, in Shushan the palace there was a certain Jew, whose name was Mordecai.] Who is thought by some to have come to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (because one of that name is mentioned in his company), but returned back again to Babylon, being one of the king's servants; for he was one of his guard, or keeper of the door; or, as we translate it, he sat in the king's gate, (ver. 19. 21.) But this was another Mordecai, as appears from the time wherein he lived, in the latter end of the Persian empire.

The son of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite.] The latter Targum here gives his pedigree down from Benjamin, the son of Jacob, but mixed with such fables that no credit can be given to it.

Ver. 6. Who had been carried away from Jerusalem with the captivity which had been carried away with Jeconiah king of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away.] Mordecai was not then carried away, but Kish, who is mentioned just before, from whom Mordecai was descended. (See our Rainoldus, Cens. lib. Apocryph. prælect. cxlvi.) And Bonfrerius also hath well observed, (in his appendix to his Præloquium to his Commentaries on the Scripture, chap. 7.) if he himself was then brought from Jerusalem, he must be at least a hundred and ten years old (supposing this history to have fallen out in the time of Darius Hystaspes) when he came into the place of Haman; for, from the captivity of Jeconiah, till their deliverance from captivity, was eighty-one years; and from thence to the reign of Darius Hystaspes was almost twenty years, as Eusebius saith; and Haman was hanged in the twelfth year of this king; so here are a hundred and ten years. But it is not credible that a man of such a great age should be advanced to such authority as he had; and more incredible that Esther, who was his cousin-german, should be beloved of Ahasuerus when she was an old maid, as she must have been, if Mordecai was of these years.

Ver. 7. And he brought up Hadassah (that is, Esther), his uncle's daughter.] Her Jewish name was Hadassah, signifying in Chaldee a myrtle, as the former Targum saith; but her Persian name was Esther, which he fancies was from the Greek word Ἀστὴρ, a star. But the other Targum derives it from satar, which signifies hidden, because she was hidden in Mordecai's house a long time, and no man saw her but he; or rather, because her nation was concealed, and not known. Primate Usher thinks, that as Vashti was Atossa, so Esther was she whom the heathens called Artystona; who, as Herodotus saith, was the wife Darius loved above all other, and had her statue made of pure gold, (lib. iii. cap. 88. and lib. vii. cap. 69.) He saith, indeed, that she also was another daughter of Cyrus, and sister to Atossa; but he was either ignorant (as that great man thinks) of the Persian genealogies; or out of envy concealed their original. It is more likely he gives a true account of her descent, as he doth of other things, and she was not Esther.

For she had neither father nor mother.] Her father died, saith the former Targum, when her mother was big with child of her, and her mother died as soon as she was brought to bed.

And the maid was fair and beautiful; whom Mordecai (when her father and mother were dead) took for his own daughter.] The Vulgar translates it, adopted her for his daughter. Which doth not signify such an adoption as among the Romans (as Mr. Selden observes), but only paternal love and care to bring up a child who had lost her parents. For the Hebrew doctors are so far from acknowledging any adoption, that they say he took her to make her his wife. So Jarchi by bat [daughter] understands beth, a house; which the LXX. follow, he educated her εἰς γυναῖκα, to be his wife, (lib. de Succession. cap. 4. p. 18.)

Ver. 8. So it came to pass, when the king's commandment and his decree was heard, and when many maidens were gathered together unto Shushan the palace, to the custody of Hegai, that Esther was brought also unto the king's house, to the custody of Hegai, keeper of the women.] The words which we translate was brought, may be translated was taken; and that by force, as the word sometimes signifies, and as the former Targum here explains it, she was brought by violence. The latter Targum tells the manner of it at large, That Mordecai, hearing of this order, hid his cousin in a private place where the officers could not find her. But when the virgins were gathered together, and Esther was missing, whom all the neighbours knew to be a very great beauty, they procured an order from the king to Mordecai, that upon pain of death he should produce her; which he did. But perhaps I take too much notice of these Jewish fables.

Ver. 9. And the maiden pleased him, and she obtained kindness of him.] That is, Hegai, who was much taken with her countenance, and her mien, and her sweet disposition (it is likely), and all other things, which he thought would make her acceptable to the king.

And he speedily gave her her things for purification.] That she might be fit before the usual time to go in unto the king, that is, in a year's time, as some understand it, (ver. 12. 16.)

With such things as belonged to her.] For her clothes and diet, which the former Targum makes to be very sumptuous.

And seven maidens.] One for every day of the week, saith the same Targum, whose names he gives us, and the days of the week on which they waited.

Which were meet to be given her, out of the king's house.] Persons of quality, fit to attend her.

And he preferred her and her maids unto the best place of the house of the women.] And did her so much honour, that he assigned her and her maids the best apartment in the house of the virgins.

Ver. 10. Esther had not shewed her people nor her kindred; for Mordecai had charged her that she should not shew it.] Lest she should be contemned, and looked upon as no better than a slave.

Ver. 11. And Mordecai walked every day before the court of the women's house, to know how Esther did, and what should become of her.] He might walk there without being suspected, because he belonged to the court, and was a man of condition; for those that were carried away in Jeconiah's captivity (as his ancestors were) were of the better sort, (2 Kings xxiv. 14, &c. Dan. i. 4.) And Esther might find means, by some of those that attended her, to let him know the state of her health, and of her affairs.

Ver. 12. Now, when every maid's turn was come to go in to king Ahasuerus, after that she had been twelve months.] They were kept close so long, that the king might be sure he should not be imposed upon by a child begotten by another man. And besides, it was suitable to the state of the king to have them wait a great while, before they were brought into his company: and another reason here follows. Herodotus explains the first words, lib. iii. cap. 69. where he saith, the Persian women go in to their husbands, ἐν περιτροπῇ, in a circle, by turns.

(For so were the days of their purifications accomplished, to wit, six months with oil of myrrh, and six months with sweet odours.] It is observed by Pliny, lib. xiii. cap. 1. that ointments were first invented by the Persians; which were very necessary in so hot a country, where men and women are apt to sweat much, and so smell rankly, without great care to keep themselves clean and sweet. For which purpose the oil of myrrh was much used, being very fragrant, and apt also to make the skin soft and smooth, and to cleanse it from scurf. The sweet odour served to the same use, to take away all ill scents, and, as some think, to make the body more vigorous.

There are many authors (as Fortunatus Scacchus observes) who take the word mor to signify not myrrh, but that fragrant herb which we call marum, or, as some think, marjoram, from which excellent oils were drawn: (lib. i. Myrothecium, cap. 50.) but he takes it, as we do, for myrrh; from whence not only a noble oil was drawn, but being beat to a powder, such a fumigation was made with it, as was offered unto their gods. Whence Athenæus blames Alexander's arrogance, for suffering Σμύρνα, καὶ τὰ ἄλλα θυμιάματα, myrrh and other sweet odours to be offered to him, (lib. xii. cap. 8.)

Six months.] This was a long time, which was set (first with that oil, and as many more with sweet odours) for their purification: or rather for their abstersion or cleansing, as the same Scacchus observes: for there were no such purifications here used, as were among the Jews; but it is a known thing, that, as women in all countries were wont to spend a great deal of time in their dressing, and trimming up of themselves, that they might appear well abroad; so much more in this country, and when they were to go to the bed of a great king. A year, indeed, was a long time; but Athenæus saith, that among the Sybarites (who were a delicate, luxurious people) there was a sanction that the women, when they were called to the public sacrifices at great festivals, πρὸ ἐνιαυτὸν τὴν παρασκευὴν ποιεῖσθαι, were to make preparation for it a year before.

And with other things for the purifying of the women).] Whatsoever was proper for this purpose, was used in their preparations for the king's bed.

Ver. 13. Then thus came every maiden unto the king; whatsoever she desired was given her to go with her out of the house of the women unto the king's house.] Whatsoever ornaments or attendants she desired.

Ver. 14. In the evening she went, and on the morrow she returned into the second house of the women, to the custody of Shaashgaz the king's chamberlain, which kept the concubines.] She returned no more into the former house, having lost her virginity: but was treated in another house, as one of the king's wives: for so concubines were, of a secondary sort, as I have often noted:

She came in unto the king no more, except the king delighted in her, and that she were called by name.] For every one's name was registered, as the Targum saith, and the night, I suppose, when she went in unto the king.

Ver. 15. Now, when the turn of Esther, the daughter of Abihail, the uncle of Mordecai (who had taken her for his daughter), was come to go in unto the king, she required nothing.] But was contented with her own natural beauty, and desired nothing of art to recommend her.

But what Hegai the king's chamberlain, the keeper of the women, appointed.] Yet she did not refuse what he, who had been so kind to her, ordered for her.

And Esther obtained favour in the sight of all them that looked upon her.] All that beheld her, as she passed from the house of the women to the king's house, admired her beauty: which needed no ornament, for the greatest ornaments of virgins are modesty (as Pellicanus speaks), silence, well-disciplined eyes, a serene countenance without levity, a horror of all wantonness; which meeting all in her, made her acceptable to every one that saw her.

Ver. 16. So Esther was taken unto king Ahasuerus into his house-royal.] She was not sent back in the morning unto the second house of the women, as the rest were, but the king kept her in his own house, intending to make her more than a concubine.

In the tenth month (which is the month Tebeth), in the seventh year of his reign.] He made the great feast we read of in the foregoing chapter in the third year of his reign, in the end of which Vashti was sent away. How it came to pass that it was so long before Esther was advanced to succeed her, seems difficult to resolve: but we are to consider, that a great deal of time was spent in gathering the virgins together, and that she was a year in preparing herself for admission to the king; and several, it is likely, went in before her, who had also their time for preparation; and took some time, it is likely, to try how he liked her wit, humour, and conversation.

Ver. 17. And the king loved Esther above all the women, and she obtained grace and favour in his sight more than all the virgins; so that he set the royal crown upon her head, and made her queen in the stead of Vashti.] She being at this time, as Jacobus Capellus computes, twenty years old, ad A. M. 3645. But some make a question whether she did not commit a great sin to come at this dignity, not considering the custom of those times and countries. For those persons whom the king took into his bed after the manner beforementioned, were not harlots, but became his wives of a lower sort; for whom he provided ever after, and they were no longer chargeable to their parents or friends; nor might any other man marry them. Such a one Esther would have been, if he had not liked her so well as to do more for her. Which, no doubt, was ordered by a special providence of God, who thus rewarded her virtue, and also preserved the whole nation of the Jews from perishing.

Ver. 18. Then the king made a great feast unto all his princes and his servants, even Esther's feast.] So it was called, because it was made in honour of her, and, if we may believe Josephus, lasted a whole month.

And he made a release to the provinces.] At this feast he gave the people some ease in their imposts, and forgave them some of the duties they were bound to pay him. Some have affirmed, that this is reported by Herodotus to have been the custom of the Persian kings at their marriages. But I can find no more than this in him, that ὁ καθιστάμενος Βασιλεὺς, &c. when he was made king, he remitted the tribute that was due to him from all the cities, (lib. vi. cap. 59.)

And gave gifts, according to the state of the king.] He made great presents to the queen, as the manner of the Persian kings was; who gave to their queen at their marriage such a city to buy them clothes, such a one for their hair, another for their necklaces and other ornaments, and so for the rest of their expenses. Here the latter Targum tells an idle tale, how the king desired Esther to tell him what country she was of, and who were her ancestors from whom she descended. To which she answered, that her parents dying when she was an infant, she did not know who were her forefathers: which the king hearing, he released all men of their taxes, and gave them gifts, saying, I will be kind to all people of all nations, because I will be sure to be kind to the people of Esther, who are among some of them.

Ver. 19. And when the virgins were gathered together the second time, then Mordecai sat in the king's gate.] This doth not signify that there was another inquisition for virgins after Esther was married; but, to join this history with what follows, he repeats what was said before, ver. 2. that at the time when this second collection of virgins was made for the choice of a new wife, as there had been one before when Vashti was married, then Mordecai was in attendance at the gate of the palace; and so proceeds to shew how he discovered a plot against the life of the king.

Ver. 20. Esther had not yet shewed her kindred nor her people, as Mordecai had charged her.] Which he would not have her to discover, lest she should be hated for her nation's sake, or her nation be envied for her good fortune.

For Esther did the commandment of Mordecai, like as when she was brought up with him.] A rare example of virtue, that she should be so observant of him when she was a queen; for most forget what they were, when they are unexpectedly grown very great.

Ver. 21. In those days (while Mordecai sat in the king's gate), two of the king's chamberlains, Bigthan and Teresh, of those which kept the door, were wroth, and sought to lay hand on the king Ahasuerus.] These were two great men, who, perhaps, kept the door of the king's bedchamber, and were incensed at the divorce of Vashti (whose creatures they were), or at the advancement of Esther, knowing her to be related to Mordecai, who they were afraid would be raised to greater power than themselves. Thus the former Targum writes, "Doth not the queen by her power with the king intend to turn us out of our places, and put in Mordecai?" therefore they resolved to poison him, as both that and the latter Targum understand it.

Ver. 22. And the thing was known to Mordecai, who told it unto Esther the queen; and Esther certified the king thereof in Mordecai's name.] One of their servants, whose name (as Josephus saith) was Barnabazus, discovered the conspiracy to Mordecai, who found means to inform Esther of it, and she acquainted the king with it from Mordecai.

Ver. 23. And when inquisition was made of the matter, it was found out.] His information which he gave to the king appeared to be true, upon a due inquiry into the matter.

Therefore they were both hanged on a tree: and it was written in the book of the Chronicles before the king.] In the day-book, wherein all memorable things were recorded, to be read (as the Targum observes) before the king, when he required. Here we may see the infelicity and the danger of the most potent persons: the life of a great king depending upon the fidelity of one single person, whose service was neglected by the court, though a memorial was made of it. Thus all masters of families are obnoxious to the perfidiousness of their servants that wait upon them. They are the words of Conradus Pellicanus.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. AFTER these things.] About five years after, as appears from ver. 7.

Did king Ahasuerus promote Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite.] He was descended from the royal race of the Amalekite kings, and grown into great favour in this court, as Daniel and his companions, who were of noble blood also, (Dan. i. 3.) The latter Targum hath given us the pedigree of Haman, up to Eliphaz, the eldest son of Esau.

And advanced him, and set his seat above all the princes that were with him.] Either of his own or other nations. For it is likely the Persian kings, as the Chaldee before them, had many kings and princes, whom they had conquered, with them, who had the honour sometimes to sit on royal seats before them, (2 Kings xxv. 28.)

Ver. 2. And all the king's servants, that were in the king's gate, bowed and reverenced Haman; for the king had so commanded concerning him.] To bow the knee or the body to all great persons was a common respect; for which there needed not a particular command to require this of every body with respect to Haman, since no doubt they did it to all princes, and would much more do it to him, who took place of them all, and was the prince's favourite. There was therefore some kind of Divine honour intended in this; such as was paid to the Persian kings themselves, to whom the Greeks would not pay this sort of respect, because it was accounted Divine. And the word reverence imports something beyond bowing, which was falling flat upon their faces to the ground. Such prostrations the kings of Persia expected: and Ahasuerus, to express his great affection to Haman, would have it paid to him. The former Targum I believe thought of this, when he saith, They in the king's gate bowed down to his image which he had set up, and worshipped Haman.

But Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence.] Because he was of a nation devoted by God to destruction, with whom therefore the Jews would have no friendship, nor shew them any kindness, but remember the injuries they had done them, (Deut. xxv. 18, 19.) But this doth not seem a reason weighty enough, why he should not pay him civil respect, which was given to all men in great place, especially since by denying it he might expose his whole nation to danger. This is an argument that there was something more intended: and accordingly the author of the apocryphal additions to this book understood it, who represents Mordecai praying after this manner: "Thou knowest, O Lord, that it is not contumacy, nor pride, nor desire of vain-glory, that makes me not worship Haman; for I would willingly kiss his feet, for the safety of Israel: but I do it, that I may not prefer the glory of a man to the glory of God; nor adore any one but thee my Lord alone."

Ver. 3. Then the king's servants, which were in the king's gate, said unto Mordecai, Why transgressest thou the king's commandments?] I suppose it seemed strange to them, that one single person should refuse to do what every body did, especially since thereby he disobeyed the king: therefore they expostulated with him, to make him sensible of his duty and his danger.

Ver. 4. Now it came to pass, when they spake daily unto him, and he hearkened not unto them.] Seemed not to regard what they said, and perhaps gave them no answer.

That they told Haman, to see whether Mordecai's matters would stand.] Whether he would persist in his stiffness, and what would be the issue of it.

For he had told them that he was a Jew.] Being much pressed by them, he confesses the reason why he could not do as they did. For, that they might not think it was pride or sullenness that made him not comply with the king's order, he acquaints them plainly of what religion and what nation he was; who might not shew any respect to an Amalekite (as some take it), or worship any but God alone, as I take the meaning to be. And thus the latter Targum here explains it: when they asked him why he did not obey the king, he answered, "What is the son of man that he should exalt himself? what is he that is born of a woman, who comes lamenting into the world, and is of few days, and then returns to his earth, that I should worship him? No, I worship God, the living God, who endures for ever," &c. And so he goes on, describing very well the glorious majesty of God, the Lord of heaven and earth, and thus concludes, "He is to be praised by us, and before him we ought to bow down ourselves."

Ver. 5. And when Haman saw that Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence, then was Haman full of wrath.] It is likely he did not mind what every one did that was in the king's gate (where there was a great crowd), till he was told of Mordecai's neglect; and then he marked him when he next passed by, and was highly enraged at him.

Ver. 6. And he thought scorn to lay hands on Mordecai alone; for they had shewed him the people of Mordecai: wherefore Haman sought to destroy all the Jews that were throughout the whole kingdom of king Ahasuerus, even the people of Mordecai.] He disdained to take so poor a revenge as to rid himself of one man alone, but resolved to make the whole nation suffer, who he knew were enemies to that nation from whence he sprung.

Ver. 7. In the first month (that is the month Nisan), in the twelfth year of king Ahasuerus, they cast Pur, that is the lot, before Haman, from day to day, and from month to month, to the twelfth month, that is the month Adar.] It was the manner of the eastern country, by casting lots into an urn, to inquire what days would be fortunate, and what not, to undertake any business in: according to which superstition Haman endeavoured to find what time of the year was most favourable to the Jews, and what most unlucky. And first he inquired what month was most unfortunate, and found the month Adar, which was the last month in the year, answerable to our February. For, as Guil. Schickard observes, there was no festival solemnity in this month, nor was it sanctified by any peculiar rites. And then he inquired the day, and found the thirteenth day was not auspicious to them, (ver. 13.) Some think there were as many lots as there were days in the year, and for every day he drew a lot; but found none to his mind, till he came to the last month of all, and to the middle of it. (See Hottinger's Smegma Orientale, p. 75.) Now this whole business was governed by a wonderful providence of God; by whom these lots were directed, and not by the Persian gods, to fall in the last month of the year; whereby almost a whole year intervened between the design and its execution, and gave time for Mordecai to acquaint Esther with it, and for her to intercede with the king, for the revoking or suspending his decree, and disappointing the conspiracy.

Ver. 8. And Haman said unto king Ahasuerus.] Or rather had said: for it is not likely he would cast his lots till he knew his mind, for fear he should lose his labour.

There is a certain people scattered abroad, and dispersed among the people in all the provinces of thy kingdom.] For a great number of them, being well settled in the land of their captivity, would not return to Judea when Cyrus gave them leave; whom Haman represents as a despicable people, or vagrants and stragglers (as the latter Targum understands it), dispersed here and there up and down in his dominions.

And their laws are diverse from all people, neither keep they the king's laws.] A proud, high-spirited people (as the same Targum represents the sense), who live by laws of their own, and will observe none of the king's; for they will neither eat of our meat, nor drink of our wine, nor keep our festivals; but have several of their own, on which they will not work, nor do the king's business. All which he sets forth at large in that paraphrase.

Therefore it is not for the king's profit to suffer them.] The former Targum thus glosses upon these words, "The king gets nothing by them, while they live in this kingdom; but what will he not get if he destroys them all?" The other Targum makes him represent them as griping usurers, which was to the damage of the king's people.

Ver. 9. If it please the king, let it be written that they may be destroyed.] He desires, not only a verbal command, but an order in writing, for their utter extirpation as a pestilent people.

And I will pay ten thousand talents of silver.] He promises to compensate the loss of the tribute which they paid yearly by a vast sum of money, which he would pay immediately. But he intended not to pay one farthing of it himself, it being easy to raise it out of the spoil of the Jews' goods, (ver. 13.)

To the hands of those that have the charge of the business.] Not of those who had the charge to kill them, but of those that received the king's money; as appears by the next words, to bring it into the king's treasuries. And so the same Targum, "I will pay it into the hands of those who coin the king's money;" that is, into the mint, as we now speak.

Ver. 10. And the king took his ring from his hand, and gave it unto Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, the Jews' enemy.] Without any examination into the condition of the people, he consented to their destruction. So loath are men that love their pleasure to take any pains to distinguish between truth and falsehood.

Ver. 11. And the king said unto Haman, The silver is given unto thee, the people also, to do with them as it seemeth good to thee.] He gave him power to draw up what decree he pleased, and seal it with his own ring; but as for the money, he loved him so much, he would have none of it.

Ver. 12. Then were the king's scribes called.] As there were sacred scribes among the Jews, who were men learned in the law, so there were political both among them and other nations, as L'Empereur observes upon Bertram, de Repub. Jud. p. 381. And there were two sorts of them; one of which was employed in writing public letters or contracts, and other acts that were to be signed by authority, the more honourable and highest of which were such as are called here the king's scribes, whom the Chaldee calls the king's notaries, and we now call secretaries of state.

On the thirteenth day of the first month.] This was not wisely projected, to let his design be known so long before it was to take effect; for the king's mind might alter, or the Jews might find some way to deliver themselves, or might steal out of the kingdom.

And there was written (according to all that Haman had commanded) unto the king's lieutenants, and to the governors that were over every province, and to the rulers of every people of every province, according to the writing thereof, and to every people after their language; in the name of king Ahasuerus was it written, and sealed with the king's ring.] He himself indited the decree by the royal authority, and made it, no doubt, as strict as it was possible; and perhaps commanded it to be executed under great penalties, by all manner of officers, who were required to take care to see it done. And that none might be ignorant, it was written in the language of every people, and in the character they could read.

Ver. 13. And the letters were sent by posts into all the king's provinces.] Concerning these posts which were in use among the Persians, see Herodotus, lib. viii. cap. 98. where, describing the dispatches which were sent into Persia to carry the news of Xerxes's overthrow, he saith, Τουτέων δὲ τῶν Ἀγγέλων οὐδέν ἐστι θᾶσσον, ὅτι παραγίνεται δυπτὸν ἐον, &c. There is nothing upon earth swifter than these messengers, whom neither snow, nor rain, nor heat, nor night, can hinder from finishing their course speedily. The manner of which he there sets down, which the Persians, he saith, call Ἀγγαρήιον.

To destroy, to kill, and to cause to perish, all Jews, both young and old, little children and women, in one day, even upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, and to take the spoil of them for a prey.] This was a strong motive to such a bloody execution, that they who killed them should enrich themselves by their spoil.

Ver. 14. The copy of the writing, for a commandment to be given in every province, was published unto all people, that they should be ready against that day.] Copies of this original decree of the king were sent into every province, and there ordered to be published, requiring them to be ready against that day.

Ver. 15. The posts went out, being hastened by the king's commandment; and the decree was given in Shushan the palace.] He procured a new commandment from the king, requiring their speedy delivery of this decree, that the people might not want time to prepare for its execution; and he also got it signed by the king's council; for that seems to be meant by its being given in Shushan.

And the king and Haman sat down to drink.] It is likely Haman made an entertainment for the king, to thank him for his great kindness to him in this grant.

But the city Shushan was perplexed.] The Jews that lived there, who were very numerous, knew not what to do: and it is probable other people in the city were very fearful what would become of them; not knowing but that they might also suffer in such a massacre: and perhaps some of them were related to the Jews, or had made friendship with them, and therefore were much concerned at this horrid decree.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. WHEN Mordecai perceived all that was done.] Which it is likely he heard by some friend before it was publicly known, but did not express his grief till the edict was hung up.

Mordecai rent his clothes.] Both before and behind, saith the latter Targum.

And put on sackcloth with ashes.] As the manner was, in great sorrow.

And went out into the midst of the city, and cried with a loud and a bitter cry.] Saying, as the same Targum expresses it, What a heavy decree is this which the king and Haman have passed upon us? Not against a part of us, but upon us all, to root us out of the earth: whereupon all the Jews flocked about him; and he caused the book of the law to be brought to the gate of Shushan, covered with sackcloth; and therein he read those words of Moses in Deut. iv. 30, 31. "When thou art in tribulation, and all these things are come upon thee, in the latter days, if thou turn to the Lord thy God, and shall be obedient to his voice (for the Lord thy God is a merciful God), he will not forsake thee, nor destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers, which he sware unto them." After which he exhorted them to fasting, humiliation, and repentance, according to the example of the Ninevites.

Ver. 2. And came even before the king's gate.] That his cry might come to the ears of Esther.

For none might enter into the king's gate clothed with sackcloth.] But he durst not take his place in the gate, because none that were in mourning might come there: so careful they were, not in the least to disturb the king in his pleasures. By this it appears, as from many other places, that in the gate they made their court, as we speak, and dispatched all public affairs (as I have noted often before), which was here practised more than in other places, because the Persian monarchs lived more retired than other princes, few but those who attended them being admitted into their palace.

Ver. 3. And in every province, whithersoever the king's commandment and his decree came, there was great mourning among the Jews, and fasting, and weeping, and wailing; and many lay in sackcloth and ashes.] All day long they fasted, and wept, and lamented themselves; and in the night many lay, not in their beds, but on the ground in sackcloth and ashes.

Ver. 4. So Esther's maids and her chamberlains came and told it her.] As a piece of news, or perhaps they understood there was some relation between them.

Then was the queen exceedingly grieved.] Imagining some mischief had befallen him, and not knowing what it was.

And she sent raiment to clothe Mordecai, and to take away his sackcloth from him.] That he might come to court, and take his place in the gate.

But he received it not.] This, no doubt, very much increased her grief.

Ver. 5. Then called Esther for Hatach, one of the king's chamberlains, whom he had appointed to attend upon her.] In whom the king had a great confidence, and whom she could entrust with such a message.

And gave him a commandment to Mordecai, to know what it was, and why it was.] What was the cause of his weeping and wailing, and why he would not accept of the garments which she sent him; as the latter Targum very well explains it.

Ver. 6. So Hatach went forth to Mordecai unto the street of the city, which was before the king's gate.] Where, it is like, he still continued lamenting their miserable condition.

Ver. 7. And Mordecai told him of all that had happened unto him.] How he had refused to worship Haman (as the former Targum explains it), and how this had incensed him against the whole nation.

And of the sum of the money that Haman had promised to pay to the king's treasuries for the Jews, to destroy them.] The ten thousand talents he had offered, to procure the king's consent to their destruction.

Some of the Jews here add another marvellous thing which had happened to Mordecai the very night before Hatach came to him, which he desired Esther might be acquainted withal: whether it be true or false, I think fit here to remember it (it seeming to be so piously designed), as I had it, near threescore years ago, from a great man in the Jewish learning, who quotes for it R. Moses Almosnino, in a book called Jede Moseh (the hands of Moses), where he says, That Mordecai going home in great heaviness, reflecting on the danger his whole nation was in, met three boys coming from school, whom he examined what they had learned that day; one of them told him his lesson had been in Prov. iii. 25, 26. "Be not afraid of sudden fear, nor of the desolation of the wicked when it cometh: for the Lord shall be thy confidence," &c. Then Mordecai cried out, I am confident this desolation shall not be so speedy. Then the second child told him he had learned that day, Isa. viii. 10. "Take counsel together, it shall come to nought; speak the word (or pronounce the decree), it shall not stand; for God is with us." O the wonderful goodness of God, said Mordecai, that thus out of the mouth of babes and sucklings ordaineth strength. And what have you learned? said he, to the third child; who answered, Isa. xlvi. 4. "Even to your old age I am he (that is, the God); unto hoar hairs will I carry you; I have made, and I will bear: even I will carry, and will deliver you." Now, blessed be God, cried Mordecai, that hath not left us comfortless; his hand shall be with us, as in former ages, &c. But another great man, in this learning, hath lately admonished me that this rabbin is but of yesterday, and designed to elude the prophecy of Psalm viii. quoted in the gospel, and therefore unworthy to be mentioned in this place.

Ver. 8. Also he gave him the copy of the writing of the decree that was given at Shushan to destroy them, to shew it unto Esther.] That she might be fully satisfied what was intended.

And to charge her that she should go in unto the king, to make supplication unto him, and to make request before him for her people.] He charged her, I suppose, in the name of God, or, as she loved her nation, to go and earnestly to beseech the king to be merciful to the Jews, as the Targum expounds it.

Ver. 9. And Hatach came, and told Esther the words of Mordecai.

Ver. 10. Again, Esther spake unto Hatach, and gave him commandment unto Mordecai.

Ver. 11. All the king's servants, and the people of the king's provinces, do know.] That is, nobody, either in the court or in the whole kingdom, was ignorant.

That whosoever, whether man or woman, shall come unto the king into the inner court, who is not called.] Here the king kept retired from all company, but such as he called for, or was pleased to admit.

There is one law of his to put him to death.] Let him be of ever such quality there was no exception; but one law reached all that were so presumptuous. This seems to have been an ancient law in that country, mentioned by Herodotus, lib. i. and Athenæus, lib. xii. But the former Targum will have it, that it was procured by Haman, that none might come into the king's presence unless he introduced them.

Except such to whom the king shall hold out his golden sceptre, that he may live.] Which, I suppose, was so seldom done, that few would venture to stand in need of a pardon. A sceptre was the ensign of the highest and most absolute authority: so that, as Wagenseil observes, when Mordecai was advanced to the greatest dignity next to the king, having royal apparel, and a great crown on his head, (viii. 15.) yet he had no sceptre; for that was proper and peculiar to the king.

But I have not been called to come in unto the king these thirty days.] Which might justly make her fear his love was cooled to her, and then her person and petition might not be acceptable to him.

Ver. 12. And they told to Mordecai Esther's words.] There seems to have been more than one person that went with this message, to confirm the truth of what she said.

Ver. 13. Then Mordecai commanded to answer Esther, Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house more than all the Jews.] He would not have her flatter herself with a vain imagination, that because she was queen she should be spared; for she would find no more privilege in the king's house than the rest of the Jews did abroad.

Ver. 14. For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place.] He did not know whence, but he confided in God, that by some means or other he would preserve them from utter destruction.

But thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed.] He would have her believe that God would cut off her and her family for self-love, and want of zeal to preserve her nation.

And who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?] Rather than refuse to intercede for her people, he would have her think (though there was danger in it) that God had raised her up to the dignity in which she was, on purpose that she might be the deliverer of her people, and therefore go courageously about it.

Ver. 15. Then Esther bade them to return Mordecai this answer:

Ver. 16. Go, gather together all the Jews that are present in Shushan.] Not all into one public congregation, for that might have given suspicion of an intended insurrection, but in several private assemblies.

And fast ye for me, neither eat or drink three days, night or day.] None, or very few, could keep a fast for three days and nights, without tasting any meat or drink: the meaning therefore is, that they should make no set meal in their families, neither dinner nor supper, but only eat and drink so much at night as would support them in prayer to God for a blessing upon her undertaking; or, as Josephus understands it, they should abstain from all delicacies, and be content with hard and coarse fare. But Drusius thinks this fast was only one whole day and two nights, according as it is said of our Saviour, that he lay three days and three nights in the grave; and then they might fast so long without taking any refreshment: and in those hot countries we read of monks that fasted four or five days.

I also and my maidens will fast likewise.] It is not likely her maidens were Jews; yet notwithstanding they might be disposed to fast with her; which was not unusual with the gentiles in time of great distress, as appears by the story of the Ninevites, whose fast the Targum thinks Mordecai imitated, making the cattle, oxen, and sheep to abstain, as well as men and women.

And so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law.] Being thus recommended to God, she resolved not so much to regard the law, as the preservation of her people; for there are in some cases such violent circumstances, that to observe the law, as Grotius notes, would be to offend the chiefest law. Whither Puffendorf refers what we read in Valerius Maximus, lib. iii. cap. 7. n. 1. cap. 8. n. 6.

And if I perish, I perish.] This is not a speech of despondence, but of courage and resolution; being as much as to say, I am content to perish in so good a cause; and if I perish for it in this world (as the Targum glosses), I shall have my portion in the world to come.

Ver. 17. So Mordecai went his way, and did according to all that Esther had commanded him.] Betook himself to fasting and prayer (unto which he called all the Jews) as long as Esther required, omitting the joys of the paschal feast, and turning it into a fast, if we may believe the former Targum: for that paraphrast thinks, that Haman laying his plot in the month of Nisan, (ii. 7.) and Mordecai presently applying himself to defeat it, these things must fall out about the Passover, which was in this month. But in memory of this the Jews keep a fast on the thirteenth of Adar, which they call Esther's fast.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. NOW it came to pass, on the third day.] In the conclusion of the fast, or, as the former Targum, on the third day of the Passover.

That Esther put on her royal apparel, and stood in the inner court of the king's house, over against the king's house.] But first, saith the latter Targum, she made a solemn prayer to God, with many tears, as soon as she was dressed, saying, "Thou art the great God, the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God of my father Benjamin: as thou didst deliver Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, out of the fiery furnace, and Daniel from the lion's den, so deliver me now out of the hand of the king, and give me grace and favour in his eyes," &c. And so he goes on in a very long prayer.

And the king sat upon his royal throne in the royal house, over against the gate of the house.] So that he could see every one that came into the court.

Ver. 2. And it was so, when the king saw Esther the queen standing in the court, that she obtained favour in his sight.] He was much moved, saith the former Targum, to see trouble in her countenance, and her eyes full of tears; and so immediately comforted her in the manner following.

And the king held out to Esther the golden sceptre that was in his hand.] In token of his favour, and inviting her approach. But the other Targum says, that the officers about him, as soon as she entered, ran to apprehend her, that she might be put to death: but the king stopped them, by his shewing she was acceptable to him. So true is that of Solomon, "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord; as the rivers of water, he turneth it whithersoever he will," (Prov. xxi. 1.)

So Esther drew near, and touched the top of the sceptre.] Kissed it, saith the Vulgar, or put her hand under it, saith Grotius, in token of her subjection and thankfulness for his favour.

Ver. 3. Then said the king unto her, What wilt thou, queen Esther? and what is thy request? it shall be even given thee to the half of the kingdom.] This is an usual form of speech among kings, when their hearts are enlarged, and they overflow with affection to others, or when they give them the freest liberty to demand what they please, as Grotius explains it upon Matt. xiv. 7. It is a foolish addition, which the latter Targum here makes, that he excepted one thing, which was the building the house of the sanctuary at Jerusalem, which he would not grant, because he promised Geshem, Sanballat, and Tobiah, it should not be built, lest the Jews should rebel.

Ver. 4. And Esther answered, If it seem good unto the king, let the king and Haman come this day unto the banquet that I have prepared for him.] It was very prudent not to open her mind presently, but first to endear his affection by feasting, music, dancing, and whatsoever might please him: and it was no small pleasure, it is likely, that she invited his favourite to come to her entertainment together with him. There was also a singular providence of God in this matter, which so disposed her mind, that the high honour the king bestowed on Mordecai the next day might fall out between this and that, and make way for her petition.

Ver. 5. And the king said, Cause Haman to make haste, that he may do as Esther hath said.] Get himself ready with all speed.

So the king and Haman came to the banquet that Esther had prepared.

Ver. 6. And the king said unto Esther at the banquet of wine.] At the conclusion of the entertainment: for they did not drink wine, but water, at the beginning of their feasts.

What is thy petition? and it shall be granted unto thee: and what is thy request? even to the half of the kingdom it shall be performed.] This shews it was not a sudden passion of love that made him speak so kindly to her before, but he had a settled affection for her, which disposed him to be very bountiful, and shewed he was much pleased with her entertainment.

Ver. 7. Then answered Esther, and said, My petition and my request is,

Ver. 8. If I have found favour in the sight of the king, and if it please the king to grant my petition, and to perform my request, let the king and Haman come to the banquet that I shall prepare for them, and I will do to-morrow as the king hath said.] That is, make her request to him: which she thought would be more seasonable, when she had won his heart by fresh expressions of her desire to please him, and obtained also a new promise from him, that he would deny her nothing: for there was need of a great preparation, to dispose him to do so great a thing for her, as to revoke or suspend his own decree. The latter Targum, after his fashion, gives several frivolous reasons why she invited Haman to the banquet twice; but the last of them is tolerable. The Israelites were in great expectation of the issue of this feasting, and hoped to see Haman presently cut off; but she was resolved to turn their thoughts the right way, that is, from her unto God, looking for mercy from their heavenly Father.

Ver. 9. Then went Haman forth that day joyful and with a glad heart.] To think he was in such favour with the queen, as well as with the king.

But when Haman saw Mordecai in the king's gate, that he stood not up, nor moved for him, he was full of indignation against Mordecai.] The Targum still repeats it, that he saw Mordecai would not rise up before his image.

Ver. 10. Nevertheless Haman refrained himself.] From taking any sudden revenge.

And when he came home, he sent and called for his friends, and Zeresh his wife.] The daughter of Totni (saith the latter Targum), one of the king of Persia's governors beyond the river.

Ver. 11. And Haman told them of the glory of his riches.] How splendidly he lived.

And the multitude of his children.] It was a glory in this country, as Drusius observes, to have abundance of children; but the Targum had no shame, when he affirms he had two hundred and fourscore, besides those ten that were princes in the provinces, and besides Shimstæus the king's secretary.

And all the things wherein the king had promoted him.] What offices and dignities he had conferred upon him.

And how he had advanced him above the princes and servants of the king.] So that he took place of the greatest princes who were natives of the country, and of all the officers in the court.

Ver. 12. Haman said moreover, Yea, Esther the queen did let no man come in with the king unto the banquet that she had prepared but myself; and to-morrow am I invited unto her also with the king.] He did not fail to relate the peculiar honour the queen had done him, which he could not but look upon as a token that he was established in the favour of the court.

Ver. 13. Yet all this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king's gate.] How small a matter will spoil all the satisfaction of those who are arrived at the top of human felicity! immense riches, glory, and honour, gave not Haman so much pleasure, as he felt pain from one man's disrespect unto him: and yet he might have given himself ease before this, by speaking one word to the king to displace Mordecai, or put him to death, if his pride and passion would have let him be contented, without the destruction of a whole nation.

Ver. 14. Then said Zeresh his wife and all his friends unto him, Let a gallows be made of fifty cubits high.] That men might see him that was hanged on it afar off, and be struck with the greater terror, by that spectacle, of giving any disgust to Haman.

And to-morrow speak thou unto the king that Mordecai may be hanged thereon.] They advised him not to wait till the general slaughter of all the Jews, but to rid him presently of Mordecai; for which he had now a fair opportunity, being to attend on the king to-morrow unto the banquet.

Then go thou in merrily with the king unto the banquet.] When his heart was eased of this trouble, the dispatch of his enemy, and the banquet, giving him a double pleasure.

And the thing pleased Haman; and he caused the gallows to be made.] And set up before the door of Mordecai's house, saith the former Targum, against the plain words of this history, vii. 9. where it is said, they stood in Haman's house; from whence, it is possible, he intended to remove them to the door of Mordecai: that Targum hath a great deal of frivolous stuff about this consultation which Haman's friends had how to destroy Mordecai; some advising one way, and some another, but none approved of till this was propounded. The reason given for it is foolish; but at last he concludes piously, that the Jews were extremely troubled at the sight of the gallows, and all cried to God in the words of the Psalmist, (cxxiii. 2.) "Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God, until that he have mercy upon us."

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. ON that night could not the king sleep.] Now follows a wonderful turn of affairs: God so disposing it, that the king could take no rest in the night; and instead of music and singing, and diverting himself with his wives and concubines, he called for the records of the kingdom to be read to him.

And he commanded to bring the book of records of the Chronicles; and they were read before the king.] These were diaries, wherein was set down what passed every day, which we now call journals, (as I observed, ii. 13.) And in them it was the manner of the Persians to set down the names of those who had done the king any eminent service; as Grotius notes out of Herodotus, Thucydides, and Procopius.

Ver. 2. And it was found written, that Mordecai had told of Bigthana and Teresh, two of the king's chamberlains, the keepers of the door, who sought to lay hand on the king Ahasuerus.] It was a singular providence of God, that they should read in that very part of the book wherein the service of Mordecai was recorded. And the latter Targum, to increase the wonder, saith, that Shimstæus, who brought the book, and opened it at this place, seeing this which was written of Mordecai, turned over the leaves, and would have read in another part of the book; but the leaves flew back again to the same place where he opened it, and he was forced to read that story to the king.

Ver. 3. And the king said, What honour and dignity hath been done to Mordecai for this? Then said the king's servants that ministered unto him, There is nothing done for him.] Great men sometimes are unmindful of the highest services that are done them, and take no care to reward them. Though some think the king ordered him a reward, of which, by the artifice of those in the court, who hated the Jews, he was deprived. But there was a special providence in it, that he went without a reward then, which procured it for him most opportunely at this time. It is not improbable, that, as Josephus saith, the history of some of his ancestors was read before they came to his reign; wherein was set down what services men had done, and what preferment or gifts had been bestowed upon them; which moved the king to ask, when they came to this story of Mordecai, what had been done for him?

Ver. 4. And the king said, Who is in the court?] For he was resolved immediately to shew how sensible he was of his service.

(Now Haman was come into the outward court of the king's house, to speak unto the king to hang Mordecai on the gallows that he had prepared for him).] He was come very early to court, that he might gratify his revenge, and go with more pleasure to the banquet. This was another part of God's providence, to bring him so soon to court when the king was thus disposed.

Ver. 5. And the king's servants said unto him, Behold, Haman standeth in the court. And the king said, Let him come in.] Which he durst not do, as great as he was, without leave.

Ver. 6. So Haman came in. And the king said unto him, What shall be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour?] The king, in all probability, would not have asked this question, but ordered himself what he thought fit, if God had not intended that Mordecai should have the greatest honour done him, and that by the judgment of his greatest enemy.

(Now Haman thought in his heart, To whom would the king delight to do honour more than to myself?)] He had reason to think so, because he had already heaped so many favours upon him, and was now invited by the queen to keep him company at her banquet.

Ver. 7. And Haman answered the king, For the man whom the king delighteth to honour,

Ver. 8. Let the royal apparel be brought which the king useth to wear.] When he went abroad, and appeared publicly among his people; which should rather be translated, the royal robe, an external garment, or stole, coming down to his feet, which none wore but himself.

And the horse that the king rideth upon.] I suppose it was a horse which none might ride upon but himself; like the mule among the kings of Israel, which was peculiarly appointed to their own use, as I have noted on 1 Kings i. 33. Herodotus (lib. i.) mentions such a generous and most noble horse belonging to the king of Persia.

And the crown-royal which is set upon his head.] That is, upon the horse's head, upon which there was a royal ornament; as there is now at Rome, called a fiocco. For keter is a large word, signifying any ornament about the head or the neck. And that this refers to the horse, not to the king, is plain in the Hebrew, and from the next verse, and ver. 10, 11. where there is no more mention of this keter; but only of the robe, and of the horse to which this royal ornament upon his head belonged. (See Ludovicus de Dieu.)

Ver. 9. And let this apparel and horse be delivered to the hand of one of the king's most noble princes, that they may array the man withal whom the king delighteth to honour, and bring him on horseback through the street of the city, and proclaim before him, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honour.] This proclamation, in all likelihood, was made by some public officer.

Ver. 10. Then the king said to Haman, Make haste, and take the apparel and the horse, as thou hast said, and do even so to Mordecai the Jew, that sitteth at the king's gate.] It is very likely these words astonished Haman, and made as great commotions in him, as the Targum here describes: but he durst not dispute the king's command, nor ask him what Mordecai he meant (there being many of that name), when the king had plainly told him on whom it was he intended to bestow this honour. But if he made any difficulty to obey this command, or desired to be excused, the king bade him say no more, but go (as the verse concludes), and let nothing fail of all that he had spoken.

Ver. 11. Then took Haman the apparel, and the horse, and arrayed Mordecai, and brought him on horseback through the street of the city, and proclaimed before him, Thus shall it be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour.] At which sight (saith the latter Targum) Esther praised God in the words of the Psalmist, cxiii. 7, 8. "He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill: that he may set him with princes, even with the princes of his people." And Mordecai said those words, Psal. xxx. 11, 12. "Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing: thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness; I will praise thee, O Lord God my redeemer, that thou hast not let mine enemy triumph over me."

Ver. 12. And Mordecai came again to the king's gate.] Returned to his duty, clothed not in sackcloth, as the Targum represents him (for then he might not have come there), but in his own raiment. Shewing he was not puffed up with the honour that had been done him; but foreseeing, no doubt, the happy event which followed.

But Haman hasted to his house mourning, and having his head covered.] Which was a token of sadness and dejection.

Ver. 13. And Haman told Zeresh his wife and all his friends.] Who were waiting to hear what was become of Mordecai, whom they advised to get hanged on the gallows.

Every thing that had befallen him.] How cross every thing had fallen out to him that morning.

Then said his wise men and Zeresh his wife.] They whose counsel he had used in his divination by lots, now changed their mind; and his wife concurred in opinion with them, that these were bad omens.

If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shalt not prevail against him, but shalt surely fall before him.] They had observed, it is likely, how the Jews had been wonderfully raised from under great oppressions, since the time of Cyrus; and thence conclude there was a particular providence that took care of them. And it is possible they had heard something of the oracle against the Amalekites, that they should perish by the hands of the Jews. And, as Dr. Jackson excellently notes, (book i. on the Creed, chap. 21.) Those plots which would have crushed other nations, did often turn to their advancement, and the fall of their enemies. Whence both their rising and falling, and consequently the success of such as opposed them, was in the apprehension of wise men of other nations merely fatal; altogether incorrigible by worldly policy. Whence these wise men of Chaldea (as he calls them), upon the first notice of the wind's turning for them, read Haman's destiny. And accordingly Achior's speech to Holofernes, Judith v. 17, &c. (whether truly uttered, or feigned by the penman of the history), was framed according to the known experience of those times, and contained such advices as a faithful counsellor, well acquainted with the estate of the Jews, should have given to his lord, who did not so well understand it.

Ver. 14. And while they were yet talking with him, came the king's chamberlains, and hasted to bring Haman unto the banquet that Esther had prepared.] He hearing their opinion, that these things boded some evil to him, was very slow, we may well suppose, in his motion; and could have been content, perhaps, not to have gone to the banquet: or he was musing what to do for his preservation, which made him stay longer than he should have done, before he waited on the king to it.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. So the king and Haman came to banquet with Esther the queen.

Ver. 2. And the king said again to Esther on the second day, at the banquet of wine.] When his heart was merry, and highly delighted with his entertainment.

What is thy petition, queen Esther? and it shall be granted thee: and what is thy request? and it shall be performed, even to the half of the kingdom.] This promise, renewed the third time, gave her courage to present her suit to him.

Ver. 3. Then Esther the queen.] Lifting up her eyes to heaven, as the Targum enlarges it.

Answered and said, If I have found favour in thy sight, O king, and if it please the king.] Thus she prefaced to her request, when she only beseeched him to accept of a banquet from her.

Let my life be given me at my petition, and my people at my request.] That is, the life of her people.

Ver. 4. For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, to be slain, and to perish.] For Haman had offered a great sum of money to purchase their destruction. She uses so many words, that she might express the outrageous mischief intended against them, which was no less than their extermination.

But if we had been sold for bond-men and bond-women I had held my tongue.] For that might have turned to the king's profit, and they might, at one time or other, have recovered their liberty.

Although the enemy could not countervail the king's damage.] The king would not have gained so much as he would have lost by it. But there is another interpretation which Aben Ezra mentions, who takes the Hebrew word hatzar not to signify an enemy, but distress, misery, and trouble. Which makes this sense, If they had sold us for slaves, I had not troubled the king with my petition, because that misery of ours would not have been so much to the king's damage. (See De Dieu.)

Ver. 5. Then the king Ahasuerus answered and said unto Esther the queen, Who is he, and where is he, that durst presume in his heart to do so?] It seemed incredible that any man should entertain such a thought (for the king, I suppose, had forgot the decree Haman had obtained from him), to cut off a whole nation. In the Hebrew the words are, Who is he whose heart hath filled him to do so? A speech like that in the New Testament, Acts v. 3. "Why hath Satan filled thine heart?" Made thee so daring and presumptuous. The like, Eccles. viii. 11.

Ver. 6. And Esther said, The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman.] She found now that she need not fear to speak plainly.

Then Haman was afraid before the king and the queen.] For he could not but see the danger he was in to lose his greatness and his life. And his fear was the greater, now he knew the queen was one of that nation whom he had conspired to destroy.

Ver. 7. And the king, arising from the banquet of wine in his wrath, went into the palace-garden.] To take breath, and cool himself; being in a great commotion, by variety of passions boiling and struggling in him. For as he loved the queen, so he loved Haman; and yet was full of indignation that he should engage him in such an odious design.

And Haman stood up to make request for his life to Esther the queen.] Who he thought might have so much tenderness, as to take compassion upon him and forgive him.

For he saw that there was evil determined against him by the king.] Which he discerned by the king's countenance, and by his going out of the room in a great fume and violent passion; which, it is likely, broke out into threatening words.

Ver. 8. Then the king returned out of the palace-garden into the place of the banquet of wine; and Haman was fallen upon the bed whereon Esther was.] They sat, or rather lay upon beds, as they ate and drank: and Haman fell down as a supplicant at the feet of Esther, laying his hand upon her knees, and beseeching her to take pity upon him. I have not read any where that this was the manner among the Persians; but it was among the Greeks and Romans, to embrace the knees of those whom they petitioned to be favourable to them. Insomuch, that it was a rite in their religious worship to touch the knees of their gods. (See Pliny, lib. xi. cap. 45.) And thus Sulpitius Severus takes it to have been done here, "Deinde regressus rex, vidit Aman reginæ genua amplexum."

Then said the king, Will he force the queen also before me in the house?] The king finding him in this posture, interpreted it, as if he were so impudent as, before the king's face, and in his own palace, to offer violence to the queen's chastity. Not that he believed this was his intention; but in his furious passion he turned every thing to the worst sense, and made use of it to aggravate his crime.

As the word went out of the king's mouth, they covered Haman's face.] That he might not see the face of the king any more; or rather, as a man condemned, this told him his doom: for it is likely the king, when he saw him in that posture, made a sign what they should do with him, which immediately was performed. Though Aben Ezra saith, this was always done to those with whom the king was angry, though they were not put to death; to shew them what they deserved, never to see the king more.

Ver. 9. And Harbonah, one of the chamberlains, said before the king.] The latter Targum saith, that this Harbonah was one of Haman's counsel, who advised him to set up the gallows to hang Mordecai; but, seeing this strange turn of affairs, incensed the king, by telling him what Haman designed against him who had saved the king's life.

Behold also the gallows, fifty cubits high, which Haman had made for Mordecai, who had spoken good for the king, standeth in the house of Haman.] Upon which he intended to make Mordecai an example to all those that should presume to offend him.

Then the king said, Hang him thereon.] But whether dead or alive is not said, as Salmasius observes; who shews, by many instances, (in his book De Cruce, p. 494.) that it was the manner of the Persians, first to cut off the heads of malefactors, and then to hang them on a gibbet. Josephus, indeed, saith, that he commanded Haman, ἐκ σταυροῦ κρεμασθέντα ἀποθανεῖν, to be put to death hanging on a cross: but crucifying was not a Persian punishment; nor did the Romans let the bodies of malefactors die on the cross themselves; but they extinguished them some other way.

Ver. 10. So they hanged Haman on the gallows that he had prepared for Mordecai. Then was the king's wrath pacified.] The latter Targum here adds a great deal of frivolous stuff, how the king sent for Mordecai, and charged him to see the execution done upon Haman; and how he begged of Mordecai to spare his life, at least not to hang him, who had been so great, like a varlet, &c. but he concludes very well, that now was verified the observation of Solomon, (Prov. xi. 8.) "The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in his stead."

I cannot think fit to end this chapter without taking notice of a reflection which a great man of our own church made long ago upon it: that, in this wonderful deliverance of the Jewish nation, there was no extraordinary manifestation of God's power, no particular cause or agent, that was in its working advanced above the ordinary pitch of nature; and yet the contrivance, or suiting of those ordinary agents appointed by God, is more admirable than if the same end had been effected by means truly miraculous. That a king should not sleep is not unusual, nor that he should solace his waking thoughts by hearing the annals of his own kingdom, or the journals of his own reign, read to him, &c. But that he should lie awake at that time especially, when Haman was watching to destroy the Jews, and that, in the chronicles of the kingdom, they should light on that place where Mordecai's unrewarded services were recorded; and that he should resolve forthwith to do him honour; and Haman come in at that very nick of time when the king was so disposed; and should ignorantly determine what honour should be done him, and be made the instrument of it: this was from the keeper of Israel, who neither slumbers nor sleeps, and was truly marvellous in his people's sight, as Dr. Jackson speaks in his second sermon upon 2 Chron. vi. 39, 40. where he observes, that miracles are in their nature more apt to affect the sense; but such secret contrivances of God's wisdom and providence do more affect the understanding: the one works astonishment, the other admiration. For which reason, miracles were more frequent in the infancy of our religion, to enforce unbelievers to give ear to the words of life, and to take God's promises (which otherwise they might have slighted) into serious consideration: but now the ways of God's wisdom, or secret dispositions of his providence, are more apt to cherish the seed of life sown in the hearts of believers. Miracles by continual frequency would cease to be miracles, and not be wondered at; whereas the unsearchable ways of God's wisdom in contriving extraordinary successes, by means ordinarily, will incessantly breed in us matter of admiration: and his wise contrivances are still, in one kind or other, most visible, but we want eyes or hearts to observe or contemplate them.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1. ON that day did the king Ahasuerus give the house of Haman, the Jews' enemy, unto Esther the queen.] That is, he bestowed on her the whole estate belonging to his family (for that is meant by his house); his lands, his goods, his servants, his cattle, all the money he had treasured up. For by his crime all was forfeited to the king; who could not more fitly dispose of it, than to her who would have been the greatest sufferer by him.

And Mordecai came before the king.] By Esther's intercession.

For Esther had told what he was unto her.] Which was not known at court till now; though two eunuchs, who were her confidants, knew something of it, (ii. 21.) and he, perhaps, who carried messages between them, (iv. 5. 13.)

Ver. 2. And the king took off his ring, which he had taken from Haman.] Which he had formerly given him, (iii. 10.) but now had resumed.

And gave it unto Mordecai.] In token that he put the same confidence in him, to be the keeper of his signet.

And Esther set Mordecai over the house of Haman.] Not over his family, for that was destroyed; but over his lands and goods, which the king had given to Esther. Of which she made Mordecai her steward, that he might manage that vast estate, which Haman, no doubt, had heaped up, for her advantage.

Ver. 3. And Esther spake yet again before the king, and fell down at his feet, and besought him with tears.] The danger was not yet over, and therefore she renews her petition in the most humble and most moving manner; for tears flowing from so great a person have a great power to move compassion. But she had not yet delivered her petition, these words only expressing what she intended and was prepared to do.

To put away the mischief of Haman the Agagite, and his device that he had devised against the Jews.] By repealing that bloody decree which he had obtained from the king, (iii. 13.)

Ver. 4. Then the king held out the golden sceptre towards Esther.] Who, it seems, had adventured to press into the king's presence once more, without being called. Which he did not take ill, but graciously invited her to come to him by this token.

So Esther arose, and stood before the king.] She rose from her knees, and stood before him to make her request.

Ver. 5. And said, If it please the king, and if I have found favour in his sight, and the thing seem right before the king, and I be pleasing in his eyes.] She uses such variety of expressions for the same thing, to insinuate herself into the king's favour, by an entire submission to his pleasure. For she knew what an unusual thing it was that she was about to desire.

Let it be written to reverse the letters devised by Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, which he wrote to destroy the Jews which are in all the king's provinces.] This edict which Haman procured, some think, was not made in such a manner as to become immutable, like that, i. 19. but might be revoked by another edict more peremptory. But this, I think, is a mistake; for it was sealed with the king's ring, which he himself saith, ver. 8. no man may reverse.

Ver. 6. For how can I endure to see the evil that shall come unto my people? or how can I endure to see the destruction of my kindred?] If she herself should be spared, she represents to him that it would break her heart to see all her kindred, nay, her whole nation, destroyed.

Ver. 7. Then the king Ahasuerus said unto Esther the queen, and to Mordecai the Jew.] Who, I suppose, was sent for to hear the king's answer to her petition.

Behold, I have given Esther the house of Haman, and him they have hanged upon the gallows, because he laid his hand upon the Jews.] That is, intended to destroy them all. By what the king had done to shew his resentment against Haman, they might easily believe he would deny them nothing that was necessary for their preservation.

Ver. 8. Write ye also for the Jews.] As Haman had done against them.

As it liketh you.] In as full words as you can desire for your safety.

In the king's name, and seal it with the king's ring.] To give it the same authority which the former writing had.

For the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, may no man reverse.] This seems to me to signify, that the king could not do what Esther desired; (ver. 5.) for it was contrary to the law of the Medes and Persians to reverse any decree. But he promises to do what he was able to make that decree ineffectual, by giving them power to defend themselves against all that should assault them. And for that end he bade them draw up a letter, in words as strong as they could devise, which would hinder the former decree from being executed, though he could not annul it. And accordingly we find, by what follows, that there is not a word said of revoking Haman's decree; but only that they should stand for their lives, and destroy all, little and great, that should attempt to execute the decree sent by Haman. Thus he chose to fill his realm with blood, rather than revoke a rash decree; which was agreeable enough to the temper of Ochus, who is represented by Valerius Maximus as very cruel. So Jacobus Capellus observes, ad A. M. 3650. where he saith he doth not remember any heathen writer who mentions such an absurd law as this of the Medes and Persians; though Ælian mentions one not much less unreasonable.

Ver. 9. Then were the king's scribes called at that time.] As they had been before by Haman to write his decree, (iii. 12.) The author of the apocryphal additions to this book hath forged a copy of this letter; wherein the king tells his subjects, that it was not levity which made him change his mind, and contradict the former decree; but he found he had been deceived by the false suggestions of those whom he highly honoured; as many other great kings had been before him. Which letter discovers the ignorance of him that wrote it, in that he calls Haman a Macedonian, who intended to dethrone him, and take away his life.

In the third month (that is the month Sivan), on the three-and-twentieth day thereof.] A little more than two months after the former decree.

And it was written (according to all that Mordecai commanded) unto the Jews.] That they might prepare themselves for their defence the best they could; and let all men know what power the king had given them.

And to the lieutenants, and the deputies and rulers of the provinces.] Who were commanded (as they were in Haman's decree, iii. 12.) to be assistant to them, and furnish them with means to defend themselves.

Which are from India unto Ethiopia, a hundred twenty and seven provinces, unto every province according to the writing thereof, and unto every people after their language, and to the Jews according to their writing, and according to their language.] This doth not prove that there were so many distinct languages spoken in his dominions, and many different ways of writing; but, as Bochartus observes, whatsoever any people spake, or what character soever they used (which might be the very same in some provinces), there were letters wrote to them in that language and in that character, (lib. i. Phaleg. cap. 16.)

Ver. 10. And he wrote in the king Ahasuerus's name, and sealed it with the king's ring; and sent letters by posts on horseback, and riders on mules, camels, and young dromedaries.] It is very difficult to render this verse word by word, though the sense be very plain. For the first words, bejad haratzim, seem to me to signify by the hand of couriers, as we now speak; for ratzim signifies runners or racers. And the next, basusim, undoubtedly signifies on horses: the former Targum saith, of horses whose spleens were cut out, and their hoofs pared; which Bochartus shews was sometimes practised, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 11. Then here follows rocheve harechesh, riders on a swift beast called reches. But what animal that was is very uncertain. Many say a dromedary; with which Drusius is unsatisfied, but leaves it in doubt, (Miscellan. cent. ii. cap. 73.) Bochartus thinks it is a word added to explain what went before, signifying that he sent the posts upon the swiftest horses; for reches was a kind of horse. (See 1 Kings iv. 28.) Our translation takes it for mules, which Ælian saith, were ἄγαν δρομαίους, exceeding swift runners, and therefore used in the Olympic races, as Bochartus observes, Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 21. Then the next word, ahashteranim (which we translate camels), he takes to be a Persian word; for there is a word at this day in that language of the same sound and signification, viz. asthera: (see his Phaleg. lib. i. cap. 15.) Then follows bene haramachim, which we translate young dromedaries; and the latter Targum, the foals of mares. And so Bochartus shews that ramec doth signify a mare; from whence he thinks the word marc among the ancient Gauls was derived, which Pausanias tells us signified a horse: for there was such a transposition of letters as is in the word forma, which comes from μορφή. In his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 42. there is extant a work of a very learned young man of our own (now with God), who, after that he had observed that neither the latter nor the ancient Jews, nor the Gemarists themselves, knew what to make of this word, hath made a long discourse about it. (See Guil. Guisius, in his Annotations upon that title in the Mischna, called Kelaim.)

The sense of the whole is, that he sent men on horseback (naked, as the first Targum will have it, that they might be lighter), and upon other creatures as swift as horses, and upon mules both old and young, according as the places were nearer or farther off. So he ordered the letters to be sent with great speed by the post, which carried them from stage to stage, till they came to the place whither they were directed.

Ver. 11. Wherein the king granted the Jews which were in every city to gather themselves together.] Notwithstanding that former decree sent by Haman.

And to stand for their life, to destroy, to slay, and to cause to perish, all the power of the people and province that would assault them, both little ones and women, and to take the spoil of them for a prey.] It must be presumed that some would obey the former order, out of their hatred to the Jews; therefore this gives them authority, if any attempt was made upon them, either in great bodies or small parties, not only to defend themselves and repel them, but to make as great a slaughter of them as they were able (for he uses many words to express the liberty he gave them to destroy their enemies), not sparing children and women; and to possess themselves of their goods, as men used to do in war, and as Haman had procured them licence to take the goods of the Jews, (iii. 13.)

Ver. 12. Upon one day, in all the provinces of king Ahasuerus, namely, upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is the month Adar.] Which day was chosen and appointed by Haman for their destruction.

Ver. 13. The copy of the writing, for a commandment to be given in every province.] To warrant them to do what was therein commanded.

Was published unto all people, and that the Jews should be ready against that day to revenge themselves on their enemies.] Furnish themselves with arms, and all things necessary for their defence, and to annoy their enemies on that day. The latter Targum makes bold to insert a copy of this letter, which imports, that the king was deceived by Haman, who persuaded him to write the former letter; but now he had hanged him, because he found the Jews to be an innocent people, worthy of his protection: and especially commended Esther and Mordecai, whom he had taken into his favour: and therefore sent this new signification of his will and pleasure to them in the behalf of the Jews. There are many expressions in it, which, no doubt, he never used; but the sense of it is good.

Ver. 14. So the posts which rode upon mules and camels went out.] Here are two of the same words used again, reches and ahashteranim; the latter of which is translated camels, as it was before; which, though they be not swift creatures, yet are very fit to travel through dry countries better than horses, being very patient of thirst and labour.

Being hastened and pressed on by the king's commandment.] Who gave them a strict charge to make all the speed possible to disperse this new order.

And the decree was given at Shushan the palace.] As that sent by Haman was; (iii. 15.) and, as I there observed, signed, it is probable, by the king's counsellors.

Ver. 15. And Mordecai went out from the presence of the king in royal apparel of blue and white.] In such robes as the princes of Persia were wont to wear.

And with a great crown of gold.] Not like that of the king's; but such a coronet as was used by the greatest peers of the realm.

And with a garment of fine linen and purple.] This was his inner garment, as the former was the outward. The former Targum hath made an extravagant description of the riches of the habit, wherein Mordecai appeared; his tunic costing four hundred and twenty talents of gold; and many such things which he saith about his sword, and the chain of gold about his neck, which it would be a vanity to mention. But one thing he saith, which is pious, if it were truly related; that Esther looking out of her window, saw him walk in this state: and he spying her, said those words of the Psalmist, (cxxiv. 6.) "Blessed be the Lord, who hath not given me a prey unto their teeth." To which she replied in the words of Psal. cxxii. 7. "Our help standeth in the Lord, who hath made heaven and earth."

And the city of Shushan rejoiced and was glad.] At his advancement, and at the fall of Haman, who designed the ruin of such an excellent person.

Ver. 16. The Jews had light, and gladness, and joy.] All these words signify the same thing, expressing the highest joy and satisfaction.

And honour.] They were much respected by the people.

Ver. 17. And in every province, and in every city, whithersoever the king's commandment and his decree came.] His commandment was, that the decree should be published with all speed; and both of them were known together: what decree the king had made, and how he pressed the delivery of it, (ver. 14.)

The Jews had joy and gladness, a feast and a good day.] Not only in Shushan, but every where else, they entertained one another, and their neighbours, with good cheer, being full of joy at this unexpected alteration of their affairs. For they doubted not this new decree of the king's would be observed by his people; and they were resolved to defend themselves against those that did not observe it, and destroy them.

And many of the people of the land became Jews.] Many of the Persians became proselytes to the Jewish religion, as both the Targums explain it; but that they were circumcised is not probable. Such persons there were in all times, especially in the days of David and Solomon, when the affairs of the Jews were very prosperous. But the Jews say they did not admit them presently, until the court of judgment approved them as sincere converts. See Selden, de Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. ii. cap. 2. 4. where he observes, that such persons ever after went by the name of Jews (as Dio himself takes notice), and were not reckoned gentiles if they fell to idolatry, but called apostates. (See p. 149, &c. 160.)

For the fear of the Jews fell upon them.] The liberty granted them by the king's edict, and the power of the queen and Mordecai, made the Persians stand in awe of them and of their God, who had so marvellously disposed things in their favour. (See the next chapter, ver. 2, 3.)

But this hath made some admire that such a marvellous and memorable thing should not be related, nor so much as touched, by any exotic writer whatsoever. Of which Jacobus Capellus hath given a plain reason, that the history of Ochus is described by no writer, but only Diodorus Siculus: and he meddles with the affairs of Persia no farther than as they cohere with the affairs of Greece.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. NOW, in the twelfth month (that is the month Adar), on the thirteenth day of the same, when the king's commandment and his decree drew near to be put in execution, in the day that the enemies of the Jews hoped to have power over them.] As they often boasted (it is likely) and threatened, since the decree, which Haman sent, came to them, for they had gotten start of the other, and put the Jews into great terror and confusion, and their enemies into high expectation of their ruin.

(Though it was turned to the contrary, that the Jews had rule over them that hated them).] As it appeared presently when the time was come for the executing both the decrees.

Ver. 2. The Jews gathered themselves together in their cities throughout all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, to lay hand on such as sought their hurt.] As some did, being possessed with hatred to them, and being combined, it is likely, upon the receipt of Haman's decree, to endeavour to destroy them. It cannot be imagined, that when Haman perished, all his friends and potentates perished with him; but he had a great party every where, some of which were so furiously enraged at his fall, that they could not contain themselves from shewing their indignation at those who were the occasion of it.

And no man could withstand them.] But they fled before them.

For the fear of them fell upon all people.] When they heard that Haman had lost all his authority and his life, and that his family was destroyed, and how Mordecai was in great power (as it here follows), and the queen herself was a Jew, no doubt it daunted all those who were disposed to execute the first decree. And though some were so desperately envenomed against the Jews, that they did rise up to assault them, yet they had not such courage as the Jews had to oppose them.

Ver. 3. And all the rulers of the provinces, and the lieutenants, and the deputies, and officers of the king, helped the Jews.] Which was a great advantage to them, and disheartened their enemies, who hoped for their assistance.

Because the fear of Mordecai fell upon them.] They were men of the times (as we speak), and would have been as ready to execute Haman's decree, if he had continued in power, as to aid the Jews in this: which it was their interest to do, being afraid to be turned out of their places by Mordecai, who was the chief minister, if they did otherwise.

Ver. 4. For Mordecai was great in the king's house.] Having the management of all the queen's affairs in the court, where she was beloved of the king; who also (it appears by the foregoing chapter, ver. 15.) gave him the highest authority in the kingdom.

And his fame went out throughout all the provinces.] It is soon known every where who is the favourite at court, which makes all addresses to be paid to him.

For this man Mordecai waxed greater and greater.] In the esteem of the people, who not only stood in awe of his power, but highly applauded his wisdom and justice in the management of all affairs: for one cannot but think he was very eminent in those noble qualities.

Ver. 5. Thus the Jews smote all their enemies with the stroke of the sword, and slaughter, and destruction.] That is, they that had no swords slew them with clubs and staves, and such-like weapons as they could procure; as the former Targum understands it.

And did what they would unto those that hated them.] Had them perfectly at their mercy.

Ver. 6. And in Shushan the palace.] That is, in the city where the king's palace was.

The Jews slew and destroyed five hundred men.] It is commonly thought that these and the rest mentioned ver. 15, 16. were such as they knew were confederate with Haman, and perhaps Amalekites (as the latter Targum saith); for Mordecai, they think it is likely, required them to kill none but those who declared themselves forward to execute Haman's decree. But I see no ground for this: if men were quiet, and did not rise up against them, they had no authority to hurt them, much less to kill them. Therefore these five hundred, and the rest killed in other places, were men who could not conceal their wicked inclinations, but openly assaulted them; and such Ahasuerus gave them power to destroy, (viii. 11.) And Dr. Alix thinks the conjecture of the Targum is right; that these five hundred men were Amalekites, who followed the fortune of Haman: and by their slaughter were accomplished the prophecies against Amalek. Some others, it is likely, joined with them; but they were the most enraged against the Jews, and the readiest to attempt their destruction.

Ver. 7. And Parshandatha, and Dalphon, and Aspatha,

Ver. 8. And Poratha, and Adalia, and Aridatha,

Ver. 9. And Parmashta, and Arisai, and Aridai, and Vajezatha.] It is too curious an observation of some of the Jews, that the letter vau before the last of these names is larger than ordinary, to shew, that though this was the youngest son of Haman, yet he was the most violent against the Jews of all the rest. Or, as others will have it (for such conceits are endless), this being the numeral letter for the number six, it signifies this was the sixth son of Haman, but placed last, out of contempt, as the vilest of them all.

Ver. 10. The ten sons of Haman the son of Hammedatha, the enemy of the Jews, slew they.] It is likely they were in the head of the rest, who were so bold as to attempt the destruction of the Jews in this city; being mad with rage, and resolved to revenge their father's death; and rather perish than not execute his design as far as they were able.

But on the spoil laid they not their hand.] The king had granted them leave to take it, (viii. 11.) but they would not meddle with it, that they might not seem to desire any thing but their own safety, and that the king might have the greater kindness for them, into whose exchequer these goods were to come, if he pleased.

Ver. 11. On that day the number of those that were slain in Shushan the palace, was brought before the king.] Who required an account, that he might know how people stood affected towards the Jews.

Ver. 12. And the king said unto Esther the queen, The Jews have slain and destroyed five hundred men in Shushan the palace, and the ten sons of Haman; what have they done in the rest of the king's provinces?] That was not yet known, but he thought in all likelihood they must have killed a great many more.

Now, what is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee; or what is thy request farther? and it shall be done.] If this did not satisfy her, he asks her what she had to desire farther, and he would not deny her.

Ver. 13. Then said Esther, If it please the king, let it be granted to the Jews which are in Shushan to do to-morrow also according unto this day's decree.] That is, kill as many of their enemies as they could find; for some that appeared against them, perhaps, escaped their hands, whom they might meet withal the next day.

And let Haman's ten sons be hanged upon the gallows.] By their father, I suppose.

Ver. 14. And the king commanded it so to be done: and the decree was given at Shushan.] That both her petition and request should be granted. This was a new decree, authorizing them to do on the fourteenth day as they had on the thirteenth.

And they hanged Haman's ten sons.] For their great infamy, that they might be exposed to public reproach, and their bodies remain unburied, being left to rot upon the gallows, or to be devoured by crows and vultures, and such-like ravenous creatures. For, though the Jews suffered none to hang on a tree (so they called a gallows) longer than till the evening of the day, whereon they were hanged, yet other nations let them hang till they were there consumed; as appears from the story of the Gibeonites, (2 Sam. xxi. 9, 10.) and from the vulgar saying among the Romans, "pascere in cruce corvos," to feed ravens on a gibbet.

Ver. 15. For the Jews that were in Shushan gathered themselves together on the fourteenth day also of the month Adar, and slew three hundred men at Shushan: but on the prey they laid not their hand.] The former Targum saith still, these three hundred men were of the family of Amalek. But whosoever they were, I take them to have been such as the day before rose up against them, but in the conflict escaped by flight, and now were found out and killed.

Ver. 16. But the other Jews that were in the king's provinces gathered themselves together, and stood for their lives.] This they did upon the thirteenth day, when they defended themselves from those that rose up against them to destroy them.

And had rest from their enemies.] Who could not stand before them; but ceased to molest them.

And slew of their foes seventy and five thousand.] There is some reason to think these were Amalekites, as the former Targum saith: for, it is likely, many of that nation might be dispersed throughout the king's provinces as well as the Jews; and being the old enemies of the Jews, might be very forward to help to destroy them. But whosoever they were, the Jews prevailed against them, and slew so many thousands, that thereby we may judge what a great number of Jews still remained in other countries, and did not return to their own.

But they laid not their hands on the prey.] It is likely Mordecai, in his letters, had charged them not to make use of the liberty the king had given them to take the spoil, (viii. 11.) because they universally avoided it.

Ver. 17. On the thirteenth day of the month Adar.] This is to be referred to the foregoing words; the slaughter was made in the provinces on the thirteenth day of this month, when they should have been destroyed themselves.

And on the fourteenth day of the same, rested they, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.] And so the Jews in the provinces made the next day a festival of rejoicing for their great deliverance. For there never was any day of joy and gladness for any blessing, without feasting and liberal entertainment of each other, and of the poor.

Ver. 18. But the Jews that were at Shushan assembled together on the thirteenth day thereof, and on the fourteenth thereof; and on the fifteenth day of the same they rested, and made it a day of feasting and gladness.] The Jews, indeed, in the city of Shushan, made the fifteenth day a festival, because they had liberty to avenge themselves of their enemies, not only on the thirteenth, but on the fourteenth, which were both days of slaughter; and therefore they rested not till the fifteenth day.

Ver. 19. Therefore the Jews of the villages, that dwelt in the unwalled towns, made the fourteenth day of the month Adar a day of gladness and feasting, and a good day, and of sending portions one to another.] This verse gives an account of the reason of the different observation of the festival in Shushan, and in the country towns throughout the king's provinces. There they had leave only on one day to slay their enemies, which was the thirteenth of Adar; therefore the fourteenth was a day of gladness to them: whereas in Shushan the fifteenth was the day of gladness, the fourteenth being, by the king's leave, made like the thirteenth, another day of slaughter. But this was at the first done thus, only of their own free accord; afterward the law established it otherwise.

A day of gladness and feasting, and a good day.] A day of thanksgiving and praise to God, as well as of feasting one with another, and of sending portions to their neighbours out of their good cheer, that the meaner sort might feast and rejoice also. And as, to add to their joy, they sent them meat from their tables; so the Jews have made a constitution, that they should make a collection of money to send to the poor at this time of the year, that they may provide themselves things necessary to make a feast. Which money it is unlawful (as Guilielmus Schickardus observes) to apply to any other use, but only the making themselves merry at this time. (See Nehem. viii. 10.)

Ver. 20. And Mordecai wrote these things, and sent letters unto all the Jews that were in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, both nigh and far.] That which they had done at the first voluntarily, he thought good to turn into a law, and sent it into the whole realm.

Ver. 21. To stablish this among them, that they should keep the fourteenth day of the month Adar, and the fifteenth day of the same, yearly.] But, to make these more solemn times, they now keep a fast before the feast (after the example of Esther) on the thirteenth day of the month Adar.

Ver. 22. As the days wherein the Jews rested from their enemies, and the month which was turned unto them from sorrow to joy, and from mourning into a good day; that they should make them days of feasting and joy, and of sending portions one to another, and gifts to the poor.] For in the provinces they had done their work before the fourteenth day, and then rested and rejoiced: but in Shushan not before the fifteenth; and then they rejoiced there.

Ver. 23. And the Jews undertook to do as they had begun, and as Mordecai had written unto them.] That is, to keep these days as festivals every where throughout all generations.

Ver. 24. Because Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, the enemy of all the Jews, had devised against the Jews to destroy them, and had cast Pur (that is the lot) to consume them, and to destroy them:

Ver. 25. But when Esther came before the king, he commanded, by letters, that his wicked device, which he devised against the Jews, should return upon his own head, and that he and his sons should be hanged on the gallows.] These two verses give an account why this festival was ordained, which they took care should be understood by all posterity: who observe it at this day; and tell us it consists in these three things: in reading, in rest from labour, and in feasting. The reading begins in the evening, as soon as the stars appear; when the history of Haman is read from the beginning to the end, out of a Hebrew manuscript written on parchment: for it is not lawful to read it out of a printed Bible, no more than they do the law itself, as Schickard observes out of their writers, who say, three prayers go before this reading. In the first of which they praise God for counting them worthy to attend this Divine service: in the second, they thank him for the miraculous preservation of their ancestors: and in the third, that they have lived to observe another festival in memory of it. After this they go to supper upon spoon-meats; and next morning to the synagogue, where the history is read over again with the same ceremonies. After which they have done with religion and piety, and spend the two days in idleness, and eating, and drinking. Surenhuysius hath given a full account of this reading, and the benedictions, in his notes upon the Megillah, p. 387. And for their rest and feasting, they say in their books, that the first is kept so sacredly, that they will not so much as set or sow any thing in their garden on these days; but play at chess, and such-like games, or spend the time in music and dancing, till it be time to feast. And then they indulge themselves so far, that they think it not unlawful to drink so much, as not to be able to distinguish between the blessing of Mordecai and the curse of Haman, as they themselves speak. Insomuch, that our learned primate Usher calls this feast, The Bacchanals of the Jews.

Ver. 26. Wherefore they called these days Purim, after the name of Pur.] A Persian word, signifying a lot.

Therefore, for all the words of this letter, and of that which they had seen concerning this matter, and which had come unto them.] This seems to refer to the foregoing words; wherefore they called these days Purim, because of what was contained in the letters of Mordecai, and because of what they had seen when these things fell out, and what they heard reported of them in the places where they could not see them. But we take them to be the reason of what follows; viz. of the keeping these days.

Ver. 27. The Jews ordained, and took upon them, and upon their seed, and upon all such as joined themselves unto them.] All that should become proselytes to their religion.

So as it should not fail, that they would keep these two days according to their writing, and according to their appointed time, every year.] According as Mordecai had written, so they engaged without fail to keep these two days in the time appointed; viz. on the fourteenth day they kept the festival in the country all over the king's dominions, and on the fifteenth they kept it in Shushan. The former of these the Jews now call in their calendar the lesser feast of Purim, and the latter the greater feast.

Ver. 28. And that these days should be remembered, and kept throughout every generation, every family, every province, and every city.] Accordingly at this day they kept this festival, as they did in more ancient times: for in the second book of Maccabees, xv. 37. we find, that Judas having obtained a great victory over Nicanor, they ordained it should be commemorated upon the thirteenth of Adar, the day before the feast of Mordecai, which was this of Purim. This shews, that in those days they kept this deliverance in memory by celebrating this feast, and that the thirteenth of Adar was not then a fast.

And that these days of Purim should not fail from among the Jews, nor the memorial of them perish from their seed.] This is but a repetition of what was said before, to make them more seriously attend to their obligation; which was laid upon them all throughout all generations. Accordingly now, as they tell us in their books, the little children, the women, they that are base born, and servants, &c. are bound to keep this feast.

Ver. 29. Then Esther the queen, the daughter of Abihail, and Mordecai the Jew, wrote with all authority, to confirm this second letter of Purim.] These days were first recommended to their observation by the authority of Mordecai, ver. 20. But either they were neglected, or sometime intermitted, or were thought not to be sufficiently established; therefore the first order was confirmed and ratified by a second, which was backed by the authority of the queen. And the opinion of Maimonides is not improbable, that this was also an ordinance of the prophets; viz. Haggai, Zechariah, and others, that lived in the days of Esther. But this cannot be true; for they were dead long before this time.

Ver. 30. And he sent the letters unto all the Jews, to the hundred twenty and seven provinces of the kingdom of Ahasuerus.] And consequently as far as Jerusalem; for Syria and Judea were among his provinces, and the Jews should have been killed there, as well as in the rest of his dominions: and were bound to thank God for their preservation throughout all ages; for otherwise they had not been any longer a people.

With words of peace and truth.] Full of sincere love and affectionate desires of their happiness. "Verbis amicis et sinceris." Or, as others will have it, wishing their prosperity, and exhorting them to live in love and peace, and to be faithful in their religion; and particularly in keeping their promise of observing these days. But after all, Conradus Pellicanus seems to me to have guessed the best at the meaning of these words peace and truth; which he thinks were the salutation at the top of the letter.

Ver. 31. To confirm these days of Purim in their times appointed, according as Mordecai the Jew and Esther the queen had enjoined them, and as they had decreed for themselves, and for their seed, the matters of the fastings and their cry.] Some learned men understand these words, as if they meant, that these days of Purim were therefore appointed, that they might be a memorial of that deliverance, which was obtained of God by fastings and prayers unto him; which, if it be admitted, gives no ground to conclude from thence, that they observed a fast upon this occasion, as well as a feast. The Jews, indeed, think quite otherwise; and, if we may believe their calendar, have ever since kept a fast on the thirteenth of Adar, which was the day appointed for their extirpation. Upon the hearing of which decree, all places were filled with doleful lamentations, there being no help for them if God did not deliver them; unto whom therefore they cried with fasting and prayer. In memory of which, they undertook to keep a yearly fast, as well as days of feasting and gladness, which immediately ensued. But their calendar is a new piece, and of no credit at all; nor do we find the least indication that Esther or Mordecai enjoined any thing but a feast, no mention being made of a fast in their decree: and therefore it was voluntarily undertaken by the Jews themselves in after-ages, as this verse seems to import. Which the former Targum thus paraphrases (and the latter to the same purpose): "To confirm these days of Purim, as Mordecai the Jew, and Esther the queen, appointed concerning them; and as the Jews ordained for themselves, and for their posterity, to keep in memory the matter of their fastings and their prayers."

Ver. 32. And the decree of Esther confirmed these matters of Purim; and it was written in the book.] Either she made a new decree by her sole authority to enforce the former; or the meaning is, that she commanded the forementioned decree, which confirmed the days of Purim, to be recorded and made a public act, in a book where, perhaps, this whole history was contained. Which record testified in time to come what passed in her days; viz. their danger, and their wonderful deliverance, and the decree of Esther concerning the observation of these days.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. AND the king Ahasuerus laid a tribute upon the land, and upon the isles of the sea.] Having great occasion for money, he laid a new tax upon all his provinces, both in the continent (as we speak) and in the isles of the sea, belonging to his dominions. Some think, that the imposts which he released to his people at the marriage of Esther, (ii. 18.) which continued for some years, were now revived; and that this is all which is meant by these words. But this doth not well agree with this phrase, of laying a tribute on them. Our primate Usher understands by the isles here mentioned, those in the Ægean Sea, which were conquered by Darius Hystaspes, who was the first that laid a tribute on his subjects; for Cyrus, and Cambyses before him, laid none; but, being begun, they continued it to the reign of this king, ad Annum Per. Julian. 4219. Strabo saith, (lib. xv. p. 735.) that the tribute exacted on the sea-coast was paid in silver; but that from the land, in such commodities as every country afforded, in wool, drugs, cattle, &c.

Ver. 2. And all the acts of his power, and of his might.] Which was so great, that the Egyptians in their hieroglyphics represented Ochus by a sword. And Plutarch (as Jacobus Capellus observes) calls him the most terrible of all the Persian kings.

And the declaration of the greatness of Mordecai, whereunto the king advanced him, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia?] These words signify, that as this king did great things, so they were to be ascribed very much to the management of Mordecai, after he was advanced to the highest authority in the kingdom. But it was not the design of the author of this history to relate such things; for which he refers to the public records of the kingdom, which were kept in some part of the king's house, (it appears from vi. 1.) and were extant in those days when this book was written.

Ver. 3. For Mordecai the Jew was next unto king Ahasuerus.] I cannot but observe here, in the conclusion of this book, that Mordecai is so often called the Jew by this author, (see ix. 29. 31.) that it hath inclined me to think it was not written by one of that nation, but by some proselyte of Persia who was converted, as many were at this time, (viii. 17.) to the Jewish religion. Some of which might be in these times divinely inspired, as Nicholas, a proselyte of Antioch, was in the apostles' days, (Acts vi. 5.) But I have no authority for this, which I mention as a mere conjecture.

And great among the Jews, and accepted of the multitude of his brethren.] His greatness did not make him forget his brethren; by whom he was highly esteemed, and much honoured by every one of them.

Seeking the wealth of his people.] And no wonder he was so acceptable, for his study was how to do them good.

And speaking peace to all his seed.] Advising and promoting whatsoever was for their advantage; and speaking still to the king for that which might tend to the happiness and prosperity of his nation, which he advanced to the utmost of his power. Unto which a most earnest desire of the coming of the Messiah contributed exceedingly; and the serious study of the law, which he recommended to them, as the only means of living happily. Thus Conradus Pellicanus concludes his commentary on this book; but where he found this I cannot tell. It is only highly probable, that so good a man as Mordecai was very solicitous they should be obedient to the law of Moses (as Malachi was), and live in expectation of the Messiah, concerning whom Moses prophesied. For, as Epiphanius, and Seder Olam, and others, observe, this book of Esther is the last canonical book of the Old Testament; and the nearer they approached to the coming of Christ, the more desirous holy men were to see him. Others, indeed, think Malachi is the last Divine writer; but, on the other side, it seems probable, that he, having taken no notice of the deliverance under Esther, prophesied some time before it.
